REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Thursday, July 17, 1980

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT
(Statutory Instruments No. 10)

1. Your Committee presents this Report under the terms of reference set out in its First Report (Statutory Instruments No. 9) and approved by both Houses on June 4, 1980. Those terms of reference read as follows:

Your Committee also reports that in relation to its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, 1970-71-72, c. 38 it was empowered during the Fourth Session of the Thirtieth Parliament and during the First Session of the Thirty-First Parliament "to conduct a comprehensive study of the means by which Parliament can better oversee the government regulatory process and in particular to enquire into and report upon:

1. the appropriate principles and practices to be observed,

(a) in the drafting of powers enabling delegates of Parliament to make subordinate laws;

(b) in the enactment of statutory instrument;

(c) in the use of executive regulation—including delegated powers and subordinate laws; and the manner in which Parliamentary control should be effected in respect of the same.

2. the role, functions and powers of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments."

Your Committee was unable to complete its study and therefore recommends that the same Order of Reference together with the evidence adduced thereon during the last two Parliaments be again referred to it.

Further reports may be submitted to the Houses as circumstances require.

2. Your Committee's predecessor introduced its general report, the Second Report of the 1976-77 Session, with the following sentences which it is important to reiterate:

3. The Committee's primary function is to maintain a watch on the subordinate law made by delegates of Parliament. In the modern era Parliament has been forced by considerations of time and lack of technical and scientific expertise to leave to subordinates the making of detailed rules and regulations and to confine itself increasingly to setting the main structures of legislative interventions in society. However, Parliament retains responsibility for the law of the land and to the extent that those detailed rules and regulations are not subject to Parliamentary scrutiny. Parliament is forfeiting its effective right to settle the laws that must be obeyed by the people. Parliamentary scrutiny of all such subordinate or delegated law is now an accepted part of the Parliamentary tradition in the Commonwealth.

14. With the exception of statutory instruments made under the Royal Prerogative, which are original or primary legislation no less so than are statutes, all statutory instruments subject to the Committee's scrutiny fall into that class known as subordinate or delegated legislation. The Committee wishes to emphasize at the outset that subordinate legislation is, and must be regarded as being, subordinate, for otherwise Parliamentary supremacy will have been abandoned. The Committee can make this point no more clearly than did the Committee on Ministers' Powers (Donoughmore Committee) in 1932:

"The power to legislate, when delegated by Parliament, differs from Parliament's own power to legislate. Parliament is supreme and its power to legislate is therefore unlimited. It can do the greatest things; it can do the smallest. It can make general laws . . . it can make a particular exception out of them in favour of a particular individual. It can provide . . . for the payment of old age pensions to all who fulfill the statutory conditions; it can also provide—and has in fact provided—for boiling the Bishop of Rochester's cook to death. But any power delegated by Parliament is necessarily a subordinate power, because it is limited by the terms of the enactment whereby it is delegated."

The maintenance of parliamentary supremacy and of parliamentary democracy is imperative. The inability of Parliament to consider or to make all the laws necessary in the modern state should not lead to a lessening of the fairness, participation and procedural safeguards in law making which now attend the passing of statutes, but not the making of subordinate legislation by Parliament's delegates. The aggregation of power in the hands of the Crown and its servants, whether Ministers or public servants, as law making delegates of Parliament should not lead to a decrease in accountability to Parliament for law making. Delegated law making is far too wide-spread a practice to be without democratic participation, procedural safeguards and parliamentary accountability. Yet, our present practices are based on the premisses that delegated legislation is abnormal, and that it is confined to matters of detail. There can be no doubt that delegated legislation is now the ordinary and indispensable way of making the bulk of the non-common law of the land. It is beyond question that subordinate legislation is not confined to detail and more often than not embodies and effects policy. The making and control of subordinate law must therefore be regularized and brought into harmony with our constitutional order.

3. There has been much talk of late of "regulatory reform" and of the impact of "regulation" on the public sector. The burden of the discussion has related to the content, burden and cost of the regulatory policies rather than to the legality or propriety of particular regulatory methods. There is a considerable feeling abroad that the policy and cost of regulation should be scrutinized and made subject to the contribution of persons beyond the Government's employ. To prevent confusion as to the subject matter of this Report, it is important to draw some preliminary distinctions. The process of "regulation" as it has been debated is not confined to the making of subordinate laws by delegates of Parliament. Regulation of an activity or a sector of the economy may be achieved by the passing of an Act of Parliament, by orders or decisions of a regulatory agency such as the Canadian Transport Commission, by the application of a settled policy whether announced or unannounced, by changes in tax policy or the giving of incentives and subsidies upon conditions, by government ownership, and by the making of subordinate laws, commonly called regulations, by a delegate of Parliament, usually the Governor in Council, but sometimes a Minister or an agency. Under its permanent terms of reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act—(1), your Committee is concerned with the subordinate law making of Parliament's delegates. Bodies such as the Economic Council of Canada in its "Regulation Reference" are concerned with the much broader field of regulation, however achieved, of people, of industry and of commerce, of whole sectors of the economy. Your Committee welcomes the scrutiny of the worth, effectiveness and cost of government regulation and sees it as complementary to its own work which concerns subordinate legislation only, the protection of the rights and liberties of the subject and the reassertion of parliamentary sovereignty.

4. Your Committee is well aware of and laments the bewildering terminological confusion that muddles all reference to subordinate or delegated legislation. The confusion is worse compounded by the complexity of the definitions of "statutory instrument" and "regulation" in the Statutory Instruments Act and by the practice of embodying almost all executive acts in Orders in Council. In an attempt to simplify matters, Appendix I on terminology is attached. It should be noted that not all subordinate legislation is included within the definition of "statutory instrument" as the Crown now applies it. Nevertheless, in this Report your Committee deals with all subordinate or delegated legislation however called.

5. Its special terms of reference call on your Committee to report on its role and function. Recommendations in that behalf appear throughout this Report. It is appropriate, in addition, to make some general remarks about the Committee which, after six and one half years of active operation, can not be said to be well known. Its activities are followed by a small circle in the Public Service, more especially in the Department of Justice. It has influence in some quarters but it has not the impact of its counterparts overseas, which influenced the recommendations of the MacGuigan Committee—(2). The reasons for this unhappy situation are several. In part, it stems from the need to work in a setting where subordinate laws are seen only after they are made and in which there are no sanctions to Parliament's hand if a particular subordinate law is disapproved of. There are certainly limitations inherent in the Statutory Instruments Act which were not foreseen by the MacGuigan Committee especially in the parliamentary scrutiny. There are also traditions in the Public Service, most notably in the drafting of both statutes and subordinate legislation, which are more in keeping with administrative ease than accountability to Parliament and observance of the law. The absence of a clearly articulated philosophy of respect for liberty and of propriety in the activities of the executive Government of Canada is a most serious problem. Your Committee is also aware that it needs to tighten up its own procedure in the light of the past years' experiences. And it is doing so. Beyond that there need to be the major changes recommended in this Report.

A. LIBERTY, AND THE PROPRIETY AND MERITS OF SUBORDINATE LAW

6. Subordinate legislation is an historically accepted means of governance. There is no longer any point in arguing that it is fundamentally improper or that it should be used only occasionally or for mere matters of detail. What is essential is to surround the making of subordinate legislation with procedural safeguards and measures of control so that the rights and liberties of the subject, which it is the object of our constitutional order to protect while maintaining a viable system of government, may be secured as well under subordinate legislation as under statute. Subordinate legislation must not become a means, even unwittingly, of suppressing rights and liberties or of subverting parliamentary supremacy over the law. The Crown's power has never stood higher; the potential for its abuse has never been greater.

7. Subordinate legislation may be inescapable and the implementation through it of policy, even policy never debated by Parliament, may be inevitable; but that is no reason to allow subordinate legislation to be made without adequate check, without any democratic element in its formation, and embodying any provisions Parliament's delegate chooses. There are still matters which are not meet to be dealt with by delegated legislation and which should be soberly weighed by Parliament. The confining of subordinate law to its proper sphere, and the regularisation of its use will be impossible of accomplishment if Parliament continues in the habit of giving larger and vaguer grants of law making power to the executive in skeletal statutes many of which are devoid of any clear enunciation of policy. Such blanket grants of executive power as are contained in, for example, the Petroleum Administration Act, the Energy Supplies Allocation Act or the Fisheries Act, were rarely made under the Tudor sovereigns who certainly prized administrative convenience and jealously guarded their control of the machinery of state. It is odd that in a supposedly democratic age government values its convenience, its control of the administrative system and its monopoly of information no less. What future can there be for individual liberty, for the rights of minorities and for democratic and participatory traditions if the highest end of government is its own ease, the exercise of power without public accountability? The need to abide by procedural rules, the stern restraint of the rule of law, the control of arbitrary if well meaning acts, all these may make government awkward. But the rights and liberties of the governed require that government not be untrammelled. Liberty is usually prickly and often untidy and asymmetrical. It wants, as Professor Hugh Trevor-Roper has observed, that certain beauty of mathematical order so beloved of those who respect power and what it can achieve.

8. In recommending more parliamentary vigilance, especially of enabling powers for the making of subordinate law, your Committee is not blind to the exigencies of the parliamentary timetable or to the pressures on the Houses' time. Nonetheless, a way can be found to direct Parliament's attention to grants of subordinate law making powers in Bills after second reading through their scrutiny by a Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Review which should replace the present Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. The deficiencies your Committee and its predecessors have pointed out in existing statutes could be corrected by amending Bills introduced in the Senate upon the recommendation of the Regulatory Review Committee and made the subject of all-party agreement.

9. In acknowledging the present concern with the policy content of subordinate laws, your Committee is not losing sight of the need to police the actual means used to achieve policy ends. Policy is directed to the well being of the national interest, or to that of a particular class or group of the nation. As such, its ends are seen as desirable in themselves and there is often a not unexpected impatience with those who, defending ancient rights and liberties, oppose what to administrators seem to be the most direct and effective means of achieving the policy. It is all too easy to assume that the means employed to achieve the ends of policy are of little consequence and a mere matter of administrative convenience. This is a criticism which can be directed not only at well intentioned and hard pressed servants of the Crown but also at commentators and academic political scientists who find the policy content or ends of subordinate law fascinating and the propriety of the means used to achieve those ends of little consequence. The hard won rights and liberties of the people secured over centuries of constitutional conflict depend upon a constant vigilance to prevent illegal and illegitimate means. That is why parliamentary scrutiny committees on delegated legislation have traditionally concerned themselves with the means of effecting policies as set down in subordinate law and not with the policy ends themselves.

10. Your Committee is vitally concerned to see that the means used are legitimate ones, means that are not simply lawful on an interpretation however limited or stretched of enabling powers, but are also legitimate given the underlying principles and standards of Canada's constitutional order, which is based on individual liberty in person and estate. Even in the short run means can be as important as the ends being pursued, for the means may well clash with the underlying constitutional imperative of liberty. In the long term the means used to achieve government's ends can be far more important than the ends themselves. It is no exaggeration to say that the evolution of our constitutional system since Magna Carta has consisted of a series of controversies and conflicts over means. It is very easy for those responsible for fisheries policy or the protection of wildlife, or for those charged with rendering manpower mobile, checking illegal work by immigrants, trying to reduce Post Office deficits or with protecting Canadian industries from overseas competition to come to see their policy objectives as all important and to consider the means employed to achieve those objectives as subsidiary or even unimportant matters. While administrative efficacy may be the dominant objective of the administrative process, for the community as a whole it is only one object and particularly when seen historically, not necessarily the most important one. The means employed in the administrative process bear upon the individual and since these means are critically important they must be policed. In an historically derived constitutional order such as ours liberty, order, harmony and constitutional balance require that means be legitimately founded in the underlying principles and standards of that constitutional order.

11. A parliamentary democracy also requires that means be subject to public scrutiny and parliamentary control. It also requires that the ends being sought through subordinate legislation be publicly acknowledged and that the Government be accountable for them to Parliament. Fairness requires that subordinate laws be not harsh and oppressive and be made by procedures that are fair, open and responsive to the people that the legislation will affect, whether for good or ill. If all citizens have an interest and a democratic right to concern themselves with the policy furthered by a subordinate law, the protection of the rights and liberties of the subject and hence our constitutional order is also at issue in every exercise of a power to make a subordinate law. While few may be affected by a particular end that is sought, all have an interest in the legality and propriety of the law and the procedures followed in its making.

12. There are many who believe that parliamentary scrutiny is a slight thing if it does not concern itself with the policy of subordinate legislation as well as with its legality and propriety as we have explained it. Your Committee favours parliamentary scrutiny of the policy or merits of subordinate legislation, especially where Parliament has never debated the policy or where the subordinate laws are made under a statute devoid of any policy content. Thus, policy scrutiny of the fishery regulations, to take but one example, would be a very worthwhile endeavour. The making of extensive subordinate laws on important matters such as Via Rail Canada Inc. under Votes in Appropriation Acts also produces laws and policies never debated by Parliament. Your Committee's predecessor called for an end to this practice inimical to parliamentary sovereignty. It should stop and all existing subordinate laws made under Votes should be the subject of review as to merits by the appropriate Parliamentary Standing Committees.

13. Questions have been raised as to whether your Committee should concern itself with the policies or merits of the thousand or so subordinate laws that come before it each year. While this might be a glamorous task and would perhaps rescue the Committee from that obscurity in which its predecessors languished, it would be beyond its capabilities. This is so even though a large part of the subordinate laws made each year consists of relatively straightforward amendments to existing subordinate legislation. Your Committee is well aware that its statutory terms of reference in section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act do not preclude a review of any piece of subordinate legislation on its merits if the Houses so agree. Nevertheless, your Committee believes that it is more appropriate for subordinate legislation to be scrutinized by the appropriate Standing Committees of the Houses as to merits as discussed in paragraph 16 below. The Regulatory Review Committee should continue to review in terms of criteria such as those now used by your Committee and which are found in Appendix II.

14. Your Committee believes that the appropriate stage for the review of subordinate law as to its policy and merits is well before it is finally made. Your Committee also believes that more effective than any scheme of parliamentary scrutiny of the policy of a proposed subordinate law that can now be devised is an obligation to make that proposed law public, to state the reasons for its making and to consider representations from the public, whether individuals or groups. Consequently, a later section of this Report deals in detail with a mandatory notice and comment procedure for all subordinate law. After a subordinate law has been in force for a reasonable time, its effectiveness should be evaluated. Parliamentary Standing Committees could serve a useful role as the public fora in which the continued need for a particular policy and the effectiveness of the subordinate legislation could be scrutinized.

15. Your Committee also recommends in paragraphs 24-30 infra that disallowance of subordinate legislation that has been made and the affirmation of draft subordinate laws (commonly called negative and affirmative vote procedures) be established as regular and invariable parts of the Canadian system of subordinate law. The debate on a resolution to affirm a subordinate law and the actual disallowance procedure recommended by your Committee should provide scope for interested parliamentarians to raise the merits and policy of subordinate legislation. Your Committee has noted the failure of a special merits committee at Westminster where there has been no referral of subordinate legislation to appropriate Standing Committees. It has also noted that while disallowance has frequently been moved and carried in the Senate of the Commonwealth of Australia on grounds of illegality and impropriety, it has but rarely been invoked on ground of merits. Your Committee considers, therefore, that it cannot at this stage recommend the establishment of any new Committee to scrutinize merits. It can do no more now than to recommend referral to appropriate Standing Committees and a system which allows for pre-making scrutiny of proposed subordinate laws by the public and for affirmation and disallowance in the Houses. It will be up to the members of the Houses using these procedures to make good their oft repeated complaints that policy of which they disapprove is settled in regulations by bureaucrats.

16. One proposal that has been aired from time to time for the review of merits is that all subordinate legislation should be referred to the appropriate Standing Committees of the Houses for review on the merits and as to policy. With this your Committee agrees. It would also be desirable to have policies reviewed from time to time to assess their effectiveness and the need to continue them. Your Committee cannot pretend, however, that it is very sanguine about the effectiveness of references to Standing Committees while the membership of Committees of the House of Commons remains so large and subject to frequent replacements, and the Committees themselves lack adequate technical assistance. In any event, it would seem to be a Herculean task to review the merits of and to hold hearings on all regulations, even all new regulations. Perhaps all that can reasonably be aimed for is the review by Parliamentary Standing Committees of the merits and policy of selected subordinate laws. The Rules and Standing Orders of the Houses should be amended to allow such scrutiny and review by Standing Committees either on their own initiative or on reference from the Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Review. Committees conducting such reviews would need to guard against the danger of their scrutiny of policy being too much influenced by their expert staff who might be simply endeavouring to have their own personal judgments substituted for those of servants of the Crown to whom Parliament had originally delegated subordinate law making authority.

17. Prevention is to be desired above cure and your Committee exhorts the Houses to a much more rigorous examination and scrutiny of the enabling powers in Bills and to insist on clear statements of policy in statutes. The Houses' study of Bills would be greatly facilitated if, when enabling powers are being sought, the proposed subordinate laws to be made under them were to be tabled and studied by the apppropriate

Standing Committees at the same time they are studying the Bills. The mandatory notice and comment procedure which your Committee later recommends should act to reduce significantly the number of instances in which regulations are not drafted by the time Bills reach the Committee stage.

18. In addition to parliamentary review, subordinate laws should not, save in exceptional cases, be made at all unless and until there has been an opportunity for public representations on the draft laws. The public can have an influence on Bills through their elected representative and through representations at the Committee stage. Procedures should be in place to afford some approximate opportunity in respect of subordinate laws. Procedure is the handmaid of liberty and your Committee makes no excuse for paying so much attention to it in what follows.

B. CONTROL OF SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION AND LAW MAKING

19. A casual reader of the Statutory Instruments Act might be impressed by the apparent safeguards it contains and by the fact that most subordinate laws in Canada are made not by individual Ministers but by the Governor in Council. The true position is, however, not at all reassuring. The Statutory Instruments Act provides for the scrutiny of draft "regulations", a subclass of "statutory instruments" by no means including all subordinate laws, by the Legal Advisers to the Privy Council Office who are in fact officers of the Department of Justice, as are the legal officers who draft regulations in Departments and many Agencies. It is doubtless the case that the Legal Advisers have managed to weed out many offensive or ultra vires provisions in regulations. Your Committee perhaps flatters itself that its scrutiny has assisted the Legal Advisers in their own work. It must be emphasized, however, that the Legal Advisers can not prevent a regulation being made if the sponsoring Department wishes to put it forward despite the Advisers' adverse report. This, the Committee believes, rarely occurs. The effectiveness of the internal scrutiny of the Legal Advisers is severely hampered because both they and the departmental legal officers are bound by the very traditions of drafting and received legal opinions of the Department of Justice which your Committee has found to be among the chief causes of objectionable provisions in regulations—(3). The fact is that your Committee and its predecessors have objected to a far higher proportion of the regulations they have scrutinized than have their counterparts in the United Kingdom, Australia and Ontario. Your Committee can only conclude that the existing means of checking and controlling subordinate legislation in Canada as to its legality and propriety, while a considerable improvement over the situation existing before the passage of the Statutory Instruments Act, could still be improved further. There is, as so many are now aware, no check or control as to merits or policy.

20. In Canada most regulations, and hence subordinate laws, are made by Order in Council of the Governor in Council. It is, therefore, commonly said that the regulations are made by the Cabinet. Your Committee thinks it important to place on public record that this is not strictly so. Since the Governor General does not preside at his Council, his assent to an Order in Council follows upon its earlier approval by Cabinet members. Very few draft regulations are actually considered by the Cabinet as a deliberative body. Some of these are first considered by Cabinet Subcommittees. By far the greatest number of regulations is recommended for His Excellency's approval by the Special Committee of Council which consists of ten Ministers with a quorum of four. The extent to which draft regulations are scrutinized as to policy, legality and propriety by the Special Committee will depend upon its membership. The decision as to whether a regulation should be considered by a Cabinet Committee or direct by the Cabinet rests fundamentally with the sponsoring Minister according to his view of the regulation's importance and implications. Occasionally, the Cabinet itself may decide that particular regulations when drafted should come before it. Your Committee records this information merely to disabuse the Houses and the public, if that be necessary, of the notion that all the Cabinet members turn their collective attention to each of the thousand and more regulations made each year. The way in which regulations by Order in Council are in fact made gives but little support to the view that there are safeguards in vesting subordinate law making powers in the Governor in Council rather than in individual Ministers. Furthermore, it does nothing to satisfy the need for scrutiny of subordinate laws both as proposed and as made, by the public and particularly by Parliament.

21. Under the Statutory Instruments Act, section 26, your Committee is granted neither power nor jurisdiction to do anything in particular with or to statutory instruments, the very nature and definition of which are obscure. The Committee scrutinizes regulations, other published statutory instruments and such other statutory instruments as it finds after they have been made, and on occasion reports some of them to the Houses either in special reports or in a general report.

22. Parliament has no greater power than has the Committee. Only in twenty-one instances under the Statutes of Canada to the close of the 1976-77 Session is Parliament allowed the opportunity to disallow a statutory instrument or to prevent its coming into or continuing in force by refusing to affirm it—(4). No general machinery is in place under Statute or in the Rules of the Senate or the Standing Orders of the House of Commons to require a debate to be held on a motion to disallow a statutory instrument, in those cases where such is allowed, or to force the motion to come to a vote.

23. While the efforts of your Committee's predecessors to secure changes in particular statutory instruments and in the general principles used in drafting and publishing them have had varying degrees of success often depending on the Department involved the only sanction open to your Committee is to report to the Houses. This is unnecessary in the case of those Departments and agencies which are co-operative with the Committee and of no consequence for those which habitually ignore the Committee's principles and requests or are dilatory in honouring their undertakings to amend or to promote necessary statutory changes. The Committee's methods of proceeding, as outlined in the Second Report for the 1976-77 Session are necessarily not geared to enforcement, or to the control of delegated legislation but to suasion, re-education and scrutiny. These latter functions are not to be despised, and in the long run the re-educative function may be the most potent of all, but they are not enough. There should be means by which Parliament can control the executive in its exercise of the subordinate law-making function Parliament has delegated to it.

24. Your Committee has taken note of the procedures used for this purpose in the United Kingdom and in the Commonwealth of Australia, which are summarized in Appendix III to this Report. It considers that a power in the Houses, soberly used, to disallow subordinate legislation, is essential in Canada and that on far more occasions than at present Parliament should be called upon to affirm a subordinate law before it can have legal life. Your Committee recommends that all subordinate legislation not subject to a statutory affirmative procedure—(5) should be subject to being disallowed on resolution of either House and that the Executive be barred from re-making any statutory instrument so disallowed for a period of six months from its disallowance. Your Committee further recommends that if any resolution for disallowance of a statutory instrument is moved, and is not withdrawn, the statutory instrument should be deemed to have been disallowed if a debate on the resolution does not take place and culminate in a vote within a fixed number of sitting days.

25. Disallowance is, in your Committee's view, a curative measure and prevention is much to be desired. Prevention of ultra vires, improper or illegitimate subordinate laws will not be possible if scrutiny of all of them is forbidden before they are made. The Committee realizes that pre-making scrutiny of subordinate legislation is not in all cases possible or even desirable. Indeed, your Committee recommends in paragraph 34 below that a special type of subordinate law should be provided for in the Fisheries Act which by its very nature could not be seen by any parliamentary body before it is made. Yet the Committee is firmly convinced that the publication of draft subordinate legislation is not only possible in most cases but is highly desirable and makes extensive recommendations to that end in Section C below. Such a practice would allow persons or groups interested to make representations and objections to laws which usually affect them more closely than do statutes in the passage of which they often do have an opportunity to give expression to their view. More importantly from Parliament's point of view, publication in draft would allow Parliament to be consulted through the need to have a draft subordinate law affirmed by both Houses before it could become law and through the opportunity to move for disallowance before the law could take effect as under the United Kingdom "21 day" rule set out in Appendix III. Clearly, many statutory instruments are wholly non-controversial and unobjectionable and affirmation would be granted without demur. But the opportunity would exist for Parliament to exercise its sovereign powers. Another important consideration is that whereas your Committee, in keeping with the tradition of bodies of its kind, does not comment on policy, affirmation, as indeed disallowance, could be used by any member of either House to debate the policy of an instrument. The appropriate Standing Committees of either House could consider the merits of a draft subordinate law and its chairman move disallowance or speak against affirmation. In this regard, your Committee wishes to re-emphasize that many regulations are made to give effect to policies which are not embodied in any statute and which Parliament has never considered or even had the opportunity to consider. Under the Canadian habit of using statutes and Votes in Appropriation Acts merely as vehicles for the conferring of powers on the executive, this situation is only too common.

26. It is not possible to specify all those cases in which affirmation would be possible and desirable, although its virtue in cases of subordinate laws made under skeletal statutes is obvious. Affirmation would also be highly desirable in cases where the exercise of enabling powers may

(a) substantially affect the provisions of the enabling or any other statute;

(b) impose or increase taxation, fees or charges;

(c) lay down a policy not clearly identifiable in the enabling Act or make a new departure in policy; or

(d) involve considerations of special importance.

To a great extent the decision as to whether or not to insert in a Bill a provision for affirmation of subordinate legislation must be left to the bona fides of the government of the day and to the parliamentary draftsmen. But your Committee recommends that a commitment be made by the Government to use the affirmation procedure where practicable and to follow a 21 day rule wherever possible, even in cases where the notice and comment provisions your Committee recommends are not applied. The Committee recommends that whenever draft instruments are published it should have jurisdiction to scrutinize them as to legality and propriety, to report to the Houses upon them and to make representations to the sponsoring Departments and Agencies. The appropriate Standing Committees should be entitled to scrutinize, report and make representations as to merits.

27. A government will normally wish to see a resolution to affirm a draft subordinate law come to a vote. With the exception of one matter, your Committee is not of a mind at present to recommend any special, required procedure for dealing with affirmative resolutions in either House beyond that already contained in section 28.1 of the Interpretation Act—(6). The Rules and Standing Orders of the Houses should be amended to facilitate that procedure. The Committee notes that the Interpretation Act procedure was not used in the case of the Anti-Inflation Act—(7) where a different procedure was provided for. What must be avoided at all costs is a proliferation of special affirmation procedures applying to different subordinate laws. The one addition which should clearly be made to the present Interpretation Act procedure is the addition of a rule that no debate should be held on a motion to affirm an instrument until the Regulatory Review Committee has been given an opportunity to report on it within a specified time and until the appropriate Standing Committee has reported on its merits or that it does not wish to do so or the specified time has expired. The Rules and Standing Orders of the Houses should specify the times within which Reports must be received.

28. There is no general procedure in the Parliament of Canada for the scrutiny of any instrument in draft for purposes of affirmation. In fact, only under section 18 of the Government Organization Act, R.S.C. 1970 2nd Supplement, C. 14, and section 4(2) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, S.C. 1970-71-72, C. 48 are orders tabled and laid before Parliament which have no effect until affirmed. Your Committee recommends that this is the type of affirmative procedure that should be adopted in Canada. Your Committee does not favour the type of affirmation which is in use in four instances under statutes of Canada whereby an instrument has legal effect for a certain period (as long as 180 days) but ceases to have effect at the end of the period unless it is affirmed. This procedure is open to abuse in that an instrument can be, and has been, revoked a day or two before the expiration of the fixed period, and a new one made, the consequence being that the substance of the instrument can be given indefinite life despite any action Parliament may take. Draft subordinate laws which are subject to affirmation should stand referred to the Regulatory Review Committee for scrutiny and report before the debate and vote on a motion to affirm takes place.

29. The actual form of disallowance provision which is introduced in the Parliament of Canada and the attendant procedures will determine the worth and effectiveness of the principle. The provisions in section 28.1 of the Interpretation Act are inadequate with respect to disallowance. Your Committee places great emphasis on the procedural aspects of its recommendations. Disallowance by either House should be provided for in a new Subordinate Legislation Act and should possess six essential characteristics:

1. Subordinate laws are void and of no effect if not presented in each House within fifteen sitting days of their making.
2. Notice of motion for disallowance in either House must be moved within fifteen sitting days of the tabling or laying of a subordinate law in that House.
3. A notice of motion for disallowance of a subordinate law must be resolved within twenty sitting days, otherwise that law is deemed to be disallowed.
4. The debate on a motion for disallowance of a subordinate law must not be commenced until the expiry of the time limited for receipt of a report from the Regulatory Review Committee as to that law's legality and propriety and from the appropriate Standing Committee on its merits.
5. If a notice of motion for disallowance is unresolved in the Senate or in the House of Commons at the end of a Session or on dissolution of the House of Commons, the subordinate legislation the subject of the motion is deemed to be presented to the House concerned at the beginning of the next Session.
6. Subordinate legislation the same in substance as that disallowed may not be made within six months after disallowance or deemed disallowance without the consent of the House in which disallowance occurred. (This last is particularly important in the context of disallowance where the notice and comment procedure the Committee recommends have been ignored without good cause shown).

   Your Committee favours a minimum number of five signatures for a motion for disallowance in either House.

30. This form of disallowance will require the restoration of the tabling and laying of subordinate legislation in the Houses, which was abandoned despite the recommendation to the contrary of the MacGuigan Committee. It will also require the carrying forward of the substance of the present section 28.1(2) of the Interpretation Act to ensure that where a subordinate law has been disallowed or is deemed to have been disallowed any law that was revoked or amended by the making of that law shall be deemed to have been revived at the date of disallowance or deemed disallowance.

31. The Houses will, of course, have to adopt Rules and Standing Orders which will facilitate the statutory procedures for affirmation and disallowance, and in particular the referring of subordinate legislation to Standing Committees.

32. Your Committee expects that once a workable disallowance procedure is in place it will be used sparingly and that it will generally be invoked upon report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Review on questions of legality and propriety. The opportunity, however, will exist for Standing Committees to report on substance and merits and for any of their members to move disallowance. And five members of either House will have the opportunity to cause a debate and a vote thus holding the executive government responsible in a public fashion.

33. Your Committee neither expects a flood of motions for disallowance nor considers that the number likely to be moved will clog the Parliamentary timetable. If the British House of Commons could find time to debate ninety-two motions for disallowance on the floor of the Chamber in 1975-76, there can be no reason why the rules and practices of the Houses in Canada should not accommodate a goodly number of motions if they were moved. There would seem to be Senate time and Opposition days available. To put minds at rest on this issue your Committee wishes it known that neither it nor its predecessors would have sought to disallow any number approaching ninety-two subordinate laws in any Session. Moreover, it expects that the possibility of a motion for disallowance and a debate will cause most Departments and Agencies to agree quickly to remove from their subordinate laws any objectionable features which have survived the notice and comment procedures your Committee recommends.

34. Your Committee has become aware from scrutiny of regulations under the Fisheries Act that there are serious defects in many of those regulations which can not be cured without amendment of both the Statutory Instruments Act and the Fisheries Act. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans finds it impossible to make detailed subordinate laws governing the peripatetic fisheries resources under the time constraints and delays in the making of regulations inherent in the Statutory Instruments Act. Consequently, the Department draws its regulations in such a way as to grant discretions to officers to act, to prohibit or to issue licences. No criteria are spelled out in the regulations in accordance with which officers are to exercise their discretions so that the actual law enforced lies in the officers' mouths. Your Committee objects to this procedure on the grounds that it amounts to sub-delegation of rule-making power not provided for in the Fisheries Act, and to an arbitrary exercise of power which can not be checked because the rules actually applied by officers are not contained in any law. In fact, a great deal of guidance is given to officers by departmental instructions and guidelines which contain many of the real rules but which are not subject to your Committee's scrutiny and are not legally binding on anyone. Your Committee recommends that the Fisheries Act should be amended to permit sub-delegated law-making by the Minister and by designated officials. Such sub-delegated laws should be exempt from all notice and comment requirements and from the pre-scrutiny requirements of examination by the Legal Advisers to the Privy Council Office. They should come into force on their being made known locally where they are to apply. They would, however, remain subject to ex post facto scrutiny by the Regulatory Review Committee, to which they should be required to be sent. Only by this means does your Committee conceive that the Department of Fisheries can make the law swiftly as it sometimes needs to do and Parliament can be assured that the actual rules applied in the control and preservation of the fishery will be included in legally effective rules, binding fisherfolk and Crown alike and subject to parliamentary scrutiny. The Regulatory Review Committee would, of course, be expected to maintain a close watch on such sub-delegated subordinate laws to ensure that they were not used unnecessarily as a means of avoiding public scrutiny and representations, and examination in draft by the Legal Advisers to the Privy Council Office.

35. Your Committee notes the significant contribution to the improvement of administrative practices made by the Administrative Conference of the United States, a statutory body established in 1964 consisting of government and agency officials, practising lawyers, academics and experts on administrative procedure. The Council on Tribunals of the United Kingdom also exercises a valuable supervisory role over aspects of administrative law in the United Kingdom. An external body with a general mandate to survey and report on regulatory activity in Canada is much to be desired. Your Committee, therefore, recommends the establishment of a Regulatory Council composed of members from the regulatory agencies, government departments, public interest groups and industry and labour. The Council should maintain a continuous review of the regulatory process, including the making and scrutiny of subordinate law, and of means of eliminating unnecessary regulatory effort. It should pay particular attention to the effectiveness of the notice and comment procedure your Committee later recommends and should make reports suggesting alterations in procedures and alternative methods of giving publicity to proposed subordinate law making. It should also study the area of "quasi-law": the issuing of interpretative and policy statements, guidelines and manuals to be applied by administrators.

C. NOTICE AND COMMENT PROCEDURES

36. Your Committee has reconsidered the procedure by which the substance of subordinate legislation comes into being and has found it wanting. It is truly the secret garden of the Crown. Of recent years there has been some movement towards the publication of draft regulations and a willingness to receive representations from the public on those drafts. This procedure has been endorsed by the Economic Council of Canada—(8). But it is not new. It is widely used in the United States and is generally considered to be successful. It was considered and rejected by the McRuer Commission on Civil Rights in Ontario. It was abandoned in the United Kingdom in 1946 in favour of consultation during the formulative stage of proposed laws because the exceptions to the notice and comment procedure had been habitually abused by Departments which always pleaded urgent circumstances. A notice and comment procedure was in force in the Commonwealth of Australia but was discontinued in 1916. The MacGuigan Committee considered such a procedure and, while recommending that its use be provided for in new statutes where suitable, did not recommend that notice and consultation or comment be made a general rule applying to the making of all subordinate legislation.

37. At the time the MacGuigan Committee reported, there were but two statutes of Canada which required notice of a draft regulation and the affording of opportunity to comment upon it to interested persons. No opportunity was extended to members of the public generally. In several other statutes which provided for the giving of notice an opportunity to make representations could probably be implied. The tenor of the evidence before the Committee was clearly in favour of extensive informal consultation with those peculiarly affected by draft regulations but against a formalised notice and comment procedure being made available to the public at large. Nevertheless, in the ensuing years there has been a considerable movement in that direction. A number of statutes now provide for notice of draft regulations or guidelines to be given sixty days before they are made and for an opportunity to members of the public to make representations. These, however, usually relate to the imposition of technical standards on industry.

Moreover, the statutes usually provide that where a draft has been altered as a result of the representations received it need not be republished.

In 1978 the Honourable the Treasury Board introduced a notice and comment procedure for those major, non-emergency, "health, safety and fairness" regulations made under specific, listed statutes, which meet certain criteria as to direct and indirect social costs. The definitions of all these terms are found in Chapter 490 of the Board's Administrative Policy Manual—(9). Every such draft regulation must be published at least sixty days before it is to be made and be accompanied by a "socio-economic impact analysis" and a statement of the legal authority for and the purposes of the regulation. It is too early to tell how revealing such analyses and statements will be, and whether they will afford a sufficient enunciation of the policy of the proposed regulation and the reasons for it. Similarly, it cannot now be said whether the number of proposed regulations subject to this procedure, which could be abolished by the Treasury Board at any moment, will be significant. Only two have so far been published—(10). The procedure does not extend to "guidelines" or administrative procedures. One feature of the Health, Safety and Fairness procedure deserves special commendation. Each sponsoring department or agency must respond to comments from non-government bodies on its proposed regulation. The Committee trusts that "bodies" is interpreted as including individuals.

Your Committee is also aware of a parallel development in that of recent years the Canadian Transport Commission and the Canadian Radio-Television Commission have held hearings to assist them in their rule-making functions, thus exposing both policy and draft rules to intense scrutiny.

38. More recently, the Economic Council of Canada has recommended a sixty day notice and comment procedure for all new regulations which have significant implication in terms of cost or impact on the distribution of income and are susceptible to cost benefit analyses. The Council appears to use "regulations" in its generic sense as indicating all subordinate legislation. Of one thing your Committee is certain, notice and comment procedures should not, in the case of subordinate legislation, be confined to regulations which meet economic or monetary criteria or are susceptible to cost benefit analyses. The important objective is to allow the reasons for and the policy of all subordinate legislation to be subject to the light of public scrutiny.

39. The Economic Council identified seven deficiencies in the present regulatory system as follows:

inadequate notice of new regulatory initiatives (statutes, amendments and subordinate legislation) to interested persons; inadequate consultation with interested persons during the development of proposals for new regulations;

failure to assess the costs and benefits of new regulations to society as a whole;

failure to evaluate periodically the large stock of existing regulatory activities; lack of central co-ordination of regulatory activity; inadequate public access to information regarding the regulatory actions of government; and unequal opportunities for participation in decisions concerning new regulations and existing regulatory programs by those who have an interest in them.

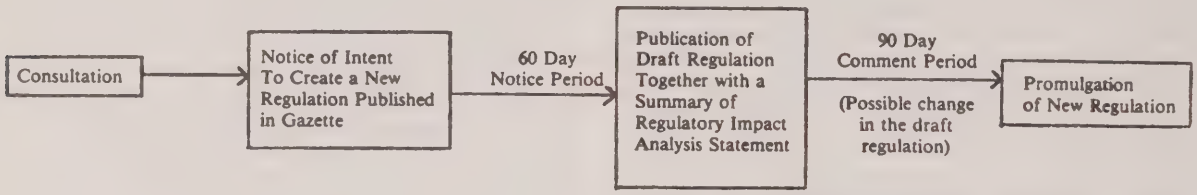
Your Committee endorses the conclusions as expressed by the Economic Council provided the phrase "interested persons" is not confined to those who, like an affected industry, have a particular interest in regulatory programmes. Not only industry but public interest groups and the public generally must be able to make representations. It is the public interest which must be paramount and not that of the "interested person". Your Committee deprecates any attempt to intrude a corporatist bias into regulatory reform or any assumption that the concerns of an industry subject to control by subordinate legislation warrant any pre-eminent consideration. Your Committee has no reservation, however, in assenting to the basic propositions set forth by the Council as the bases for its recommendations:

"1. governments should provide advance notice of their intent to propose major new regulations (i.e. subordinate legislation) and allow an opportunity for consultation;



2. governments, before imposing major new regulations, should assess the costs and benefits of such regulations; and

3. governments should periodically, on a systematic basis, evaluate their existing stock of regulatory programs and agencies."

The second and third of these bases relate to merits with which this report is not primarily concerned. The first raises the question: why should there be participation in the subordinate law making process? First, the proponents and draftsmen of subordinate laws cannot know or have thought of everything. It is possible they do not have command of all relevant information. Secondly, all the consequences and problems flowing from a proposed subordinate law may not have been foreseen. Thirdly, participation by those outside the government may help to offset any biases or cloudy thinking that has gone into the preparatory work for the draft. Fourthly, a satisfactory alternative not requiring a law may be suggested. Fifthly, and most important of all, participation goes some way to legitimizing the policy of the subordinate law which eventually emerges.

40. The Council proposed a new procedure which would begin with an Advance Notice of Intent to propose new regulations, which meet its criteria, at least sixty days prior to further action. Thereafter, the proposed regulations would be subject to a regulatory impact analysis. A draft of the regulations together with a summary of the analysis would be published and at least ninety days be made available for comment "by interested individuals and groups" before making. The only regulations subject to this system would be those having significant implications in terms of cost or distribution of income. Thresholds would be set which could be raised or lowered as desired to catch more or fewer regulations. Different thresholds would be set for Advance Notice and Prior Assessment. The whole scheme would be subject to an emergency "by-pass" procedure. The Council's diagram illustrating the whole scheme is this:

The Committee agrees with this system in so far as it goes. However, limited as it is to what could be a very narrow range of "major" new regulations of great economic impact, it alone will not serve the Committee's purpose. Consequently, your Committee has been led to recommend a more basic, less sophisticated but mandatory system covering all new subordinate legislation to be augmented by the publication of a regulatory budget and as much advance consultation in the formative stages of draft regulation making as circumstances will permit. Simple procedures have a greater chance of being accepted by those who must operate them and give promise of swifter results.

41. Despite the reluctance of the MacGuigan Committee to recommend a mandatory notice and comment procedure, your Committee believes that it should now be introduced in Canada. Informal consultations are no doubt of great value but they are essentially haphazard and on occasion savour of regulatory capture.

> "These proposals for consultation demonstrate the fundamental weakness of informal consultation, in that all too often no adequate early opportunity is given to other than established interests to influence the development of policy. It is misleadingly simplistic simply to ask: "Is there consultation? The real questions are: "With whom will there be consultation?" "At what stage of policy development will this consultation take place?" and "What will be the effect of all this consultation?" Moreover, without at least some degree of formality or structure, there is a very real danger that consultation in an atmosphere of intimacy will drift into dictation by corporate interests. This is particularly important in transport regulation because, as John Langford has noted, "Transportation policy-making at the federal level has always been characterized by an extremely close relationship between the transportation industry and its interest groups and the bureaucracies of the various agencies involved in the policy-making process". All in all, it would seem that it would be inadvisable to leave consultation and participation in policy-making to a totally informal process."—(11)

42. Your Committee's predecessor but one travelled to Washington and studied the operation of section 553 of the United States Administrative Procedures Act—(12) which has been in effect since 1946. It was satisfied that it worked very well. Its view coincides with that of informed commentators and the Administrative Conference of the United States. Professor K.C. Davis, in Administrative Law of the Seventies, is equally enthusiastic about the appropriateness of the notice and comment procedure, asserting that 'the system is simple and overwhelmingly successful'. This Committee believes that in adapting the Administrative Procedures Act procedure to Canada certain improvements in it could be made. It also believes that the recent voluntary developments within the Government of Canada and its regulatory agencies mark out a path which should be followed vigorously. Your Committee does not believe that the fact that subordinate legislation is far more commonly made in Canada by the Governor in Council and by Ministers than by independent or quasi-independent regulatory agencies in any way affects the desirability and practicability of a notice and comment procedure. Nor does it believe that there is anything in such a procedure which is inimical to responsible government. The procedure was in force for half a century in the United Kingdom and was never thought to be contrary to the basic tenets of the constitution.

43. There is in the United States a significant trend for the courts to impose judicial control on the rule making process to ensure "fairness", for example, by insisting on a right to cross-examine rule makers and others who make representations on draft laws. Your Committee is satisfied that the development of such judicial controls in Canada on common law principles is unlikely. It is not convinced that they would necessarily be desirable. They are in no way involved expressly or implicitly in the application in Canada of a procedure similar to that in section 553 of the Administrative Procedures Act. A subordinate law made in defiance of the procedure as a condition precedent to law making should be a nullity but the mere right to be informed and to make representations and to receive a response involves little opportunity for judicial creativity.

44. Your Committee acknowledges that any new system of notice and comment in subordinate law making will give rise to manpower and paperwork costs. This must be true also in the United States, yet commentators and rule makers there favour the system and one aspect of the improvement, the legitimacy of the rules that are made, can not be measured.

Presumably, savings will be generated in the future if better laws are developed in the first instance. In this connection the United States Commission on Federal Paperwork has this to say:

> "The necessary paperwork which would be added through greater participation in rule-making is temporary. It ends when a proposed rule is put into effect. The "bad" paperwork of a poorly written rule which is allowed to go into effect, however, can be endless."—(13)

Both the Treasury Board and the Economic Council appear to have accepted that the costs of notice and comment, albeit on an as yet unknown scale, can be borne. Professor Mullan also says:

> "The extra workload it has imposed on many regulatory agencies and departments of state seems to have been accepted willingly because of the valuable information generated by the "notice and comment" procedure and, also in part, because of the fact that the opportunity for prior involvement in the development of rules has the tendency of defusing criticism and making those rules more acceptable politically."—(14)

45. The procedures of the Administrative Procedures Act as they relate to rule making are widely misunderstood.—(15) Commentators refer to rule making hearings. But in fact under section 553 there are no hearings in the sense of a formalized tribunal setting. There is notice of rule making in the Federal Register thirty days before a rule is to come into effect and the reception of representations. The notice discloses the terms or substance of a proposed rule and a description of the subjects and issues involved. The actual draft rule is not necessarily included in the notice which does, however, give the address and particulars of the agency office which should be contacted. The Congress has on many occasions imposed more stringent requirements than those of section 553 in respect of some rules and some agencies. Those requirements sometimes include true hearings. The formulation of rules in a formal hearing before an agency is not frequent and is held in disfavour by many commentators and administrative lawyers. The notice and comment procedure gives those particularly interested and any member of the public an adequate opportunity to be heard. It is this opportunity and the statement of policy and method which are so important. Perhaps few members of the general public utilize this opportunity. But that is not the point. No one can be compelled to take a part in his own government. All that can be done is to afford him the opportunity. Your Committee wishes to record Professor Mullan's conclusions as to the operation of the Administrative Procedures Act procedure:

> "From the research I have conducted, there is no doubt at all that the "notice and comment" procedure adopted in section 4 (now 553) of the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 has become an entrenched part of the federal administrative procedure. The worth of such procedures to rule-making at the federal level in the United States seems to be acknowledged universally. That the statute is not perfect, at least now, some thirty-two years later, has perhaps to be admitted. The exemptions may be too wide. The alternative of a full adjudicative hearing when rule-making is required to be on the record is not acceptable. Nevertheless, much of the discontent with the present situation in relation to rule-making procedures seems to stem not so much from the Act itself as from the excesses of procedure provided for in some individual statutes, and the need for legislative draftsmen to pay more attention to devising alternatives in some situations between the informality of "notice and comment" and the formality of formal adjudicative-type hearings. There is also some concern that, at least in some instances, "notice and comment" opportunities come too late, and this has led to suggestions from a number of quarters for formal provision for an opportunity for public input at a stage prior to and during the actual drafting of the legislation.
> Yet, to someone observing the American scene from the outside, despite all these proposals for reform both general and specific, one of the striking things about the "notice and comment" procedure of the APA and perhaps one of the explanations for its seeming success is the modesty of its aims. Certainly, it does not cover even a majority of agency rule-making at the federal level in the United States. Certainly, it does not spell out very elaborate procedures. Certainly, it does nothing by way of mandating rule-making rather than adjudication in certain situations. However, if it had done any of these things, at least initially, it may well have been overreaching. Instead, because of its modest aims and comparatively low level of imposition on the overall work of the administrative agencies, it was readily tolerated and in time came to be seen as an extremely valuable adjunct to the administrative process. It may also be for that reason that many of the current proposals for reform are seemingly being treated with equanimity even on the part of the agencies."—(16)

46. What your Committee finds so lacking in the present Canadian system is any avowal of the policy being effected by subordinate legislation and any opportunity to comment on or contribute to it. Equally, there is no general advance notice of the means to be employed and little opportunity to comment on them. Accordingly, it recommends that the notice to be published of a proposed subordinate law should be accompanied by a clear statement of the reasons for the proposed regulation, the policy to be furthered by it, and the socio-economic impact analysis where that has been developed pursuant to the existing Health, Safety and Fairness policy of the Treasury Board or the recommendation of the Economic Council. The period of notice should be sixty days as suggested by the Economic Council and not thirty days as in the United States. Your Committee favours the publication of an economic impact statement with proposed subordinate laws, as this requirement would force the identification of costs and alternative methods of achieving policy ends. Consequently, it favours the extension of the socio-economic impact analysis to as many new regulations as practicable. Because of the costs that could be involved in such a system, of which your Committee has no evidence, it does not propose that the publication of an economic impact analysis be made mandatory beyond those cases covered by the existing Treasury Board policy and the recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada. Your Committee does recommend, however, that all relevant opinions of advisory bodies and councils should be tabled in Parliament with new subordinate laws to assist any member who wishes to debate the merits of the law.

47. The notice of a proposed subordinate law should be published in the Canada Gazette. That journal is not a widely read document and publication elsewhere, in trade journals, newspapers, etc., is obviously desirable in very many cases. It is not possible to specify all those cases and places of publication now. Departments should be encouraged to publicize their draft subordinate laws widely and the Regulatory Council should have the power to study particular instances and to recommend the use of additional means and places of publication.

48. Your Committee wishes to emphasize that notice and comment procedures must be open to, indeed directed to, the general public. The public interest may not be fully protected if the opportunity to comment is afforded only to those paticularly affected by a subordinate law or if there is too close a relationship between Government and industry. Your Committee, therefore, recommends that both the document which forms the factual basis of the decision to make a new subordinate law and the comments submitted on it should be open to public scrutiny and that any freedom of information legislation which is introduced should so provide. This requirement is particularly important where new technological standards are proposed. Experts are often bitterly divided on such standards and it is often to the advantage of a particular industry to seek to delay the adoption of more advanced standards. Your Committee also recommends that submissions be responded to. If a draft subordinate law is significantly altered as a result of submissions received, it should be readvertised with a further opportunity to comment provided. A thirty day time limit would be appropriate in that event.

49. Very often policy has become frozen by the time a draft regulation is prepared. Attempts at modification, change or abandonment are likely to be met with resistance. Therefore, your Committee recommends that wherever possible notice of proposed regulation making should be given before a draft regulation is prepared and published. The notice should indicate the policy to be effected and the object to be achieved and invite representations as to both the policy itself and the means to be employed. It is always possible that some representation will show a way to reach a desired end without the need for yet another new law. Your Committee notes that in the United States there is a movement beyond the minimum procedures of section 553 of the Administrative Procedures Act. Sometimes additional requirements such as the publication of a "rule-making record" are mandated by statute, but they are often adopted voluntarily.

50. The need to give sixty days notice of proposed regulations will require Departments and Agencies to plan their regulation making activities well ahead and to follow a schedule for the enactment of subordinate laws. Consequently, it should be a relatively simple matter for Departments and Agencies to contribute to a regulatory budget. Such a budget published for a twelve month period would give clear notice of all planned non-emergency subordinate laws and would provide even greater opportunity for representations and contributions by citizens. Your Committee recommends that a regulatory budget be prepared, and updated and brought forward every quarter. The budget should be published each quarter in the Canada Gazette. Consideration should be given to other avenues of publicity for it.

51. Your Committee is aware that many subordinate laws are made in urgent circumstances and that it is impracticable and would be unwise to subject them to a sixty day or even to any notification and comment procedure. Some subordinate laws involve small scale amendments to existing laws, others are of a housekeeping or domestic nature governing matters within the civil service, others apply to only one, or two or a small number of people while still others affect national defence and security. It may be that specific exemptions can be ordained at the outset of the new system by statute. One such exception should be made for the lower tier of fishery regulations referred to in paragraph 34 of this Report. Other specific exemptions come readily to mind such as the Queen's Regulations and Orders for the Canadian Armed Forces and the Administrative Orders of the Chief of the Defence Staff. Beyond the exemption for cause shown discussed below, your Committee is opposed to any generally worded exemptions. Some of the exemptions in the United States Administrative Procedures Act have been the subject of much criticism and there has been a tendency to abandon them voluntarily. All the United States exemptions are vaguely and generally worded and would invite both abuse and interpretational argument, as has the present definition of a "statutory instrument". They appear in the United States to have afforded some opportunity to avoid the notice and comment procedure and have been criticised by the Administrative Conference of the United States. Your Committee is even more opposed to the granting of exemptions by regulations of the Governor in Council. The present exemptions under the Statutory Instruments Regulations are an object lesson in that regard. Instead, it recommends that the maker of a subordinate law should be able to proceed to make that law, without first giving sixty days or any period of notice and receiving comment, under the following conditions:

(i) as soon as a draft is prepared it is sent to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Review with a statement as to why the subordinate legislation or its equivalent need not wait upon a sixty day notice period. While the Committee is sitting cause would have to be shown immediately. If a subordinate law or its equivalent is made when there is no Committee, cause would have to be shown as soon as the Committee is reconstituted;

(ii) in any case where the Committee considers cause has not been shown, it shall report the fact to the Houses forthwith and recommend disallowance where the regulation has already been made and refusal of affirmation where the regulation has not yet been made.

Your Committee believes these stringent conditions are necessary. The failure of the United Kingdom system before 1946 was caused by Departments always pleading urgent circumstances and the need to be exempted on that ground. While "cause" will cover far more than urgency, its interpretation will be in parliamentary hands.

Your Committee appreciates that in the case of hundreds of subordinate laws made each year there is no need to burden the administrative system with an advance notice and comment procedure. It is not generally appreciated how many "regulations" made each year amend existing "regulations" in quite minor ways. It is not now possible, however, to draft an exemption which will include the minor, the urgent and the trivial but exclude the sensitive, the significant and the potentially contentious. Consequently, your Committee recommends that the exceptions to the general, mandatory notice and comment procedure for all subordinate laws should consist of specific statutory exceptions and exceptions agreed to by the Regulatory Review Committee for good cause shown. The definition of what constitutes good cause will be addressed by your Committee in a further report.

52. Because your Committee's recommendation is for a simple, general procedure applying across the board, it recommends that the Regulatory Council review the operation of the notice and comment procedure at regular intervals to see if more stringent or different procedural requirements are necessary in particular cases of subordinate law making or in respect of particular agencies or Departments of the Government.

53. The Economic Council of Canada in its interim report "Responsible Regulation" was of the view that the enforcement of notice and comment procedures should be an administrative and not a judicial responsibility. It recommended that

"If governments implement the suggested procedural reforms they should take the appropriate precautionary steps to preclude or minimize the possibility of judicial review."

Given the importance your Committee attaches to procedure as the safeguard of liberty, it cannot agree with this recommendation. A subordinate law which is subject to a condition precedent to its making, which is not met, should be a nullity as it is under the present law, be that condition precedent ever so new. The sanction for failure to observe the condition precedent for notice and comment or to show cause to the Regulatory Review Committee should be the invalidity of the subordinate law.

54. There is in Canada a developed habit of making regulations rather than rulings on individual cases. It is possible, however, that faced with notice and comment procedures, and the tighter parliamentary control of subordinate legislation recommended elsewhere in this Report, any Government may incline towards the formulation of policies, not expressed in subordinate laws, and the taking of decisions in individual cases in light of those policies, guidelines and interpretative statements issued to explain them. In view of the fact that the impact of interpretative rulings, guidelines and statements of policy is often virtually indistinguishable from that of subordinate legislation, and in order to ensure public input in their formulation, their making should be attended by the same notice and comment procedure recommended in this Report for subordinate legislation and subject to the same exemptions. The Regulatory Council should keep the area of "quasi-law" under close surveillance.

55. Once subordinate laws are made and have survived their parliamentary scrutiny, they should not be left to continue in force without further parliamentary attention. Your Committee endorses the Economic Council's call for periodic evaluation of existing regulations, and of the consequences flowing from them, according to a regular schedule. While such evaluations will of necessity have generally to be performed by Government Departments and Agencies, your Committee recommends, as does the Economic Council, that they be referred to the appropriate Standing Committees of the Houses for review. Your Committee has noted the uses to which so called sunset laws might be put in connection with subordinate legislation.

D. A NEW SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION ACT

56. Perhaps as fundamental to the control of subordinate law as the prepublication of proposed regulations and the introduction of affirmative resolution procedures or a power to disallow statutory instruments is the pressing necessity for a thorough revision of the Statutory Instruments Act. This matter was discussed in considerable detail in our predecessor's Second Report of the 1976-77 Session. Since there is no established practice in Canada, as there is in the United Kingdom and in the Commonwealth of Australia, that the Government responds in detail to reports of Parliamentary Committees, there is no evidence so far that our predecessor's remonstrations have been taken seriously. This emphasizes the need for the institution of a system under which the responsible Minister will make a report to Parliament, or the Government will publish a White Paper, outlining the action the Government will take with respect to subordinate legislation and law making within three months of the presentation to a House of Parliament of a Committee report on subordinate legislation or law making. Each of the Houses should maintain a register recording the tabling dates of appropriate Committee reports and the date of presentation to the House of any Government statement on it or the date of any White Paper published in response to it.

57. The definition of a statutory instrument is obscure and the interpretation placed upon it by the Department of Justice, so far as it has become known to your Committee, is artificial and produces quite ludicrous results. The distinction between a statutory instrument and a regulation is also obscure in some respects, notably in the meaning to be given to the phrase "made in the exercise of a legislative power", and is again artificial and productive of ludicrous results. Your Committee once more recommends that there should be but one class of subordinate law, and that, by whatever name it is known, should be defined generally in the terms suggested by the MacGuigan committee in 1969—(17). It should be made clear that your Committee rejects any definitions which make the safeguards of parliamentary control and notice and comment procedures dependent on whether the draftsman of a statute inserts a certain form of words such as "by order" in the enabling powers in a Bill. This is the current and wholly unsatisfactory situation. Your Committee does not know on what principles magic formulae are inserted in or left out of enabling clauses. The Department of Justice has refused to say whether instructions to the parliamentary draftsmen exist and, if so, what they are. If the matter is now left entirely to the discretion of sponsoring Departments, it should not be.

58. Your Committee fails to understand why the sensible and cogent recommendation of the MacGuigan Committee as to the definition of "regulation" was departed from in drafting the Statutory Instruments Act. Your Committee believes that the recommendations of Parliamentary Committees are entitled to the utmost respect from the Government. If any Government wishes to depart from or reject a specific recommendation of a Parliamentary Committee, it should only do so for very good reasons which it should explain in detail. In the absence of any discernible good reason or explanation in this instance, your Committee is at a complete loss to understand what prompted the definitions of "statutory instrument" and "regulation", the distinctions between them and the deliberate attempt to exclude some subordinate legislation from the definition of a statutory instrument by the use of artificial formulae.

59. The MacGuigan Committee made other particular recommendations which have not been implemented and in which your Committee concurs. These are set out once again by way of emphasis.

1. The quaterly consolidated index and table of statutory instruments should include reference to all regulations which have been exempted from publication, according to their title (which should be as descriptive as possible), the Act and the section or sections under which they were made, their date and the date of their registration.
2. All subordinate legislation should be tabled and laid in Parliament immediately on registration. The Votes and Proceedings of the Commons and the Minutes and Proceedings of the Senate should list under "Returns and Reports Deposited with the Clerk" the title of each subordinate law, the Act and the section or sections under which it is made and its date of registration.

Your Committee adds that there could be no objection to a special document being published setting out subordinate legislation laid upon the Table. Whatever method is used the latest date on which notice may be given of a motion to disallow should always be given.

3. All departmental directives and guidelines as to the exercise of discretion under a statute or subordinate law where the public is directly affected by such discretion should be published and also subject to parliamentary scrutiny.
4. Statutes should resort more than they do now to the use of provisions stating that regulations made thereunder or under specified sections thereof do not become effective until published, or some specified period thereafter.

Appendix VI lists the disposition by the Government of the recommendations of our predecessor's Second Report for the 1976-77 Session.

60. While at present all "statutory instruments", except certain excluded categories, stand permanently referred to your Committee pursuant to section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, there is no law or mechanism in place which compels those who make statutory instruments to send them to the Committee. Those statutory instruments which are either regulations or are in fact published appear in Part II of the Canada Gazette and by subscribing to the Gazette the Committee sees them. The Committee has no means of identifying or receiving all those other statutory instruments which do not appear in the Gazette. Indeed, there appears to be no mechanism in place whereby the Government itself maintains any central register or record of all statutory instruments.

It is essential that the Government, which has resources, should undertake a survey of the statutes and known subordinate law of Canada to identify all subordinate laws. All subordinate laws, and all policy and interpretative statements and guidelines which have virtually the same impact, should be governed by the procedures recommended in this Report. Other instruments which do not fall into the foregoing categories should stand referred to the Regulatory Review Committee, but should not be subject to notice and comment procedures or to the general power of disallowance. It is imperative that statute provides that all instruments be referred to and be made available to the Committee, for the determination of what is legislative in character and thus subordinate law must be in Parliament's hands, or in those of an independent Review Committee, and not in those of the Department of Justice.

61. The present Statutory Instruments Act will have to be extensively rewritten to reflect the changed definitions, and to provide for the notice and comment procedures. The procedures governing disallowance and affirmation should be taken out of the Interpretation Act and included in a new Act which should be renamed simply "The Subordinate Legislation Act". The Act should provide that all subordinate legislation and other instruments stand permanently referred to a Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Review, expressly provided for, thus putting the Committee's existence on a permanent footing.

62. The Committee's criteria for scrutiny should also be included in the Act.

63. Any enabling power in the Subordinate Legislation Act which provides for the making of regulations exempting any subordinate law from any provision of the Act should be subject to affirmation by both Houses.

64. The Subordinate Legislation Act should include, apart from the procedural and other requirements recommended in this Report, a provision stating three basic rules or presumptions which are necessary for effective scrutiny and control of subordinate law making. These are the presumption of invalidity of sub-delegation of law making power, the presumption against retroactivity of subordinate laws and the rule that incorporation of an external standard into subordinate law by reference is valid only if it is of a fixed and not a variable standard unless it is of a statute or another subordinate law.

65. The present section 11 of the Statutory Instruments Act should be amended to require that the onus rests on the Crown of proving publication of a subordinate law in the Canada Gazette at the time of the alleged commission of an offence of contravening that law or that adequate steps had been taken at that time to draw the subordinate law to the alleged offender's attention.

E. DRAFTING OF ENABLING POWERS AND OF SUBORDINATE LAWS

66. Certain drafting practices have grown up in Canada which are inimical to the development of the sort of delegated legislation that is consistent with your Committee's present criteria for scrutiny. The success of a scrutiny committee on subordinate legislation will, in the long run, depend upon the abandonment of some of those practices, the modification of others and the development of new principles indicative of self-restraint on the part of both Government and Parliament in the conferring of powers upon the executive.

67. Canada has a deservedly high reputation in the Commonwealth for the clarity of its parliamentary drafting and its advances in the art or skill of drafting. This reputation is largely due to the work of Dr. E.A. Driedger, Q.C., who established the first regular course in draftsmanship in the Commonwealth as a postgraduate programme at the University of Ottawa. Nevertheless, it is apparent to your Committee that clarity of drafting and the relative ease with which a Canadian statute can be read have not been achieved without a price. Far too many statutes contain little or no indication of legislative policy and are neutral documents the object of which is merely to confer powers on the executive to act in certain vaguely defined fields. Moreover, these powers are granted in very broad terms so that little or no detail is given as to the content or type of delegated legislation that can be made. It is too easy to dismiss this type of statute as "skeletal"; the problem is more serious than that. Even a skeletal statute can be fairly specific about the powers it grants and what can be done under them. Too many Canadian statutes are not specific in that way.

68. The problem is aggravated because of certain traditions in the Department of Justice as to the effect of divers phrases in general use in the conferring of power to make delegated legislation. Your Committee is convinced that there is no foundation in law for the consequences claimed for the phrases it has questioned. In particular, the Committee can not agree that a power to make delegated laws "with respect to" or "respecting" a subject matter permits the delegate to make any law touching or connected with that subject matter, directly, indirectly or even remotely that Parliament itself could make, or that standing alone it permits the delegate to sub-delegate his rule-making power to someone else, either completely or in part, or to grant dispensations from the laws he does make in favour of individuals. There can be no substitute for the enumeration of the actual subordinate law-making powers to be granted.

69. Your Committee is concerned by the lack of specificity in the enabling powers commonly granted in statutes. If it is desired to enable a delegate to sub-delegate, an Act should say so. If it is considered that dispensations from subordinate laws in favour of individuals will be needed, the enabling statute should provide for them. If it is thought that a certain activity will have to be prohibited in whole or in part, the enabling powers should be drawn so as to confer that power. If a permit system is to be introduced, the enabling Act should provide for it and for the setting by subordinate legislation and not by the issuing officers of any terms and conditions which may attach to a permit. If a Department wishes to have regulations touching a matter peripheral to the subject matter of the enabling power, Parliament should be asked to provide it. If it is desired to charge a fee, Parliament should give the necessary authority. These are principles habitually observed in drafting in the United Kingdom and in the Commonwealth of Australia and the Committee considers that they should be adopted here forthwith. It is far too great a temptation to Departments and to Ministers to grant general enabling powers and to rely on their exercise being confined to the "four corners of the Act". They are certain, and the Committee speaks in the light of its predecessors' experience, to be used, and probably abused, in the pursuit of administrative convenience, to make subordinate laws never imagined by parliamentarians at the time of passage of Bills. Your Committee is convinced that the so-called principles used by the Department of Justice to justify the inordinate breadth with which powers are invested after passage are simply rationalizations for practices of great convenience to administrators but subversive of parliamentary supremacy over the law. The true practice and principle is simply this: the intentions of Parliament in delegating powers and the scope of the delegation should be beyond all doubt and clearly limited.

70. Insufficient attention is paid to enabling clauses in Bills before Parliament. They should be the subject of searching scrutiny during the Committee stage. The Regulatory Review Committee is well placed to undertake such scrutiny as it sees week by week the consequences of the powers so readily granted by Parliament in the past. Your Committee, therefore, further recommends that the Regulatory Review Committee be charged with the duty and responsibility of examining and reporting upon all powers in Bills to make subordinate law or to issue, make or establish other instruments. Its reports should be made to the appropriate Standing Committees of the Houses having the committee stages of the Bills.

71. The enabling powers in some existing statutes cause your Committee grave disquiet—especially when it sees the uses to which they are habitually put. In particular, your Committee considers that it is necessary to draw to the Houses' attention section 34 of the Fisheries Act which is ripe for root and branch reform. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans persists in promoting regulations your Committee considers go beyond the brief provisions of section 34 and which sub-delegate law making power from the Governor in Council to officials. Far more regulations are made under this section than under any other ten enabling powers in the Statutes of Canada. The need for some sort of sub-delegated rule making in the regulation of the fisheries is evident and Parliament should be asked to consider and dispose of a Bill to that end. Your Committee recommends that a reference be given to the Standing Committee on Fisheries to engage at once in a detailed study of all aspects of the Fisheries Act and the policies pursued under it and that your Committee be empowered to report on all subordinate law making powers contained in the present Act. Your Committee also recommends that a new Subordinate Legislation Act authorize the Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Reform to report to the Houses on the enabling powers it encounters in its scrutiny of subordinate legislation.

72. It is not only in the conferring of subordinate powers in Bills that your Committee considers that drafting habits should change. There are serious flaws in the traditional methods and formulae used in drafting the subordinate laws themselves. Your Committee's predecessors expended a great deal of effort taking up aspects of the drafting of subordinate laws which, taken individually, might appear picayune, but which, in the aggregate, constitute abuses of administrative power and the establishment of discretionary powers of such a scope as to amount almost to institutionalized lawlessness.

An understanding of the invalidity and illegitimacy of unauthorised sub-delegation of rule making power is taking a long time to seep through the many layers of officials, legal and non-legal, involved in the making of subordinate laws. An appreciation of the degree to which current subordinate legislation grants unreviewable discretionary powers to act is also long in coming. Your Committee is forced to be particularly concerned about such discretionary powers because of the absence of any general system of administrative review in Canada and the unavailability of judicial review of most administrative action. Your Committee commends to the earnest study of the Houses, the Press and the Government the Administrative Review Tribunal established of recent years in the Commonwealth of Australia.

73. Your Committee specifically condemns certain practices and devices commonly employed in the drafting of subordinate laws:

(i) the use of subjective instead of objective tests in granting power to determine whether a regulation applies to a particular set of circumstances; The bare opinion of an official should not be a criterion for action. The only purpose of the use of phrases such as "in the opinion of" or "where the Minister is satisfied" is to impede judicial review. Under an objectively worded test administrators will still have to bring their professional skill and judgment to bear to determine whether the test is satisfied;

(ii) the practice of using a rule-making power, not to make rules of general application but to grant discretionary administrative power to deal with individual cases ad hoc;

(iii) the granting of discretionary powers unfettered by any criteria or conditions governing their exercise;

(iv) the prohibition of an activity coupled with a discretion unregulated by any expressed standards or criteria to permit that same activity in individual cases; To illustrate that with careful drafting a regulated discretion to permit is possible, your Committee refers the Houses to section 95.1 of the Animal Contagious Diseases Regulations as made by SOR/79-295;

(v) the refusal to lay a duty to act in a certain way on a Minister or an official and the conferring of a discretion to act instead;

(vi) the failure to set objective criteria and to require the observance of the minimum standards of natural justice when a decision to act adversely to a subject is taken, for example, when a licence or permission is suspended or cancelled. Whatever the subject's rights to litigate may be, reasons should be given for the decision and an opportunity to show those reasons to be false or inapplicable should be accorded;

(vii) the cancellation of a licence for alleged breach of a regulation despite an acquittal on a charge of breaching that regulation or the failure to bring any charge; The Committee commends to the attention of all draftsmen of subordinate law section 8 of the National Parks Fishing Regulations as made by SOR/80-51;

(viii) the failure to specify when a permission or licence will be suspended, as opposed to being cancelled;

(ix) the failure to be reasonably specific in stating the information which persons subject to regulations must provide to officials;

(x) the failure to require inspectors to show their authority and identification;

(xi) the conferring of powers, especially of search and seizure, on officials in the same terms as are contained in statutes, usually very old, passed by Parliament;

(xii) the failure to specify precisely the powers officials are to have over the subject;

(xiii) the failure to disclose that a statutory instrument is being used to make rules to give effect to the substance or the general tenor of an international agreement;

(xiv) the imposition of fees or charges by reference to imprecise criteria, e.g. "by arrangement" or by reference to variable rates in the private or public sector;

(xv) the imposition of fees or charges without express authority in the enabling Act;

(xvi) the use of section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act to set fees or charges where those fees or charges are already set by statute; your Committee recommends that the wording of section 13(b) should be amended to make clear its true intent that where the Governor in Council is empowered by statute to set a fee or charge he may sub-delegate that power to a Minister.

(xvii) enjoining obedience to "rules" contained in documents which are neither regulations nor statutory instruments;

(xviii) the making of substantive rules under ancillary and procedural enabling powers following or preceding an enumeration of specific enabling powers;

(xix) the exploitation of enabling powers to their fullest extent as conceived by the Department of Justice in accordance with its received traditions. This absence of self-restraint leads to a failure to revise enabling powers to accord with modern conditions.

74. Your Committee will give more extensive treatment to drafting matters in its next General Report which it trusts will assist the Attorney General to issue circular instructions to all draftsmen of subordinate legislation to be policed by the Legal Advisers to the Privy Council. It wishes now to draw the Houses' attention to a paragraph from a recent report of the United Kingdom Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments—(18) which your Committee endorses without qualification.

"The Committee fully appreciates that the justification for the granting of delegated legislative powers is to remove subsidiary or procedural details from the Statute Book and to afford to the Executive flexibility and the ability to alter detailed provisions to fit changing circumstances, without the need to enact a new Statute. The corollary of this, however, must be that the delegated legislation itself should be detailed, specific and self-explanatory and should not depend on the exercise of ministerial or departmental discretion unless provision to that effect is expressly contained in the enabling Statute. Circulars explaining or amplifying the contents of either primary or delegated legislation can be very useful to the general public and to the administrators. But the Committee hopes that Parliament will condemn subordinate legislation by Departmental Circular when Parliament itself passed a parent Act which requires such legislation to be by statutory instrument."

F. THE COMMITTEE'S OWN PROCEDURES

75. In its formative years the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments was necessarily relatively circumspect in its dealing with the Departments and Agencies of the Government. Embarked on an entirely new venture in the Canadian Parliament, it had to feel its way. Great difficulties were encountered in establishing a proper machinery for handling the Committee's criticisms of statutory instruments. Even more difficulty was experienced in securing prompt amendment of objectionable instruments or the presentation of a report to the Houses. Many Departments tended to adopt a dilatory or delaying stance because the Committee itself was less than ruthless in exacting unequivocal commitments and remedial action. This problem was undoubtedly exacerbated over the past three years by the long periods in which there was no Parliament or an imminent dissolution was expected. These difficulties should now be left behind. Your Committee will follow a tight operating schedule for the consideration of instruments: departmental explanations of them, the receiving of undertakings to amend or revoke statutory instruments and the reporting of instruments to the Houses. This tightening up is desirable in itself and will be necessary if the Committee is to have time to handle the extra business the recommendations in this Report will generate.

76. The Committee will in future report more instruments to the Houses, not merely as a last resort but also to illustrate or draw attention to undesirable or praiseworthy provisions. It will in future draw to their attention instances where Ministers, Departments or Agencies of the Government of Canada have failed to honour within a reasonable time their undertakings to amend or to revoke statutory instruments or to take other action to remedy some defect in an enabling power. Your Committee will also draw the Houses' attention to particular, objectionable or inadequate enabling powers which it encounters in existing legislation. This action is, of course, an essential complement to that recommended in paragraph 70 above. Your Committee will, if disallowance and affirmation procedures are put in place, be reporting more frequently in connection with those procedures.

77. Your Committee will be less tolerant than its predecessors of promises by Departments and Agencies to do or to refrain from doing something in future. Such promises leave the objectionable or defective subordinate law in force, unless it is or is soon to become spent. They are also exceedingly difficult to keep track of. Even if the Committee had staff for such a purpose, it would be an unjustified waste of manpower. It appears, too, that Departments and Agencies who have given such promises in the past have had difficulty in remembering them and seeing that they are honoured.

78. In future, where the Committee has a criticism of a statutory instrument and is not satisfied with the explanation or the promise of remedial action promised by the Designated Instruments Officer of the Department or Agency concerned, the Committee will forthwith communicate its objection direct to the Minister and request appropriate remedial action. The Minister will be given an opportunity to communicate or to appear before the Committee before a report is made to the Houses. If the Minister fails to respond within a short space or if the Committee is not satisfied with the Minister's explanations or proposed action, the matter will be reported forthwith to the Houses, with a recommendation for disallowance or refusal of affirmation if the procedures recommended in this Report are in place.

79. In its scrutiny of subordinate legislation your Committee has on many occasions to consider the question of legality, that is whether a law is ultra or intra vires the enabling powers granted by Parliament. Very often in the past Committees have been told that there is an opinion of the Department of Justice that a statutory instrument is intra vires. Sometimes it is said that there is an opinion of the law officers of the Crown to this effect. Your Committee notes that there is only one law officer of the Crown in Canada, the Attorney General, and he is ex officio. Nevertheless, the Committee's precedessors were careful not to ask for a copy of the actual legal opinion furnished by one of the solicitors in the employ of the Department of Justice. However, the Committee can not see why, in principle, copies of such opinions should not be made available when they have been expressly relied upon by a Minister or a senior official. Certainly when an opinion on some aspect of a subordinate law is given by the only law officer of the Crown at the national level, the Attorney General, or by his deputy, and is referred to as the justification for government action, the Committee considers that it should be made available to it, as recommended in your Committee's predecessors' Report of the 1977 Session on Freedom of Information:

> "Documents the disclosure of which would reveal . . . (b) legal opinions or advice provided for the use of the Government unless a Minister or other senior Government official refers to a legal opinion in support of a Government action in which case the legal opinion would not be protected."

In the Commonwealth of Australia the Senate Committee on Regulations and Ordinances is supplied with the opinions of the Law Officers given in connection with the validity or consequences of subordinate legislation.

The Committee wishes to reaffirm that a mere statement that a particular course of action or omission is intra vires or is supported by an opinion of a solicitor of the Department of Justice, or of the Attorney General himself, is an affront to the Houses. At the very least, reasoned argument should always be given both to the Committee and to the Houses. Your Committee sees no reason why legal opinions expressly relied upon should not be made available, especially when the Committee's legal advice is a matter of public record and is communicated in detail to Departments and Agencies of the Government of Canada.

80. Statutory Instruments published in Part II of the Canada Gazette or purchased individually from the Privy Council Office are now accompanied by Explanatory Notes. Each note sets out in simple language the purport of the instrument, often in synoptic form. This is a great step forward and was accomplished after several years prodding by the Committee in the 30th Parliament. When that Committee first began operations, it sought to have supplied to it for each statutory instrument an Explanatory Memorandum which would set out the rationale of the instrument and explain its provisions. Such a memorandum is routinely provided to the Statutory Instruments Committee at Westminster. At Canberra the Regulations and Ordinances Committee is supplied with what is in fact a copy of the memoramdum to the Governor General with only the heading and address removed. A request for either a separate memorandum on each instrument or a "copy" of the explanation accompanying the submission to the Governor in Council was rejected. The latter document was said to be secret. Your Committee readily acknowledges that it cannot expect to be supplied with documents prepared expressly for or in connection with the deliberations of the Cabinet or of a Cabinet Committee except those documents composed of mainly factual or statistical material.

Recently, examples of the explanations accompanying some submissions to Council or to Ministers for statutory instruments have come to light in a new, and very well produced, "Information Manual for the Processing of Orders-in-Council and Other Statutory Instruments" put out by the Department of National Revenue (Customs and Excise). Some of the statutory instruments involved have been scrutinized by your Committee's predecessors. The substance of these explanations, had it been routinely available to those Committees, would have obviated the need in each case for at least one exchange of correspondence which must have absorbed as much labour and effort at the Customs' as it did at the Committee's end. Very often requests have to be made in writing for an explanation of an instrument and some provision in it. If explanatory memoranda can be supplied at both Westminster and Canberra, your Committee should receive them also. Given the time limits that will attend the recommended disallowance and affirmation procedures, the Committee must be in a position to consider a subordinate law, or a draft of one, as soon as it is received. An accompanying explanatory memorandum setting out in detail the purport, antecedents, and authority for the law will be essential. In particular, the Committee will need to be informed in detail where

(a) new powers are being exercised;

(b) substantial changes are being made in the existing legislation;

(c) the powers exercised are linked with some other legislation, convention or treaty which is not referred to in the new subordinate law or its accompanying explanatory note, especially when that legislative connection or treaty is recent;

(d) the enabling powers are difficult to follow and an annotation or explanation of them would aid comprehension; or

(e) a subordinate law is to be amended which itself has been subject to previous amendment so that it is difficult to follow what is proposed.

81. Your Committee's efforts to scrutinize subordinate legislation will be of no effect whatever if the Government does not commit itself to respecting the Committee's criteria for scrutiny. Those criteria cover the question of the legality of subordinate law—the issue of ultra vires—and fourteen instances of impropriety not necessarily involving illegality. In the reaction of government spokesmen to the reports your Committee's predecessors made to the Houses and in correspondence with those Committees, it is apparent that there is a marked tendency to ignore those other fourteen criteria and to dwell on vires. If the Committee reports that a subordinate law is ultra vires, it is said that it is not a court and that the Government's legal opinion is that the subordinate law is valid. If the Committee reports that a subordinate law infringes one or more of the other fourteen criteria, it is said that since it is not alleged that the law is ultra vires it is proper that it stand. Your Committee's effectiveness will be severely hampered if its criteria relating to impropriety continue to be so ignored.

G. HARD WORK FOR ALL

82. Your Committee is well aware that the recommendations contained in this Report will throw a considerable burden on its own members. They will also cause not only a deal of hard work in Departments and Agencies of the Government, but also the abandonment of many long followed practices and deeply ingrained attitudes. Neither Parliament nor the Executive will serve the people by evading urgent and important reform or by slipping aside from difficulty. "Difficulty", Burke said, "is a severe instructor", but, as your Committee thinks, an indispensable one. "This amicable conflict with difficulty obliges us to an intimate acquaintance with our object and compels us to consider it in all its relations. It will not suffice us to be superficial. It is the want of nerves for understanding for such a task; it is the degenerate fondness for taking short-cuts, and little fallacious facilities, that has in so many parts of the world created governments with arbitrary powers . . . ".

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

A NEW "SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION ACT"

1. That a new Act, entitled "The Subordinate Legislation Act", replace the present Statutory Instruments Act and the relevant sections of the Interpretation Act.—paragraph 61.

2. That the new Subordinate Legislation Act contain the definition of subordinate legislation as generally recommended by the MacGuigan Committee in 1969.—paragraphs 57, 61.

3. That the new Act expressly provide for the Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Review thus putting the Committee's existence on a permanent footing.—paragraph 61.

4. That the Act should provide that all subordinate legislation and other instruments stand permanently referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Review.—paragraph 61.

5. That the Committee's criteria for scrutiny be included in the new Act.—paragraph 62.

6. That the Subordinate Legislation Act include three basic rules or presumptions:

a) the invalidity of sub-delegation of law making power;

b) the presumption against retroactivity of subordinate laws, and

c) the rule that the incorporation of an external standard into subordinate law by reference is only valid if it is of a fixed and not a variable standard.—paragraph 64.

7. That the present section 11 of the Statutory Instruments Act be amended to require that the onus rests on the Crown of proving publication of a subordinate law in the Canada Gazette at the time of an alleged commission of an offence of contravening that law.—paragraph 65.

8. That the procedures governing disallowance and affirmation, ordered according to the following recommendations, should be included in the new "Subordinate Legislation Act".—paragraph 61.

9. That the new Act provide for the notice and comment procedures recommended by the Committee.—paragraph 61.

10. That all subordinate laws, guidelines and interpretative rulings and policy statements should stand referred to Committee.—paragraph 60.

11. That the Government should undertake a survey of the statutes and known subordinate laws of Canada to identify all subordinate laws.—paragraph 59.

ENABLING CLAUSES

12. That the deficiencies your Committee and its predecessors have pointed out in existing statutes be corrected by amending Bills introduced in the Senate upon the recommendation of the Regulatory Review Committee and made the subject of all-party agreement.—paragraph 8.

13. That the Regulatory Review Committee be charged with the duty and responsibility of examining and reporting upon all powers in Bills to make subordinate law or to issue, make or establish other instruments.—paragraph 70.

14. That enabling clauses in Bills be more specifically drafted as is suggested in paragraph 69.

15. That, when enabling powers are being sought, the proposed subordinate laws to be made under them be tabled and studied by the appropriate Standing Committees at the same time they are studying the Bills.—paragraph 17.

16. That there be instituted a system under which the responsible Minister will make a report to Parliament, or the Government will publish a White Paper, outlining the action the Government will take on any report of a Parliamentary Committee with respect to subordinate legislation and law making within three months of the report's presentation to a House of Parliament. Each of the Houses should maintain a register recording the tabling dates of appropriate Committee reports and the date of presentation to the House of any Government statement on it or the date of any White Paper published in response to it.—paragraph 56.

17. That all subordinate legislation should be tabled and laid before Parliament immediately on registration. The Votes and Proceedings of the Commons and the Minutes and Proceedings of the Senate should list under "Returns and Reports Deposited with the Clerk" the title of each subordinate law, the Act and the section or sections under which it is made, its date of registration and the last date on which disallowance may be moved.—paragraph 59.

18. That the Rules and Standing Orders of the Houses should be amended to allow scrutiny and review by Standing Committees of subordinate legislation, either on policy or on merits, on their own initiative or on reference from the Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Review.—paragraph 16.

19. That the Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Review have jurisdiction to scrutinize draft instruments as to legality and propriety, to report to the Houses upon them and to make representations to the sponsoring Departments and Agencies.—paragraph 26.

DISALLOWANCE AND AFFIRMATION PROCEDURES

20. That disallowance of subordinate legislation that has been made and the affirmation of draft subordinate laws (commonly called negative and affirmative vote procedures) be established as regular and invariable parts of the Canadian system of subordinate law.—paragraph 15.

21. That all subordinate legislation not subject to a statutory affirmative procedure be subject to being disallowed on resolution of either House and that the Executive be barred from re-making any statutory instrument so disallowed for a period of six months from its disallowance.—paragraph 24.

22. That if any resolution for disallowance of a statutory instrument is moved, and is not withdrawn, the statutory instrument shall be deemed to have been disallowed if a debate on the resolution does not take place and culminate in a vote within a fixed number of sitting days.—paragraph 24.

23. That the affirmation procedure should be used where the exercise of the enabling powers may:

a) substantially affect the provisions of the enabling or any other statute;

b) impose or increase taxation, fees or charges;

c) lay down a policy not clearly identifiable in the enabling Act or make a new departure in policy; or

d) involve considerations of special importance.—paragraph 26.

24. That a commitment be made by the Government to use the affirmation procedure where practicable and to follow a 21 day rule wherever possible, even in cases where the notice and comment provisions are not applied.—paragraph 26.

25. That the procedure for affirmative resolutions in either House be that contained in section 28.1 of the Interpretation Act.—paragraph 27.

26. That the Rules and Standing Orders of the Houses be amended to facilitate the affirmation procedure.—paragraph 26.

27. That the Interpretation Act provide that: no debate be held on a motion to affirm an instrument until the Regulatory Review Committee has been given an opportunity to report on it within a specified time and until the appropriate Standing Committee has reported on its merits or that it does not wish to do so or the specified time has expired.—paragraph 27.

28. That the affirmative procedure under section 18 of the Government Organization Act, R.S.C. 1970 2nd Supplement, C. 14, and section 4(2) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, S.C. 1970-71-72, C. 48, should be adopted for general use in Canada, as the orders tabled and laid before Parliament under them have no effect until affirmed.—paragraph 28.

29. That draft subordinate laws which are subject to affirmation should stand referred to the Regulatory Review Committee for scrutiny and report before the debate and vote on a motion to affirm takes place.—paragraph 28.

30. That, as the disallowance procedure in section 28.1 of the Interpretation Act is inadequate, and that the six following principles should be followed:

1. Subordinate laws are void and of no effect if not presented in each House within fifteen sitting days of their making.

2. Notice of motion for disallowance in either House must be moved within fifteen sitting days of the tabling or laying of a subordinate law in that House.

3. A notice of motion for disallowance of a subordinate law must be resolved within twenty sitting days, otherwise that law is deemed to be disallowed.

4. The debate on a motion for disallowance of a subordinate law must not be commenced until the expiry of the time limit for receipt of a report from the Regulatory Review Committee as to that law's legality and propriety and from the appropriate Standing Committee on its merits.

5. If a notice of motion for disallowance is unresolved in the Senate or in the House of Commons at the end of a Session or on dissolution of the House of Commons, the subordinate legislation which is the subject of the motion is deemed to be presented to the House concerned at the beginning of the next Session.

6. Subordinate legislation the same in substance as that disallowed may not be made within six months after disallowance or deemed disallowance without the consent of the House in which disallowance occurred.—paragraph 29.

31. That a minimum number of five signatures be required for a motion for disallowance in either House.—paragraph 29.

32. That any enabling power in the Subordinate Legislation Act which provides for the making of regulations exempting any subordinate law from any provision of the Act be made subject to affirmation by both Houses.—paragraph 63.

33. That section 28.1(2) of the Interpretation Act be carried forward so that where a subordinate law has been disallowed or is deemed to have been disallowed any law that was revoked or amended by the making of that law shall be deemed to have been revived at the date of disallowance.—paragraph 30.

NOTICE AND COMMENT PROCEDURES

34. That a mandatory notice and comment procedure covering all new subordinate legislation be introduced in Canada.—paragraph 41.

35. That the Committee supports the Economic Council of Canada in its recommendation that a sixty day notice and comment procedure for all new regulations which have a significant implication in terms of cost or impact on the distribution of income and are susceptible to cost benefit analyses. The Committee, however, would extend the use of notice and comment procedures to all new regulations.—paragraphs 38, 46.

36. That a notice to be published of a proposed subordinate law should be accompanied by a clear statement of the reasons for the proposed regulation, the policy to be furthered by it, and the socio-economic impact analysis where that has been developed pursuant to the existing Health, Safety and Fairness policy of the Treasury Board on the recommendation of the Economic Council of Canada.—paragraph 46.

37. That the socio-economic impact analysis be extended to as many new regulations as is possible.—paragraph 46.

38. That all opinions of advisory bodies and councils be tabled in Parliament with new subordinate laws or draft ones under a Canadian 21 day rule to assist any member who wishes to debate the merits of the law.—paragraph 46.

39. That the notice of a proposed subordinate law be published in the Canada Gazette.—paragraph 47.

40. That both the document which forms the factual basis of the decision to make a new subordinate law and the comments submitted on it should be open to public scrutiny and that any Freedom of Information legislation which is introduced so provide.—paragraph 48.

41. That the notice indicate the policy to be effected and the object to be achieved and invite representations as to both the policy and the means to be employed.—paragraph 49.

42. That, wherever possible, notice of proposed regulation making should be given before a draft regulation is prepared and published.—paragraph 49.

43. That, if a draft subordinate law is significantly altered as a result of submissions received, it should be readvertised with a further 30 day time limit for comments.—paragraph 48.

44. That a regulatory budget, giving a clear notice of all planned non-emergency subordinate laws be prepared, updated and brought forth every quarter.—paragraph 50.

45. That any subordinate legislation exempted from the notice and comment procedures be subject to the following conditions:

a) as soon as a draft is prepared for the Legal Advisors to the Privy Council, it is sent to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Review;

b) cause is shown to the Committee why the regulation is required urgently or need not wait upon the sixty day notice period. While the Committee is sitting cause would have to be shown immediately. If a regulation is made when there is no Committee, cause would have to be shown as soon as the Committee was reconstituted;

c) in any case where the Committee considers cause has not been shown, it shall report the fact to the Houses forthwith and recommend disallowance where the regulation has already been made and refusal of affirmation where the regulation is subject to either of those procedures.—paragraph 51.

46. That the sanction for failure to show cause or to observe the conditions precedent for notice and comment to the Regulatory Review Committee be the invalidity of the subordinate law.—paragraph 53.

47. That interpretative rulings, Departmental guidelines and statements of policy to be applied to individual cases be subject to public input in their formation and be subject to the notice and comment procedure recommended for subordinate legislation.—paragraphs 54, 59.

48. That the quarterly consolidated index and table of statutory instruments should include reference to regulations which have been exempted from publication, according to their title (which should be as descriptive as possible), the Act and the section or sections under which they were made, their date and the date of their registration.—paragraph 59.

49. That statutes make use of a provision stating that regulations made thereunder or under specified sections thereof do not become effective until published or some specified time thereafter.—paragraph 59.

EXPLANATORY MEMORANDUM

50. That an explanatory memorandum be supplied to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Review with each new subordinate law, whether in draft or in final form.—paragraph 80.

51. That such an explanatory memorandum contain explanations in detail of:

a) new powers which are being exercised;

b) substantial changes which are being made in the existing legislation;

c) the powers exercised which are linked with some other legislation, convention or treaty which is not referred to in the new subordinate law or its accompanying explanatory note, especially when that legislative connection or treaty is recent;

d) the enabling powers which are difficult to follow and for which an annotation or explanation of them would aid comprehension; and

e) a subordinate law which is to be amended and which itself has been subject to previous amendment so that it is difficult to follow what is proposed.—paragraph 80.

REGULATORY COUNCIL

52. That a Regulatory Council should be established with members from the regulatory agencies, government departments, public interest groups and industry.—paragraph 35.

53. That the Regulatory Council should maintain a continuous review of the regulatory process, including the making and scrutiny of subordinate law and of means of eliminating unnecessary regulatory effort.—paragraph 35.

54. That the Regulatory Council should make any reports they deem necessary suggesting alterations in procedures and alternative methods of giving publicity to proposed subordinate law making.—paragraph 35.

55. That the Regulatory Council review the operation of the notice and comment procedure at regular intervals to see if more stringent or different procedural requirements are necessary in particular cases of subordinate law-making or in respect of particular agencies or departments of Government.—paragraph 52.

56. That the Regulatory Council be given a mandate to study the whole question of "quasi-law" of interpretative and policy statements, guidelines and manuals, applied by administrators.—paragraph 35.

57. That all departmental directives and guidelines as to the exercise of discretion under a statute or subordinate law where the public is affected by such discretion be published and subject to parliamentary scrutiny.—paragraph 59.

VOTES IN APPROPRIATION ACTS

58. That the making of extensive subordinate laws under Votes in Appropriation Acts should stop and that all existing subordinate laws made under Votes be subject to review as to merits by the appropriate Standing Committees.—paragraph 12.

LEGAL OPINIONS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

59. That the legal opinions given by a solicitor of the Department of Justice or of the Attorney-General himself, when expressly relied upon for a particular course of action or omission in subordinate law making, be made available to the Committee and to the public.—paragraph 79.

DRAFTING PRINCIPLES

60. That the principles and techniques for the drafting of subordinate legislation detailed in paragraphs 68 to 73, be scrupulously followed.

REGULATIONS UNDER THE FISHERIES ACT

61. That the Fisheries Act be amended to permit sub-delegated law-making by the Minister and by designated officials.—paragraph 34.

62. That such sub-delegated laws be exempt from all notice and comment procedures and from the pre-scrutiny requirements of examination by the Legal Advisors to the Privy Council Office.—paragraph 34.

63. That these laws come into force on their being made known locally where they are to apply.—paragraph 34.

64. That these laws remain subject to ex post facto scrutiny by the Regulatory Review Committee, to which they should be required to be sent.—paragraph 34.

65. That a reference be given to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry to engage in a detailed study of all aspects of the Fisheries Act and the policies pursued under it, and that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Review be empowered to report on all subordinate law making powers contained in the present Act.—paragraph 71.

SUNSET PROCEDURES

66. That, after a subordinate law has been in force for a reasonable time, its effectiveness should be evaluated. While such evaluations will of necessity have to be generally performed by Government Departments and Agencies, your Committee recommends, as does the Economic Council of Canada, that they be referred to the appropriate Standing Committees of the Houses for review.—paragraphs 14, 55.

—12 No. 553. Rule (a) This section applies, according to the provisions thereof, except to the extent that there is involved; (1) a military or foreign affairs function of the United States; or (2) a matter relating to agency management or personnel or to public property, loans, grants, benefits, or contracts. (b) General notice of proposed rule making shall be published in the Federal Register, unless persons subject thereto are named and either personally served or otherwise have actual notice thereof in accordance with law. The notice shall include; (1) a statement of the time, place, and nature of public rule making proceedings; (2) reference to the legal authority under which the rule is proposed; and (3) either the terms of substance of the proposed rule or a description of the subjects and issues involved. Except when notice or hearing is required by statute, this subsection does not apply; (A) to interpretative rules, general statements of policy, or rules of agency organization, procedure, or practice; or (B) when the agency for good cause finds (and incorporates the finding and a brief statement of reasons therefor in the rules issued) that notice and public procedure thereon are impracticable, unnecessary, or contrary to the public interest. (c) After notice required by this section, the agency shall give interested persons an opportunity to participate in the rule making through submission of written data, views, or arguments with or without opportunity for oral presentation. After consideration of the relevant matter presented, the agency shall incorporate in the rules adopted a concise general statement of their basis and purpose. When rules are required by statute to be made on the record after opportunity for an agency hearing, sections 556 and 557 of this title apply instead of this subsection. (d) The required publication or service of a substantive rule shall be made not less than 30 days before its effective date, except; (1) a substantive rule which grants or recognizes an exemption or relieves a restriction; (2) interpretative rules and statements of policy; or (3) as otherwise provided by the agency for good cause found and published with the rule. (e) Each agency shall give an interested person the right to petition for the issuance, amendment, or repeal of a rule. (Pub. L. 89-554, Sept. 6, 1966, 80 Stat. 383).

APPENDIX I

SUBORDINATE LAW, ORDERS IN COUNCIL, "MINISTERIAL ORDERS", REGULATIONS, STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS AND OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS

1. There is no magic in nomenclature. It is generally the nature of a document which is important, not its name. (Unfortunately, there are exceptions to this proposition within the definitions of "regulation" and of "statutory instrument" in the Statutory Instruments Act.)

2. Virtually all acts of the Crown, of its servants and agents, which have legal effect are carried out by or evidenced in writing. The resulting documents bear many names and there is little consistency in the names of documents (regulation, order, by-law, warrant, etc.) in which acts or powers are executed, exercised or evidenced. The form of some documents and of appointments to some offices, the sealing requirements and the signatures required are set out in the Formal Documents Regulations made under the Seals Act.

3. The formal decision of the Governor in Council to issue a document or to make an appointment is in almost all cases embodied in an Order in Council. Similarly, the decision to issue a Proclamation is embodied in an Order in Council.

4. An Order in Council is an Order of the Sovereign, or of Her representative for the time being whether Governor-General or Administrator, made after receiving the advice (not necessarily the consent although that is now, politically, always essential) of the Privy Council. For the giving of advice no particular quorum of Council is now required by law. By tradition dating from 1627 a minimum of three Councillors, in addition to the Sovereign, is required. This replaced an earlier requirement of Henry VIII that a minimum of two Councillors attend upon the Sovereign. In Canada a quorum of four seems customarily to have sat. Queen Victoria's Instructions to the first Governor General, Viscount Monck, provided for a quorum of four Councillors and this requirement has been followed as a tradition ever since. In contrast with the practice in the other countries of the Monarchical Commonwealth, the Governor General does not preside at meetings of the Council and has not done so for many decades. Dr. Forsey advises that the last occasion occurred during the Great War, H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught presiding.

5. The Order in Council is the universal workhorse of Canadian administration. This is particularly so since so many statutes provide that the subordinate laws made under them and the administrative acts and appointments required by them shall be done and made by the "Governor in Council". The consequence of this is that, since the Governor in Council acts by Order in Council, subordinate laws, appointments and administrative acts are all embodied in or authorized by Orders in Council, although the documents that result may be termed regulations, orders, warrants, rules or anything else Parliament called them in the enabling statutes. The form of making them all is an Order in Council.

6. In many cases Parliament provides that some delegate may make laws or do some act "with the approval of the Governor in Council". The approval, when it is forthcoming, is signified in an Order in Council.

7. Consequently, of all the Orders in Council made in any year only a proportion, at present about one fifth, can be classified as making or as approving the making of subordinate laws, whether those subordinate laws go under the name of regulations, rules, by-laws, orders, tariffs or whatever. In answer to a question of Mr. Leonard Jones (H.C. Debates October 17, 1977 p. 8259) the following statistics were given:

Total number of Orders in Council made in 1976		3326
Pursuant to Statute	3265
Under the Royal Prerogative	61

DESCRIPTION OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL FOR THE YEAR 1976

	Number	Percentage
Appointments (includes re-appointments, resignations and fixing salaries)	750	22.55
Regulations and other Statutory Instruments	653	19.63
Lands and other property (includes exchanges, acquisitions, transfers to or from a Province, sales of lands under the surplus Crown Assets Act and under the Veterans' Land Act)	481	14.46
Contracts and other agreements	289	8.70
Pardons and Revocations (under Criminal Records Act)	234	7.03
Foreign Investment Reveiw Act	232	6.97
Payments, loans, contributions, grants and gifts	161	4.84
Remission Orders	82	2.46
Satisfied Securities	75	2.25
Judges Act, other than appointments (annuities to widows, approving residence, retirements, etc.)	55	1.65
Railways	41	1.23
Ex gratis payments	35	1.05
Other	238	7.18
Total	3,326	100.00

8. Parliament occasionally delegates subordinate law-making power to persons other than the Governor General in Council. The Post Office Act, for example, confers extensive subordinate law-making power directly on the Postmaster General. The Aeronautics Act allows the Governor in Council to empower the Minister of Transport to make extensive subordinate laws (confusingly called "Orders"). Under a series of Acts, the Canadian Transport Commission enjoys extensive law-making power.

9. Amongst subordinate laws the Statutory Instruments Act introduces a series of highly artificial distinctions. Some subordinate laws, by whomsoever they are made, are categorized as "statutory instruments" and of these some are further categorized as "regulations" (although they may be called regulations, by-laws, tariffs, rules or whatever). Only "regulations" and certain other statutory instruments and types of statutory instruments, as determined by Parliament or by the Clerk of the Privy Council, must be registered in the Privy Council Office and published in the Canada Gazette, Part II.

10. A list or schedule of all Orders in Council made is tabled in the House of Commons monthly and copies of the list are available from the Sessional Papers Office. No such list is tabled in the Senate. A copy of any Order in Council, other than one exempted from inspection pursuant to the Statutory Instruments Act—(1) may be obtained from the office of the Assistant Clerk of the Privy Council, 15th Floor, Varette Building, 130 Albert Street, Ottawa.

11. It follows from the foregoing that

(i) subordinate laws not made by or approved by Order in Council will not appear on the monthly list of Orders in Council;

(ii) only a portion of the Orders in Council on the monthly list will be subordinate legislation whether regulations or other statutory instruments;

(iii) only a portion of the Orders in Council on the monthly list will appear in the Canada Gazette Part II; others may appear in Part I of the Gazette or not be published at all.

12. In other jurisdictions of the British Commonwealth enjoying the same constitutional forms as does Canada, it is far more common to confer subordinate law-making power on Ministers and on boards, commissions and tribunals. Consequently, in those jurisdictions there will be far fewer instances of subordinate laws being embodied in Orders in Council or Minutes of the Privy or Executive Council.

13. In the United Kingdom, in particular, use of the Order in Council to make subordinate law is rare, being confined largely to emergency laws, and constitutional arrangements for colonies and dependencies. In addition, the United Kingdom displays a greater sophistication in the use of royal instruments and seals than does Canada with the result that the numbers of Orders in Council necessary to authorize appointments and governmental actions is correspondingly less.

14. In the United Kingdom most primary subordinate law is made by Secretaries of State or by other Ministers of the Crown. Virtually all primary subordinate laws fall into the United Kingdom definition of statutory instruments. Again, however, the documents in which subordinate laws are contained go under various names, regulations, orders, schemes, directions, by-laws, warrants, resolutions, although by far the greater number of them all is made by Ministers.

15. In considering United Kingdom subordinate legislation, there is no magic, special significance or even specific meaning in the phrase "Ministerial order".

16. An analysis of United Kingdom statutory instruments made in 1976 is attached.

17. There is no reason to suppose from statistics now available that Canada is any more or less governed by laws made outside Parliament than is the United Kingdom. While it may appear that the total number of statutory instruments or their equivalents in Canada, Dominion and Provincial, would far exceed the 2,248 for the United Kingdom in 1976, it must be remembered that

(i) the functions of local government are far more extensive in the United Kingdom than in Canada;

(ii) there has developed in the United Kingdom an orderly system of Ministerial Circulars, Letters and Directives which contain many subordinate rules but which are not included in the category "statutory instrument". It is known that much the same practice obtains in Departments of the Government of Canada through the issuing of "Guidelines" and "Manuals". However, these are generally secret, unlike their United Kingdom counterparts, and it is impossible to form any estimate as to their number or as to the number of substantive rules in them;

(iii) the definition of "statutory instrument" in the United Kingdom has been treated as not extending to include rules made in the exercise of a sub-delegated power.

18. It is often said in the Press, and is popularly believed, that in Canada the Cabinet makes all regulations (and other statutory instruments) made by Order in Council. This is not true. First, the Governor General, whose approval is an essential element, is not part of the Cabinet. Secondly, while the Cabinet, sometimes after a recommendation of a Cabinet Committee, does consider some especially important or sensitive regulations, by far the greater number is recommended for His Excellency's approval by the Special Committee of Council, which consists of ten Privy Councillors with a quorum of four. The decision as to whether a regulation has sufficient policy implications to warrant going to a Cabinet Committee or directly to Cabinet is made essentially by the recommending Minister, occasionally by Cabinet itself.

FOOTNOTE

—1 The details are set out in section 21 of the Statutory Instruments Regulations. In peacetime this restriction, so far as it bears on Orders in Council, relates to pardons and the precise salary portions of appointments.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS MADE IN THE U.K. IN 1976

1. General statutory instruments	1,114
Local statutory instruments	1,134

NOTE The local instruments are not always printed and are not included in the annual volume of statutory instruments.

2. Analysis of the 1,114 general statutory instruments:

Orders	484
Regulations	381
Orders in Council	128
Rules	53
Acts of Sederunt	39
Acts of Adjournment	4
Schemes	13
Approval instruments	4
Orders of Council	3
Directions	2
Bylaws	1

NOTE: (a) Acts of Sederunt and Act of Adjournal are rules governing procedure of Scottish Courts.

(b) Orders of Council are orders made by the Privy Council, not in the presence of the Sovereign, approving rules regulating professional education and conduct in regard to certain professions, e.g. doctors, dentists, opticians.

3. Of the general statutory instruments mentioned in paragraph 2,

(a) 103 required affirmative approval of both Houses;

(b) 627 were subject to annulment by either House;

(c) 42 required affirmative approval of the House of Commons only;

(d) 95 were subject to annulment by the House of Commons.

4. Prerogative Orders in Council—167

NOTE: These are orders made under the prerogative, not under statutory powers, relating to colonies, mostly providing new constitutions.

APPENDIX II

CRITERIA FOR SCRUTINY OF STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

In scrutinizing statutory instruments the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments uses the following criteria, approved in their present form by the two Houses in February, 1978:

Whether any Regulation or other Statutory Instrument within its terms of reference, in the judgement of the Committee:

1. (a) is not authorized by the terms of the enabling statute, or, if it is made pursuant to the prerogative, its terms are not in conformity with the common law; or

(b) does not clearly state therein the precise authority for the making of the Instrument;

2. has not complied with the provisions of the Statutory Instruments Act with respect to transmittal, recording, numbering or publication;

3. (a) has not complied with any tabling provision or other condition set forth in the enabling statute; or

(b) does not clearly state therein the time and manner of compliance with any such condition;

4. makes some unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the enabling statute or by the prerogative;

5. trespasses unduly on the rights and liberties of the subject;

6. (a) tends directly or indirectly to exclude the jurisdiction of the Courts without explicit authorization therefor in the enabling statute; or

(b) makes the rights and liberties of the subject dependent on administrative discretion rather than on the judicial process;

7. purports to have retroactive effect where the enabling statute confers no express authority so to provide or, where such authority is so provided, the retroactive effect appears to be oppressive, harsh or unnecessary;

8. appears for any reason to infringe the rule of law or the rules of natural justice;

9. provides without good and sufficient reason that it shall come into force before registration by the Clerk of the Privy Council;

10. in the absence of express authority to that effect in the enabling statute or prerogative, appears to amount to the exercise of a substantive legislative power properly the subject of direct parliamentary enactment, and not merely to the formulation of subordinate provisions of a technical or administrative character properly the subject of delegated legislation;

11. without express provision to the effect having been made in the enabling statute or prerogative, imposes a fine, imprisonment or other penalty, or shifts the onus of proof of innocence to the person accused of an offence;

12. imposes a charge on the public revenues or contains provisions requiring payment to be made to the Crown or to any other authority in consideration of any license or service to be rendered, or prescribes the amount of any such charge or payment, without express authority to that effect having been provided in the enabling statute or prerogative;

13. is not in conformity with the Canadian Bill of Rights;

14. is unclear in its meaning or otherwise defective in its drafting;

15. for any other reason requires elucidation as to its form or purport.

APPENDIX III

PROCEDURES FOR PARLIAMENTARY CONTROL OF DELEGATED LEGISLATION IN THE UNITED KINGDOM AND IN THE COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA

A. The United Kingdom

1. Statutory instruments fall into four classes:

(i) those having been laid before Parliament subject to annulment (i.e. disallowance) by either House or by the House of Commons alone with respect to instruments under financial legislation, within forty sitting days of laying;

(ii)(a) those which must be laid in draft and which can not be made unless affirmed by both Houses, or the Commons alone in the case of financial instruments, within twenty-eight or forty days, usually the latter;

(b) those which having been made must be laid and cease to have effect unless affirmed within twenty-eight or forty days, usually the latter;

(iii) those which must be laid but need not be affirmed and can not be disallowed; and

(iv) those which need not be laid and need not be affirmed and can not be disallowed.

2. The Standing Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments has jurisdiction to scrutinize and draw the attention of the Houses (or the House of Commons alone with respect to financial instruments) to any instrument from any of the four classes. Classes (i) and (ii)—those subject to affirmation or annulment—constitute approximately two thirds of all instruments, and a higher proportion of those under modern legislation. Class (i) comprises approximately one half of all instruments.

3. No debate on or vote for affirmation of an instrument takes place until the Committee has scrutinized it and reported to the Houses or the House of Commons as the case may be.

4. The Government follows a practice of tabling the drafts of instruments subject to annulment at least twenty-one days before they are made to allow greater time for Committee scrutiny and Committee report. This is called the "21 day rule". Some procedures are in place including debate in a Standing Committee to facilitate prayers for annulment.

5. Whether a Bill provides for affirmation or annulment of instruments to be made under it when enacted is a matter decided upon by the Minister introducing the Bill. However, skeletal statutes generally require affirmation for instruments made under them.

B. The Commonwealth of Australia (Sections 48-50 of the Acts Interpretation Act)

1. Regulations must be notified in the Commonwealth Gazette and take effect from the date of notification or some later date. They must also be laid before each House within fifteen sitting days of their making. Regulations not so laid are void.

2. Either House may by passage of a resolution disallow any regulation provided notice of motion is given within fifteen sitting days (usually a period of five weeks) of this being laid.

3. If a motion for a resolution to disallow is not called on and disposed of within fifteen sitting days of notice of the motion, the regulation specified in the motion is deemed to have been disallowed on that fifteenth day.

4. Disallowance or deemed disallowance has the same effect as repeal.

5. Where a regulation has been disallowed, or is deemed to have been disallowed, no regulation, being the same in substance as that disallowed or deemed to have been disallowed, may be made within six months of disallowance unless the House disallowing or in which deemed disallowance took place approves.

6. Territorial Ordinances and Regulations, Rules of Court and By-laws of public sector corporations and some orders of regulating authorities under the Broadcasting and Television Act are subject to the same procedures as above.

7. The House of Representatives has never taken any part in the scrutiny and control of delegated legislation, which has been a function zealously pursued by the Senate. Motions for disallowance usually follow upon an adverse report from the Regulations and Ordinances Committee of the Senate (at work since 1932). Instruments disapproved of by that Committee, if not withdrawn by the Government, are habitually disallowed by the Senate.

APPENDIX IV

SOCIO-ECONOMIC IMPACT ANALYSIS OF THE TREASURY BOARD

Regulation: a regulation as defined by Section 2(1) of the Statutory Instruments Act. (This definition includes amendments to existing regulations.) Where a standard or set of standards is incorporated by reference into a regulation, the standard or set of standards should be considered as a part of the regulation for the purposes of the SEIA policy.

Health or safety regulation: a regulation or an amendment to a regulation made pursuant to any of the statutes listed in Appendix A, which

(a) concerns the health or safety (in the broadest sense) of the general public or of particular segments thereof, or the protection of the environment, except that

(b) to the extent that a regulation concerns economic rate-setting, metric conversion, the eligibility criteria for health or safety programs or policies, or the financial administration of health or safety programs, it is deemed not to be a health or safety regulation for the purposes of the SEIA policy.

For example, regulations concerning environmental contaminants, hazardous or potentially hazardous goods or substances, food contamination prevention, occupational health or safety, fall within the definition. Regulations (such as the Canada Assistance Plan regulations) concerning eligibility criteria or the mechanics of health funding or expenditures do not. Note that a proposed regulation falling within the definition and also containing aspects of economic rate-setting, metric conversion or eligibility criteria would be subject to the policy but the excluded areas need not be addressed.

Fairness regulation: a regulation or an amendment to a regulation, made pursuant to any of the statutes listed in Appendix A, which

(a) concerns protection against fraud, deception, or inaccuracy in the reporting of information, except that

(b) to the extent that a regulation concerns economic rate-setting or metric conversion, it is deemed not to be a fairness regulation for the purposes of the SEIA policy.

For example, regulations prescribing minimum or mandatory quality standards, prescribing grade names in the broadest sense, requiring accuracy in weighing or measuring, requiring the accurate disclosure of information or requiring that disclosed information be accurate fall within the definition. Note that a regulation which would otherwise fall completely within the definition is only excluded to the extent that it concerns economic rate-setting or metric conversion; this means that such a regulation might still have aspects which would fall within the area of fairness, and consequently, would still be subject to the requirements of the SEIA policy.

New HSF regulation: an HSF regulation or an amendment to an HSF regulation which was promulgated on August 1, 1978 or thereafter, and which was made under the authority of any statute listed in Appendix A on the date on which the regulation or amendment was promulgated; or any proposed HSF regulation or any proposed amendment to an HSF regulation which is to be made under the authority of any statute listed in Appendix A.

Major HSF regulation: an HSF regulation whose economic or social impact either exceeds the cost criteria or entails a sizeable potential adverse effect on specific groups or on technological progress, market structure and competition. The precise cost criteria and the other criteria for distinguishing between major and minor new HSF regulations are described in Appendix B. Most major HSF regulations will be considered major because of the cost criteria. The other criteria are included to ensure that no HSF regulation which has other important implications of potential concern to interested groups, or the public at large, goes unassessed.

.3.3 Content of analysis

.3.3.1 Content of the SEIA References are made to examples of socio-economic impact analyses in Appendix E. These examples provide guidance on the information and detail to be included in an SEIA.

At present, a prescribed format for all SEIAs is not considered appropriate. However, it is possible that a suitable format for the majority of SEIAs may emerge as the number performed increases. Until such time, departments and agencies shall ensure that each SEIA provides the following information presented in the order given:

(a) Background information on the proposed regulation: a description of the proposed regulation including its terms and legal authority; its purpose and objectives; brief outline of how the concern arose; the nature and role of consultations which took place in the development of the proposed regulation; and why an SEIA was performed.

(b) Analysis of the potential allocative effects:

—identification of the methodology used to carry out the analysis and of the time horizon used in the analysis;

—section on costs: identification and estimation of all costs associated with compliance with the proposed regulation including all assumptions made; identification of data sources used in estimates; the discounted present value(s) of the total costs including identification of the real rate(s) of discount used; outline of any sensitivity analysis performed; tables, graphs etc. as appropriate;

—section on benefits: same information as for costs; when cost-effectiveness methodology is used, a brief explanation of why estimates were or were not discounted;

—cost-benefit or cost-effectiveness comparisons: net present values, benefit-cost or cost-effectiveness ratios for all cases, i.e. including different assumptions used in performing sensitivity analyses or when different sets of data are available, etc.;

—section on alternatives: identification of all technological and policy-instrument alternatives considered and discussion of feasibility of each alternative, including the status-quo alternative; for each feasible alternative, costs and benefits should be identified, estimated and compared as is appropriate.

(c) Analysis of the non-allocative effects: a discussion of the potential impact of the proposed regulation on the distribution of income, market structure and competition, technological progress, international competitiveness, output, employment, the balance of payments, inflation, etc.; details of the size and/or direction of such impacts which are significant.

(d) Summary and conclusions including the reasons for omitting any of the above identified items.

(e) Identification of the office or person(s) to contact regarding the SEIA.

.3.3.2 Contents of the summary of the SEIA The terms of, the legal authority for, and the purpose of a major new HSF regulation shall be published in advance in Part I of the Canada Gazette, along with a summary of the SEIA. The following paragraphs list the type of information which shall be included in the summary of the SEIA to be published:

(a) a statement of the reason(s) why the proposed HSF regulation is considered as major (e.g. the proposed HSF regulation was identified as major and subjected to a socio-economic impact analysis because it could lead to increased social costs for the national economy of $10 million or more in any one year);

(b) a statement on the methodology (e.g. benefit-cost, cost-effectiveness) and on the time horizon used to analyze the allocative effects of the proposed HSF regulation;

(c) a summary of the expected social costs (e.g. capital expenditures, operating and maintenance costs required for compliance) and their present values under the real social discount rates suggested and, when appropriate, under different sets of assumptions;

(d) a summary of the expected social benefits (e.g. to save energy, to reduce injuries, to save lives) and of either their present values under the real social discount rates suggested (when cost-benefit analysis can be used) or their magnitude (when the social benefits can only be expressed in physical terms). When appropriate, a range should be provided in view of different sets of assumptions;

(e) a statement on the net present values, benefit-cost or cost-effectiveness ratios obtained from using various sets of assumptions;

(f) a summary of the technological or policy-instrument (when appropriate) alternatives considered in order to meet the same objective(s) as the proposed HSF regulation and, if the alternatives are practicable, the net present values, benefit-cost or cost-effectiveness ratios shall be provided;

(g) a summary of the potential non-allocative effects considered within the complete SEIA (e.g. impact on the distribution of income, on prices, on international trade, on market structure and competition). For those variables on which the proposed HSF regulation is expected to have an impact, the size and direction of the impact shall be provided;

(h) when appropriate, a statement of the reason(s) why one or more of the above items were not considered;

(i) identification of the office from which and person(s) from whom the complete SEIA can be obtained.

Sponsoring departments should consult their respective information divisions on the development and issue of general publicity packages. For example, an SEIA of proposed school bus safety standards would likely have the following interested audiences: school boards, school bus manufacturers, transportation specialists and safety organizations. All groups have publications related to their special interest and news releases should be prepared for each of them. Special efforts should be made to reach small groups (e.g. the small-business community) that may be affected by the regulation.

A. The Canadian SEIA

On December 14, 1977 the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs announced changes to the regulation-making process by requiring a Socio-Economic Impact Analysis (SEIA) program, for major proposed health, safety and fairness—(2) regulations.—(3) The program, which came into effect August 1, 1978, provides an opportunity for increased public participation in regulation-making through a "notice and comment" procedure and requires regulations in the areas of health, safety, fairness, and environmental protection to be subjected to a socio-economic impact analysis.—(4) The program constitutes an important movement toward reform of the regulatory process as it requires an evaluation of the policy effects of proposed new regulations.—(5)

The SEIA program will subject only new regulations to the system of evaluation, and only major regulations in the health, safety, fairness and environmental protection field will be included; the magnitude of "social costs"—(6) is to be the major criterion for distinguishing between major and minor regulations, with those, for example, with expected social costs of over $10 million in one year classified as "major". Special procedures are provided for major new health, safety and fairness regulations related to cases of emergency, when fast action is necessary.

Federal departments and agencies are responsible for initiating consultations with interested parties when new regulations are contemplated, for identifying major new health, safety, fairness and environmental regulations and for preparing the socio-economic impact analyses, using guidelines provided by the Technical Advisory Group on Impact Assessment (TAG). That Group maintains an assistance and advisory role, providing guidance on the preparation of SEIA's and advising whether proposed regulations are within the class of health, safety, fairness, and environmental protection.

A proposed regulation within the class and a summary of the SEIA must be published in the Canada Gazette at least sixty days prior to the date when the regulation is to be promulgated.

The summary of the SEIA to be pre-published is to include—(7): a statement of the reasons why the regulation is considered as major; a statement on the methodology and time horizon used to analyse the effects of the regulation; a summary of the expected social costs and expected social benefits; a summary of the alternatives considered to meet the same objectives as the proposed regulation; a summary of the potential non-allocative effects considered (for example, impact on the distribution of income, on prices, on international trade, on market structure and competiton); identification of the office from which and the person from whom the complete SEIA can be obtained. The responsible department or agency is required to make the complete SEIA publicly available and must respond to comments and requests for changes.

As noted above, the SEIA only became effective on August 1, 1978; as of December 1979, only one report has actually been released to the public, an evaluation of the socio-economic effects of various proposals for regulating the use of chlorofluoromethanes in aerosol sprays.—(8) Thus it is too early to assess the effectiveness of the program. It can be questioned whether the policy will actually affect regulatory decision-making or whether it will be used as a method of rationalizing decisions already taken.—(9) The requirement of consultation with non-government interest groups when new regulations are contemplated would appear to be very beneficial in this regard. In this consultation, it is necessary that participation of diverse interests is encouraged so that the process not serve to further only the special interests of politically effective groups.

Another consideration to be examined is whether the SEIA process would be more useful in an extensive though less intensive review of existing regulations; both examination of new proposals and existing regulations are, of course, beneficial. Finally, consideration should be given to extending the process to cover economic as well as health, safety and fairness regulations, as is the situation in the U.S.

FOOTNOTES

—2 The term "fairness" refers to protection against fraud or deceptive practices.

—3 The details of this program are contained in Treasury Board Canada, Administrative Policy Manual, chapter 490.

—4 Thus all economic or rate-setting regulations are expressly excluded.

—5 The SEIA program is discussed in Robert D. Anderson, forthcoming.

—6 The "social costs" are the value of all the additional resources which would have to be used to meet the requirements of the regulation or which would have to be transferred outside the country to meet the higher costs of imported goods and services as a result of the regulation.

B. The United States Experience

In the United States provision is made for public input into the regulation-making process, by requiring publication of proposed rules and consideration of responses, and at the discretion of the rule-maker, the possibility of an oral hearing on the proposed rules.

The U.S. Administrative Procedure Act, passed in 1946, provides for a "notice and comment" procedure. The Act requires notice in the Federal Register, the U.S. equivalent of the Canada Gazette, of proposed rule-making to be given at least thirty days before its effective date. The notice must include the time, place and nature of public rule-making proceedings, if any, reference to the legal authority under which the rules—(1) is proposed and information on the rule or the issues involved. Agencies—(2) are required to give interested persons an opportunity to participate in rule-making through submission of written data, views, or arguments with or without opportunity for oral presentation. The agency is obliged, after taking account of the material submitted, to incorporate in the rules a concise statement of their basis and purpose.

These rule-making provisions apply only to substantive rules; they do not apply to interpretative rules, general statements of policy, or rules of agency organization, procedure, or practice, as well as rules involving military or foreign affairs. An agency itself may ignore the notice and public procedure requirements if "for good cause", they are impracticable, unnecessary, or contrary to the public interest"—(3).

The requirements concerning thirty-day notice only may be avoided in cases involving a substantive rule which grants or recognizes an exemption or relieves a restriction; interpretative rules and statements of policy; or as otherwise provided by the agency for good cause found and published with the rule—(4).

Section 553 applies to so-called "informal rule-making". Other statutes may contain requirements that rules be made on the record after a hearing; in these cases, while the notice provisions in section 553 apply, the public participation in the rule-making process is governed by sections 556 and 557, which provide for such matters as the taking of evidence, handing down decisions, and compiling a record.

There appears to be a general satisfaction with the procedures:

> "A survey of the American periodical literature and the various administrative law texts some thirty-two years after the enactment of the Administration Procedure Act reveals no suggestion at all that section 553 should be repealed. The extra workload it has imposed on many regulatory agencies and departments of state seems to have been accepted willingly because of the valuable information generated by the 'notice and comment' procedure and, also in part, because of the fact that the opportunity for prior involvement in the development of rules has the tendency of defusing criticism and making those rules more acceptable politically"—(5).

And, as stated by Professor K. C. Davis in Administrative Law of the Seventies, "the system is simple and overwhelmingly successful"—(6).

Movement for reform has instead been in the other direction: for a narrowing of the exceptions to the "notice and comment" procedure. Professor Davis has called for such a move:

> "Unfortunately, a large portion of all legislative rules are issued without party participation, because of the many exceptions to s. 553. Congress should and probably will scale down those exceptions"—(7).

The Administrative Conference of the United States—(8), at its Fifteenth Plenary Session in December 1976, urged administrative agencies to follow the section 553 procedure for interpretative rules of general applicability if likely to have a "substantial impact" on the public—(9), noting that it was extremely difficult to distinguish interpretative rules, exempted from the Act, from substantive rules, which are subject to the Act. In addition to this and other calls for removal or restriction on exemptions, there have been indications that the Act does not provide for an appropriate level of public participation. There have been suggestions, for example, that, while trial-type hearings may be inappropriate for rule-making, something more than "notice and comment" procedures may be required, as for example legislative-type hearings, a discovery system, the imposition of formal rules governing the compilation of a rule-making record, or perhaps consultation before publication of a rule in the Federal Register—(10).

The need for change has also been recognized by legislators, as evidenced by the number of statutes enacted in the past few years which require some procedures in addition to "notice and comment" during rule-making—(11). In addition, many regulatory agencies have voluntarily adopted procedures going beyond the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act—(12). U.S. federal courts have also at times extended the requirements applying to the rule-making procedure: in requiring rule-making hearings for certain types of interpretative and procedural rules, in deciding that the procedures set out in the Administrative Procedure Act should be treated as a minimum requirement, and requiring much fuller participation in some cases, as for example, where the rule-making involves the determination of narrow adjudicative facts—(13).

The Commission on Federal Paperwork has recommended that the Act be amended to provide for greater opportunity for input at the early drafting stages of a rule by those likely to be affected, presumably so that by the time of publication a rule would have wider acceptance, and thus bring about a reduction in paperwork at later stages of the rule-making process. The Commission also noted that public participation resulted in better rules, and the necessary paperwork added through greater participation is temporary, whereas the paperwork associated with a poorly written rule allowed to go into effect can be endless—(14).

Another consideration that is worthy of note is the rejection by commentators of trial-type procedures in the development of rules—(15).

> "The actual agency experience with these procedural requirements raises serious doubts about their desirability. At best, some agencies have learned to live with them, even though preferable procedures are probably available. At worst, these procedures have warped regulatory programs or resulted in virtual abandonment of them . . . "—(16).

In summation, it appears that there is an overall satisfaction with the Act; concern with the Act centers on the exemptions, and on the fact that there are only two extremes provided for: the "notice and comment" procedure and a trial-like adjudicatory hearing.

Executive Order 12044—(17), issued in March 1978, contains a requirement for executive agencies to follow a "notice and comment" procedure. The Order requires that executive agencies give the public "an early and meaningful opportunity to participate" in the development of regulations—(18). A number of possible methods are listed: publishing an advance notice of proposed rule-making, holding open conferences or public hearings; sending notices of proposed regulations to publications likely to be read by those affected; and notifying parties directly. Agencies are required to give the public 60 days to comment on proposed significant regulations, and where this does not prove possible, the regulation must be accompanied by a brief statement of the reasons for the shorter time period.

The Executive Order also requires executive agencies to make use of a "regulatory calendar"—(19). In order to give the public adequate notice the agencies are required to publish at least semi-annually an agenda of significant regulations under development or review. On the first Monday in October each agency must publish in the Federal Register a schedule showing when their semi-annual agenda will be published; supplements to the agenda may be published at other times if necessary. Each published agenda must, at a minimum, describe the regulations being considered by the agency, the need and legal basis for the action being taken, and the status of regulations previously listed in the agenda. In addition, the agenda must state whether or not a regulatory analysis will be required, and include existing regulations scheduled to be reviewed—(20).

—1 A "rule" is defined as the whole or part of an agency statement of general or particular applicability and future effect designed to implement, interpret, or prescribe law or policy or describing the organization, procedure, or practice requirements of an agency, and includes the approval or prescription for the future of rates, wages, corporate or financial structures or reorganization thereof, prices facilities, appliances, services or allowances therefor or of valuations, costs, or accounting, or practices bearing on any of the foregoing.

—2 "Agency" is defined as any authority of the government of the United States whether or not it is subject to review by another agency, but does not include: the Congress; the courts; the governments of territories or possessions or the District of Columbia; agencies composed of representatives of the parties or representatives of organizations of the parties to the disputes determined by them; courts martial; military authority exercised in the field in time of war or in occupied territory; and certain specific exemptions in other statutes.

APPENDIX VI

DISPOSITION BY THE GOVERNMENT OF RECOMMENDATIONS IN THE SECOND REPORT OF THE STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ON REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS FOR THE 1976-77 SESSION

B. The Committee's criteria for scrutiny of Statutory Instruments

Not acted upon

1. The Committee's criteria for scrutiny should be written into the Statutory Instruments Act so that they will not need to be adopted and concurred in anew by the two Houses at the commencement of every Session and Parliament.

Acted Upon

2. An additional criterion should be added, namely, whether a statutory instrument trespasses unduly on the rights and liberties of the subject.

E. Defects in the Statutory Instruments Act, principally the definition of a Statutory Instrument

Rejected

1. As a general rule no subordinate legislation should come into effect before it is published.

Not acted upon

2. All subordinate legislation, unless expressly excepted by the terms of the Statutory Instruments Act, should be registered, published and transmitted to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Not acted upon

3. The definitions of "statutory instrument" and "regulation" at present contained in the Statutory Instruments Act should be repealed and replaced by a clear definition of a statutory instrument as a piece of subordinate legislation, with any exceptions from the definition, being also the exceptions to Parliamentary scrutiny, specifically and clearly set out.

Not acted upon

4. The distinction between "regulations" and "other statutory instruments" provided for in the Statutory Instruments Act should be abandoned. There should be but one class of subordinate laws, called statutory instruments, broadly defined in accordance, in general terms, with the definition of "regulation" as contained in the Interpretation Act.

Not acted upon

5. All documents contained within the single class of statutory instruments should be subject to uniform procedure as to registration, publication and restriction on retroactive effect.

Not acted upon

6. The definition of a statutory instrument should not be made to depend upon the insertion in an enabling power of the name of any particular type of document or instrument preceded by the preposition "by".

Not acted upon

7. The new definition of a statutory instrument should be arrived at by taking the sum of the law-making and rule-making exercised by the Crown and its agencies and by any other delegate or sub-delegate of Parliament, and whether made pursuant to or under a statute or to the Prerogative, and by declaring the whole to be subject to Parliamentary scrutiny. If it is then desired to exclude any documents or classes of documents from scrutiny, from registration and publication, those documents or classes of documents would need to be defined expressly. Such definitions should be construed narrowly and a statutory direction to this effect should be included in the Statutory Instruments Act.

Not acted upon

8. The Statutory Instruments Act should provide for a Statutory Instruments Reference Committee having the authority to issue a conclusive determination for the purposes of Parliamentary scrutiny as to whether any particular document is a statutory instrument or not.

Not acted upon

9. Any Departmental Guidelines, Directives or Manuals which contain substantive rules not contained in statutes or in other statutory instruments should be included within the definition of a statutory instrument and be subject to Parliamentary scrutiny. This inclusion should extend to Guidelines, Directives, etc. which constitute instructions to staff where the rules so made are applied to or in respect of non-staff members or where the breach of the rules can lead to disciplinary action against the staff member committing the breach.

Not acted upon

10. Where any statutory instrument is to come into force before registration and publication, the reasons therefor should be provided to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Not acted upon

11. Should the distinction between "regulations" and "other statutory instruments" be retained, the words "regulation-making authority" in the Statutory Instruments Act should be re-defined to make clear that in respect of regulations made by the Governor in Council by Order in Council they mean the Department, Ministry or other body which recommends the draft Order to the Governor in Council.

Overtaken by the Consolidation of the Regulations

12. Section 32 of the Statutory Instruments Act should be amended to require the publication of the regulations that have been registered under that section.

F. Matters relating to the form of Statutory Instruments

Acted upon

1. Both the enabling authority for subordinate legislation and other documents or statutory instruments referred to within the body of a statutory instrument should be clearly and adequately identified with the actual place of publication being disclosed.

Acted upon

2. The references to intermediate enabling authority, not being statutes, and to all instruments mentioned within a statutory instrument, should be given by a footnote showing the place and date of publication, and registration number if one exists. The giving of footnote references should not be confined to instruments the details of whose registration and publication can not be traced through Part II of the Canada Gazette.

Acted upon

3. When a statutory enabling power has been amended since the last Revision of the Statutes of Canada, the preamble to a statutory instrument made in reliance on that power should recite not only the relevant section number or numbers and the name of the Act but also the reference to any amending statute which has amended the enabling power.

Acted upon

4. The footnotes to an amending statutory instrument should disclose all the prior amendments relevant to the provision or provisions of the statutory instrument now to be amended.

Acted Upon

5. Statutory instruments should be accompanied by Explanatory Notes. This is especially to be desired in the case of amending statutory instruments. An Explanatory Note should describe the subject matter dealt with in such a way as to indicate the point of the statutory instrument in a purely informative way without entering into justification, argumentation or construction of the law.

G. The withholding of information from the Committee

(Paragraphs 70-80)

Those Departments of State and Authorities which make, or propose to the Governor in Council the making of subordinate legislation should explain to the Committee, if called upon, how it is that a particular piece of subordinate legislation does not infringe one or more of the criteria for scrutiny. An explanation should include legal reasons where such are called for as where the Committee has questioned the vires of a statutory instrument, the interpretation of some apparently obscure or ambiguous provision, or the status of a document as being or not being a statutory instrument.

H. Sub-delegation of rule-making power

Not acted upon

If it is desired or thought necessary to give to a delegate of Parliament power to sub-delegate rule-making power, the power should and must be conferred expressly by the enabling statute.

I. The Language of Delegation

Not acted upon

1. The precise limits of subordinate law-making power should always be defined in clear language in the enabling statute.

Rejected

2. Enabling powers cast in terms of subject matter, and commonly introduced by the word "respecting" should not be included in enabling statutes whilstever the view is held by the Crown that such powers permit both sub-delegation of rule-making power and a power of dispensation in favour of individuals.

Appears no longer to be done

3. No enabling power should confer upon Parliament's delegate the authority to determine or to declare the scope of his own delegated power or the true intention of the enabling statute.

J. The pretended power of dispensing with regulations in favour of individuals

Not acted upon

The pretended power of dispensing with the provisions of subordinate legislation in favour of individuals under colour of enacting further subordinate legislation, being illegal unless expressly authorized by the enabling statute, should be abandoned forthwith.

K. Enabling powers in appropriation acts

Not acted upon

1. The practice of using Votes, whether substantive or dollar Votes, and Items in the Estimates as vehicles for the conferring of enabling powers should come to an end. Subordinate legislation should be made under enabling authority contained in ordinary statutes.

Not acted upon

2. Even if the practice is not terminated immediately, the following particular abuses should stop, viz:

(a) the conferring of subordinate law-making power in Votes and Items in terms which, in the view of the Crown, excludes the subordinate legislation, when made, from the definition of a "statutory instrument", and thus from Parliamentary scrutiny;

(b) the conferring of subordinate law-making power by use of the words "subject to terms and conditions approved by the Governor in Council";

(c) the extension and amplification of the purposes of old votes by a series of subsequent Votes.

L. Scrutiny of enabling powers

Not acted upon

Enabling clauses in Bills should be scrutinized while the Bills are before Parliament by the appropriate Standing Committees or by the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

M. The Text of Instruments subject to amendment

Not acted upon

Statutory instruments that have been much amended should be revoked and remade in complete form. An instrument in respect of which a process of constant amendment is forseeable should be revoked and remade in consolidated form at regular intervals, perhaps annually.

P. Implementation of international agreements by statutory instrument—Remission orders under section 17 of the Financial Administration Act

Not acted upon

Remission Orders made pursuant to section 17 of the Financial Administration Act should be regarded as subordinate legislation and as subject to Parliamentary scrutiny. The exclusion of any class of such Orders from scrutiny should occur only if expressly provided for in the Statutory Instruments Act.

S. Powers of Officers of Agricultural Agencies

Acted upon

1. Rights of entry, powers of inspection and of seizure and the power to demand or take information should be confined exactly within the limits provided for in enabling legislation.

T. Discretionary administrative decisions, The rules of natural justice and a right of appeal

Not acted upon

1. As a general rule, subordinate legislation should set objective criteria governing the taking of decisions provided for in that legislation.

Not acted upon

2. Where tests are set for eligibility or as prerequisites to the taking of some action under subordinate legislation, the test should be cast in objective and not in subjective terms. Tests, prerequisites or criteria dependent upon the formation of opinions or the satisfaction of individuals should be avoided.

Not acted upon

3. The granting of discretionary powers is properly the subject of a statute and not of subordinate law.

Not acted upon

4. Any person aggrieved by a refusal to grant a licence or permit, or by a suspension, cancellation or revocation of a licence or permit, pursuant to subordinate legislation, should be accorded in the subordinate legislation itself a right to be heard in objection, a right to be given reasons and a right to be apprised of any adverse material in any report submitted to the determining official. These rights should be accorded even where a right of appeal might exist, for the subject should not be forced unnecessarily to litigation, and their presence will assist in guaranteeing jurisdiction in the Federal Court under section 28 of the Federal Court Act.

U. Exemptions from Civil Liability

Not acted upon

Subordinate legislation should not attempt to exempt governmental agencies from the legal consequences of their acts or defaults or of those of their employees in either tort or contract.

V. Statutory Instruments made under the Income Tax Act

Not acted upon

The Status of the National Revenue Department's Interpretation Bulletins and Information Circulars, and their equivalents in other Departments of State and agencies, must be carefully examined when the definition of a statutory instrument is amended.

W. Affirmation and disallowance of Statutory Instruments by the House of Parliament

(Paragraph 142)

Not acted upon

1. Greater use should be made of affirmative and negative resolution procedures in the drafting of Bills.

Not acted upon

2. A complete code governing both affirmative and negative resolutions should be adopted either by the amendment of section 28A of the Interpretation Act or by the adoption by the two Houses of Standing Orders (preferably identical) setting out in detail the procedures to be followed in the two Houses.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY,
Joint Chairman.

THE SENATE

Monday, October 6, 1980

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN MOTHER

COMMUNICATION FROM PRIVATE SECRETARY

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the Clerk of the Senate had received the following communication from the Private Secretary to the Queen Mother:

CLARENCE HOUSE

31st July 1980

Dear Mr. Fortier:

I write to tell you how grateful Queen Elizabeth The Queen Mother is for the message of congratulations on her birthday that you have conveyed to Her Majesty on behalf of the Senate of Canada.

The Queen Mother is extremely appreciative of this kind thought and is deeply touched by the sentiments contained in the message.

Yours sincerely,

Martin Gilliat,
Private Secretary to Queen Elizabeth
The Queen Mother

Robert Fortier, Esq.,
Clerk of the Senate.

THE LATE HON. SARTO FOURNIER

TRIBUTES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it was with profound sadness that we learned of the passing of our good friend and colleague, the Honourable Sarto Fournier, on July 23 last. All of us who serve in this chamber, and all of those who served with the senator in his many other activities and pursuits during a long and distinguished career in law and in public life, join in this great feeling of loss.

All who worked with the late Senator Fournier admired his great ability and capacity. He served Canada for over 27 years. He served in the Commons for 18 years, between 1935 and 1953. Appointed to the Senate in 1953, Senator Fournier was elected mayor of Montreal, as well, in 1957. In all of these responsibilities he served with great distinction. With this superb background, the late Senator Sarto Fournier brought to this chamber a knowledge of public affairs which proved to be of great assistance in the course of his service here.

We shall all miss his goodwill, his capacity, his wisdom and his keen sense of humour. Our condolences go to his wife, Elizabeth, and his two daughters.

[Translation]

I wish to offer my deepest sympathy to his wife, Elizabeth, and his two daughters.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The career of Senator Sarto Fournier is probably unique in our history. In him, we have lost one of our two most senior members in Parliament, the other being Senator Azellus Denis. Both were elected to the House of Commons in 1935 and both then continued their political careers in the Senate.

However, Senator Fournier's case was exceptional because he was elected to the House of Commons even before being admitted to the Bar. He was a law student at the time. According to the story, at the convention where he was chosen as a candidate, he was so surprised at what was happening to him—because at that time, like today, being chosen as a Liberal candidate was the same as being elected—that he fainted.

Senator Denis: Of happiness.

Senator Flynn: Of course. He was re-elected up to 1953, when he was appointed to the Senate.

He was also interested in municipal politics. On several occasions he stood as a candidate for mayor. In 1957 he was successful where many others have failed when he defeated Mayor Drapeau. To have succeeded even once is quite an achievement. It is perhaps as much an achievement as being elected as a Conservative in the Quebec-South constituency in 1958. In any event he had a very interesting career. Sarto Fournier had an engaging personality. He did not take himself too seriously and he had a great sense of humour. He did his work honestly and we remember him fondly. We, of the official opposition, wish to offer our most sincere condolences to his wife and two daughters.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I would like to join those who have spoken before me in offering my deepest sympathy to the family of our colleague, the late Sarto Fournier.

For me, he was more than a colleague. He was a friend. He was a personal friend who shared with me many sorrows and many joys for nearly 45 years.

We were elected at the same time, in 1935, a long time ago, and this was the beginning of a friendship which goes back to our arrival on the political scene. Most of the time we even shared the same office and were seated next to each other in the House of Commons and in the Senate.

As Senator Flynn said, Senator Fournier was born into a low income family. In spite of that, he had enough courage to work evenings and weekends to pay his tuition so that he could complete his college and university studies. This will to work and this legitimate desire to succeed led him to devote himself for nearly 20 years, if I am not mistaken, as the member of Parliament for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, in addition to serving a term of office as mayor of Montreal, as the government leader has said.

A great many colleagues benefited from his exceptional oratorical talents during many election campaigns, and his party was therefore able to take advantage of his precious services; while helping his former colleagues, he helped his party obtain the success that it has known until now.

Once more, I would like to join my colleagues in offering my deepest sympathy to the family of my good friend. I share the sorrow of the great number of people who admired him.

● (2005)

[English]

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I was most sad, on the 23rd July last, to hear the news of the death of my good personal friend Sarto Fournier.

I had known Senator Fournier intimately since 1935. I had been a candidate on the wrong side of the fence in 1935, in Ottawa East, and he had been elected somewhere in Montreal. We arranged oftentimes to meet at different political meetings. Since then we had always been great friends.

When I was summoned to the Senate in 1958 he had already been elected mayor of Montreal a year previously, where he distinguished himself, as everybody knows.

I travelled with Senator Fournier to Panama at least four or five times, as well as to Quebec City and Montreal, on business. I was very struck by the fact that when I first went to Montreal he phoned me and said, "I would like you to stop with me at the Mount Royal Hotel. I'll explain to you why later." He said, "I have some special attachment to this place."

Everybody who had many years of service in that hotel knew him quite intimately, and remembered him. He said, "I worked here as a waiter in the years I took my law course at McGill University."

● (2010)

There was never a dull moment in all of my travels with him. He had a series of anecdotes that he had gleaned during his political travels with men like Ernest Lapointe and P. J. A. Cardin. He told stories galore, and had acquired a reputation as an excellent raconteur. I got to know his wife who also travelled with us. He had an affectionate name for her that would be equivalent to "mon petit choux"; it was "minoune." You could see they were two great lovers all of the time. To Mrs. Fournier and to the two daughters whom I had the pleasure of meeting, I offer my most sincere condolences.

THE HONOURABLE MICHEL FOURNIER

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise today to pay tribute to Michel Fournier, who retired on September 22 last after over 45 years of public service at all levels of government.

Michel was truly representative of the regional aspect of this house and of the priceless experience that senators coming from different regions bring to the national government.

Senator Fournier began his long and fruitful political career at the municipal level in 1935. Ten years later he was elected for the first time to the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick, which he left as Minister of Industry and Development in 1963.

[English]

We in the Senate were fortunate to be able to count Michel Fournier as a colleague. He is a great credit to the province of New Brunswick and to Canada. He was an able and energetic regional representative here.

We are going to miss him for his lasting contribution to the Senate, and I am sure all of us wish him well in his retirement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, when I was first elected to the New Brunswick legislature in 1952, Senator Michel Fournier had been a member there for seven years. He remained a member of the New Brunswick legislature until 1963—another 11 years. He served as Minister of Industry and Development from 1960 to 1963 and then as a senator in this chamber for another nine years. His youthful appearance certainly belies his years of service.

Senator Michel Fournier was always a friendly, gracious gentleman. I am sure we all join in wishing him good health and satisfaction in his retirement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, allow me to express my feelings on the occasion of Senator Michel Fournier's retirement. I had the pleasure of serving in the New Brunswick government from 1960 to 1963 with Michel, a devoted, sincere and friendly fellow, who always managed to win and keep the trust of his electors, a fellow who worked hard for everyone. The province and the Acadian people of New Brunswick owe a lot to Michel Fournier. That is why, in two weeks from now, we shall be getting together and giving him a party in his home town.

THE LATE HON. DANIEL J. MacDONALD, P.C.

TRIBUTES TO FORMER MINISTER OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, last week we lost an outstanding Canadian in the person of the Honourable Dan MacDonald, the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Dan MacDonald was an inspiration to his fellow Canadians and certainly to his fellow parliamentarians whether they served in the other place or in the Senate. A double amputee, this courageous man was, as the Prime Minister pointed out in his eulogy, an outstanding Minister of Veterans Affairs. He was a man who understood, listened to and cared about the veterans of this country. In this he was joined by others in other political parties in a concern for the veterans of this nation. He was a veteran himself and saw to it that Canada was a leader among nations insofar as veterans legislation was concerned.

In fact, during our last royal assent before we adjourned in July, honourable senators will recall that Dan MacDonald was with us during that ceremony. He turned to me as we walked down the Senate aisle, and he said that it was one of the proudest moments of his life to be here for royal assent for a number of measures that he had wanted to achieve for a good deal of time on behalf of the veterans. It is gratifying to note, and it should be said, that many of these efforts were supported with great vigour by certain members of the opposition. It is to their credit. The heartfelt condolences of all of us go out to Dan MacDonald's wife and family. He was a great son of Prince Edward Island, and a very great Canadian.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I feel privileged and honoured to pay a personal tribute to the Honourable Dan J. MacDonald. As veterans affairs critic in the other place for many years, I had the occasion frequently to be in close contact with the minister, and, as a result of our common aims on behalf of the veterans of Canada, we established a mutual bond that crossed over partisan politics.

Dan MacDonald knew better than anyone of the commitment made by Canada to the hundreds of thousands of veterans who made the supreme sacrifice, that of offering their lives in two world wars and the Korean conflict, many of whom after service returned to Canada maimed and disabled and denied the Canadian opportunity. Dan MacDonald knew this because he himself was one of the unfortunate. He had experienced double amputation through service to his country. Despite his wounds, he exemplified the true grit of a Canadian. Despite the daily pain and suffering that he endured, he rose from being a small farmer to the heights of Canadianism. He achieved high political status in his province, and later national status as the representative of his comrades in battle who fought to ensure peace and freedom in our Dominion. Dan MacDonald ignored medical advice because of his dedication to the cause of Canada's veterans. Because of our close relationship in Parliament, I was recently interviewed by the national press on my feelings about him. Without any hesitation I said that Dan MacDonald had given more than could be asked of any Canadian when he offered his life twice for his country. The first time was as a soldier in World War II, and the second time was when, as Minister of Veterans Affairs, he ignored the pressures of pain and adversity, which surely hastened his death, to fulfill what he felt was his commitment to better the plight of the veteran.

May I then, on behalf of my leader and my colleagues, offer our sincere feelings of comradeship and respect to Dan's wife, Pauline, and his family, on the sad loss to our country.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I join in the expression of deepest sympathy to Dan's wife, Pauline, and his family, his grandchildren and his brothers and sisters, who loved him dearly, and whom he loved dearly.

● (2020)

Dan MacDonald was born in a rural area of Prince Edward Island in 1918 when the soldiers were coming home from the First World War. He was a farm boy, dedicated to the good earth—the top six inches of Prince Edward Island. But when the call to duty came in 1939 Dan enlisted, became a sergeant and a leader among his fellow men. In Italy, in 1944, he lost an arm and a leg, but he was still prepared to fight on and never became discouraged.

In 1945 he returned home to Bothwell and a big rally. A beautiful girl was there to welcome him home. Her name was Pauline, and he married her. He worked on the farm, and pulled out roots, stumps and trees alongside his father, with an arm and a leg off. He built a barn; he shingled the roof himself.

I can remember going down to Bothwell in 1962 to try to persuade Dan MacDonald to run for the legislature in his home district, for the party to which I belonged. He said he did not have the time; he would love to serve but he had much to do and a small family to support. I made a second trip, and on this occasion he surrendered. He ran and was elected to the Legislature of Prince Edward Island at a time when his party was in opposition. It was the first comeback of his party, when Dan was able to turn the tide in that district and win that seat. He became an active member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

In 1966 Dan offered himself again, but only three weeks before that election his colleague died as a result of a heart attack. The election in that district was called off, and there was a deferred election. In 1966 the then premier, Walter Shaw, and the new young Leader of the Opposition, Alex Campbell, each ended up with 15 seats. The deferred election was held on July 11, and Dan MacDonald and his colleague, Bruce Stewart, had the whole thing hanging on their success or failure. Dan paraded up and down the lanes on his artificial leg, made house calls and talked to all his people. They tell me that on one occasion a dog attacked him. He offered it his artificial leg and said, "You son of a gun, if you want to bit something, bit this one."

Honourable senators will probably remember that that election was called the election of the promised land. Dan was there in the promised land. If you moved you were promised a pension, and if you didn't move you were promised pavement. It got to the point where the farmers of the area had signs in their front fields saying: "Please don't pave this field."

In spite of that, Dan MacDonald was able to win that election, and eventually he became the Minister of Agriculture in the Campbell government. He was a good minister. He understood the needs of farmers and fishermen, because he was one himself.

I can remember going to Dan again in 1972 and saying, "Dan, we need that King's County seat federally. You will have to resign and run federally." But he said he was quite happy where he was. Again I made a second trip, and he then surrendered and ran federally. That was in 1972 when the Liberals formed a minority government, and Dan MacDonald's was about the only seat won from the Conservatives in that election.

He then became the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and continued in that portfolio, except for one short break, when he suffered a heart attack. He lost the May 1979 election, but was returned to Ottawa this year in better health than ever to again take charge of the Department of Veterans Affairs, a department which he loved because he admired and respected his comrades in action.

I have said on many occasions—and I will say it again today—that the Honourable Dan MacDonald was probably the best Minister of Veterans Affairs that Canada ever had or is likely ever to have. Dan MacDonald was a common man. He was a people's man. He walked with crowds and kept his virtue; he walked with kings and never lost the common touch. With the passing of Dan MacDonald, Prince Edward Island lost a great islander; Canada lost a great Canadian; and I lost a great friend.

I extend my sympathy to his wife and family.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I will not attempt to paint the lily of obituary praise to a great Canadian. However, I should like to associate myself with the sentiments expressed here, in Prince Edward Island and indeed nationally, since the passing of the Honourable Dan MacDonald.

We from Prince Edward Island were very proud of him. I was happy and honoured to know him as a friend over a good many years. Many fine and deserved tributes have been paid to his splendid war record. He was, indeed, a man of valour, but it could never be said of him that he was a man of vanity.

One of the most attractive characteristics of Dan MacDonald to me was his complete lack of pretension or, to use a more modern, if not so eloquent, expression, his total unphoniness. That is something which is fine and worthy, and made him a most excellent minister in the other place in dealing with that intricate and difficult situation which many honourable senators know—the handling of questions from members of a vigorous opposition.

I remember one time when the Honourable Dan was being pressed about some report. The suggestion was that the report was a little late in forthcoming or that there might be reasons why it was not—was it being suppressed; was there some cover-up? The Honourable Dan said, very simply, "Mr. Speaker, when that report is ready, I sure will table it." End of that particular question.

We are proud of him in Prince Edward Island, and I like very much the suggestion made on the day he died by my successor, Mr. McMillan, that the veterans building to be constructed in Charlottetown be called The Honourable Daniel MacDonald Memorial Building. He, like all good men, requires no symbolical, concrete or physical memorialization; but, nevertheless, I think he deserves it. In words uttered long ago, I would say, simply, "Here was a man."

SMALL LOANS ACT
CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-44, to amend the Small Loans Act and to provide for its repeal and to amend the Criminal Code.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

EXPRESSION OF ADMIRATION FOR POLISH WORKERS—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, with leave, I move, seconded by Senator Guay:

> That as preparatory meetings are now being held for the Madrid Review Conference on the Final Act of Helsinki, to which Canada is a signatory country, the Senate of Canada express its admiration for the courageous and prudent way in which the Polish workers struggled for free trade unions and other fundamental freedoms and human rights, and urge all signatory countries to faithfully observe the provisions of the Final Act of Helsinki to ensure social justice and security.

[Senator Perrault.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: What leave? It is a notice of motion.

Senator Frith: It is a notice of motion, Mr. Speaker, so the honourable senator does not need leave.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: I apologize, honourable senators, but we have before us a proposal which is seconded by the Honourable Senator Guay. This is a formal motion.

Senator Flynn: I understood it was a notice of motion.

• (2035)

[English]

Is this a notice of motion?

Senator Haidasz: I was asking leave, honourable senators, to present this motion today.

Senator Flynn: No. Tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Leave is not granted.

QUESTION PERIOD

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I say at the outset that I am pleased once again to be in the company of the Leader of the Government. I say "once again" because I was in British Columbia over the weekend and had the occasion to fly back from Vancouver with him today. And I know I speak for the rest of my colleagues when I say that we are pleased to be back. But I wonder why the leader was in such a rush to bring us back, and I wonder why we are here this evening.

I cannot see anything that really requires our presence at this time instead of next week, when everyone had arranged to return. Recalling the Senate at this time seems to have complicated somewhat the plans of many of our colleagues who could not be here this evening.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to say, too, how much I enjoyed travelling from the west coast on the same flight with the honourable senator. I am sure that he was glad to note that there was no anti-aircraft fire as we flew over the western provinces. Indeed, I want to assure him that western reaction to the government's constitutional proposals has been most gratifying, but discussion of the Constitution in this place must await another day.

One of the reasons we are here this evening—but only one of the reasons—is the matter of the constitutional proposals. Honourable senators are aware of the government's notice of motion placed on the order paper in the other place last week, and they are also aware that the motion is being debated now in the other place. It proposes that a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen Respecting the Constitution of Canada". We are here this evening because it was felt that there was at least a possibility that the members of the other place might wish to deal with that resolution today and send a message to members of this place asking that we unite with them in the formation of and participation in the activities of this joint committee to consider the constitutional resolutions.

In addition, honourable senators, there is a bill which has come from the other place and which has been introduced this evening. There are a number of questions of major importance which have developed in the past few weeks and months. There are also a number of delayed answers in respect of which an assiduous effort has been made to gather and collate information in recent weeks. These are some of the reasons for sitting this evening, but there are others.

Senator Flynn: I can see that Senator Perrault has not changed much during the last two months. If anything, he is getting worse. I think he is taking us for granted. It seems that he feels he can give us any reason whatever and we will swallow it. Of course, on his side there are many members who are prepared to do that, but one of these days some of them will awaken and tell him that this is not the way to treat the Senate. He has given no reason except that there was going to be that motion in the other place, but that does not concern us. He would be very naïve indeed to believe after the provocative speech made by the Prime Minister last Thursday that this resolution could pass the House of Commons unanimously and without debate.

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, as the Leader of the Opposition is aware, the motion proposes that "a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House—" that is the Commons—"for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed special joint committee."

In view of the dialogue which has taken place since the Right Honourable Prime Minister made his announcement last week, when he spoke to the nation in such eloquent fashion, perhaps it was too much to expect that the resolution would be dealt with today. However, I want to say that some have been so encouraged by the remarks of the Honourable William Davis, the Premier of Ontario, that it was felt there was at least the possibility of a motion from the other place this evening.

Senator Flynn: If the Honourable Leader of the Government wants to speak of what the Honourable William Davis said about this proposal of the Prime Minister's being the answer to Quebec's aspirations after the referendum of last May, then he does not know what he is talking about.

Senator Perrault: In any case, honourable senators, in due course it is expected that the members of the other place will make their judgment on this motion.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: And that we will have a full opportunity for a vigorous debate here.

Senator Asselin: Not this year.

Senator Perrault: There is always that possibility.

Senator Asselin: No, no.

ENERGY

AGREEMENT IN PRINCIPLE BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND NEW YORK STATE FOR THE SALE OF HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to either the Leader of the Government in the Senate or the Minister of State for Economic Development. The question relates somewhat to the First Ministers' Conference or matters arising therefrom.

In view of the fact that the Province of Newfoundland has a potential agreement, or an agreement in principle, to sell 600 megawatts of hydro-electric power from the Lower Churchill to the New York Power Authority, would the Leader of the Government or the Minister of State for Economic Development advise whether the government is prepared to support access to such power through the Province of Quebec?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice. However, I recall that at one stage during the constitutional conference it was pointed out that to date there had been no application made by the Government of Newfoundland for that transmission line.

Senator Marshall: I beg to differ with my colleague. At the First Ministers' Conference the Prime Minister told Premier Peckford publicly, in fact, that the federal government would intervene with Quebec if Newfoundland could come up with a contract to sell its power. Indeed, they have come up with a contract with the Power Authority of the State of New York.

I am willing to give the minister time to discuss it with his colleagues in cabinet, but I would like an answer to this question, because of the importance of the development of the Lower Churchill in the creation of energy which can save the country millions and millions of dollars. Can the minister either prepare an answer or have an answer prepared so that he can report to the Senate, thus enabling the people of Newfoundland to know what is happening so that they may have some assurance of the development of the Lower Churchill in Newfoundland to provide more energy for all of Canada?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall take that question as notice. If there has been some further development since that conference took place, obviously that will come out in the replies I will receive; but I think the honourable senator will have also to realize that, whatever progress has been made, it will nevertheless require a formal application by the Government of Newfoundland for a transmission line and the right to install such a transmission line—an application which I do not believe has been made to this date.

Senator Marshall: I have a supplementary question. Can the minister confirm that the National Energy Board has the power to order access to transmission lines for an international contract such as would be developed for the transfer of electric power from Canada to New York?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would not want to get involved in giving an interpretation on that. Obviously, the National Energy Board will, after it has received an application, look at the law and decide whether or not it has the power my honourable friend is referring to.

THE CONSTITUTION

STATUS OF REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government whether, in view of the current interest in constitutional reform, he can explain why there has not been forthcoming tonight the report of the subcommittee of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee on which a number of our colleagues worked this summer? Even though the committee was unduly restricted in its terms of reference, as we on this side pointed out at the time, its report would be interesting and timely, if it is to be brought in immediately.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe we are all aware of the outstanding work done by senators from both sides of this house as members of that subcommittee.

I understand that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will be meeting later this week to consider the matter of when the report should be tabled. I would not wish to anticipate what might take place at that meeting.

Senator Murray: Can the minister say, or, alternatively, can Senator Lamontagne, the chairman of the subcommittee, or Senator Goldenberg, the chairman of the committee, say whether there is a report ready or not?

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, the committee, as Senator Murray has said, met a number of times during the summer. It agreed on the substance of its report on two of the matters referred to it. It has not had the opportunity of giving full consideration to the third matter.

In any event, the aspects of the Constitution referred to the committee, which were dealt with by a subcommittee under the chairmanship of Senator Lamontagne, are not directly related to the government proposals in the resolution to which reference has been made.

We will present a report in due course, but as I have said and as Senator Flynn knows, we did not have within our terms of reference any of the specific items which appear in the proposals to which Senator Murray made reference.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Murray: I would not enter a quibble at this point except to say that the proposed resolution, the proposed address, does, according to some rather authoritative interpretations, have a most profound effect upon the powers of this place. If I recall the terms of reference correctly, the role of the second chamber was discussed by that subcommittee.

Senator Goldenberg: The second part of the report will deal with the Senate, but I do not think Senator Murray is correct when he says that the proposals in the resolution deal with the Senate in terms of the future of the Senate as referred to the committee.

Senator Murray: The Senate will be written out of renewal if that resolution passes.

DELAYED ANSWERS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed answers. Indeed, it has been a busy summer assembling all the data sought by members of the official opposition. Holidays were postponed in order to prepare this great sheaf of documentation.

I would not wish to act in an unparliamentary fashion, but the quantity of material is such that it might be satisfactory to the opposition if I read some of the short replies and placed some of the other material on the record. If honourable senators have any further questions we shall be glad to provide replies.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps if the Leader of the Government would give us the subject matter of each reply, we might then be able to decide.

Senator Perrault: I thank the Leader of the Opposition for another constructive suggestion.

Senator Argue: That is why we came back—for a constructive suggestion.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN AMBASSADOR FOR DISARMAMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on June 5 concerning the appointment of a Canadian Ambassador for Disarmament.

Mr. A. R. Menzies, currently the Canadian Ambassador to the People's Republic of China, will take up the duties of Canadian Ambassador for Disarmament in the fall after he completes his present assignment.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

EAST BLOCK—OFFICE ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Lang on June 4, 1980, concerning accommodation in the East Block and the presence of House of Commons security forces in that building.

Senator Flynn: The senator is not here, so the reply can be printed.

(The answer follows:)

Public Works was advised by the Sergeant-at-Arms that the Honourable Don Johnston was assigned space in the East Block under the authority of Madam Speaker.

As a consequence of the partial occupancy of space by the House of Commons, the security services normal to a construction site were no longer considered adequate by the Sergeant-at-Arms and he undertook to provide the necessary services of the House of Commons security staff.

THE CABINET

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY IN THE SENATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on April 15, the Leader of the Opposition asked a question concerning ministerial responsibility.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That will be a long reply. It can be printed.

Senator Perrault: Thank you.

(The answer follows:)

Senator Argue is responsible to Parliament for the Canadian Wheat Board and Senator Olson is responsible to Parliament for the Economic Development portfolio and the Northern Pipeline Agency. Since both of these portfolios cover quite a wide range of areas, it is not possible to strictly define the exact responsibility of each minister within an extremely narrow area. Outside of the areas for which each of my colleagues represent through their portfolios, each of us does his best to represent and be responsible for this particular region, as do all honourable senators.

THE CONSTITUTION

ASPECTS OF SENATE STUDY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition on June 11 concerning the discussion of immigration, cultural policy and social affairs as part of constitutional reform.

Immigration, cultural policy and social affairs are subjects of ongoing discussion at the federal-provincial level. It was agreed, however, by both provinces and the federal government that these subjects were not priorities for discussion during the September First Ministers' Conference. Therefore, these subjects will be topics of discussion at some future time.

Honourable senators are aware that the government has expressed its view that there should be conferences to discuss constitutional matters, particularly over the next two years.

THE ENVIRONMENT

CONVERSION OF U.S. ELECTRICITY GENERATING STATIONS—POTENTIAL INCREASE IN AIR POLLUTION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Sherwood on June 26 concerning the potential increase in air pollution from the conversion of U.S. electricity generating stations.

(The answer follows:)

At a meeting between United States and Canadian officials on February 29, just prior to the legislation being introduced into the Congress, strong Canadian concerns were expressed over the fact that the coal conversion program would aggravate the already serious problem of acid rain. These concerns were reiterated by the Minister of the Environment in April at a meeting with Mr. Costle, Administrator of EPA, and Mr. Andrus, Secretary of Interior. The bill which was passed recently by only the U.S. Senate, specifically exempts the converting plants from the stringent new source performance standards of the U.S. Clean Air Act. The plants will be controlled to the extent required for existing facilities. Canada would have preferred to see a bill which required the application of best available control technology. The bill does include limited provision for grants to help defray the capital costs of pollution control equipment including coal washing facilities.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS—SALARIES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Muir on June 27 concerning the salaries of Order in Council appointees.

Hon. Robert Muir: Put it on the record; that will be satisfactory.

(The answer follows:)

The Minister of Finance undertook on June 27, 1980, when it came to his attention that this information on salary ranges had not been included in the lists, to ensure that in future when these salary ranges are established as the result of a current review they will be included as part of the information.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SPACE RESEARCH CORPORATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): On June 27 Senator Macquarrie asked a question concerning the purchase of Space Research Corporation by the national government.

(The answer follows:)

The Government of Canada through any of its branches, agencies or corporations, has not given any consideration to buying into Space Research Corporation (Quebec) and becoming a partner of this company and putting us in a role with the Government of South Africa. The government is, however, giving consideration to the purchase of certain physical assets of this company, such as lands, buildings and equipment used in research, development and production of ammunition and to operate these facilities independently of SRC(Q) so as to provide to the Department of National Defence the supply of ammunition the Canadian forces require.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MARIJUANA—NATIONAL EDUCATION PROGRAM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): On June 27, Senator Haidasz asked a question concerning a national education program aimed at decreasing the use of marijuana.

Senator Haidasz: The reply may be printed.

The government indicated in the Speech from the Throne on April 14, 1980, that it intends to move cannabis from the Narcotic Control Act to the Food and Drugs Act and to remove the possibility of imprisonment for possession of small amounts. There is, however, no intention of "legalizing" marijuana.

The Department of National Health and Welfare is particularly concerned that Canadians may be unaware of health risks associated with cannabis use, risks which are similar to those resulting from the use of alcohol and tobacco, affecting the respiratory system. The possibility exists that the sexual development and subsequent reproductive capacity of young people may be affected. Continuing heavy use might also have a cumulative negative impact on a student's academic and social growth.

It is with these issues in mind that officials in the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Justice, and the Ministry of the Solicitor General have been studying the problem. The department will be proposing a national education campaign to alert Canadians to the health hazards of using cannabis.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC CANADA—PASSENGER AND FREIGHT FACILITIES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): On July 9, Senator Muir asked a question concerning the hiring of buses by VIA Rail to transport people in the Atlantic region.

Hon. Robert Muir: I should like that reply to be reported to the house because the CN service by VIA Rail still continues to be cut back in the Atlantic region, particularly Cape Breton Island.

Senator Perrault: VIA Rail is contracted by Transport Canada to operate two rail diesel cars known as RDCs, daily between Sydney and Truro which complements the daily RDC train service between Sydney-Halifax via Truro.

During the peak summer months, passenger volumes occasionally exceed the seating capacity offered. This is a problem that occurs throughout the entire rail passenger network operated by VIA and not just in the Atlantic region. VIA officials state that the only recourse open to them is to hire buses and/or taxis to transport the passengers unable to get a seat on the train.

I am sure the honourable senator can appreciate the fact that VIA is unable to keep spare equipment on hand at all times to meet unexpected increases in ridership. Not only are the costs of such a measure prohibitive, there is not enough equipment available to do so.

However, there were an unusual number of instances where there were more passengers than there were seats available during June of this year on the Truro-Sydney service. Consequently, VIA took the necessary steps to rectify this recurring problem. Through a reassignment of equipment from other services, VIA assigned an additional RDC to the Truro-Sydney service effective July 4.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

HIRING OF CONVICTED WATERGATE CONSPIRATOR

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Senator Goldenberg asked a question on July 10 concerning the hiring of G. Gordon Liddy by the CBC to report on the political campaign in the United States.

The newspaper reports on this matter were premature. The CBC has not entered into any such contract with G. Gordon Liddy.

Senator Flynn: Not as yet.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NUCLEAR FUSION RESEARCH

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): On July 15, Senator Yuzyk asked a question concerning Canada's participation in nuclear fusion research. The reply is rather lengthy.

Senator Flynn: Place it on the record.

(The answer follows:)

Research in controlled nuclear fusion is proceeding in several countries and is the subject of intensive international collaboration. There are at least two different proposed methods of achieving controlled nuclear fusion which show promise of achieving engineering and economic feasibility. These are the magnetic-confinement and inertial-confinement methods. Until such time as the engineering feasibility of these methods has been demonstrated, perhaps by 1990, and the preferred method chosen, it is not considered possible to make a realistic estimate of the costs of fusion power systems.

Although it is not possible now to estimate realistically the costs of fusion power systems, whether imported in toto or with significant contributions by Canadian industry, the impact of total dependence on foreign technology can be assessed.

Failure to mount a minimal program of fusion R/D sufficient to secure access to a significant portion of fusion technology developed in other countries would probably mean Canada would eventually have to import fusion reactor systems with only limited participation by Canadian industry, mainly in low technology areas. The resultant inability of Canadian industry to contribute significantly to the high-technolgy content of fusion power systems could greatly increase the overall costs to Canada of acquiring fusion power systems. It will be possible to make realistic estimates of those increased costs once the engineering concepts of future fusion power systems are more fully established.

If Canada does not participate to a significant extent in fusion research our access to the detailed knowledge of fusion technology developments in other countries will become increasingly restricted. Work on fusion in other countries is already moving from the research phase to the engineering phase and the knowledge related to engineering and technological developments is tending to be restricted to the various national programs of fusion development or to those countries who collaborate in major international programs on fusion developments. In the last two years there have been several instances where Canada's ability to access the fusion developments in other countries, and our representation on international organizations concerned with fusion R/D, has been limited because of the absence of a Canadian program of fusion R/D which is seen to be of significance on an international scale.

Indications have been received by officials of the National Research Council, from representatives of the U.S. and Japanese governments and from the International Energy Agency, that Canadian participation in research on fusion would be welcomed. Some small collaborative research programs are in place now and the opportunities for larger collaborative programs in specific research areas have been discussed. The possibilities of pursuing these larger collaborative opportunities are dependent on a decision by Canada to support a national program of fusion R/D.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POLICY RESPECTING NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Asselin on July 15, concerning an alleged contradiction between the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence in a statement on nuclear policy.

Senator Asselin: The reply may be printed.

Senator Perrault: If the honourable senator has any further questions, we will take them under consideration.

(The answer follows:)

The position of the government on disarmament and nuclear weapons remains unchanged. Nor is there any contradiction in statements made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence. The statement made by the Minister of National Defence referred, as both the minister and the Prime Minister have pointed out, to the NATO situation, not to Canadian policy. The question posed to the minister was specifically related to NATO. Moreover, the minister expressed the view that the mere threat of existence of such a weapon as the neutron bomb would in itself have a deterrent effect.

LABOUR

RESTRICTIVE PROVINCIAL EMPLOYMENT LEGISLATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Muir on July 16, concerning the mobility of construction workers between Quebec and Ontario. I believe that was a supplementary to a previous question asked by the honourable senator.

Senator Muir: The reply may be placed on the record.

(The answer follows:)

Residents of Ontario may work in the construction industry in Quebec but under limited circumstances. Under section 3.07 of regulation No. 5 made pursuant to section 32 of the Construction Industry Labour Relations Act, S.Q. 1968, c.45 (the "regulation"), an employee residing outside of Quebec may work in that province if such employee obtains a special classification certificate from a board created under the regulation. To obtain this certificate, the employee must acquire a guarantee of employment from an employer registered with the said board and must satisfy it that (a) there is no available employee holding a classification certificate for the employment secured by the said employee, or (b) that the employee belongs to the employer's regular work force. If such a certificate is obtained, the duration of the certificate is determined by the board pursuant to section 3.10 of the regulation. Further, section 3.12 of the regulation provides that the holder of a special classification certificate may be restricted to definite works, a region or locality, to a site or to an employee.

Residents of Quebec are allowed to work in the construction industry of the province of Ontario without any restriction. There is presently no legislation enacted in Ontario which is similar to the Quebec regulation.

THE ECONOMY

NATIONAL ANTI-POVERTY ORGANIZATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on July 16, Senator Muir asked a question concerning the National Anti-Poverty Organization.

As you will recall, Senator Muir raised the question of whether the government could assure the National Anti-Poverty Organization, known as NAPO, that it would receive the second phase of its federal grant for 1980, which was due on July 2.

I am pleased to inform the Senate that an interim payment of $25,687.61 was made to NAPO on July 17 in order to enable the organization to meet its obligations for June and July. In the meantime, the department has arranged, with the agreement of NAPO, to have an independent firm assess the organization's financial position with a view to recommending a plan for debt retirement.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER—AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND FÉDÉRATION DES FRANCOPHONES HORS QUÉBEC

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Senator Murray asked a question on July 16, concerning negotiations with the Fédération des Francophones Hors Québec.

Senator Murray: The reply may be placed on the record.

(The answer follows:)

> As the Honourable Secretary of State said on July 15, 1980, the government has never promised to set up a joint commission comprised of members of the government and the Fédération of Francophones outside Quebec. The honourable senator will remember no doubt that this type of suggestion had been favoured by his government during the electoral period to elicit votes from certain francophone circles outside Quebec, a tactic which incidentally did not seem to work.
> From the government's point of view, there has never been any doubt as to our commitment with regard to francophones outside Quebec either by a constitutional or government policy point of view.

FEDERAL BUILDINGS

CONCESSION AT PLACE DU PORTAGE, HULL, QUEBEC

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): On July 17 Senator Phillips asked a question concerning the food concession at Place du Portage in Hull.

(The answer follows:)

> Since it became necessary, on March 15, 1980, to replace the food service concessionaire at Place du Portage 1, Hull, Quebec, Public Works Canada invited the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, a non-profit organization, to continue these services in view of their relatively low overhead and their capacity to serve meals at reasonable prices tailored to public servant needs.
> This new arrangement is effective as borne out by increasing sales volume and the maintenance of high food quality.

TRANSPORT

MISSISSAUGA DERAILMENT—CONDITION OF CNR TRACKAGE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Senator Marshall asked a question on July 17 relating to the rail system of CNR. A professor at the University of Carleton had described the CNR system in somewhat unflattering terms.

(The answer follows:)

> Safety as a principal operating philosophy is a necessity if CN Rail is to achieve its objective of meeting transportation demands while operating as a commercially viable company. In recent years CN Rail has implemented major upgrading programs involving its roadbed and structures in order to improve capacity and reduce the possibility of derailments. These programs include the installation of heavier rails, improved ballast, and some 6,000 miles of continuous welded rail. Programs are continuing to add 450 miles of continuous welded rail, 300,000 concrete ties and 2 million new wooden ties to the system annually. CN is a leader in the industry in the development of high speed automated track changeout and maintenance equipment which add significantly to the productivity of its maintenance forces.
> Over the next five years CN Rail will spend close to $2 billion upgrading and maintaining its rail roadbed and structures. In addition to these programs, CN is continuously upgrading and increasing its rolling stock. Equipment programs will cost CN almost $900 million over the same five-year period and will involve, on average, the purchase of 35 new locomotives and 2,000 railcars per year.
> Transport Canada, on behalf of the Minister of Transport, will continue to monitor the activities of CN Rail and other Canadian railway companies to ensure that every reasonable effort is made to safely meet demands for rail transportation in Canada. Transport Canada scrutinizes CN's capital budget each year as part of the process requirement to gain approval within government. Particular attention will be given to the area of railway safety.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has indicated the hard work that has been done during the summer in order to provide replies to so many questions. As I look at the order paper, I notice questions that were asked away back on May 1, May 13, June 4, June 11, June 17 and July 8 have not been answered. Can the Leader of the Government give us an explanation as to why it has been difficult to reply to such simple questions.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is more difficult to prepare material for some questions than for others. All I can say is that we shall commit ourselves to even greater diligence than heretofore.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STRIKE OF CLERICAL AND REGULATORY EMPLOYEES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a late report has been made available regarding the situation at the Toronto International Airport. The firefighters are honouring the clerks' picket line. Planes are not leaving Toronto for safety reasons. The rest of the system is stable. There will be no movement in Toronto until the morning.

As far as the strike itself is concerned, I have been advised in a late note that the mediator has commenced his negotiations with Mr. Stewart and Mr. Dennis McDermott of the CLC at the Skyline Hotel. The negotiations are still under way.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 7, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Messrs. Manly and Robinson (Burnaby) had been substituted for those of Messrs. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore) and Manly on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 44 OF PROPOSED CONSTITUTION ACT, 1980

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in order to prepare for the coming debate on the resolution which is before the other place concerning the Constitution I have started reading with careful attention the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada."

Today I just want to ask a question of the Leader of the Government on section 44. I am reading what is relevant to my question:

> 44. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation under subsection 41(1) or section 43 without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within ninety days after the passage by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not passed such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of those ninety days, the House of Commons again passes the resolution—

Do I understand correctly that if this address goes to Westminster and becomes law, thereafter any amendment to our Constitution, including the abolition of the Senate, could be made without the Senate having a word to say about it?

• (1410)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we are really not engaged in the process of debating this proposed resolution.

Senator Flynn: It is a question.

Senator Perrault: It is not for me to provide a definitive interpretation of that section. Quite understandably, a number of senators have asked questions with respect to section 44 and with respect to a number of other sections of this proposed resolution and the appended suggested bill that it is hoped will be dealt with by the British Parliament. I want to provide assurances, and I am certain the Leader of the Opposition is aware of the fact that after a debate has been concluded in the other place and the motion dealt with, there is every chance that the Senate will be invited to unite with the other place in sending the resolution to Westminster. Before that takes place, of course, there will be a debate in the Senate itself on the subject matter of the bill and the various sections contained therein.

Honourable senators, I do not think it would be in order to initiate a debate at this time before the resolution has been received.

Senator Flynn: I am not asking for a debate; I am just asking if the intention of the government is the one I read into the text. Does the government know what it is doing?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government has the best intentions in its efforts to advance this resolution through Parliament.

Senator Flynn: I can see that.

Senator Perrault: An opportunity will be accorded for full debate in the other place and in this place. It is surmised that ten senators could be members of a joint committee. Whatever the number, should we be asked to participate, there will be more than adequate opportunities for honourable senators to debate the various sections and to obtain explanations of the wording of the address to Her Majesty and the proposed appended bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: I have a supplementary question. If I understand clearly the answer that was just given to Senator Flynn, we have yet to reach the stage where the full meaning of the content of the resolution will be explained. We have not reached that stage yet.

Are the emissaries, sent to London by the Canadian Parliament—

Senator Asselin: The government.

Senator Tremblay: —by the Canadian government, giving the same answer to the British who want to know the meaning of the content of the resolution to be debated?

If those emissaries can, before the proper time that will come when the resolution is passed, enlighten the British and clarify for them the real meaning of the resolution, then why could not the Senate, as an integral part of the Canadian parliamentary institution, receive the same clarifications now?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is no attempt being made to deny information about any aspect of this bill.

As far as the visit to the United Kingdom by two members of the ministry is concerned, I understand that Her gracious Majesty demonstrated a lively interest in all aspects of the question of constitutional change and patriation; indeed, some reports have suggested that the conversations ranged through a luncheon as well as an hour-and-a-half further meeting with Her Majesty. Of course, explanations were given to the British government and to the Queen with respect to the various sections of the bill.

During the process of what will be a very detailed debate, a great deal of information will be provided by the government. If the committee is established, it will be empowered to call witnesses. Indeed, I am sure that members of the opposition will have access to exhaustive detail before the committee process has been completed. However, this is not the time when the bill and its contents should be debated. We have yet to receive a message from the other place asking us to consider the proposed resolution, but it would not be in order and it is not our parliamentary procedure to move into substantive debate at this stage.

Senator Flynn: It is only a question. We are trying to understand this resolution.

• (1415)

Hon. Daniel Riley: I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Are the press reports true when they state that two ministers of the Government of Canada spent all of four minutes with the Prime Minister of Great Britain discussing this resolution?

Senator Murray: Four and a half minutes.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not know the time involved by Canada's representatives in speaking to the Right Honourable the British Prime Minister and to the leaders of the political parties in the British Parliament. I have no specific report as to the time involved in those meetings. That information will be sought. However, over a number of weeks and months, many parliamentary contacts have been made in Great Britain and assurances have been given, I understand, that the British Parliament is prepared to deal expeditiously with the constitutional resolution.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Am I right in understanding that before December 9 the only people allowed to debate this matter will be the 15 members of the subcommittee?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that is not correct but I am pleased to clarify the situation. A debate is under way now in the other place. After the motion under consideration has been dealt with there, and if a decision is taken to invite the Senate to participate in a joint committee, a message to that effect will be sent to this chamber. It will then be up to honourable senators to decide whether they wish to participate in that committee's activities, and presumably that decision will follow a debate in this house. It would be inconceivable that the Leader of the Opposition would agree to the acceptance of such an invitation without speaking. As well, I know that many of his colleagues and senators on the government side will wish to speak. There will be many, many opportunities for debate.

To make things abundantly clear, what the House of Commons is debating now is a motion that a joint committee consider and report upon a document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen Respecting the Constitution of Canada." Parliament is considering a motion to study proposals to patriate Canada's Constitution with certain amendments. A motion is now being debated in the Commons to determine whether or not that resolution and the appended proposed bill should be referred to a joint committee of the Senate and Commons. That is the motion that is being debated there. In the process of that debate, a good deal of discussion is taking place with respect to the content of the proposed bill. After the debate has been concluded in the other place, a vote will be taken to refer the resolution to a joint committee and to send a message to the Senate asking us to participate in the committee, and then the debate process would begin here. So there will be many opportunities for honourable senators to participate in discussion and debate.

Senator Denis: Could a good part of those resolutions be amended before they are sent to the committee?

Senator Perrault: No, in the other place they are only debating the motion to refer this matter to a joint committee. It is not possible to amend before that committee has been established.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, is it not effrontery on the part of the Trudeau government to send over to the British House of Commons something more than what they expected would be simply the repatriation of the Canadian Constitution? Now the Prime Minister has added to that in this resolution some further clauses, particularly section 44, for the British Parliament to pass, something that he could not pass in the Parliament of Canada. In his attempt to by-pass the Canadian Parliament, is he not deceiving the British Parliament?

• (1420)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I cannot agree that there is any deceit involved. First of all, let us understand what the government is attempting to do here. The first idea is to patriate the Constitution—

Senator Walker: We agree with that.

Senator Perrault: —with no amendments possible, unless there is the consent of all the provinces, for a two-year period. If there is no agreement on a new amending formula during that two-year period, then it is proposed that the Victoria formula be adopted, which would require consent by two of the Atlantic provinces representing at least 50 per cent of that region's population and two of the western provinces representing at least 50 per cent of that region's population, and provinces representing 25 per cent of the population of Canada. In addition, there are a number of other amendments relating to human rights in this country. In the case of that human rights package, all of the provinces have at one point expressed their support—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: —for those rights—

Senator Flynn: Not so.

Senator Perrault: —which this government would hope to entrench and enshrine.

Senator Walker: Section 44 of the proposed resolution states:

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation under subsection 41(1) or section 43 without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within ninety days after the passage by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not passed such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of those ninety days, the House of Commons again passes the resolution, but any period when Parliament is prorogued or dissolved shall not be counted in computing those ninety days.

Patriating the Constitution is a brand new, important and vital amendment to the Constitution of Canada, in which the Prime Minister, in his effort to finally become the dictator, is attempting to take unto the House of Commons, which he can control, the whole of the passage of any such legislation, and from then on he won't have to get the support of the Senate. It is one of the most shocking bits of effrontery that I have ever seen any statesman attempt to impose on Parliament.

Senator Perrault: Here again, honourable senators, we are now getting into a debate on this proposed resolution, and I would suggest that section 44 relates as well to other sections—

Senator Asselin: Which ones?

Senator Perrault: —which require the support of the Senate and the Commons—

Senator Walker: Oh no.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: —and a number of the provinces to bring proposed amendments into place. I don't think this is the time or place to get into a detailed debate on the content of the proposed resolution, when the proposed resolution itself is under discussion in the other chamber. There will be full Senate representation, including representation from the official opposition, on the proposed Senate-Commons joint committee, where these questions, which are entirely appropriate, can be answered and dealt with. I am not questioning the right of honourable senators to pose their questions, but this is not the best time to pose them.

Hon. G. I. Smith: I must ask the Leader of the Government to remember that yesterday he tabled this document in this house. I always understood that when a document was tabled in this house it was for the perusal of the members thereof, and for the members, if they wished and thought it useful, to ask the Leader of the Government questions based on the content of those papers. I do not understand this sudden reluctance, because the matter has not come before us officially by a message from the other house, to deal with legitimate questions based upon the content of a document that was tabled here yesterday.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, of course the proposed resolution was tabled here, and I know it gives rise to questions. Indeed, a number of questions have been asked of me personally by various members of the Senate. However, what I do not think would be appropriate—and I find no parliamentary precedent for it—is to have a full debate on the motion, the resolution and the appended bill before they come to us for debate and discussion. We must decide at the appropriate time whether (a) we will participate in the joint committee, or (b) we will join in the debate. That is the only point I make.

Senator Walker: Isn't the very essence of the reason we are here—we do not want to debate the particulars of it—that we should protest in the event that somebody should try to pull the wool over the eyes of the British House of Commons and the British House of Lords by sending them a bill which, under clause 44, would annihilate the Senate as a body with any power. Anything that it rejected could be passed again by the House of Commons without any suggestion of another vote.

Senator Flynn: Senator Haidasz has a reply for his leader.

Senator Walker: I did not hear what he said.

This is paramount, and it needs an answer before we can go any further. Clause 44 would eliminate the Senate as a power in this land, and to make the British House of Commons responsible for that heinous error is really effrontry, in my consideration. To have those two soft-soapers go over and address Her Gracious Majesty the Queen, two completely insignificant people, is shocking, because the effect of this measure is to destroy the Constitution of Canada as we understand it.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator has made his point very passionately, and he will have many further opportunities to make this and similar points. If, for example, his leader would have him serve on the proposed joint committee, I am sure Senator Walker would make an outstanding contribution. Certainly there will be an opportunity to debate the issue in the house. There are many clauses in the proposed bill which are open to interpretation and explanation. There are a number of technicalities which invite further clarification. Even at this early point, the debate in the other place, for example, has featured useful observations by members of all the parties. These will be considered very carefully by the government, which has stated that it will listen closely to all arguments and proposals for amendment that could be advanced in committee.

Clause 44 states:

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation under subsection 41(1) or section 43 without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation—

And so on. However, clause 41(1) states:

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by
> (a) resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons; and
> (b) resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least a majority of the provinces that includes
> (i) every province—

In other words, the Victoria formula, agreed to by all of the provinces in 1971 in the city of Victoria.

I know the honourable senator may disagree and say that because of other considerations there is not adequate protection for this chamber. I want to reassure him again that there will be a full opportunity for consideration and debate of his and other views. There will be no restriction on the right of honourable senators to speak. The Senate could have, I understand, ten representatives out of the 25 on the committee.

Senator Flynn: Why do you say you understand? On what basis do you say you understand?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have two questions I would like to ask by way of supplementaries.

First of all, I am wondering whether the leader was accurate a moment ago when he referred to this as a bill. I thought this was a resolution that we were dealing with.

Also, the Leader of the Opposition made reference to clause 44 of the resolution. While I do not want to discuss any particulars contained in clause 44 of the resolution, I am wondering whether the Government of Canada will require the sanction of the Senate before referring the resolution to the committee and the assent by the Senate to that resolution before it is referred to the British Parliament.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, let me give the words of the government notice of motion so we will understand what the proposal of the government is:

> That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That is the first section.

[Senator Perrault.]

> That 15 Members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;
> That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;
> That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;
> That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;
> That the committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;
> That the quorum of the Committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized—

That is a joint chairmanship involving the Senate and the House of Commons.

> —that the joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when 6 members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and
> That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, Members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

It seems to me that the government notice of motion and the government motion observe the highest standards of parliamentary practice. Here we have an attempt by the government to assure democratic and orderly procedures—yes, and hopefully, perhaps, to achieve something like a consensus at the very least to reduce the areas of dispute or difference as far as that is possible.

It seems to me that it would be of great value to present to Her Majesty a joint address where there is a substantial consensus in Parliament and across the country. I know that many questions will arise and many sections may be open to misinterpretation, but the assurance that I am pleased to give, is that the government will afford every possible opportunity for the kind of debate to go forward that will be consistent with parliamentary tradition.

The honourable senator has asked an important question. Witnesses will be called before that committee, perhaps expert witnesses, representatives of the government, to provide explanations to honourable senators. It is hoped that the honourable senator will be more satisfied after he hears those explanations.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, I have nothing more to add but I should like to clarify the leader's answer. I suggest to him that section 41 does one thing, and most of us are in entire agreement with that, but section 44 is something entirely new and entirely different. It has a profound effect on the Senate and the whole Constitution of Canada, and the working of it. That is what my protest is about, and it has nothing to do with any other ambiguity at this time.

● (1435)

Senator Perrault: I want to assure the honourable senator that his protest and the statement that he has made today will be brought to the attention of the Prime Minister and those responsible for the consideration of this resolution. I want to give him that commitment.

Senator Walker: Then it is only proper to say that to embroil Her Majesty in a matter of this kind is really an insult.

LEAKED CABINET DOCUMENT—GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING PROGRAM

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning this process which has now been launched. I invite him to recall the famous "document" from the federal-provincial relations office to the cabinet that was leaked last summer. To refresh his memory I should like to quote one or two passages from it:

> The fundamental question to be addressed concerns the legitimacy of spending taxpayers' dollars to promote what will be deemed by many to be a politically partisan position.

And a little later:

> But once the government has decided what action that it intends to take, and Parliament has been reconvened to debate that proposed action, the role of advertising changes. At that point, public funds are being used to sell the governing party's position, yet such funds are not made available to Opposition parties. Thus, the Opposition has no effective way to respond, in contrast to the provinces which can (and did during the summer) respond by running their own advertising programs.

I would draw the minister's attention particularly to this sentence:

> Under these circumstances, Ministers need to decide if advertising is politically legitimate.

My question to the minister is to ask how that matter has been resolved by the government and whether, in fact, an advertising program is continuing or going forward in relation to these matters while they are still being debated in the other place and before they even come to this chamber for debate.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I say as a participant in the much discussed Lake Louise meetings, at which this memorandum is supposed to have been considered, that this document, from which the senator has quoted in a highly selective fashion, was prepared by one public servant. It was his personal opinion on a certain number of matters.

I know that the honourable senator, with his extensive background in government, realizes that many, many documents are prepared by many advisers to governments on many occasions—in fact, on almost every occasion.

The document he refers to is not an official cabinet document prepared as a result of cabinet consideration. It does not represent any decision of cabinet. I know the honourable senator is aware of that and I know that his innate sense of fair play will inspire him to admit that.

If this had been a cabinet document, a cabinet decision, I think the kind of interpretation which he is attempting to draw from that memorandum would have a great deal more import.

So far as the advertising program is concerned, I hope honourable senators do not feel that that was politically inspired. Indeed, at no time did it talk about the Government of Canada. It talked about the values which most Canadians hold in common: a great love for their country, a desire to see all sections of it stronger, an appeal for fair play and tolerance and understanding. And I know that the great party of which the honourable senator is a member subscribes to those principles as well. Surely this was a bipartisan or a multipartisan advertising campaign, really putting forth in rather attractive and inspiring terms the values that we hold in common as Canadians.

I will undertake, however, honourable senators, to obtain, insofar as I am able, further information about the scheduling of this campaign and when it may conclude.

If these public announcements were being used to promote one partisan viewpoint in this dialogue at the present time, I could understand his criticism. It is likely that I would feel very much as the honourable senator feels, but it is not a partisan campaign.

● (1440)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, first, the great party, of which I am a member, moved to disband those hucksters and banish them from the Canadian Unity Information Office during the brief time that we were in power, and I regret to see them resuscitated by the present administration.

Secondly, the document in question does not purport to report a cabinet decision. It was a presentation to the cabinet by the bureaucrats, as the Leader of the Government stated. I understand his desire to disavow it since what it does is pose a moral dilemma to the cabinet—and, of course, this is not a cabinet that is accustomed to dealing in moral dilemmas. It cannot even grasp the meaning of a moral dilemma.

Senator Steuart: They can count the votes.

Senator Murray: Senator Steuart quite properly intervenes by saying that they can count the votes, and I will give them that. My question is whether an advertising program is indeed continuing on these matters while they are being discussed in the other place and before they arrive here for debate.

Senator Perrault: That information will be sought. However, as I recall, there are at least six references in the memorandum, from which the honourable senator has quoted, expressing the national government's great desire to achieve an agreement with the provinces on the range of issues. Indeed, if one reviews the recent constitutional conference it is apparent that almost all of the "flexibility" was on the side of the federal representatives at those meetings.

The attitude of some of the premiers was that agreement among themselves should have been sufficient to inspire the federal government to agree to further power-sharing. Indeed, a few weeks ago one provincial premier who attended the conference said, "We regard the federal government as an agent for the provinces." Honourable senators must surely regard that as an incredible statement.

In all of the areas under discussion—in respect of the 12 issues under discussion—the federal government made offers which, in effect, would have given the provincial governments greater power and greater latitude in many if not almost all of those areas.

An Hon. Senator: Right on!

Senator Perrault: I would like the honourable senator, who is so critical of the government, to cite one instance where there was any great degree of flexibility demonstrated by the provincial first ministers regarding specific matters affecting federal government interests such as the so-called human rights package. As I recall, two or three provinces expressed support for the patriation of the Constitution, but complete unanimity could not be achieved on that point. Some of the provinces gave general support for minority education rights, but there was no unanimity on that point.

Almost all of the flexibility in those talks was on the side of the federal representatives—

An Hon. Senator: Oh come on!

Senator Perrault: —and if the honourable senator wishes to quote from an alleged memorandum supposedly under discussion at Lake Louise, I suggest, in all fairness, that the memorandum reflected clearly the resolve of the government and its earnest endeavour to achieve agreement with the provinces.

Senator Murray: Since the Leader of the Government has invited me to debate the question, I will ask him to point out to the Senate where in the proposed resolution there is any reflection whatsoever of the preoccupations which the provincial governments brought to the table at the summer conference.

Senator Perrault: I will be glad to cite one or two instances, but here again we get into the subject matter of the debate. But I can cite the equalization section, which is the wording prepared by one provincial government. The matter of language education rights was agreed upon in 1978 by all of the provinces. It was agreed that this was a right that should be enjoyed by language minorities across the country.

Time after time the provincial governments have expressed their support for human rights. Indeed some provinces have codes of human rights which are almost similar to the human rights package which we propose should be entrenched.

If the honourable senator wishes to initiate an inquiry, he has the right to do so; but I do not think that we should be debating this resolution further.

[Translation]

INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 42 OF THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTION ACT, 1980

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: A supplementary, to better understand the notion of flexibility the Leader of the Government has in mind. I would like to ask him the following question about section 42 of the proposed resolution which reads as follows:

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by a referendum held throughout Canada under subsection (2) at which
> (a) a majority of persons voting thereat—

Is that the definition of the flexibility of this government—to suppress the provinces, the legislatures, in the amending process? I think that aspect is very important as it is in fact a fundamental amendment to the federative regime itself. Does the flexibility of this government consist in suppressing opponents in the process when it comes to amendments to the Constitution?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it remains to be seen whether this section will in fact serve adequately to meet the need that the government believes it should. It can be said, however, that should some unanticipated chain of events result in an amendment to the Constitution that is injurious to one section of the country, that section could facilitate a referendum appeal to the people of all regions of Canada to ensure that those regional rights are protected. That is one reason for section 42.

Perhaps it could be amended, or modified, or changed. That is for Parliament to decide. Certainly, the honourable senator will have his opportunity to advance constructive suggestions. The referendum procedure does not constitute a diminution of the power of the provinces to the benefit of the federal government. It is not a flowing of power to the federal government; it is a flowing of power to the people. A referendum would require the support of people in all regions of Canada. It would be a vote of confidence in the ability of the people, in the ultimate, to make decisions of importance to this nation.

The honourable senator may dispute that and say that along the way there should be greater consultation. That is a debate which, I am sure, will take place in the other place and in this chamber. The intent is, in the ultimate, to safeguard the rights of Canadians from coast to coast.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: A supplementary. I think we are beginning to see more and more the importance of scrutinizing the text itself if we want later on to prepare for the debate we will be having. The Leader of the Government just told us that under section 42 there is no flowing of power in one direction or the other to a level of government or the other. But the constitutional amendment in section 42 is by definition an amendment to the division of powers, otherwise it is not a constitutional amendment. There is necessarily in that section 42 the possibility that Parliament acting alone through a referendum, going over the provincial legislatures in the process, could amend the Constitution in any respect. There is no limitation contained in that section as to the matter with which the amendment could deal. No circumstance to which the Leader of the Government referred is suggested to describe the manner in which an amendment under this section would apply. It is a straight amending formula put side by side with the formula that is contained in section 41 and placed exactly on the same footing. Therefore it is the Parliament of Canada that will decide which one. That is my reading of the literal sense of that section. I note, if I understood his answer correctly, that the reading of the Leader of the Government is altogether different. So I would ask him to enlighten me on his own reading and show me that it is really a reading of the text and not a paraphrase that changes the nature of it.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on a point of order, I think that since this is Question Period it might be that the last intervention, from an authority on constitutional matters, interesting as it is—and I say that without a hint of sarcasm—is nevertheless not in order at this time. Also, perhaps honourable senators will permit me to say at least what I anticipate is going to be the procedure with reference to this matter, so that while we are waiting for the resolution to get here we can streamline our procedure or have interventions to indicate how best we might be able to deal with it in this chamber.

On the first point there is no question—it probably does not even need to be said—that since this document has been tabled it is a public document and it is perfectly in order for senators to raise questions about it. I hope we have not given the impression that we are suggesting that this document is not subject to questions during Question Period. The purpose of my intervention on the last point was that the question tended to be une constatation au lieu de questions, but perhaps that is too small a point.

As I understand the situation we can keep discussing this document during Question Period since it is there, and since it is perfectly in order to ask questions about it; but I think we should remember that in due course the resolution will come over to us, at which point the first thing we will have to decide is whether we want to join the House of Commons in this joint committee. It will be the government's intention to urge senators to do so, but that does not necessarily mean that it will be the Senate's position.

So that will be the first general point we will have to discuss, namely, do we want to participate with the House of Commons in this joint committee? It seems to me that it will be relevant for us at that point to discuss the resolution again, as distinct from the motion, because I believe it would be in order for any senator to say, "Before I decide whether I want to join in this committee I want to know what is going to be referred to the committee."

By way of footnote I would like to say that in my view a lot of the things we are talking about now with regard to this resolution we will be able to talk about again when the resolution comes to us. At that time we can also discuss the size of the committee. There is a suggestion that it should consist of 15 members of the House of Commons and ten senators. That, of course, may not be adequate. Honourable senators may think that the committee should be bigger, and that there should be more senators on it. It would certainly be relevant for us to talk about that.

Eventually I take it that we will, or will not, join with them. The likelihood is that we will join with them, but it is not a matter of certainty, in view of the modifications that we have suggested with reference to its size and with regard to our participation in it.

As members of the committee, of course, having debated to some extent the resolution while discussing the motion, we will then be able to have our representatives discuss it in the committee. Then, when that committee reports, with or without amendments, we will have the opportunity to debate the report of the committee, which will again give us a chance to deal with it.

Senator Flynn: We know all of that.

Senator Frith: Well, let me finish. I am sure I am stating the obvious to my colleague, but there may be some people here who do not know all that.

Senator Flynn: On your side!

Senator Frith: I thought that perhaps the opposition did not know that because they are insisting on debating, it seems to me, the contents of the resolution. That is why we might find it worthwhile to discuss all of the many opportunities we are going to get to debate it, even though it is perfectly in order to discuss it as a document now.

We will also get a chance to debate the motion when it comes to passing or not passing the resolution. If, in addition to all of that, we want to spend a lot of time in Question Period on it, so be it; but I think that when we are talking about how much time we want to spend on it in Question Period we might consider all the future opportunities we are going to have to do the same thing.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, perhaps I might put in the form of a question what really is some comment on what the deputy leader has just said.

Does the deputy leader not think that the more information that is available to honourable senators before these processes which he has mentioned start, and which I agree are likely to occur, the more usefully they will be able to contribute to the various stages of the debate and the processes he has mentioned?

Senator Frith: Yes.

INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 44 OF PROPOSED CONSTITUTION ACT, 1980

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like the Leader of the Government to put the following questions to the Minister of Justice, since he himself does not appear qualified or willing to answer them.

The first question is: Is my interpretation of section 44 correct? Would this section, once Westminster has adopted the resolution, entitle the House of Commons to abolish the Senate without any concurrence by the Senate?

I want the Minister of Justice to tell me whether this interpretation is correct or not.

The second matter is this—and I would like the opinion of the Minister of Justice; not the honourable leader's opinion, and certainly not that of Senator Frith. Would the Minister of Justice tell me whether, if this proposed legislation, the so-called act to amend the Constitution of Canada, were to be passed unilaterally by Parliament, it would be contrary to the decision handed down by the Supreme Court of Canada last year in the reference concerning the Senate. If this be the case, then are we not, by going the Westminster route, simply showing contempt for the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): As is the case in all instances, the comments of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition will be duly noted and information sought.

[Translation]

COMPOSITION OF CABINET DELEGATION TO GREAT BRITAIN

Hon. Martial Asselin: I should like to a put a question further to those already asked about the visit of two ministers of the Canadian government who are currently in London to sell to the British government, or rather, to inform the British government about the present constitutional situation in Canada, a step which, like some other honourable senators, I feel is premature and untimely because, once again, it shows contempt for Parliament which has yet to reach a decision: still, they are saying, "Here is what will be decided."

I should like to know why no one in the Canadian government thought of sending a French-Canadian minister with the two others now in London? That would have proved, first of all, that the strongest opposition to the unilateral patriation of the constitution comes from Quebec, from all political parties in Quebec and from the Quebec population. It would also have reaffirmed to the British the existence of the Canadian duality.

To my mind, the fact that no French Canadian member of the federal cabinet was sent to represent the aspirations of Quebec during those consultations constitutes another affront to the French-Canadian people.

[Senator Smith.]

• (1500)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the two ministers sent to London, one the Honourable John Roberts and the other the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, are both bilingual.

Senator Asselin: I am not talking about that.

Senator Perrault: Let me provide an explanation to you about this matter, and you may or may not accept it. They had meetings with all the party leaders and, of course, Her Majesty the Queen.

Mr. Roberts, of course, was co-chairman of the federal negotiating team during this long process of negotiating with the provinces. The other co-chairman was the Honourable Jean Chrétien who remained behind in Canada to introduce the motion in the other place. He has the important responsibility of piloting this measure through the other place; so it was a division of responsibility.

Senator Flynn: Mr. Pepin could have gone.

Senator Perrault: The Honourable Jean Chrétien was the responsible minister in the other place.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: The minister's answer is absolutely childish. There were French-Canadian ministers other than Mr. Chrétien. Mr. De Bané could have gone. There are nine of them in the cabinet. I have difficulty understanding why the minister could not answer my question. So I will ask him a supplementary.

In the conclusion of the Pepin-Robarts report, it is said that the authors were quite in favor of patriating the Constitution, but not unilaterally. They insisted that the provinces had to be consulted. Before the cabinet made its decision to patriate unilaterally, Mr. Pepin said in a public statement that the federal government could not patriate the Constitution without the agreement of the provinces. Mr. Pepin was positively clear about that. Can Mr. Pepin now remain a member of a cabinet that says precisely the opposite of what he said just for the sake of ministerial solidarity?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Mr. Pepin is certainly well equipped to speak for himself. He is an able, intelligent, articulate, and dedicated parliamentary servant.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Articulate, agreed.

Senator Perrault: The second point to be made is that a good deal has happened since the preparation of the Pepin-Robarts report up to the present moment.

Senator Flynn: You can say that again.

Senator Perrault: The patriation dialogue has continued for 57 years in this country.

Senator Asselin: It is just the same old story.

Senator Perrault: There is a developing national consensus that it is time to patriate this Constitution. There is substantial public support in all regions of Canada for this patriation process. I think the support which has been expressed publicly by the Premier of Ontario and other outstanding leaders of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario indicates the view that the Constitution be patriated crosses party lines.

Senator Flynn: Stick to the question. I rise on a point of order.

Senator Perrault: That is not a point of order.

Senator Flynn: I rise on a point of order.

Senator Perrault: What is your point of order?

Senator Flynn: I say that you are not replying to the question and that your remarks are entirely irrelevant. Senator Frith made the same criticism just a moment ago. You should try to answer the question, and if you cannot, just say that you cannot.

Senator Perrault: Here again we have this unique double standard which has been developed, almost as an art form, by the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: When the situation is such that the Leader of the Opposition wishes to debate at great length a subject totally unrelated to the Question Period, he continues along in his usual eloquent fashion, and a great degree of tolerance is exercised by those on the government side.

Senator Flynn: Not me.

Senator Asselin: I rise on a point of order.

Senator Perrault: As soon as one of the opposition's pet theories is challenged in any way, the Leader of the Opposition jumps up and cries, "Foul!" It is almost like a wrestling match when the champ who is engaged in all sorts of unethical tactics suddenly finds himself on the ropes, and he is the first one to grab the ropes and say the referee must protect him.

Honourable senators, to get back to the matter at hand—

Senator Flynn: It is about time.

Senator Asselin: Please.

Senator Perrault: —a consensus has developed since the Pepin-Robarts report.

Senator Asselin: Can you tell me why Mr. Pepin is a member of the cabinet when he has expressed contrary views?

Senator Perrault: Let me assure the honourable senator that Mr. Pepin is one of the most forthcoming ministers serving Canada today, and all the honourable senator has to do is stride down the hall and ask the question himself.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

ATTEMPTED TAKEOVER OF ROYAL TRUSTCO BY CAMPEAU CORPORATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I should like to give the Leader of the Government a little rest and direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Could the minister tell us what conclusions have been reached as a result of any investigation conducted by the federal Corporations Branch and the Department of Insurance with regard to the Royal Trustco takeover by the Campeau Corporation? Also, are any investigations by these federal agencies being conducted into a proposed takeover bid of the National Trust Company.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice since I do not have the necessary detailed reply on the tip of my tongue.

Senator Haidasz: As a supplementary question, is the federal government giving consideration to introducing, on a priority basis in this session, a new Trust Companies Act and a new Loan Companies Act, or at least some amendments to the existing act prohibiting takeover bids of trust companies by non-financial institutions or restricting block ownership of trust company shares in order to protect federally-chartered financial institutions from loss of independence resulting from any concentration of ownership?

Senator Olson: I also take that question as notice.

FINANCE

SALE OF GOLD RESERVES

Hon. Jack Austin: Can the Minister of State for Economic Development advise this chamber of the policy of the government with respect to the sale of gold from our monetary reserves? Why are we selling portions of our monetary reserves as gold in the international market?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will make inquiries of the Minister of Finance who is responsible for this area, and provide an answer as soon as I receive it.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO MASSEY-FERGUSON LIMITED

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, can the Minister of State for Economic Development advise us whether the government has considered suggesting or has actually suggested to its partially owned commercial corporation, Canada Development Corporation, that it review the financial circumstances of Massey-Ferguson with an end to providing, through that corporation, appropriate commercial assistance to Massey-Ferguson?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce made an announcement within the last few days concerning a number of considerations which are now being looked at with a view to finding a way of assisting Massey-Ferguson in getting out of its present difficulties. I will inquire whether any action specifically with regard to the Canada Development Corporation is under way.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

NEGOTIATIONS RE SALE OF COAL TO JAPAN

Hon. Jack Austin: My third and last question to the minister relates to the northeast coal block. I would ask him whether in these very final stages of negotiation between the coal companies, British Columbia and the possible Japanese purchasers, the minister has kept the details of those negotiations personally close at hand with a view to providing assistance of some kind, particularly with respect to transportation costs?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there was a long series of discussions between the coal companies involved, the British Columbia government, the federal government and, indeed, the transportation companies, particularly the CN. I do not have details with me as to what was offered by way of freight rates so that the coal companies could negotiate with the prospective purchasers in Japan or in other parts of the world, but my understanding is that this matter is in an advanced or final stage of negotiation.

I can express the hope again today, as I have done a number of times, that the positions are probably so close that we can be at least optimistic that some firm contracts in the volumes that were anticipated at the beginning of the negotiations will now be achieved. It is my understanding there is more than one contract that has been agreed to even to this date and, hopefully, the balance of the volume that was considered earlier this year will be achieved within the next few days, but I cannot be more specific about giving an undertaking as to when two other parties will agree to the negotiated position.

MASS MEDIA

INVESTIGATIONS INTO CLOSINGS OF NEWSPAPERS

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I direct a question to the Leader of the Government, but before I put the question I invite him to recall the closure of the two newspapers, the Ottawa Journal and the Winnipeg Tribune, a few weeks ago, and to recall also that the government announced shortly thereafter that a team or group of investigators from the government department concerned with monopolies would look into the matter, and at about the same time or not long after appointed a royal commission under the leadership of Dean Tom Kent of Dalhousie University to investigate the same thing.

My question is: Is there any truth in the suggestion that I have heard that approaches have been made to the leadership of the Senate to the effect that the Senate itself should set up a committee charged with the same kind of investigation similar to the type of investigation into the mass media carried out some nine or 10 years ago under the chairmanship of Senator Davey?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, no specific initiative has been forthcoming. I noted as well statements in the media with respect to the possibility of a Senate study, but nothing has gone ahead.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, perhaps I might ask a supplementary. I suppose it would be reasonable to ask the minister that if such a specific suggestion did come forward the question of costs, and the costs that the taxpayers already have to foot of the two investigations already established by the government, be kept in mind. The question should be asked, and asked very firmly: Are we not spending enough of the taxpayers' money on this question now?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I have stated, I know of no plans to initiate a Senate inquiry. Presumably, the honourable senator would oppose such an inquiry and this is one of the points that he wishes to make.

Senator Smith: In response to that, I will make it very clear what I intend to do or do not intend to do in due course, as the minister always says when he is asked about that kind of thing, and no inference should be drawn from my question.

FINANCE

RELATIONSHIP OF GOLD RESERVES TO MONEY SUPPLY

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. It is supplementary to the first question asked by Senator Austin. As one who has no great knowledge of our gold reserves, I ask: Are there any recent audit figures available, either through the Auditor General's reports or some other form of instrument of auditing, as to the amount of Canadian gold reserves today in relation to the amount of money that has been printed?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will include that question in the inquiry that I make of the Minister of Finance.

ENERGY

AGREEMENT IN PRINCIPLE BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND NEW YORK STATE FOR THE SALE OF HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to reply to a question asked by Senator Marshall during Question Period yesterday concerning the transmission of Lower Churchill hydro-electric power across the province of Quebec for sale to the State of New York.

As indicated in my initial reply to the honourable senator's question, the Province of Newfoundland would have to apply to the National Energy Board for permission to export hydro-electric power to the State of New York, and no such application has yet been received. However, the Premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Peckford, has written to the Prime Minister of Canada, requesting that the federal government ensure that a transmission line can be constructed across the province of Quebec. This request is being studied by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, and I will be pleased to further inform the Senate when a reply is sent to the Premier of Newfoundland concerning the federal government's position on this issue.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

1980 SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

Question No. 15 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. By province, give a breakdown showing the number of applications received under 1980 S.Y.E.P. (Public Legal Information).

Reply by the Minister of Employment and Immigration:

As of March 28, 1980, closing date for receipt of applications for the 1980 Summer Youth Employment Program (S.Y.E.P.), 16,183 applications had been received. Following is a breakdown by province:

Province	No. of Applications
Newfoundland	872
Nova Scotia	940
Prince Edward Island	246
New Brunswick	1,017
Quebec	5,193
Ontario	3,715
Manitoba	946
Alberta	778
Saskatchewan	721
Northwest Territories	23
British Columbia	1,663
Yukon	69
Total:	16,183

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VETERANS LAND ADMINISTRATION

Question No. 19 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. What is the number of staff members in the Veterans Land Administration in (a) DVA Headquarters, and (b) in regional offices?

2. What is the increase or decrease in the number of staff members in the Veterans Land Administration since the phase out of the Veterans Land Act?

3. What is the job description of the Veterans Land Administration (DVA) as a result of the phase out of the Veterans Land Act?

4. Does the Management by Objectives Committee have any projections as to the need for staff in the Veterans Land Administration over the next (a) five years, and (b) ten years?

5. How many accounts for veterans who purchased homes under the Veterans Land Act are on file?

6. What is the actual monthly case-load handled by DVA since the phase out of the Veterans Land Act, other than monthly payments of accounts?

Reply by the Minister of Veterans Affairs:

1. (a) 32 (b) 195 (actual staff).

2. In the 5 years since the phasing out of Veterans Land Administration (VLA) lending activities, March 31, 1975, VLA staff has been reduced by approximately 220.

3. Following termination of new lending activities March 31, 1975, and those involving additional loans March 31, 1977, the role of VLA has changed to one concerned with property management and contract administration. The administration's principal role, on an ongoing basis, is to assist veterans, their heirs, devisees or personal representatives acquire title to property on which veterans have been established.

4. (a) VLA Program management is projecting the following person-year requirements for the next 4 years.

1980/81—236; 1981/82—225; 1982/83—218; 1983/84—200

(b) No. Program management has no projection of person years beyond 1983/84.

5. Since inception of the Veterans Land Act, approximately 145,000 veterans have been established under its provisions. An individual file was created for each establishment and at present there are in excess of 40,000 accounts still active. All inactive veterans files from Head Office are stored in Public Archives Records Centre facilities.

6. During the past fiscal year, 1979/80, in addition to the important role of ensuring payment arrears are kept to a minimum, VLA staff processed a total of 5018 transactions pertaining to release of security, reverted properties, cash sales, partial sales, easements, leases, and timber and gravel sales. In addition, there was a considerable amount of activity involving estates transactions. Between April 1, 1979, and March 31, 1980, some 570 agreement holders died and in excess of 1000 VLA accounts were reinstated in the name of a personal representative or to a beneficiary and, in addition, a number of accounts were converted or assigned civilian agreements.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT—MINTING OF COINS COMMEMORATING GREAT CANADIANS

Question No. 21 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Senator Bosa:

1. Has the Mint received any suggestions for the minting of a $2.00 and a $5.00 coin commemorating great Canadians?

2. If so, is the Mint considering implementing such a suggestion and, if not, why not?

3. What was the result of the Mint's 1980 survey among its subscribers concerning the continuance of the minting of the Canadian silver dollar?

Reply by the Minister of Supply and Services:

Insofar as the Royal Canadian Mint is concerned:

1. Yes, we have received recommendations of this nature from one individual in the past.

2. The Royal Canadian Mint cannot consider such a suggestion at this time because the Currency and Exchange Act does not permit it. Amendments to this act will be considered shortly, and when changes are approved the suggestion will be taken into consideration.

3. Over 90 per cent of the people surveyed have asked that we keep the silver dollar in its present form.

THE ENVIRONMENT

MEMORIAL UNIVERSITY OF NEWFOUNDLAND—GRANT FOR ENVIRONMENTAL RESEARCH

Question No. 23 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. Did Memorial University of Newfoundland apply for a grant for environmental research as related in Release 24/11/06/80—6202?

2. If the answer is yes, was the application turned down and, if so, for what reason?

3. If the answer is no, (a) was the university given the opportunity to apply, and (b) by what means was the program communicated?

Reply by the Minister of the Environment:

Insofar as the Department of the Environment is concerned:

1. Memorial University of Newfoundland did not apply for a grant for environmental research as related in Release 24/11/06/80-6202.

2. Not applicable.

3. (a) The university was given the opportunity to apply for such a grant.

(b) A notice of intent is sent in September of each year to all universities and technical colleges who have the necessary research capabilities and technology. In the case of Memorial University of Newfoundland, this notice of intent was sent to the business office.

AGRICULTURE

POTATO PURCHASE PROGRAM—NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 24 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

[Senator Bosa.]

Since the inception of the federal "Potato Purchase Program," what purchases were made from farmers in the Province of Newfoundland?

Reply by the Minister of Agriculture:

No purchase was made from farmers in the Province of Newfoundland by the Agricultural Stabilization Board, since the inception of the federal "Potato Purchase Program".

SMALL LOANS ACT CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow moved the second reading of Bill C-44, to amend the Small Loans Act and to provide for its repeal and to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak on Bill C-44. Under this bill both borrowers and lenders will benefit significantly not only because it provides for the repeal of the Small Loans Act, but because it also amends the Criminal Code to enable law enforcement authorities to curb the more blatant instances of loan sharking.

The repeal of this act is necessary, in my opinion, to serve the interests of all parties in today's credit marketplace. First of all, the Small Loans Act was, in my view, enacted in an era when the small loans market did not consist of the institutions that are now characteristic of the lending community. Because it exempts the chartered banks from the interest rate ceilings imposed on credit unions, caisses populaires, trust and consumer loan companies and other established lenders, it restricts competition in the small loans market. Also, as the Small Loans Act requires the licensing of lenders who charge in excesss of 12 per cent per annum, it unnecessarily adds to the overhead of institutions which already comply with the registration and reporting requirements set by existing provincial law. These needless administration expenses make lending a more expensive proposition and add significantly to the cost of borrowing.

The act further restricts competition by preventing lenders, other than banks, from extending variable credit. Repeal of the statute would enhance competition and enable financial institutions to better serve their clients.

● (1520)

Lenders are not the only ones who have been adversely affected by the Small Loans Act. Borrowers, too, have been at a disadvantage. Because only loans of $1,500 or less are subject to the unrealistically low interest rate ceilings imposed by the act, consumers are often either unable to obtain loans of less than $1,500, or they are forced to contract for larger, unregulated loans. They may also be forced to turn to disreputable and unsupervised sources for necessary funds.

There are several other reasons for repealing this act. First, borrowers now have access to many more sources of consumer credit than existed when the Small Loans Act became law in 1940. Banks have entered the consumer loan field in a major way. There has been considerable growth in comparable services provided by the credit union and caisse populaire movement, and trust companies, too, have become increasingly active in consumer loan activity.

Secondly, there has been widespread distribution and use of credit cards, with the result that there is less need to obtain cash loans for consumer purchases. In this regard, it is interesting to note that loans covered by the Small Loans Act now account for less than one-half of one per cent of the total consumer credit outstanding.

Thirdly, the provinces have enacted consumer protection legislation that requires lenders to provide fuller disclosure of credit costs, and that provides consumers with various protective measures that did not exist when the Small Loans Act was enacted.

I mentioned at the outset of my remarks that the bill also provides for the amendment of the Criminal Code in order to help curb loan sharking activities. Before I explain the specifics of this amendment, let me say why I think consumer protection in this area is necessary. Borrowers often find themselves incurring credit obligations in excess of their real capital requirements and their ability to repay. Thus they become high risk borrowers, and as a result are particularly susceptible to victimization. Denied access to conventional lending sources by poor credit ratings, such borrowers become easy prey for loan sharks.

The repeal of the Small Loans Act would remove one of the few devices now available to combat loan sharking. However, Bill C-44 would maintain protection by amending the Criminal Code to establish a criminal rate of interest, set at 60 per cent per annum. This rate should be viewed not as a ceiling but as a level above which it would be clearly criminal to charge interest. I want to stress here, too, that for excessive interest rates below the 60 per cent criminal maximum consumers can still seek civil remedy in the courts.

Honourable senators, in my remarks I have attempted to stress the main reasons for the repeal of the Small Loans Act. Such a repeal would be an advantage to both borrowers and lenders.

Unless it is otherwise the wish of the Senate, it is my intention, if this bill receives second reading, to refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, July 16, the debate on the motion of Senator Stanbury, for the second reading of the Bill S-10, to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it was on July 16 last that Senator Stanbury moved the second reading of Bill S-10, and at that time he dealt with its provisions in some detail. While it is, therefore, not necessary to go into such detail again, it may be useful, on account of the lapse of time, to say a few words about the effect of the bill.

This is the fourth attempt to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act. That act was passed in 1962, and was chapter 26 of the statutes of that year. It is now chapter C-31 of the Revised Statutes of 1970.

The act is divided into three parts. Part I deals with corporations, Part II with labour unions, and Part III is a general section dealing with such matters as what information shall be made available for inspection, privileged communications and the like.

As the sponsor of the bill mentioned, the first proposed amendment was contained in Bill C-7 in 1977. That bill received first and second readings and was considered in the committee of the other place, but did not receive third reading and died on the order paper. In 1978 came Bill C-3, and in 1979 Bill C-12. Neither of these went past first reading. Now we have Bill S-10. All these bills are essentially the same, and strive to improve the original act.

The purpose of the 1962 act was to authorize the collection of financial and other information on certain corporations and labour unions. Over the years the act has come under increasing criticism from both small business and labour unions. Bill S-10 tries to meet and overcome such criticism. Its general purpose is to exempt and free over 70,000 small Canadian corporations from having to make reports now required by the act, and eight of the existing questionnaires will be integrated into one to reduce the overall response burden and provide information of high quality. In addition, information on technology transfers to Canada from abroad will be collected.

In Part II the application of the act has been expanded somewhat to cover more labour unions. Section 9 of the original act stated as follows:

> This Part applies to every labour union carrying on activities as such in Canada and having a local union or branch in Canada, except a labour union that, on the last day of the reporting period of the union in respect of which the description of such union is relevant, had fewer than one hundred members resident in Canada.

The new section is certainly easier to follow. It says:

> This Part applies to every labour union carrying on activities as such in Canada and
> (a) having a local union or branch in Canada, or
> (b) carrying on activities in Canada independently of any other labour union, except a labour union that, on the last day of the reporting period of the union in respect of which the description of such union is relevant, had fewer than one hundred members resident in Canada.

International unions will report all direct receipts from their Canadian affiliates and all expenditures directly attributed to their operations in Canada, and all unions will report information separately on each of their special funds, such as pension funds or strike funds. There are also other amendments dealing with labour unions.

Since there are thirteen sections in Bill S-10, many of a technical nature, I would think that the bill should go to committee for a detailed study, even though such a study was given by the Commons committee in 1977. It may well be that some companies and some labour unions would now like to make some representations regarding the subject matter of the bill, so I would suggest that it be referred to a committee. Certainly, as far as I know, there is no objection to its receiving second reading at this time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Stanbury, moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVACY BILL, 1980

ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Second reading of the Bill S-9, intituled: "An Act to extend the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individuals and that provide individuals with a right of access to government files containing personal information relating to themselves".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

● (1530)

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not intend at this time to move the second reading of this bill, because in the other place they are presently examining similar legislation. That is a government bill concerning information, concerning the subject of privacy. If that bill proceeds normally in the other place, it is not necessary to move it here. I let it stand in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate simply in case there would be a change on the part of the government. Therefore I propose a one month deferral or something like that.

Order stands.

RETIREMENT AGE POLICIES

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 26, 1980, debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Retirement Age Policies, entitled: "Retirement Without Tears," tabled in the Senate on April 15, 1980.

[Senator Macdonald.]

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, this is an item which has stood in my name for some time, and I wish to take the opportunity this afternoon to say a few words about it.

I realize that a further discussion on the report of the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies is not something that can compete in interest with the discussion of other matters which may come before us in the next little while or, indeed, which arise during Question Period. Yet, to many people, retirement age policies are policies which affect them directly and, consequently, are to them of great importance and interest.

The study made by the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies was, to my mind, a very timely one. There can be no doubt that retirement—indeed, the very idea of compulsory retirement—is a cause of apprehension and, indeed, of fear to many people, and perhaps the apprehension and fear arises more from the thought of an inadequate pension than that of retirement itself. The very idea of having to retire at a certain age is very unsettling and a real blow to an active person.

A person who is forced to retire faces a hard and difficult period of adjustment. There can be no doubt that such adjustment is made much easier where the retiring person has an adequate or better than adequate income during his or her retirement years. Even so, in many cases mandatory retirement is bound to cause many difficulties and much personal unhappiness.

On reading "Retirement Without Tears," one must be impressed, not only by the sheer volume of work which must have been involved on the part of the committee, but the manner in which the report itself was prepared. It is obvious the committee spent a great deal of time in hearing the evidence, and in reading and considering all of the briefs and studies submitted to it. The actual preparation of the report must have been a difficult and time-consuming task.

The report is the result of the work of the committee. Its conclusions and recommendations are set out in concise and well written form, which makes them easy to follow and understand.

Honourable senators, if one looks at the terms of reference of the committee and then reads the report in relation to those terms of reference, it becomes obvious that the committee, under its distinguished chairman, did its work well, and has earned the thanks and appreciation of the Senate—thanks and appreciation which have been already freely given. I join with previous speakers in this debate in paying my tribute to the committee for its study and report.

Honourable senators, while one is first of all impressed by the report and the manner in which it was prepared, that is only secondary. It is the content of the report which is important, and its importance lies in its analysis of present retirement policies and its recommendations for the improvement of existing policies and of new policies for the future. It is not to be expected, or indeed desired, that one would wish to speak on all of the recommendations or, for that matter, to agree with all of them.

Generally speaking, I was interested in the recommendation that the mandatory retirement age should rise to 70 years over a five-year period. I believe it to be an injustice that people be forced to retire when they are 65, and I think the report proves this. Personally, I am opposed to compulsory retirement at any age, and I see no reason why a person cannot draw a pension at a certain age if he has contributed to it while continuing to work. However, I am practical enough to realize that this happy state of affairs is not likely to happen in the immediate future.

Of course, those who wish to retire at age 65 are not the problem. The concern must be for those who do not wish to retire at age 65 but who are forced to do so. These are the people who are willing, anxious and able to continue their ordinary work but who are prohibited from doing so on account of age limits built into pension plans. For such people, forced retirement has at least two adverse, undesirable, and indeed evil results. First of all, there is a substantial loss of income—and we must remember that, under our economic system, few ordinary working people can accumulate any substantial savings from the salaries or wages they receive during their working lives. It must be recognized that under our system of taxation at the various levels of government, it is just not possible for the average worker to save for retirement.

I know it has been suggested that the ordinary worker could do with less during his working years in order to save for retirement, but I do not see where sharing the poverty, as it were, is any solution. I suppose some ill-informed people would think that if one has a low standard of living while working, he or she will not notice the drop to an even lower standard on retirement.

I believe it must be acknowledged that the ordinary average worker will have to depend solely on his pension income to support him during retirement. He will not have an investment income to close the gap between pension income and his former wage or salary; and, at the same time, he cannot expect his living expenses to be much lower, if lower at all. Indeed, if the person owns his own home, his expenses may well increase as maintenance costs, light and power and municipal taxes are all likely to increase—and there may very well be mortgage payments still to meet.

● (1540)

In any event, the net result of retirement will, I fear, often result in a general lowering of a person's standard of living and in many cases it will mean a lowering of a standard of living which was already too low. The report recognizes this and it is one of the reasons why it is against compulsory retirement at 65. On page 26 we see this statement:

> From another point of view, forced retirement may seriously damage the standard of living of the retired persons.

And again it says this:

> Social security payments, in general, will protect people to some extent but sole reliance on such income may entail hardship. Unfortunately, private pensions are often non-existent or small and will not prevent a disastrous drop in income. As a result, mandatory retirement often amounts to a sentence of continuing poverty.

Honourable senators, while forced retirement may bring a disastrous drop in income to an average working person, there can be a still worse result. The report mentions that some individuals are mentally distressed by mandatory retirement. I believe this to be so. I believe it can be truthfully said that forced retirement can bring with it a terrible feeling of frustration and indeed depression. I have often assisted persons to complete applications for old age security and for the supplement to such pensions, people who must retire at 65, and of course they talk about their impending retirement and how they feel about it. They just cannot understand why they must retire. They just cannot understand why they must give up their jobs while they are still able and willing to work. They just cannot understand why the last day of their 64th year they are competent and valuable employees and the next day they are not.

I think too it is apparent that when a person is forced to go on pension when he does not wish to go it can have an unfavourable effect on his character or lifestyle or personality, whatever one wishes to call it and it may very well have an unfavourable effect on his health.

It must be remembered that loss of employment—permanent loss of employment—leaves a person with another major problem. That problem is very real and it is how to occupy the eight hours—usually daylight hours—formerly devoted to his employment. Of course it is often said that people should be prepared for retirement, and I dare say many are. These are fortunate people. They have interests outside of and apart from their work which can be expanded with pleasure, and to them retirement brings no problems. But I think of a great many ordinary, average men and women for whom such preparation for retirement is not possible. And this is understandable. Over the years they have built up and evolved a life pattern, a daily routine which occupied their time apart from the time of employment. They had various social activities. Probably they passed their leisure time in many useful and pleasant ways leaving little or no time for preparation for retirement. Now suddenly all this is changed. There is an extra eight hours at least to be used in one way or another. And to use these eight hours may very well mean a difficult and frustrating problem of adjustment. One cannot abruptly break the habits or the routine of a lifetime. Those extra eight hours of new leisure are hours not usually devoted to community or social activities or to personal improvement or involvement in cultural or educational matters, or even non-educational or non-cultural matters such as the playing of bingo.

So I do think, honourable senators, it has to be acknowledged that enforced retirement with its accompanying frustrations and tensions can very well create in whole or in part a serious health problem. I expect those of us who live in small communities and who know many people have often noticed and remarked upon the number of people who live only a few years after they retire from active employment. I do not know if this relationship is wholly proven. However, there is a body of opinion which believes that enforced retirement, retirement against the will of the person, can result in premature death.

On page 23 of the report there is an interesting observation on this very point. It mentions that one witness stated that as a result of enforced retirement "imaginary illnesses become real and real illnesses are magnified." The report also observes that the American Medical Association has stated:

> The sudden cessation of productive work and earning power often leads to physical and emotional illness and premature death.

However, to be fair it also notes the Canadian Medical Association does not go quite that far, and the Director of the Centre for the Study of Aging and Human Development at Duke University disagrees with the assertion of the American Medical Association. For what it is worth and only as a result of some personal observation, I am of the opinion that forced retirement does, in many cases, have a serious effect on the health and personality of those directly affected and sometimes results in premature death. And this opinion has been strengthened by an item that appeared in the Globe and Mail of July 16 last. I quote it in part:

> Retirement may not be the best way to spend old age, a Statistics Canada study suggests. Preliminary research on people collecting Canada Pension payments shows a high death rate for men in the second year of retirement.

But the report's co-author, one L.A. Lefebvre, says the low death rate in the first year seems to fit into the cycle of the so-called honeymoon phase, when retired people are enjoying their new-found freedom. This high mortality during the second year could be accounted for by a deferred impact or by the onset of boredom and disenchantment relatively soon after the honeymoon phase.

Honourable senators, objections have been stated against the conclusions of the report and views expressed in favour of mandatory retirement at 65. Personally I do not see these objections as being too substantial. While they do have some validity, I think such objections could be overcome in practice. I believe we must, as the report does, consider the effects of forced retirement on the ordinary, average wage or salary earner. I expect the large corporations could arrange some method of retiring senior executives at 65 or earlier if they believed it necessary or desirable to do so. So while taking into consideration that these are arguments against the mandatory age of retirement, I am of the opinion—strongly of the opinion—that the conclusion of the report, in favour of raising such age, is correct and deserves support. And I was pleased to see a Canadian Press report on Wednesday last which stated that Gordon Fairweather, head of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, predicted that mandatory retirement at age 65 will be abolished in the next ten years.

[Senator Macdonald.]

Now, honourable senators, even if one believes compulsory retirement is wrong and should be abolished, I think we must ask ourselves if it is practical to do so in the immediate future, in the five-year period mentioned in the report or in the ten-year prediction of Mr. Fairweather. Personally, I must admit with great regret that I do not think this injustice will be overcome in any of the periods mentioned.

The report mentions that the age of 65 was instituted in the United States during the Great Depression, when unemployment was very high and the principle behind selecting that age was to push those of 65 and over right out of the labour market. In this way, younger unemployed would be given work. I think it is fair to say this idea or principle is in force in Canada today; certainly I know of cases where applications for jobs are made in the knowledge of various persons having to retire at 65. And to change that now would require a persistent public opinion which is not likely to occur in these days of high unemployment and indeed it does not even follow that, when and as economic conditions improve, employment will automatically improve also.

With all the labour-saving devices now available, the need for labour, even in the heavy industries, appears to be lessening. In a recent edition of Time magazine there was an interesting article entitled "Detroit's Uphill Battle". It showed a couple of pictures of machines doing the work which used to be done by men—and by skilled men, which is frightening. One picture showed how machines have replaced welders on the production line of the Chrysler plant. The article stated that the new Chrysler welding machines now carry out 98 per cent of the 3,000 spot welds used for body assembly operations on the new K-cars. One can only visualize the number of skilled workmen no longer needed in the Chrysler operation.

I am afraid the proposals of the report cannot be put into effect until unemployment is lowered to about 5 per cent, say, of the labour force, a figure which would probably be considered normal but which is not likely to be achieved in the near future. With ever-increasing mechanization and automation, I do not see an acceptable level of unemployment being brought about, regardless of even substantial improvement in our economy.

Actually, I do not think the report went into the question of employment and its relationship with retirement policies as fully as it might have done. Generally speaking, it takes the point of view that raising the age of retirement would have little effect on the employment of younger people.

On page 50, the report says:

> In the immediate future, therefore, the elimination of mandatory retirement is unlikely to increase the labour force participation of the older population significantly and thereby worsen the employment opportunities of the young.

I just cannot go along with those conclusions or with the reasons given for such conclusions.

Honourable senators, I am of the opinion that raising the age of retirement would worsen the employment situation. For that reason as well as for some others, I do not think the recommendation of the report will gain general acceptance at this time. If that is so, then the question of providing adequate pensions becomes of increasing importance. We must realize, of course, as the report does, that the whole question of providing adequate pensions is difficult and complex. I certainly agree with this statement at page 82:

> Your Committee has concluded, therefore, that only an expanded public pension program could provide pensioners with the protection against inflation that they now need.

Personally, I do not believe such an expanded plan is possible without increasing the government contribution.

The need is greatest, I think, among those who work for low wages—for the minimum wage. These people cannot afford to make higher contributions to a pension plan, even if such contributions are regarded as deferred wages. They need the wages now. And in many, probably most, of these cases, the employer is unable to pay higher wages or afford an increase in the employer's contribution.

I say, therefore, honourable senators, that the fact that a better or an improved pension scheme would require increased governmental expenditure does not bother me for one minute. There are, and there will always be, increased expenditures by government for less worthy purposes.

Honourable senators, as I have mentioned, I agree with the recommendations of the report that the mandatory retirement age should be raised. At the same time, I do not think it is practical to expect to have it raised in the immediate or near future. I hope I am wrong in this, and I will be delighted if it turns out that I am.

Honourable senators, I believe this report has already accomplished a very valuable purpose. It has brought to the attention of the Canadian people a very real problem concerning our so-called senior citizens, and that is good. However, the report also provides valuable guidelines for future policies.

I say the committee has done good work and deserves a sincere "thank you", and I conclude my remarks by quoting the last two paragraphs of the report's Introduction, which is found on pages 9 and 10:

> In conclusion, your Committee has found that retirement policies and the treatment of the aged are inadequate, often discriminatory and sometimes cruel. It is intolerable that today thousands of old people, feeling useless and rejected by society, are unnecessarily bored, ill, lonely, poor and often living in conditions of severe privation.
> The main purpose of the study has been to improve retirement policies without increasing government expenditures so that in the future Canada's elderly may live in comfort and dignity, respected and self-respecting, universally accepted as participating members of the community. Your Committee believes that the recommendations are pragmatic and forward-looking as well as compassionate, and can make such a future possible for the majority of old people in our country.

I say this is a wonderful objective, a great vision for the future; and I hope that before too long this vision will become a reality.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

MOTION AUTHORIZING EXPRESSION OF ADMIRATION FOR POLISH WORKERS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz moved pursuant to notice of Monday, October 6, 1980:

> That as preparatory meetings are now being held for the Madrid Review Conference on the Final Act of Helsinki, to which Canada is a signatory country, the Senate of Canada express its admiration for the courageous and prudent way in which the Polish workers struggled for free trade unions and other fundamental freedoms and human rights, and urge all signatory countries to faithfully observe the provisions of the Final Act of Helsinki to ensure social justice and security.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 8, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HONOURABLE JAMES DUGGAN

TRIBUTES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know you will agree with me that it is appropriate for us to pay tribute to the late Senator Jim Duggan, who passed away in August. As honourable senators will recall, he was with us for a number of years in this place. He retired from the Senate two years ago.

Senator Duggan was truly a man of the people, having spent an entire lifetime working with and for the people involved with the railways in his native province of Newfoundland. He had developed great expertise in the area of transportation, and his advice and counsel in that area was of value to all of us.

Senator Duggan served for many years on numerous labour relations boards and other commissions, always seeking to better the status of his fellow workers. He brought a unique perspective to this chamber, and all of us benefited from his advice and his expertise.

Jim Duggan will be greatly missed. We extend our condolences to his wife, Kathleen, and the six children he left behind, all living in St. John's.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, during the 12 years that James Duggan sat in the Senate, he was a modest, efficient member who made friends with everyone. He left here quietly, but we have fond memories of him. On behalf of the opposition, I join with the Leader of the Government in offering his family our sincere condolences.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I should also like to add a word of tribute to the expressions of the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition. As it happens, my career and that of Senator Jim Duggan were thrown together very closely after we became friends when I was only 12 years of age. He came to our railway community of Lewisporte as a railway agent. It was an unusual experience for him and, indeed, for us as well since our community had been founded by Methodist families and was entirely Methodist, not just Protestant, but one hundred per cent Methodist. Jim was the only Roman Catholic in the community, and I think that speaks volumes for him and for the people of that community. The most important organization in the community, apart from the church, was the Loyal Orange Lodge, and Jim and I often laughed over the fact that at every annual function such as a parade, one of the guests of honour of the Orange Lodge was none other than James Duggan, a devoted Irish Roman Catholic. Jim often spoke to me about that experience which, by the way, was something we all enjoyed very much.

I know the phrase is overworked and it is now perhaps a cliché, nevertheless I think I should use it again—Jim Duggan was one of nature's gentlemen.

I was speaking with Mrs. Duggan only two days ago, and she is, of course, heartbroken over the loss of her husband since they spent so many years together, but she is very appreciative of the friendly, generous treatment that her husband received here in the Senate. I shall take care to see to it that she receives a copy of the expressions made here today.

• (1410)

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the previous speakers.

Senator James Duggan, or Jim as we all knew him, prior to his appointment to this chamber, had been prominent in the labour movement in his province of Newfoundland. We all remember him as a quiet and unassuming person, who, until his health prevented it, was faithful in his attendance in this chamber. Quiet and unassuming he may have been, but many employers would remember Jim at the bargaining table, as that charming Irishman, or the rock-hard negotiator doing his utmost to further the cause of his fellow union members.

Over the past two years, during which time I visited him at his home in St. John's, he maintained an active interest in the proceedings of Parliament and was always eager to hear news of his former colleagues. To his wife, Kathleen, and children, I extend my deepest sympathy.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Document entitled "Canada's National-Provincial Health Program for the 1980's: A Commitment for Renewal", dated August 29, 1980 (The Honourable Emmett M. Hall, Special Commissioner), issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Report of operations under the Foreign Investment Review Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 30 of the said Act, Chapter 46, Statutes of Canada, 1973-74.

Report of the President of the National Research Council of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 16 of the National Research Council Act, Chapter N-14, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the President of the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 41 of the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council Act, Part III of Chapter 24, Statutes of Canada, 1976-77.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I desire to table the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred for consideration the subject matter of Bill C-12, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency, and ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

While I am on my feet, I should remind the members of the Senate that on July 17, in anticipation of summer recess commencing that day as far as the Senate was concerned, the Senate authorized the publication and distribution of this report during the recess period, and this was done.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the report be printed as requested?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 831.)

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next, October 14, I will call the attention of the Senate to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of Bill C-12, intituled, "An Act respecting Bankruptcy and Insolvency," tabled in the Senate this day.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED RESOLUTION FOR A JOINT ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday great interest was manifested by certain senators in documents tabled on Monday afternoon in this place. As I stated yesterday on behalf of the government, we would very much welcome a discussion and debate under appropriate Senate rules and procedures and at an appropriate time on the subject matter contained in those documents. The documents involve, of course, the proposed Address to Her Majesty the Queen and the appended draft of the bill which the government hopes will be dealt with eventually by the Parliament in Westminster.

For that reason I am prepared today to give notice, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(2), that tomorrow I will call the attention of the Senate to the document entitled: "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada," tabled in the Senate Monday, October 6, 1980.

I mention tomorrow, because if it is the desire of the opposition to commence this discussion tomorrow and if they would like to place their comments on the record commencing tomorrow, we on this side are certainly prepared to accommodate them. I would be most interested to have the views of the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government was kind enough to discuss this matter with me just before lunch. That short notice, however, did not afford me enough time to consult fully with members on this side, or to form an opinion on the propriety of such a procedure. For that reason I would prefer that this matter be put over to Tuesday next, which would be the proper time according to our rules to start such a debate.

That would give me time to look into the question of procedure. I know that what we are doing looks much the same as when we refer the subject matter of a bill to a committee. But I am not sure whether the method should not be to move that the matter be referred to a committee and have the debate on that motion of reference, rather than an inquiry which launches a debate here, which would precede the other one. I am a little worried that maybe the idea is to avoid questions or shorten the debate that we would have if and when the proposed resolution finally reached us. These are all matters that I want to think about in consultation with those on this side. If it were proposed that the motion be put next Tuesday, this would give us time to form an opinion. We may not have any objection to having the inquiry proceed on Tuesday. By then we will have had time to consider the matter.

Senator Perrault: We on this side would certainly like to accommodate the wishes of the opposition—

Senator Asselin: For once.

Senator Perrault: —in discharging the important responsibilities they hold. For that reason I give notice that on Tuesday next I will call the attention of the Senate to the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada," tabled in the Senate, Monday, October 6, 1980.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Might I ask the Leader of the Government, since I presume he will be the lead speaker for the government on this motion, whether, when the matter comes up, he will give a detailed explanation of the reasons why the government is proposing the action it suggests with regard to the powers of the Senate concerning amendment of the Constitution? It is significant that neither in the speech made by the Minister of Justice in the other place the other day, nor in the documents that were put out by the government explaining the constitutional proposal, was there any real reference to the rather drastic measures that the government proposes with regard to the powers of the Senate in future constitutional amendments.

Senator Perrault: The suggestion advanced by the honourable senator will certainly be given consideration.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

IRAQI-IRANIAN WAR

INQUIRY WHETHER CANADA HAS TAKEN INITIATIVE TO EFFECT CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether this government has taken any initiatives to bring about a cessation of hostilities between the State of Iraq and the Islamic Republic of Iran?

● (1420)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, given the many other challenges confronting Canadians, I am aware of no direct initiative on our part to intervene as the mediator of the Middle East dispute. Indeed, I have no information at hand to suggest that Canada's services, which have been requested in past disputes, have been requested in this instance.

Some questions have been asked about the Iran-Iraq conflict by many Canadians. Canada supported the Security Council Resolution of September 28, which calls for a mediated settlement. If it continues, war could become a drawn-out stalemate, entailing further damage to the Iraqi and Iranian economies, disrupting oil supplies and destabilizing the Middle East region. It is especially important that shipping through the Strait of Hormuz not be disrupted, a point emphasized by the Prime Minister of Iraq in New York on October 1.

Tanker traffic is moving fairly normally and the threat of closure of the strait has receded somewhat, but only an end to hostilities will guarantee that the war does not spread.

More specifically with respect to the inquiry by the Honourable Senator Bosa, there is no obvious role for Canada in mediating a ceasefire, as it is the view of the government that the Islamic countries are best placed to effect this particular kind of initiative.

There are only 25 to 30 Canadians remaining in Iraq, including the press and six embassy staff, and about the same number are in Iran. To the best of our knowledge, all are well and safe.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

ACCEPTANCE OF RESOLUTION BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he can confirm the reports of a statement attributed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, to the effect that the Right Honourable Margaret Thatcher, Prime Minister of Great Britain, has assured him that any resolution of the Parliament of Canada would be accepted by the British government without objection.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, information has been sought with respect to the conversation between the Honourable Mark MacGuigan and the Honourable John Roberts and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Great Britain. However, I have no document before me which would serve to provide enlightenment on the question posed by the Leader of the Opposition.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, a supplementary question. Is it true that this meeting between the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the two Canadian delegates lasted only four minutes?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators will recall that a similar question was posed yesterday. Certain information has been requested, but I am not aware that anyone held a stopwatch in order to time that particular conversation. An inquiry has gone forward.

Senator Steuart: It does not take long to say "yes."

Senator Flynn: When are the ministers returning to Canada?

Senator Perrault: It is my understanding that they are now back safely on Canadian soil.

PARLIAMENTARY AMENDMENT OF PROPOSED CONSTITUTION ACT, 1980

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question in further reference to the putative resolution from both houses of Parliament. After all of the discussion yesterday, and discussions elsewhere, may I ask the Leader of the Government if it is his view that the deliberations of the houses, whether in committee or in the full house in each case, could in effect alter the terms of the said resolution?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Prime Minister, in his public statements, has indicated that proposals for constructive changes and amendments will be given serious consideration by the government. It is felt by the government that there is real merit in having a highly qualified parliamentary committee made up of representatives of the Senate and of the House of Commons direct detailed attention to all of the provisions of what are very important and historic proposals. The attitude of the government throughout the process, I assure you, will be very forthcoming.

● (1425)

Senator Macquarrie: May I also ask, in recalling that this is a parliamentary action, a joint resolution of Parliament, and accepting the idea, as surely we must, that substantial changes may be made by those parliamentary bodies, was it not considered perhaps premature for the ministers to present a document to Her Majesty and to the Prime Minister in London before Parliament had, in fact, given it final form?

Senator Perrault: The attitutde of the government, honourable senators, is simply this. Her Majesty the Queen, because of her great interest in the subject of the Canadian Constitution and her role as Queen of Canada, has the undeniable right to be kept fully informed and has the right to receive constitutional information and should receive progress reports. Indeed, I suggest that it would be unseemly and wrong if the government were not to keep Her Majesty fully advised of events as they occur with respect to the proposal to patriate the Constitution. It is certainly not out of the question that other visits may be made to Britain by government ministers during the course of the next few weeks.

I would remind honourable senators that prior to this time there have been contacts with representatives of the British government. Surely this process of apprising Her Majesty and representatives of the British government of constitutional developments as they occur constitutes sound parliamentary practice as well as good manners.

LANGUAGE RIGHTS IN PROPOSED CONSTITUTION ACT, 1980

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have another question concerning the document which has been the subject of questions up to now.

I understand that in the proposed charter submitted to the premiers at the conference at the beginning of September it was mentioned that the right of usage of the French and English languages would be applicable to the provinces of New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba. In the proposal now before the other place, and the document which has been tabled here, this reference has been withdrawn and there is no mention of New Brunswick or Ontario. There is only a reference to section 133 of the B.N.A. Act, which, of course, continues in force, and to section 23 of the Statutes of Manitoba. Can we have an explanation of this? Is this a bargaining point between Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Davis?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to speak to that point more fully when, God willing, the debate takes place. But the intent of the proposal is to ensure that, where numbers warrant, minority language education shall be available in all provinces.

Senator Flynn: I know that. My question is about linguistic rights and the use of the French or the English language in the legislatures of New Brunswick and Ontario. This was in the proposal as submitted to the conference, and has been removed from the present proposal.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I take that inquiry as notice? Detailed information will be sought and perhaps a reply incorporated in my speech on Tuesday.

AIRLINES

SALE OF NORDAIR SHARES—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, Senator Olson, concerning the current situation with respect to the sale of Nordair shares.

The government he represents, in 1978, I think it was, decided to turn over the shares of Nordair to Air Canada with the view to privatizing that corporation a year later.

When we were in power, we had made the same decision. Of course, the then Minister of Transport had meetings and consultations to see how the federal government would sell to the private sector the Nordair shares held by Air Canada.

We know that different groups met to make proposals to the government and that apparently the present Minister of Transport, the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, had made the decision to sell the shares of Nordair to Quebecair and other partners from Ontario and Quebec who had joined Quebecair.

We are told now that all that has been shelved, that after receiving the comments and objections of other groups of businessmen from Quebec and Ontario, Mr. Pepin has decided to let the thing die and no longer maintain the decision to sell the shares of Nordair to private interests, and that Air Canada is going to hold on to the shares it has in Nordair. There is no longer any talk of selling the Nordair interests to private groups.

This matter raises great financial difficulties among certain groups from both Ontario and Quebec who had joined together to purchase the shares of Nordair.

In view of that ambiguous situation, could the minister make a ministerial statement at a later sitting and tell us what is the current position of his government and of the Minister of Transport concerning the sale of Nordair?

• (1430)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take the question or certain of its aspects as notice. I should like to say, however, that I appreciate the honourable senator's recalling that the action taken by the government, when he was in office, to put together a proposal for the disposition of Nordair was followed in exactly the same manner by this government.

His intimation that the Minister of Transport had in fact reached a decision as to the sale of that airline is something I would not like to speculate on. Whether he can read the minister's mind, I do not know, but there was no public announcement of any such decision—at least not to my knowledge.

In any event, I will look into the matter and determine whether the minister is ready to make a definitive statement on the present status, or, indeed, whether there are negotiations still under way.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STATEMENT RE MEMORANDUM OF SETTLEMENT OF STRIKE OF CLERICAL AND REGULATORY EMPLOYEES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to make a statement on the status of the federal government clerks. A similar statement is also being made in the other place this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: The Honourable the President of the Treasury Board has announced details of the memorandum of settlement which was signed last night by the Board as employer and the union representing the federal government clerks.

The union has agreed to recommend the settlement to its members. If the agreement is ratified, employees will receive in the first year a 10 per cent wage increase retroactive to November 12, 1979. In addition, employees earning less than $15,000 a year will receive a lump sum payment equalling the difference between 10 per cent of their salary and $1,500.

In the second year of the agreement, employees will receive a 9 per cent increase effective November 12, 1980, and a further 4 per cent on May 12 of 1981.

● (1435)

Over the life of the agreement, the average wage for employees in the group will increase to $15,980 from $12,815.

Included in the new agreement is a family-related leave and benefits package which provides a maternity benefit as well as paid and unpaid leave to permit employees to meet family needs.

Employees subject to disciplinary action will receive notice of discipline from their departments. A special joint review committee is being established to review disciplinary action related to the strike. Employees can have their case reviewed by the committee or they may follow the normal grievance procedure with redress to third party adjudication. Where the joint review teams cannot agree on the appropriateness of the disciplinary action, the case will be referred to a special mediator arbitrator appointed by the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

The President of the Treasury Board has stated, however, that no amnesty has been granted, partial or otherwise. Those who have broken the law must face the consequences, subject only to careful review of the circumstances in individual cases.

The minister has appended a personal statement:

> I believe that we have achieved a settlement which is both fair to our employees and to the taxpayers of Canada—one which avoided the costly precedent of earlier union demands for reduced hours of work and a cost-of-living clause.

He added:

[Senator Olson.]

> I also wish to thank Mr. Jacob Finkelman for his invaluable assistance as a special mediator in our last round of negotiations.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Leader of the Government in a position to tell us the difference between the settlement and what was offered before the strike began?

Senator Perrault: That information is not immediately available, but it will be provided.

Senator Flynn: I consider it very important to find that out. If I understood the details correctly, there is an increase of 22 per cent over two years.

Senator Perrault: It is 10 per cent the first year.

Senator Flynn: Then there is a 9 per cent increase and a further 4 per cent increase—

Senator Perrault: Running into the following year.

Senator Flynn: That is 22 per cent over two years?

Senator Perrault: Two and a half years.

Senator Flynn: Would that be the equivalent of the COLA clause?

Senator Perrault: It is not the equivalent of the COLA clause. Of course, it is impossible to predict the rate of inflation. Hopefully the government's policies will result in a reduction in the inflation rate.

Senator Flynn: You may be paying more.

Senator Perrault: May I suggest, honourable senators, that this statement be read and if there are any further questions next week, we shall be pleased to provide the information.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENTS—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I have raised this point of order before and I come back to it today. In the other place, the practice is as follows: When a ministerial statement has been prepared in advance, the opposition receives a copy of the statement. This gives enough time to examine the statement, and the opposition can afterwards make its comments.

Today the Leader of the Government has read a ministerial statement which we believe to be important, as it concerns the security of a great number of government employees. We did not receive a copy of this statement. This means that we cannot even reply to it. The Leader of the Opposition must fish for information on certain details which we do not have.

In this case, I believe that we cannot allow the Leader of the Government to continue his statement unless he sends us a copy so that we may examine it and comment on what it contains.

We represent a sector of the population. We are entitled to express the opinion of these people. I believe that the practice followed in the other place should have been established here a long time ago. It is the second time that I rise on this same point of order.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): In no way can I disagree with the statement made by the honourable senator. Of course, he is perfectly correct. All that can be said is that the statement came in just shortly after we commenced our proceedings this afternoon, and an endeavour should always be made to accommodate the Leader of the Opposition in the manner suggested by the honourable senator.

I will have a copy made immediately for the use of the Leader of the Opposition in his important role, and we will attempt to establish those procedures which will always assure the Leader of the Opposition that privilege.

Honourable senators, unless there are further remarks on the postal settlement—

Senator Flynn: The clerks' settlement.

Senator Perrault: Of course, the clerks' settlement. I certainly don't wish to anticipate any further events.

Senator Frith: It is a new policy. We settle them before they arise.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

FEDERAL AID FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TRADE AND CONVENTION CENTRES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on July 14, 1980, Senator Roblin asked whether the Honourable Charles Lapointe, Minister of State for Small Businesses, responded to a letter from the mayor of the City of Winnipeg, dated June 11, 1980.

The answer is that he did so, on August 1, 1980.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

IMPORTATION OF AUTOMOBILES FROM JAPAN

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on July 15 the Honourable Senator Walker asked whether the Canadian government had had any discussion with the United States government with respect to possible joint action limiting the importation of Japanese cars into Canada and the United States.

The answer to this question is that the level of Japanese automotive imports into North America is a matter of concern to the Government of Canada. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has held in-depth discussions on this matter with Governor Askew, the United States Special Trade Representative. The nature of the Japanese penetration differs between the United States and Canadian markets. In terms of Japanese units sold, the number has risen steadily in the United States since late 1978. In Canada the number declined significantly in 1979 from 1978 levels and is only now approaching 1978 levels. The situations facing the United States and Canada are different and, in that context, joint action might be inappropriate. The situation is regularly reviewed in close consultation with United States authorities and appropriate action will be taken if necessary.

A major purpose of the visit of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to Japan in August was to indicate that the government's preferred response to the present situation is to have an indication of increasing Canadian content in the Japanese cars sold in North America or worldwide. As such, Industry Trade and Commerce recently sent a mission to Japan to follow up on the minister's trip. The progress made by the Japanese motor vehicle manufacturers and parts companies towards increasing their Canadian content will play a large part in the government's decision.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, October 14, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER—AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND FÉDÉRATION DES FRANCOPHONES HORS QUÉBEC—CORRECTION OF OFFICIAL REPORT

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, if I may, I would like to make a correction in Hansard. It is not a correction in respect of anything I am reported to have said, but, rather, something that the Leader of the Government is reported to have said on Monday evening in answer to a question from me concerning negotiations with the Fédération des francophones hors Québec.

At page 802 of Hansard the leader is reported as saying to me, in part:

> The honourable senator will remember no doubt that this type of suggestion had been favoured by his government during the electoral period in illicit votes from certain francophone circles outside Quebec—

I think what the minister intended to say—and the French language Hansard bears this out—was:

> —during the electoral period to elicit votes from certain francophone circles—

I wish to say that I find one version as offensive and insulting as the other as to the substance, but I am sure that the honourable the minister would want to be accurately quoted by Hansard. The agreement in question was signed by the Honourable David MacDonald with the Fédération des francophones hors Québec after considerable negotiations initiated at the instance of the Fédération, and not for the rather unworthy motives that are ascribed to him and to us by the minister.

Senator Perrault: I want to thank the honourable senator for bringing this error in spelling to the attention of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: And the other error, too.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA REFERENCE CASE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, July 10, the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Smith calling the attention of the Senate to the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights (the British Columbia Reference case), (1967) Supreme Court Reports, 792, and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, and submitting that it does not decide the ownership of minerals found off the shores of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am glad to have this opportunity to speak to the inquiry of Senator Smith on the application of the British Columbia Reference case to his native province of Nova Scotia.

Honourable senators will remember that Senator Smith's intervention was directed to a very important question. In the remarks I am about to make I intend first to comment on Senator Smith's intervention, giving my analysis of what I understood to be its logic and scheme, and the conclusion it led to. I then propose to raise a question as to part of that intervention. Finally, I propose to make a suggestion as to where I think another solution lies. In doing this I shall not be disagreeing very substantially with what Senator Smith had to say.

It will be recalled that the main purpose of Senator Smith's inquiry was to discuss and expose his understanding of the application of the Supreme Court reference on the province of British Columbia to the province of Nova Scotia relating to the subject of offshore mineral rights. In the last two or three years the question of the rights of certain provinces to mineral resources in the continental shelf and in the offshore area has been an important one for Canadians everywhere. Whether or not a Canadian lives in a province that has offshore mineral rights, he is still concerned as to the ownership of those offshore rights; as to whether they belong to, or need to be shared with, all the citizens of Canada, or whether they fall into the category of exclusively provincial resources.

Let me commence by saying that the provinces own the resources within their boundaries. Perhaps I can be permitted a brief footnote to say that there does, at the present time, again seem to be some misunderstanding about the constitutional proposals now before this house and the other place on that question. With respect, I think there is no question about that, and there is nothing in the present constitutional proposals that suggests there be any change in the question of provincial ownership of resources within provincial boundaries.

[Senator Murray.]

The question that has become such a lively one in Canada—and that has already been a lively one in the United States and Australia—is: What about offshore mineral rights? The specific inquiry centres on the subject of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on the question of ownership of offshore mineral rights as the decision applies to the province of British Columbia.

What Senator Smith does in a scholarly and carefully reasoned analysis is, first, to examine the principles established in the British Columbia case, and then to examine their application to the province of Nova Scotia.

The first point he makes is that the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the British Columbia Reference case clearly does not automatically apply to the province of Nova Scotia. The question is: What principles established in that case might or might not apply to the province of Nova Scotia? In an intervention I made a year or so ago in the debate on the Speech from the Throne of the former government I indicated that, in my opinion, there is clearly a good question as to whether or not the British Columbia Reference case applies to Nova Scotia, and that there is perhaps an even stronger reason to doubt its application to the province of Newfoundland.

Senator Smith then deals with the two branches of the British Columbia Reference case. In essence, what the Supreme Court of Canada said in that case was that offshore mineral rights in the province of British Columbia did not belong to the province of British Columbia, but to Canada. That was so for two basic reasons. The first reason is that the definition of the limits of the province of British Columbia, when it entered Confederation, did not include the territorial sea or continental shelf. It defined the limits of British Columbia on the west as being the Pacific Ocean. The second reason is—and I will come back to the first reason again—that offshore mineral rights in British Columbia did not belong to the province of British Columbia because the law with reference to ownership of mineral rights on the continental shelf was a relatively new question of international law and was, essentially, an issue of international status. Because British Columbia had never had the status of a nation in the international sense, it could not be said to have these offshore mineral rights. Those are the two reasons—first, because of the definition of limits and, second, because of international status.

If honourable senators would read again Senator Smith's intervention, which is to be found in Debates of the Senate, July 10, 1980, at page 613, they will see that Senator Smith, in a scholarly and effective way, completely disposes of the first point by distinguishing Nova Scotia's history and British Columbia's history. He makes it very clear that the limits of the province of Nova Scotia when it entered Confederation were broader than those of British Columbia, and not only that but that Nova Scotia had been exercising rights over these undersea or maritime properties for well over 100 years, before 1867.

The Supreme Court of Canada in the British Columbia case said it did not quarrel with the fact that the Parliament of the United Kingdom could have given British Columbia rights beyond their territorial borders and extending under the sea, but it had not done so. What Senator Smith sets out to prove, and, in my respectful view, does prove very clearly, is that the United Kingdom Parliament did give Nova Scotia such rights. Nova Scotia had such rights prior to Confederation. Nova Scotia had exercised those rights prior to Confederation and, therefore, that part of the ratio decidendi of the British Columbia Reference case did not apply to Nova Scotia.

However, on the second point, that is the question of the exercise of international rights, Senator Smith said—and I go back to the first point to illustrate the context—at page 617:

> As to the first of these assertions—that is, that the legislation is not under the enumerated heads of section 92 of the B.N.A. Act—

That was another way of expressing the fact that the province of British Columbia did not have the rights under section 92, and did not have those rights because it had never been given jurisdiction in the territorial limitations that extend under the sea.

> —that cannot be applicable to Nova Scotia whose claim is not based upon enumeration in section 92 but upon rights existing before Confederation that were brought into Confederation as a right of Nova Scotia, and specifically preserved by the British North America Act.

Senator Smith made that point very clearly before by pointing out that there is a section of the British North America Act that says the limits shall be the limits existing at that time. He has proved, up to that time, that those limits extend beyond the shoreline.

Senator Smith went on to say:

> As to the statement that a sovereign state has to negotiate with another sovereign state, and that Canada is a sovereign state, I recognize, of course, that Canada is now the sovereign state. There is no doubt, of course, that Nova Scotia was, to the extent that a Crown colony could be, a state, colony or province—call it what you will—that had specific jurisdiction allotted to it by the British Crown in respect of many things, including the very things we are talking about now.

In my respectful submission, honourable senators, this is not proved in Senator Smith's intervention as carefully and as thoroughly as his previous point was proved.

By way of summary, on the first branch of the Supreme Court case, namely the question of where the limits of the province are, Senator Smith has, in my view, proved beyond a doubt that Nova Scotia had much larger rights when it entered Confederation than British Columbia. But he does not document this second point of international status in the way he documented the first point. In fairness to him, he introduced his inquiry by saying that he wanted to divide it into two parts, the first part dealing with a careful examination of the British Columbia Reference case, and the second part by way of another inquiry that is on the order paper at the present time as Inquiry No. 3. I look forward to his proving this second point as well as he proved his first point, by the introduction of further interesting historical material about the province of Nova Scotia.

Honourable senators, I also suggest that if there is a doubt—and until I hear further from Senator Smith, I am of the opinion that there is—the legal and constitutional position of Nova Scotia lies somewhere between that of British Columbia and Newfoundland. In my view, there is no doubt that Newfoundland would be able to satisfy a court that not only did it have these extended limits but also that it had an internationally recognized government prior to entering Confederation. It, then, is able to satisfy both points. Perhaps Senator Smith will be able to satisfy us on the second point when he proceeds to give us more information.

In the meantime, I wish to recall to honourable senators that these legal questions arose in the United States, but that country did not take up too much time in solving them. The famous Truman declaration was, "These rights belong to the United States," and the national government took them. They made some settlements with the states later, but that was their position. In Australia the very same question arose: Do these rights belong to the federal state or to the individual states? That country came up with a settlement.

Briefly, the history of the settlement provisions in Canada was that an offer was made by the previous Liberal government to share them, as I recall, in the ratio of 75:25. The former Conservative government embarked on a plan of settling the matter—if you can call it a settlement—by giving 100 per cent to the provinces. There was a letter of agreement from Prime Minister Clark to Premier Peckford giving Newfoundland 100 per cent, and then letters were on their way to the other provinces in an endeavour to work out similar agreements.

The latest chapter in this important and interesting drama is, of course, the offer that was made at the September constitutional conference when the present Liberal government suggested settling the offshore mineral rights question by giving all provinces with offshore mineral resources 100 per cent of the revenue until they become a "have" versus a "have not" province. The wording was to the effect that they would get 100 per cent of the revenue as long as they were receiving equalization payments. When they were no longer in receipt of equalization payments, a formula for sharing would take effect.

In summary, honourable senators, I compliment Senator Smith sincerely on a serviceable, useful and helpful intervention on the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the British Columbia Reference case because it is, in my respectful opinion, a valuable reference document for this chamber and for the country on the question of the application of that decision to the province of Nova Scotia. I thank him as a senator and as a Canadian for giving us that document. He has done the research and has presented it eloquently. I await, as I mentioned, what he will say on the second branch of its application. That is to be continued, and we all look forward to hearing another scholarly presentation.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a question of Senator Frith? In his commentary, was he expressing the views of the government or of the Minister of Justice? That is my first question. I did not have the occasion to read the decision of the Supreme Court in the British Columbia Reference case—not in detail anyway—but he said that the main argument of the court was that the territorial limits of British Columbia were defined as being limited by the Pacific Ocean; therefore, the mineral rights would have remained the property of the British Crown. When did the British Crown transfer these rights to the crown in the right of Canada?

Senator Frith: On the first question, no, I am not expressing the opinions of the government or the Minister of Justice. In fact, I am not expressing anyone's opinions except my own.

Senator Flynn: Thank you.

Senator Frith: Those legal opinions may be worth exactly what you are paying for them, namely, nothing.

On the second point, the court did not break it down into those divisions, as I remember—that is, it did not say the resources belong to the Crown and, therefore, we have to get them back to Canada. It said once that limit was defined, then because Canada was a sovereign state, and because the limits were not included for British Columbia, therefore the offshore mineral rights belonged to the sovereign state of Canada. The court did not go, as I recall it, through the separate step of saying that the British Crown had to grant it to the federal government. That is my recollection of the case.

Senator Flynn: They didn't give it; they kept it.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: 1870.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I just wish to express, very briefly, my appreciation of the kind words of Senator Frith. I am not accustomed to such kindly words from any source, and it is a great comfort for me to hear them.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): There is an extra chair over here.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 14, at 8 p.m.

INTRODUCTION

On April 29, 1980 the Senate authorized the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to examine and report on the subject-matter of Bill C-12, intituled, "An Act respecting bankruptcy and insolvency" in advance of such Bill coming before the Senate. Since that date your Committee has received written submissions from the interested parties listed in Schedule "A" to this Report. In addition to such written submissions, the parties listed in Schedule "B" attached hereto have made oral submissions to your Committee.

Bill C-12 is the successor to a series of bills which have been tabled in Parliament for the purpose of replacing the Bankruptcy Act, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and the Winding Up Act in respect of insolvent companies. Parliament either prorogued or dissolved before any of the bills could be passed.

In 1975, The subject-matter of Bill C-60, An Act respecting bankruptcy and insolvency, the original bill, was studied and examined by your Committee. Hearings were held and submissions were received from a number of professional and business organizations. On December 11th, 1975, your Committee submitted its report on Bill C-60 to the Senate. The report recommended 140 changes in the bill. The subsequent bills, including Bill C-12, have incorporated a very large number of the recommendations and most of the problem areas in Bill C-60 have been rectified. However, your Committee has received submissions that Bill C-12 does not provide satisfactory protection to employees whose employer goes bankrupt, leaving claims for wages unpaid. This issue has dominated the hearings before your Committee.

WAGE CLAIMS

Bill C-60 provided that in the event of a bankruptcy a claim for wages, up to a maximum of $2,000.00 would be entitled to be paid in full out of the assets of the bankrupt in priority to the claims of all secured creditors. Your Committee agreed that employees of a bankrupt company should be paid promptly after a bankruptcy has occurred. However, it was of the opinion that this result could most effectively be achieved by the creation of a government administered fund under the authority of the Bankruptcy Act out of which unpaid wages of employees could be paid forthwith after the bankruptcy. In its report your Committee recommended deletion of those provisions of Bill C-60 that provide for the claims of wage earners having priority over the claims of all secured creditors. This part of your Committee's recommendation has been adopted in Bill C-12 but no provision has been made for a wage earners protection fund.

As a result Bill C-12 maintains the same priority for claims of wage earners as the present Bankruptcy Act. It provides the secured creditors are entitled to realize the assets of the bankrupt subject to their security. If there is a surplus after the debt owing to the secured creditor is paid in full, the preferred creditors are paid in the order of priority set out in Section 107 of the present Bankruptcy Act. Paragraph 265(4)(e) of Bill C-12 provides that an employee is entitled to a preferred claim for payment of unpaid wages to a maximum amount of $2,000.00 for arrears of wages and an additional $500.00 for pension plan and other employee benefits. Under Bill C-12 the preferred claim of the wage earner would be subordinate to the claims of secured creditors. If there are insufficient assets of the bankrupt to satisfy the claims of secured creditors the wage earners will not be paid. Your Committee is of the opinion that this result is unsatisfactory.

There have been three alternative solutions suggested to remedy this problem:

1. The granting to the wage earner of a statutory priority for arrears of wages that would rank in priority to the claims of all secured creditors ("Super Priority").

2. The granting to the wage earner of a statutory priority for arrears of wages that would rank in priority to the claims of the secured creditors holding security on the current assets of the bankrupt ("Modified Priority"). Such current assets would consist of cash, temporary investments, inventory and receivables provided that such priority would only extend over receivables which have been created by the supply of goods or services.

3. The creation of a Wage Earners Protection Fund out of which the claims of employees for unpaid wages would be paid immediately after a bankruptcy has occurred.

Each of these alternatives must be considered in order to determine whether the following objectives are achieved:

A. Certainty of payment to the wage earner.
B. Promptness of payment to the wage earner.
C. Ease and simplicity of administration.
D. Maintenance of the ability of a borrower to obtain financing for his business operations.

SUPER PRIORITY

Super Priority as proposed in Bill C-60 does not achieve the objectives set out above. There is no absolute certainty that the wages owing by the bankrupt will be paid. The assets of the bankrupt may not be of sufficient value to pay the wages. In addition, sophisticated lenders may stipulate that their loans be made to an associated holding company which owns all of the valuable assets, leaving no assets available in the operating company to pay arrears of wages.

It is also possible that there may be a significant delay in the payment of the claims of wage earners. The payment of such claims may be delayed until the assets of the bankrupt are sold. In many bankruptcies the realization of the assets of the bankrupt may extend over a lengthy period of time. It has been proposed that the trustee of the bankrupt estate should be empowered to borrow funds for the purpose of paying the claims of wage earners. However, the assets of a bankrupt may not be readily convertible into cash and a lender may be very reluctant to loan money. The arrangements to borrow sufficient funds to pay the arrears of wages may take an extended period of time during which the lender satisfies itself as to the realizable value of the assets.

Serious difficulties will arise in the administration of the Super Priority proposal. The most serious of which will be the allocation of the burden among the secured creditors of the bankrupt. Sub-clause 238(6) of Bill C-60 proposed that the burden of payment of the wage claims should be allocated by dividing the total of the current fair values of the security interests to which each property is subject by the total of the current fair values of the security interests to which all such properties of the estate are subject and multiplying the quotient by the total of the claims for wages.

How is the fair value of a security interest determined? Is it the amount that may be realized by the secured creditor? In the case of the collection of accounts receivable or the enforcement of a mechanics lien it is very difficult to determine the amount which may be realized. There are many different types of security interests such as real estate taxes, mortgages on land, mortgages or charges on chattels, general assignments of book debts, a specific assignment of an account receivable such as a direction given to an owner by a contractor to pay a portion of the balance owing on a contract to a supplier of materials, mechanics liens filed by unpaid suppliers of material or labour used in the construction of a building, possessory liens of a repair man or a carrier, purchase money securities such as conditional sales contracts held by the vendors of equipment to the bankrupt, leases used for financing purposes, warehouse receipts, pledges of documents of title and fixed and floating charges covering all the property and assets of the bankrupt. The allocation of the burden of paying the claims of wage earners among the various creditors holding security interests previously mentioned is an almost impossible task. The courts will be clogged with cases attempting to determine the respective priorities of various classes of secured creditors and with respect to the claims for wage earners. Provincial legislation which has attempted to provide for priority for wage claims has already resulted in extensive litigation which include two recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Sub-clause 238(5) of Bill C-60 gave the trustee of the bankrupt estate the right to borrow funds for the purpose of paying the claims of the wage earners but it did not set out whether the liability to repay these funds is jointly imposed on all secured creditors or whether each secured creditor is separately liable for repayment of his share. What happens if the asset is sold and the amount owing to the lender is not repaid? Will the lender be entitled to take legal proceedings against the secured creditor who has sold the asset and not paid his share of the wages? Will other secured creditors be liable for the amount not paid by the defaulting secured creditor? What happens if the amount realized from the sale of an asset subject to the security interest given to the lender is less than the amount of money borrowed to pay wages? In many cases such problems may not arise. However, from time to time they will occur and Bill C-60 made no attempt to solve them. This is understandable, since they are extremely difficult and complicated problems.

The creation of a Super Priority imposes unexpected burdens on secured creditors. A vendor of a warehouse may sell the property and take back a first mortgage. The purchaser may intend to use the building as a warehouse and does so with very few employees. However, the property may be resold to a labour intensive business which ultimately goes bankrupt. Should the unpaid vendor of the building be expected to bear the burden of payment of the unpaid wages? A manufacturer may supply equipment to a business and retain a purchase money security interest for the unpaid balance of the purchase price. Should such a manufacturer be required to pay part of the unpaid wages of the bankrupt? Super Priority as proposed would impose a similar burden on a subcontractor such as an electrician who may file a mechanics lien for amounts owing to him by a contractor. A garage man who has repaired a truck owned by the bankrupt could be required to bear a portion of the burden for payment of the wages. The tentacles of the Super Priority proposal reach into many areas and will create many complications.

Super Priority will impair or reduce the credit that is available to a labour intensive industry. If Super Priority is enacted into law a lender who normally advances against fixed assets such as buildings and equipment will take into account the possibility of wages being unpaid in the event of a bankruptcy before determining the amount of credit to be extended. Your Committee remains convinced that Super Priority is not the proper method for granting wage earners the protection they deserve.

MODIFIED PRIORITY

The proposal of Modified Priority has problems similar to the proposal of Super Priority. Under the Modified Priority there is even less certainty that the wage claims will be paid. The wage claims could only be paid out of the current assets. It is possible that the bankrupt company could have very few current assets or that the realizable value of the current assets would be very small. This could be the case in respect of a construction company.

Most bankrupt contractors have very little inventory on hand at the time of bankruptcy since their suppliers have usually stopped shipping materials. The collection of accounts receivable may also be very difficult since there are frequently large claims by the owner for damages suffered as a result of the non-completion of the contract and the necessity to bring in another contractor to complete the job. There may also be a greater delay in payment of the wage claims. After a bankruptcy, accounts receivable are difficult to collect for many reasons, including the fact that there may be no party available to supply warranty service. In addition, an inventory of partially manufactured goods may be difficult to sell at a reasonable price. A lender may be reluctant to advance funds on the security of accounts receivable and inventory for the purpose of paying the wage claims.

There will be fewer problems relating to administration of the Modified Priority proposal since in most cases there will be only one or two creditors holding security on such assets. However, there are problems which would have to be solved. Would the claim for wages have priority over an unpaid supplier of inventory who retains a purchase money interest in the inventory which was sold to the bankrupt? Why should the priority be restricted to accounts receivable created by the supply of goods or services? If money is received from the operation of a business and then loaned out on the security of a mortgage on land, should not the wage claim have priority over that type of account receivable? Should a wage claim have priority to the proceeds of an account receivable which has been specifically assigned to the secured creditor and notice of assignment has been given to the account debtor at the time of the assignment? This is normally what is done when a contractor gives a direction to the owner to pay a portion of the balance owing on a contract to a supplier. How would a normal factoring arrangement be affected by the Modified Priority Proposal? Would the factor rank in priority to the wage earner?

Some of these administrative problems could be avoided if the Modified Priority Proposal only applied to the claims of a creditor who held a security interest on all or substantially all the inventory or accounts receivable of the bankrupt. Such a proposal could be similar to but more comprehensive than the priority over the realization from inventory given to wage claims by Section 88(5)(a) of the present Bank Act. The provisions of the present Bank Act are insufficient protection for wage earners because they only apply to security on inventory created by Section 88 of the Bank Act and do not apply to security on inventory created by other types of security agreements such as floating charge debentures or to security interests in inventory held by lenders not governed by the Bank Act.

The problems under the Modified Priority Proposal that wage earners may not be guaranteed payment or that payment of their claims may be delayed could be solved by the Government undertaking to loan sufficient funds to the trustee of the bankrupt estate to pay the wage claims. In that event the Government would acquire a security interest on the current assets ranking in priority to the claims of creditors who hold security on such assets. The Government would then receive the funds advanced when the current assets were realized. This solution does not overcome the administrative problems relating to allocation, but under the Modified Priority Proposal the allocation problems are much less than under the Super Priority Proposal. There are still problems relating to the reduction of credit available to the labour intensive industry as were outlined in the comments on the Super Priority Proposal. Your Committee does not recommend the adoption of the Modified Priority Proposal.

WAGE EARNERS PROTECTION FUND

Your Committee believes that the best protection for wage earners would be achieved by the establishment of a Wage Earners Protection Fund from which wage claims of unpaid employees of a bankrupt company would be paid. In order to accomplish this an Act should be passed which should be intituled, The Wage Earners Protective Fund Act. Alternatively, the Wage Earners Protection Fund could be constituted by amending Bill C-12. However, the assets of the Fund will not form part of the assets of any bankrupt estate and the Fund will rank as a preferred creditor of a bankrupt estate for the amount of the wage claims it has paid. Also the administration of the Fund will be completely independent from the administration of bankrupt estates. Accordingly, it would be preferable to have the Fund established by a statute independent of the Bankruptcy Act.

The Wage Earners Protection Fund would be self-sustaining and maintained by monthly contributions from all employers in Canada, based on the number of employees. Contributions from such a large number of employers would result in modest amounts being paid per employee. The only exception to this universal rule would be that no contributions would be required from employers with fewer than six employees. However, any employee would be entitled to have his claim for wages paid out of the Fund upon the bankruptcy of the employer whether or not the employer was required to make contributions to the Fund.

The Superintendent of Bankruptcy would administer the Wage Earners Protection Fund using his district offices which are located in principal cities throughout the country. Upon a bankruptcy occurring, the trustee of the bankrupt estate would review the books and records of the bankrupt and determine the amounts, if any, owing to employees. The trustee would provide the district office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy with particulars of such claims and the amount thereof would be paid to the trustee out of the Fund. The trustee would pay each employee his claim for unpaid wages to a maximum of $2,500, the amount of his referred claim under paragraph 265(4)(e) of Bill C-12. We anticipate that such payments could be made within two weeks after the date of the bankruptcy.

The Wage Earners Protection Fund would be subrogated, to the extent of the payment, to all the rights of the employees against the bankrupt company and the directors of the bankrupt company. These rights would include the right to be subrogated to the preferred claim of the employee under paragraph 265(4)(e) of Bill C-12.

The creation of a Wage Earners Protection Fund as outlined would assure the payment of the wage claims of employees of bankrupt companies. In addition, such wage claims would be paid promptly when the money is most needed to pay current living expenses. The administration of the Fund would present no complex problems since existing administrative practices would be utilized. The trustee of the bankrupt estate would perform the same duties as those under the present Bankruptcy Act when funds are available for distribution to employees of a bankrupt company. The unnecessary time-consuming and expensive litigation resulting from problems of allocation would be avoided.

Employers would be required to remit modest amounts monthly to the Receiver-General. However, the creation of a Wage Earners Protection Fund would avoid any disruption of present commercial lending practices and would enable an employer to obtain credit without any reduction caused by the fact that claims for unpaid wages would rank in priority to the secured claims of the lenders.

The introduction of Wage Earners Protection Funds in England, France and Germany recognizes the fact that they are the best solution for the protection of the wage earner. The experience in these countries should provide a realistic estimate of the annual payments to be made in Canada to unpaid employees after taking into account the terms of each fund and the number of employees protected.

For the reasons set out above, your Committee recommends that a Wage Earners Protection Fund be established in Canada.

EXTENT AND AMOUNT OF THE WAGE PRIORITY

Paragraph 265(4)(e) of Bill C-12 provides that the extent and amount of the wage priority should be $2,000.00 for wages other than amounts for pension and other health and welfare plan contributions and $500.00 for pension and other employee benefit plan contributions. A salesman would be entitled to an additional $600.00 for disbursements incurred in respect of the business of the bankrupt.

The terminology of Clause 265(4)(e) is inconsistent in that subparagraph (i) refers to pension and "health and welfare plan contributions" while subparagraph (ii) refers to pension and "other employee benefit plan contributions". The definition of "wages" refers to "pension and other health and welfare plan contributions". Your Committee recommends that these inconsistencies should be corrected and that the term "pension and other employee benefit plan contributions" should be used both in the definition of wages and in Clause 265(4)(e). This would take into account that under the current labour bargaining regime the employer makes contributions other than pension and health and welfare plan contributions. It would also provide coverage for new types of employee benefit plan contributions which may arise in the future. There appears to be no justification for providing the two limits of $2,000.00 and $500.00. It would be more beneficial if the maximum amount of an employee's wage priority was $2,500.00, which would include all claims for wages and pension and other employee benefit plan contributions. This would simplify the administration of the bankrupt estate and the Wage Earner Protection Fund.

It has been suggested that the wage priority might be limited to wages earned during a specified period prior to the date of bankruptcy. This type of provision might prejudice an employee unfairly if the date of bankruptcy occurred a significant length of time after the wage claim arose. A provision that limits the wage priority to a maximum of two weeks or a month would produce more benefit to the high wage earner and would leave the low wage earner who may be more needy with a lower claim. Your Committee considers that the expressing of the extent of such priority in dollar terms is the most equitable basis and that limiting such priority to $2,500.00 is a reasonable balancing of the interests of all parties.

LIABILITY OF DIRECTORS FOR WAGES

Clause 188 of Bill C-12 provides that directors and former directors of a bankrupt corporation shall be personally liable, on a joint and several basis, for wages owing to employees of the bankrupt corporation. Your Committee recognizes that such a provision is necessary to ensure that, wherever possible, employees are paid. The limitation of such liability to the amount of the wage priority should continue but in view of our previous recommendation the maximum amount of such liability for wages should be increased to $2,500.00, including pension and other benefit plan contributions.

Since it is possible that for many reasons wages may not be paid through no fault on the part of a director, the provisions of subclause (3) of Clause 188 should be modified to provide that a director or former director is not liable for the unpaid wages of the employees of a bankrupt corporation if he establishes that he had reasonable grounds to believe that wages would be paid. A director or former director should not be able to avoid liability for such wages if they are paid by the Wage Earners Protection Fund and such fund should be subrogated to the rights of employees to claim such wages from a director or former director.

In addition, subclause (7) of Clause 188 should be clarified in order to provide that a former director is not liable for wages earned during the period after such former director ceases to be a director.

PAYMENTS BY BANKRUPT OUT OF AFTER-ACQUIRED INCOME

Your Committee has received a submission that Bill C-12 should be amended to provide that there should be a positive obligation imposed on the court to assess how much (if any) of the bankrupt's income should be paid over to the trustee for distribution to the creditors. Bill C-60 did not impose any obligation on a bankrupt to make payments to his creditors out of income earned after the date of bankruptcy. In its report on Bill C-60 your Committee recommended that such an obligation be imposed on the bankrupt. The subsequent bills, including Bill C-12, imposed this obligation on a bankrupt if he earns income in excess of that necessary to maintain a reasonable standard of living. Clause 215 of Bill C-12 gives the administrator the right to make such a determination in the first instance.

If the administrator makes such a determination, he has the right to file a caveat against the bankrupt, and an application may be made to the court to require the bankrupt to pay a portion of his earnings to the trustee. If a creditor is not satisfied with the decision of the administrator, an application may be made to the court to have the decision reversed.

During the hearings of your Committee it was remarked that there was no restriction upon the amount of the income earned by the bankrupt which the court may order to be vested in the trustee for distribution to the creditors pursuant to Clause 160 of Bill C-12. Your Committee recommends that such amount should not be greater than the portion of the income which could be attached under the law of the province in which the bankrupt resided. Otherwise there should be no change in the provisions of Bill C-12 relating to the obligations imposed upon a bankrupt to pay to the trustee a portion of the income earned after the date of bankruptcy.

In most cases the bankrupt does not earn income in excess of the amount required to maintain a reasonable standard of living and a compulsory court hearing in respect of each bankrupt would be an unwarranted expenditure of time and money.

ACCELERATION OR TERMINATION OF A SECURITY AGREEMENT UPON BANKRUPTCY

Clause 147(1) of Bill C-12 is designed to prevent the operation of acceleration or termination provisions in a security agreement upon the filing of a bankruptcy petition or the making of a bankruptcy order.

It has been suggested that circumstances might exist where a secured creditor might be prejudiced if he was not entitled to rely on the term of his security agreement permitting acceleration of termination in the event of bankruptcy. Your Committee recommends that the secured creditor should be permitted to apply to the court of an order permitting the exercise of the acceleration or termination provisions of the security agreement if it is established that the operation of subclause 147(1) of Bill C-12 would materially and adversely affect such creditor by reducing the amount to be realized by the secured creditor below the amount which would have been recovered under the agreement if no bankruptcy proceeding had occurred.

MISCELLANEOUS

Submissions which your Committee has received have mentioned some technical flaws in the drafting of the the bill. Your Committee recommends that the following technical amendments should be made:

1. Sub-clause 2—Definition of "claim".
The word "disputed" should be substituted for "litigious". The same substitution should be made elsewhere in the bill e.g. paragraph 74(2)(b) and sub-clause 286(6)

2. Sub-clauses 10(3) and (4)
The words "to or" should be deleted where these sub-clauses refer to a transfer to or from a debtor.

3. Sub-clause 103(3)
The words "subject to the consent of any secured creditor who has an interest in the uncompleted contract" should be inserted after the words "party to an uncompleted contract,"

4. Paragraph 105(4)(b)
This paragraph should be redrafted to read as follows: "(b) The accounts referred to in that section are payable out of monies which under the terms of the arrangement are otherwise payable to creditors".

5. Sub-clause 106(7)
This sub-clause should be amended to read as follows: "To the extent provided in the proposed arrangement clauses 168 to 185 apply with such modifications as circumstances require".

6. Sub-clauses 106.2(1)(2)(3)(4) and (5)
These sub-clauses should apply not only when a commercial arrangement is made but also after a notice of an intention or a proposed arrangement is filed. This could be accomplished by amending sub-clause 106.2(1) to read "Where a notice of intention or a proposed arrangement has been filed and a secured creditor "

In addition in sub-clause 106.2(1) the words "trustee in whom property is vested pursuant to the arrangement" should be deleted and the words "trustee who has control of the records and property of the debtor" should be substituted therefor.

7. Paragraph 117(4)(c)
The words "uncompleted contract" should be substituted for "a partly performed contract".

8. Sub-clause 197(5)
The words "by reason of the insolvency of the lessee" should be deleted.

9. Sub-clause 210(3)
This sub-clause should be amended to read as follows: "For the purposes of sub-clause (1) when the validity of all claims against an estate has been determined and, in the opinion of the registrar, all the property of an estate that may be realized without needlessly protracting the administration is realized, the estate is deemed to be fully administered.

10. Paragraphs 265(2)(c) and (d)
The reference in paragraphs (d) to sub-clause 106.1 to 106.3 is in error. These sub-clauses should be referred to in paragraph 265(2)(c).

11. Sub-clause 265(14)
This sub-clause should be amended to take into account the provisions of clause 85 of Part IV of Bill C-6 the proposed new Bank Act. That clause creates a "priority payment instrument" which if issued by or drawn on a financial institution which is a member of the proposed Canadian Payments Association is entitled to be paid in full in priority to all other claims including administration costs in the event of the bankruptcy of such financial institution.

12. Paragraph 265(14)(c) paragraph (c) of sub-clause 265(14) should be deleted since Canadian banks no longer issue notes intended for circulation in a country outside Canada and no provisions regarding such notes will be in the new Bank Act.

13. Sub-clause 286(5)
The sentence "Such an appeal shall not operate as a stay of the proceedings unless and to the extent so ordered by the court," should be added to this sub-clause.

14. Sub-clause 286(8)
This sub-clause should be amended to read as follows: "Notwithstanding sub-clause (4) where the court has made a determination pursuant to sub-clause (6) such determination shall be binding on the chairman of the meeting of creditors in respect of which such determination was made.

15. Sub-clause 407(2)
This sub-clause should be amended to read as follows: (2) "Where any person whose evidence is given under oath or by affirmation in a proceeding under this Act dies, becomes incapacitated, cannot be located or in the case of any other person with leave of the court, the evidence of such person purporting to be sealed with the seal of the court, or a copy thereof purporting to be so sealed, shall be received as evidence of the matters therein deposed".

CONCLUSION

Bill C-12 is the result of an extensive amount of effort and study by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, your Committee and many business and professional organizations. Its enactment into law has been excessively delayed. Subject to the very few changes recommended in this report Bill C-12 should become law as soon as possible. This bill represents an immeasurable improvement over the present Bankruptcy Act and it is essential that its benefits should be available to the Canadian public in the very near future.

Throughout the hearings your Committee has been assisted by our advisors Melvin C. Zwaig, C.A. and David E. Baird, Q.C. We wish to express to them our appreciation for their efforts on behalf of the Committee. We also thank the representatives of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for their assistance in this matter. Bankruptcy law involves a very delicate and proper balance of the rights of creditors, secured and unsecured, debtors and the general public. This bill is an admirable attempt to achieve such a balance after taking into account fundamental changes which have occurred in the overall credit system.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

CONSOLIDATION OF BUSINESS ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It concerns a news release emanating from his office on the series of improvements in the organization and delivery of federal government business assistance programs. While I reluctantly have to commend him for consolidating many of the programs, I feel that he is remiss in stating that there are now only 37 programs, run by ten departments, that should be consolidated. According to information that I received from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion three or four years ago, there are 159 programs, all dealing with small business, whether they be farmers or fishermen, many of which could be consolidated to avoid much waste in public expenditure. Has the minister looked into these programs, the names of which are available from his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to be able to further consolidate many of the wasteful programs, even beyond his commendable suggestion.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I want to correct a couple of things in the honourable senator's question, the first being that the main purpose of consolidating the 37 programs into five, and indeed reducing the number of departments administering those programs from 10 to 2, was for reasons even more important than eliminating the so-called waste. I do not necessarily agree with the word "waste" that my honourable friend used, because the changes were made to make it more convenient for those businesses and individuals concerned to make application for benefits under the programs.

As to the second part of the senator's question, dealing with whether or not there will be further consolidation, I am not at this date prepared to say when and indeed how many programs will be condensed—or I think "contracted" is the right word—into a smaller group. However, I can tell him that there is an ongoing assessment or evaluation made of not only the programs but the method of delivery, and certainly it is my expectation that there will be further announcements in this regard.

We did not believe it would be useful to hold up the announcement about these 37 programs into a condensation to five while we were doing further work on other programs—and indeed there are a lot of other programs, not only within the department to which my honourable friend referred but in many other government departments. I think in the press release I suggested that there were still some 200 programs in one form or another, and it would be our hope that, with further study and agreement on the part of the ministers who are now administering those programs, before long we will be able to make another announcement of further contraction of these programs.

Senator Marshall: A supplementary, honourable senators. I am pleased to hear that the minister is going to go further, but according to the list which I have, and which I would be willing to send to him, we have, for example, under the Department of Agriculture, the Farm Credit Act, the Farm Syndicates Credit Act, the Small Farm Development Program, the Fruit and Vegetable Storage Construction Assistance Program, the Crop Insurance Act and the Prairie Grain Advanced Payments Program.

Those are all under one department. I could give 10 or 12 under the Department of the Environment and 15 to 20 under the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and another 15 to 20 under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

I think it is realistic and makes common sense to review these programs so as to amalgamate them under one small agency, perhaps under the Department of Finance, to which the individuals concerned, whether they be fishermen, farmers or small businessmen, can then go.

I want to say again that I agree with the minister's thrust in this regard; I agree that he should look further into the amalgamation of these programs so as to save money and to be able to direct the help in a better fashion. As things stand now, farmers and fishermen do not know where the hell they are going, and they are frustrated because of the bureaucracy that exists in all of these programs.

Senator Olson: With the exception of the last few words that my honourable friend added, I think the way to respond to his representation is to tell him that he is now describing what we have been doing for a long time.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

MEETING OF PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he has anything to report on the meeting of the provincial premiers which took place in Toronto today.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a late report that the premiers have issued a statement. I received this information by telephone, so that my remarks do not constitute an official report or reaction from the federal government. Apparently, five of the provincial premiers have announced that they are going to take the federal government to court to challenge the validity of the proposed action. Two are undecided—I think one of the news sources described their position as "wavering,"—whatever that may mean. I understand that Premier Hatfield of New Brunswick had made no comment as of 8 o'clock this evening. I understand that Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan states that the Saskatchewan position will be announced after the federal government announces whether certain amendments will be made to the proposed draft bill which is part of the reference to Westminster.

Senator Flynn: Did he mention what the amendments were?

Senator Perrault: I do not have the wording of any reported amendments; I have only this rather brief body of information.

[Senator Marshall.]

I understand that the distinguished Premier of Ontario has stated that he fully supports the federal government's initiative. That is all I have to report.

Senator Flynn: When you mentioned "the distinguished Premier of Ontario" you should have done the same thing as Mr. Chrétien did when he spoke in Toronto last week, calling Mr. Davis and Mr. Broadbent great statesmen, because when you support the present government you are a statesman; otherwise you are a nobody.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: And when you approve like the other side does, you are trained seals. I might just mention that Senator van Roggen was the noisiest of them all.

Senator van Roggen: When was that?

Senator Flynn: Just a moment ago.

Senator van Roggen: That was Senator Austin.

Senator Flynn: I am willing to settle for that.

But speaking of going to court, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if my understanding is correct: in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in the matter of the reference last year concerning the Senate, does the government think, in light of section 44 and other sections of the proposed legislation in the resolution, that it is legal to go against the Supreme Court by going to Westminster? Does it think that Westminster can do something outside of Canada that the Parliament of Canada cannot do here? Is that the position of the government?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that is not the position of the government. The position of the government is that the measures which are, we hope, to be before a joint committee of Parliament in the very near future are both legal and appropriate to the needs of Canadians in the time in which we live. It is not the government's intention to proceed illegally in any action. It is felt that the anticipated course of action is legal.

The honourable senator mentioned earlier the reference I had made to the attitude of some of the premiers, and made a comment with respect to certain premiers who were designated as being distinguished and statesmanlike. One fact that emerges from this whole process is that it is almost impossible to determine where the Conservative Party stands. There appears to be utter division in the ranks of the Conservative Party.

● (2015)

Senator Flynn: Of course, that has nothing to do with the question.

Senator Perrault: That answers your earlier question.

Senator Flynn: When you speak of division within the Conservative Party, I should like to inquire about Mr. Ryan's position on this matter compared to that of Mr. Trudeau. Can the Honourable Leader of the Government explain that? I doubt it very much. There is not that kind of division in the Conservative Party.

In any event, it is quite clear to me that the Supreme Court said that the Senate could not be altered substantially without the consent of the provinces. But what the government is proposing in its resolution now is a substantial change, made against the will of at least half of the provinces. Do you maintain it is legal to by-pass the Supreme Court by going to Westminster, asking Westminster at one and the same time to partriate the Constitution and to solve our own problems, change our own Constitution—not simply returning it but changing the substance of our Constitution because the federal and provincial governments cannot agree?

Senator Perrault: I am sure the honourable senator, who is, I fear, a bit carried away by his own rhetoric this evening, is aware of constitutional law.

Senator Flynn: I am.

Senator Perrault: I am sure he is aware of constitutional law to the extent that he realizes that a reference or a request directed to Westminster to make certain amendments to the Constitution in no way runs contrary to the Supreme Court decision with respect to the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Perrault: To answer the previous question as to whether there is absolute unity on the part of the Conservative Party with respect to constitutional matters, including patriation, may I quote from an amendment moved by the honourable member for Edmonton East in the other place, seconded by the honourable member for Provencher, just a short while ago:

> Whereas some provinces have repeatedly refused to endorse the patriation of the Constitution of Canada from Britain, it is moved that the Parliament of Canada submit an address to Her Majesty the Queen that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom to provide for the amendment in Canada of the Constitution of Canada.

These Conservative members of Parliament moved that resolution to unanimous applause from their ranks and from other sections of the house. But it is inferred this evening that there is an unanimous view that the Constitution should not be patriated unilaterally.

Senator Flynn: Patriation alone is something quite different from the resolution before the other place. Of course, the Leader of the Government cannot understand that. But, then, we cannot ask him to be more brilliant than he can be.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: On a supplementary.

As regards amendments to the Constitution, could the Leader of the Government tell us how many senators on the other side of the house are prepared to support the government, especially on section 44 which proposes to keep the Senate out of the Constitution reform?

How many senators will follow the government on this question?

If the Leader of the Government wants to count the senators who are against this section, perhaps he will recognize that there is no unanimous consent on his side either.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators are aware, of course, that I have proposed to the Senate that we have an inquiry with respect to the documents tabled here last week; and the honourable senator in his usual eloquent fashion will be able to speak at great length on section 44 and other sections; indeed he may be able to persuade a number of people in this place and the other place that certain changes should be made. The fullest opportunity will be accorded to honourable senators to debate and set forth their views regarding this important and historic initiative by the government.

Senator Asselin: Again you did not answer my question.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ALGERIA—AID TO EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, having heard the brilliant exercise in cataloguing, categorizing and perhaps cauterizing which my leader did on certain people a while ago, I am reluctant to expose myself to his analysis; but I should like to by-pass Westminster and ask the government leader a question about Canadian aid to the sadly afflicted state of Algeria, especially in connection with the earthquake which resulted in death and destruction to the population of El Asnam.

I wish to commend the government for moving, as it did, over the weekend. Might I ask the government leader if what has been announced so far represents the totality of the Canadian contribution—to use a word which I believe his leader used last week.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have as yet no official statement from the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the terrible tragedy in Algeria. However, I hope to be able to bring that statement to the Senate tomorrow afternoon.

GRAIN

SALES TO CHINA

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board—

Senator Asselin: Did you send a notice?

Senator Buckwold: No notice.

Senator Asselin: Surprising.

Senator Buckwold: I read with interest today news of a giant grain deal being negotiated between China and the U.S.A. which would represent a sale of up to nine million tonnes of grain a year worth $1 billion per annum.

It would appear to me that the Americans are making serious inroads into a traditional Canadian market for grain, especially wheat, and I would like to have an assurance from the minister in charge of the Wheat Board that Canadian wheat and grain producers are sharing in this increased demand for grain by China which requires a much larger supply of this important commodity.

Traditionally, Canada has always been considered a prime source of supply, and I hope that we shall be able to maintain that position. I would like to have the assurance of the minister that this is the case.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, it is true that the U.S.A. has negotiated a large sale of wheat to China, a large commitment spread over a period of some years with sales up to nine million tonnes of grain per year. It is understood that this contract is worth $1 billion, but according to my calculation it is worth far more than $2 billion. It is an extremely large sale, and it certainly has an impact on Canada's export sales.

I do not wish to concern myself too much with history, but many statements have been made in this chamber and in other places pointing out that Canada has suffered in connection with its exports to the Soviet Union because of an agreement reached between the former administration and the U.S. administration limiting the sales of Canadian wheat into that market. During that period of time—this is nothing new to me, as I have said—Australia exceeded Canada's sales into that market, the United States sold record quantities into that market, and only Canadian shipments into that market were curtailed. Therefore I was pleased when the Canadian government announced some months ago that in future there would be no agreed-to limits on the sale of Canadian wheat and grains into that market.

The deal that has now been announced was negotiated by Thomas Saylor, the chief negotiator for the United States Department of Agriculture. So the negotiation was undertaken at the highest possible level by the United States. It confirmed to me something that grain people have told us many, many times, namely, that we can agree, as we have agreed, to limit our sales into one market at a given time, only to have a great effort made by the United States authorities to take up some of the sales in that market—the China market, in this instance—to which Canada might have looked forward.

Having said that, I should say that we have an agreement with China for the sale of 10.5 million tonnes of grain over a period of three years, so that we have a very large market in China, but it is obviously a good deal less than the American share of that market. I can only say—and I am pleased to be able to say it—that the Canadian Wheat Board is following a very aggressive sales effort on its own behalf, and I hope, as the weeks and months go by—though not too many months—we will be able to announce that the Canadian Wheat Board has also obtained some additional very large sales of grain to various markets of the world.

As far as our producers are concerned, they can rest assured that the Canadian Wheat Board today has markets for all of the wheat and all of the barley that they are likely to produce this year, and sales will be forthcoming for next year's production.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I am a little disturbed by the answer given by the minister. It would appear to me that the minister is just a little bit concerned about whether, in fact, Canada is going to share in this expanded market, because the same news item that I presume the minister has in front of him indicates that China's needs are expected to expand to as much as 15 million tonnes next year from the current level of 10 million tonnes. Are we going to share in that growth?

It may be true that this year we have a more modest crop—which, by the way, I am sure members of the Senate will be glad to know is much better than we expected last June and early July—but if we end up with bumper crops, as we hope we will next year, are we going to find ourselves with a glut of grain and our traditional market not expanding as it should? I think we need the reassurance of the minister that this will not happen.

Senator Argue: I cannot assure the honourable senator that there will not be a bumper crop, and I cannot assure him that if there is a bumper crop there will not be some difficulty in delivering that crop to market; but I think I can assure him that the Canadian Wheat Board will be able to sell, in the course of the next number of months, all of the grain we have been able to produce in 1980. I am, furthermore, confident, in my own mind, that the Canadian Wheat Board will be able to sell all of the grain prairie producers may be able to produce in 1981. That still, I suppose, does not answer the honourable senator's question, but I believe that Canada will share in the export markets for grain around the world as they develop, and while we may be elbowed out of one market, we may be able to do some elbowing ourselves in some other markets.

Senator Flynn: In the U.S.S.R.?

Senator Argue: I think, in total, Canada will be able to export all of the grain it produces. The restrictive factor is not likely to be so much of market as of transportation, and many efforts—successful efforts—are being undertaken from day to day to solve the transportation difficulties in Canada and to improve our facilities.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 51 OF PROPOSED CONSTITUTION ACT, 1980

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, my question is directed to either the Leader of the Government or the Deputy Leader of the Government. It has to do with section 51 of the proposed resolution. It is intended to get information which will allow me to make an accurate reading of that section. The section reads:

> Class 1 of section 91 and class 1 of section 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (formerly—

—I skip the parenthesis—

> —referred to in item 21 of Schedule I of this Act and Parts III and IV of this Act are repealed.

Part III of this act establishes constitutional conferences.

If one refers to this pompous and promising title, an institution of a federative nature is apparently going to be established by the proposed resolution. But since that Part III is in fact abolished as soon as the resolution or the Constitution Act of 1980 goes into effect, am I to understand that, in the mind of the government, the constitutional conferences bringing together all the first ministers of Canada is only a transitional operation already doomed to disappear as soon as the resolution, that is the proposed Constitutional Act of 1980, is passed?

Senator Lamontagne: At the very moment our report is tabled.

Senator Asselin: You are saying your report is going to change that? That is a good one!

● (2030)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator has asked a rather detailed question with respect to sections 51 and 52. There will be a debate later on the inquiry I initiated, and if possible I would be pleased to speak to that section during the course of the debate.

Does the Leader of the Opposition share the opinion that it may be out of order to have a question of this kind advanced during Question Period?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Why?

Senator Perrault: A debate is about to commence in the Senate with respect to the documents tabled here one week ago. This is a matter which I think could more properly be discussed at that time.

Senator Flynn: No. A question is not the same thing as a debate.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we have a draft of a bill that is going to be dealt with by the Parliament at Westminster. The bill is not even in this chamber as yet. A motion to refer that bill to a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons is now being debated in the other place. The measure is not being debated in detail in any section of Parliament. Now we are asked by an honourable senator to provide a legal opinion with respect to one of the sections. Surely that is an unusual procedure. However, in saying that, may I assure honourable senators that I will be pleased to speak to sections 51 and 52 later this evening.

Senator Flynn: We don't want a speech; we want a reply.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Not being as familiar as the Leader of the Government with the procedures I do not know whether I am engaging in a debate following what he just said. But my question was one of clarification, and not intended to discuss the merits of section 51.

Is it advisable to create provisionally a federative institution such as the constitutional conference of first ministers, or is it not advisable to do so? That is the essence of the debate. I simply wanted to make sure, so I could engage in the debate later on in as much an enlightened way as possible, if I was reading the section correctly. It is a question of information, it seems to me. Is it out of order to ask it now? I point out again that I am not engaging in the substance of the debate but merely asking a question of information.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on a point of order, I can recall this very same point being raised previously.

Senator Flynn: By whom?

Senator Frith: The point of order was raised by the leader in his answer when he implied that it was out of order. In any event, whether or not he or anyone else did, of course, it is in order for me to raise a point of order.

Senator Flynn: You can do that any time.

Senator Frith: I mention that only to put the point in context. I recall that when the Leader of the Opposition and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition were on this side they raised a point of order, which I think is a correct one, and that is that it is not in order to ask for a legal opinion during Question Period. That is my first point of order.

The second is that it is not in order to raise during Question Period something that is on the order paper and will come up later in debate, since the purpose of the Question Period is to elicit information.

Senator Flynn: Would the honourable senator repeat that so that it can be clearly understood? Do we take it that it is not in order to start a debate before another debate comes up?

Senator Olson: That is right; you cannot anticipate.

Senator Flynn: I like that argument, and I will use it later.

Senator Frith: Are you through for the moment?

Senator Flynn: Yes, sure.

Senator Frith: To reiterate, during Question Period it is not in order to ask for a legal opinion because the purpose of the Question Period is, as you told us last year, to elicit information. If you do not want me to quote the leader, I will quote Beauchesne.

Senator Flynn: You questioned me for over three-quarters of an hour, and I replied to every question you put to me. Most of those questions required me to give a legal opinion, and I provided whatever I thought was the proper reply.

Senator Frith: On that occasion I was asking for information as to what had taken place—if you read the record you will see that—and not for a legal opinion. However, in respect to the particular questions being asked here, first, is a legal opinion being asked for; and, second, is the subject raised during Question Period a subject that is already on the order paper and coming up later for debate? In my respectful submission, honourable senators, the answer to both of those questions is yes.

Senator Tremblay said he was simply asking for an answer to—"La question est si la lecture de la résolution est à point." In my opinion, that is clearly asking for a legal opinion, and the subject is on the order paper. Therefore, in my respectful submission, the question should not be asked during Question Period.

Senator Flynn: If you don't know, you just have to say that you don't know.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I was asking the question as an ordinary senator or perhaps as an ordinary citizen who would be reading information issued by the government. If reading a government paper requires legal advice, then, as a common citizen, I would have a real problem.

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, Senator Frith raised two points of order, and I should like just for a moment to reply to them. The first point was that it is not in order to ask questions about the content of something which notice of intention to debate has been given. I say that that cannot possibly be right. Surely if, in order to prepare oneself for the debate, one wishes to know what is meant by something that the government has tabled as an official government document, it is perfectly in order to ask what something in that paper means. If the honourable gentleman does not know the answer or for some reason is afraid to give it, then let him say he does not know or he does not want to give the answer. This is an utterly absurd position for the honourable senator to take and one which cannot be allowed to pass unnoticed. The other point was that it is not in order to ask for a legal opinion.

Senator Olson: Right.

Senator Smith: You know all about that. I am sure we would be delighted to hear you expound at some length your views on the legal aspect of this section. We will be glad to hear you. If the honourable gentleman could make a long speech about the legal meaning of this, I am sure the Deputy Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Government can both do the same, but if they are bringing into this house something that they want us to pass and they have not informed themselves as to its legal meaning, then they are even duller and less attentive to the business of the house and their duties than it ever occurred to me they were. After all, what do they expect? They stand there and say they don't know what it means and ask the rest of us to debate it. That is even more absurd than the first point of view.

Senator Frith: I would certainly not expect as distinguished a lawyer as my learned friend Senator Smith to accept my opinion on any of these questions. Perhaps he will not accept Beauchesne's either, but Beauchesne says, at paragraph 359 on page 132, when dealing with the Question Period:

> It must be a question, not an expression of opinion.

It must not ask for an opinion. In paragraph 360 he says that it should not > . . . ask a solution of a legal question such as the interpretation of a statute.

Senator Smith: This is not a statute.

Senator Frith: Senator Smith said he is asking for an opinion or a statement as to what something means. In my respectful submission the questions that Senator Smith is talking about are certainly proper in debate, but according to Beauchesne they should be asking for information, not an interpretation as to what something means.

Senator Flynn: You said a statute. Quote correctly.

Senator Frith: Finally, in paragraph 359(12) on page 132—

Senator Smith: Quote correctly.

Senator Frith: I am—". . . such as a statute." At page 132, in paragraph 359, subparagraph 12, Beauchesne says:

> Questions should not anticipate a debate scheduled for the day, but should be reserved for the debate.

Senator Flynn: For the day.

Senator Frith: There is the quotation. It may not be as distinguished a source as either Senator Smith's or Senator Flynn's, but it is a source that is generally accepted in parliamentary procedure.

Senator Smith: I accept what it says but I don't accept what you say it says.

Senator Frith: As I said, don't take it from me; take it from Beauchesne.

Senator Flynn: You were not giving legal opinion.

Senator Smith: To start with, the quotation refers to a statute. We are not concerned with a statute. We are concerned with something that has not even become a bill yet; it is only a draft that the government wants people to approve.

Senator Olson: It is an order of the day.

Senator Perrault: They don't want to be confused with the facts.

Senator Flynn: You wouldn't recognize a fact if it hit you in the face.

Senator Tremblay: I take notice of a splendid lesson that I have just learned. At this stage I understand that I do not need to understand what it means, what is in there.

Senator Lamontagne: Read the rules.

Senator Flynn: You never read them yourself.

Senator Tremblay: I will wait, hoping that at some stage somebody will tell me what it means, but I ask myself whether the people will understand before we understand.

Senator Perrault: I remind honourable senators that last week, in an effort to accord an opportunity for the opposition to state freely and openly their views on this important initiative, it was proposed that we commence an inquiry debate. We wanted a debate to begin so that all senators would have an opportunity to speak. Could we get consent from the opposition? Not at all. They said, "No, no, we can't give that consent." Today they act as though somehow they are being deprived of an opportunity to speak. Apparently Senator Smith has undergone a conversion greater than St. Paul's conversion on the Road to Damascus. Can he cite one instance during his long and distinguished career as Premier of Nova Scotia where he ever made the kind of concession to the opposition that he demands of us now? If he did, let him produce the evidence in this chamber.

Senator Smith: I am not going to make a search over a long period of years to satisfy the honourable senator that he is wrong. I know inherently that he is wrong. I also know that none of the authorities cited by his deputy have anything to do with this. What his citation had to do with was asking about the meaning of a statute. I say again that no one can possibly say this is a statute. It is a piece of paper that may become nothing, which we are asked to discuss. Again I say, if the honourable senator doesn't know what it means, then he has a great deal of nerve to come here and ask the Senate to accept it.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development—

Senator Flynn: We are still on a point of order. Senator Perrault—I was going to say "Senator Foghorn," as he is called on the west coast. I was there last week. There is nothing insulting in that it is just amusing.

Senator Perrault: I am not insulted.

Senator Flynn: Anyway, you just gave us a perfect illustration of why they speak of you that way out there. The Leader of the Government referred to his notice of inquiry which will come later on. Last week I made some observations. I intended to raise a point of order later, when it is called, and I think that is the proper time to do it, not to discuss it in advance, as the Leader of the Government is trying to do.

Senator Perrault: I suspect that the Leader of the Opposition did not want to debate last week because his party is so totally confused on the constitutional question. Are they attempting to rally their forces and obtain a consensus? Furthermore, I presume that the Leader of the Opposition was obviously anxious to find out what the Conservative premiers were going to announce this evening. These are some of the reasons for his failure to debate last week, and he knows it.

Senator Smith: Further to the point of order, the Leader of the Government complains that he did not have the opportunity to bring forth the notice last week. Nobody objected to his giving notice of the inquiry last week. He had every right to give the notice, and if he had given notice then, as he intimated he wanted to do, but which he did not do, we could now be debating it instead of this point of order. He didn't do it, and I might be bold enough to ask him why he didn't do it. He didn't have to ask permission to give notice. I suggest he was not really ready to give notice and he was glad to have the rest of the weekend to get ready.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, let's get this straight. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition meets once in a while with his members. Last week the Leader of Opposition asked that the debate be deferred until this week because he was not prepared to go ahead with the debate. It may help if the Leader of the Opposition met with some of his followers so that they could find out what he has in his mind at any given time.

Senator Smith: That is another occasion when the Leader of the Government displays his complete ignorance. I didn't say anything about whether or not the debate was to be last week, because there was no suggestion it was to be.

Senator Petten: Yes, there was.

Senator Flynn: He asked leave and leave was refused.

Senator Smith: I know, but what I said, and what the Leader of the Government did not respond to in any way whatsoever, was that he had every opportunity to give notice of the inquiry last week if he wanted to, and it would now come up, in the ordinary course of events, for debate tonight.

• (2040)

I say he did not do that, so how can he stand here and complain that the Leader of the Opposition has in any way delayed the debate? The Leader of the Government himself delayed it. He could have given notice any day last week, including the last day we sat, and he did not bother to do so.

Senator Frith: Question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the honourable senator's views are so tediously incorrect that I am not willing to perpetuate the debate and continue this discussion. It is useless, because the honourable senator does not know the facts.

Senator Smith: I know the facts very well, and I know one fact which you cannot deny, that being that you could have given notice of this inquiry on the last day we sat last week and we could now be debating it in the ordinary course of events. You cannot deny that, and that is a fact.

Hon. Reginald James Balfour: Honourable senators, on the same point of order, and without wanting to risk being tedious, might I ask whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate would care to enlarge upon his commitment to expend $4 billion for western Canadian development?

Senator Olson: Now, wasn't that brilliant.

Senator Perrault: Well, the universe will unfold, and a great deal of western development is going to unfold. I am not prepared to go beyond that statement at the present time. I will say that the Government of Canada as presently constituted is considerably more concerned about western development than was the preceding government.

Senator Balfour: On the same point of order, are you withdrawing from the speech you made in Vancouver with respect to the expenditure of $4 billion on western Canadian development or not?

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator obviously requires a crash course on Beauchesne, because he is completely out of order in asking a question of that kind. I made no such speech in the city of Vancouver.

Senator Smith: Where did you make it, then?

ENERGY

DISRUPTION OF OIL SUPPLIES FROM THE MIDDLE EAST

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. In light of recent news reports concerning the destruction of oil refineries and oil pipelines in the warring states of Iran and Iraq, thus curtailing the flow of oil to the West, is Canada likely to experience a shortage of oil, and if so, has the government made any provision for meeting such shortage?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall give a more complete answer to that question tomorrow, perhaps, but there is no doubt that with an amount of oil potentially shut off—and it is difficult at this stage to make any prediction as to how long that will be the case—Canada is, of course, concerned, as are a good many other countries that receive some of their supply from that source. However, I shall answer tomorrow as to any calculation that has been made in terms of the difficulties we may face as a result of the reduction of oil supplies moving out of that area.

Senator Marshall: Newfoundland will take up the slack.

STATUS OF APPLICATION BY Q & M PIPE LINES TO CONSTRUCT A PIPELINE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. What is the status of the application of Q & M Pipe Lines before the National Energy Board to construct a pipeline through Quebec and maritime provinces. Have any of the considerations which caused the National Energy Board to reject the application last spring been addressed?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, as far as I am advised to date, approval by the National Energy Board of the application was given in a modified form, and the reasons therefor were stated at that time by the board. I do not believe that a new application has been made to the National Energy Board. However, I shall check and determine whether or not that is so.

Senator Donahoe: Is it still the government's intention to discharge its campaign commitment to secure the construction of the Q & M pipeline?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Olson: It is. It was, it is, and it will be the policy of this government to have the entire pipeline built.

Senator Asselin: Until the next election.

DISRUPTION OF OIL SUPPLIES FROM THE MIDDLE EAST—POSSIBLE EFFECT ON EASTERN CANADA

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, my next question for the minister is perhaps somewhat similar to the question asked by Senator Bosa, but I ask it from a different point of view.

With oil supplies to the West having declined by approximately 8 per cent as a result of the Iran-Iraq war, has the government decided to assure security of supply for Atlantic Canada, in particular, through the accumulation of strategic supplies of crude oil?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): There was an answer given to a similar question asked in the other place earlier today, and perhaps I should advise the honourable senator of the reply that was given by the responsible minister. It was as follows:

> I have discussed this matter with other members of the IEA, including Secretary Duncan in the U.S., and it is generally agreed that there is no possibility of such a shortage developing. Western oil reserves are quite high, and we are reassured by the fact that some OPEC members, notably Saudi Arabia, are increasing their production to offset the Iran-Iraq situation.

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question. Will the minister admit, should the calculations of the International Energy Authority prove to be incorrect, and the supply fall below a certain level, that Canada would be forced to reduce its consumption by the amount of the shortfall?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not think I should at this stage try to repeat the terms and conditions that Canada agreed to with several other countries in respect of what each would try to do to help the others in the event of a shortage. Those terms and conditions are, I think, well known to my honourable friend, and Canada expects to honour whatever agreement has been made. But I am not sure that I should answer, or try to answer, hypothetical questions as to whether, in the event that the assurance that was given—and this is the opinion of a whole lot of other senior officials in the western governments—does not take care of the situation, and say what else we are going to do. Of course, we have studied that, but I have stated very positively that we do not expect a shortage to develop.

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AUTHORITY—OIL RESERVES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, might I ask a couple of questions of the minister in respect of the oil supply situation.

Could the minister advise us whether the International Energy Authority has met since the crisis developed in the Iran-Iraq area, and, if so, whether they have come to any conclusions to which Canada subscribes?

My second question has to do with the volume of reserves that there may be in eastern Canada in respect of the supply required for that area in the event of any unforeseen situation—which the minister tells us will not happen, but which certainly might happen.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there is obviously more than one part to that question. Responding to the first part, I am not sure at this time whether or not there has been a formal meeting of all of the members or some of the members of the IEA. I shall try to ascertain that by tomorrow. Certainly, the minister responsible stated earlier today that he has discussed this matter with other members of the IEA.

As to the other parts of the question, I had better take them as notice so as to get precise information to reply.

Senator Roblin: May I ask my honourable friend, when he provides the answer as to the matter of reserves, to give us not only the actual volume but its percentage relationship to, say, one year's consumption.

Senator Olson: Yes, I shall try to do that.

AIRLINES

SALE OF NORDAIR SHARES—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, might I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development whether he is in a position tonight to reply to the question I asked last week regarding the sale of Nordair shares?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): As soon as we get to that part of our sitting where delayed answers are given, I am prepared to answer. I can do so sooner, if you like.

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in response to the question asked by Senator Asselin on October 8 concerning the possible sale of Nordair, I would like to point out that the Minister of Transport issued a statement on this matter on August 5, 1980. He noted that, in spite of intensive work on a number of approaches concerning the future of Nordair, the interested parties have not yet been able to reach general agreement on a means of disposing of Air Canada's majority holding. The minister indicated that he had suspended discussions for the time being, but that he intended to seek guidance from his cabinet colleagues in the fall in the context of a new regional air carrier policy.

● (2050)

Therefore the Nordair question has by no means been shelved, as the honourable senator seemed to understand. However, a decision on the future of Nordair must take into account a number of interests including those of the provinces, the management of the airline, the employees and the prospective owners. It is the minister's hope that he will be able to make a more definite statement on the future of Nordair in the coming months.

That is the end of the reply. However, if the honourable senator has not seen the press release issued by the Minister of Transport dated August 5, I would be happy to see that he gets one.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, a supplementary question following the minister's statement. Does the government still intend to sell Nordair shares to private interests?

It seems to me that as the interested parties have yet to come to an agreement, the minister's statement would be a way out. So, is it still this government's firm intention to sell Nordair to private interests?

[English]

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I thought it was clear but, I can read that sentence again for the honourable senator. It is:

> However, a decision on the future of Nordair must take into account a number of interests including those of the provinces, the management of the airline, the employees and the prospective owners.

After all of those things are taken into consideration, then, I suppose, the next step is to take a decision on the positive action to be taken, which may or may not include the sale of the shares.

Senator Asselin: When will this action be taken by the government?

Senator Olson: The Minister of Transport will announce that when he is ready to make the decision known.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

FEDERAL AID FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TRADE AND CONVENTION CENTRES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government with reference to his statement of October 8 about the correspondence between the Mayor of Winnipeg and the Honourable Charles Lapointe, Minister of State for Small Businesses. Would he be kind enough to furnish me with a copy of the letter in question, dated July 14 last.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if a copy of the letter is available in my office I shall have it sent to the Honourable Senator Roblin. In any case, I will locate a copy and send that to the honourable senator.

FINANCE

SALE OF GOLD RESERVES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to reply to Senator

Austin's question of October 7 regarding the sale of gold in the international market.

The objective of the gold sales program is to obtain a better balanced portfolio of international reserve assets. The large rise in the price of gold in recent years has led to a substantial shift in the composition of our reserves. At current market prices (approximately U.S. $670 an ounce), the 21 million ounces of gold held by the Exchange Fund Account constitute over 80 per cent of our international reserves. This is high, both by standards of the past (in 1977, gold accounted for 49 per cent of our reserves) and in comparison to most other industrial countries. Selling some of our gold holdings and acquiring interest-earning foreign currency assets, will result in a more efficient portfolio of international reserve assets: the return on the portfolio should be higher while uncertainty as to its future value will be reduced.

The gold sales program was announced last December and sales began in January. Current plans call for sales of up to 2 million ounces. Sales are being made to the Mint for use in their gold coin programs and to the market. The actual timing of sales to the market depends on market conditions. By the end of September, 1.068 million ounces had been sold.

RELATIONSHIP OF GOLD RESERVES TO MONEY SUPPLY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there is another question that is closely related to that asked by Senator Austin. I refer to Senator Riley's question of October 7 regarding the amount of Canadian gold reserves today in relation to the amount of money that has been printed.

Canada's gold reserves are held by the Exchange Fund Account and constitute about 25 per cent of the book value of Canada's official international reserves. The Exchange Fund Account is in the name of the Minister of Finance and is administered by the Bank of Canada operating as the government's fiscal agent. The purpose of the account is to enable the government to maintain orderly conditions in the foreign exchange market. At the end of September, our gold reserves amounted to 21.11 million ounces and had a book value of just under U.S. $1 billion (for bookkeeping purposes gold is valued at its former official price of about U.S. $46 per ounce). At current market prices its value is about U.S. $14 billion.

The domestic money supply's link to gold was totally eliminated many years ago. The gold is not held as "backing" for the amount of money that has been printed; the money supply is varied quite independently in order to meet domestic economic requirements. On October 1 of this year, the stock of Bank of Canada notes in circulation was $10.2 billion, while currency in circulation and demand deposits (which corresponds to the commonly used M1 definition of the money supply) amounted to $25.8 billion.

Thus, figures are available both for our gold reserves and for the money supply, but there is no direct relationship between them.

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of State for Economic Development, and in so doing I thank him for his first answer.

I understood him to say that the government in selling its gold was acquiring interest-earning foreign assets. I wonder if the minister could tell us what is the nature of those assets. Are they U.S. Treasury bills, or European government obligations? In making the sales decision does the government take into account the potential earning gains of these foreign interest-earning assets on the one hand and the possible upward or downward movement in the commodity value of gold?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall take part of that question as notice. Whether or not the Ministry of Finance—and indeed that is where these questions are directed—is at liberty to divulge the details of the assets that are acquired, I do not know, but I shall find out and let my honourable friend know.

Senator Austin: By way of a further supplementary, I wonder if the minister could obtain from the Minister of Finance the answer to whether any of the proceeds of the sale of Canadian gold have been converted to Canadian dollars and credited to Canada's current account balance.

Senator Olson: I shall also take that question as notice.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, perhaps I might ask the minister a further supplementary with reference to the figures he just gave of the proportion which gold formed of the total foreign exchange reserve, and the figure he gave a little while ago which I thought related to the same thing and which he said was about 80 per cent. I am not quarrelling with the figures at all, but I am wondering what is the explanation for their being different figures. Do they relate to different things?

Senator Olson: I am not quite sure what the different things are that my honourable friend is talking about. Perhaps he could define his question a little more clearly.

Senator Smith: A moment ago, as I followed his answer to the question about the sale of gold, I thought he indicated that the proportion of gold to the total value of our foreign exchange reserve was something like 80 per cent; that that was higher than was the custom, and that was the reason for its being sold. But I thought I heard him say in his last reply that the gold formed a much lower amount than 80 per cent of the foreign exchange reserve. Again, I say I am not quarrelling with the figures at all. It just seems to me that they refer to different things, but I would like to understand his answer.

• (2100)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I don't think that I indicated that there was some lower percentage. I did, in fact, say—and I can repeat it, if you like—that at current market prices—that is, approximately U.S. $670 an ounce—the 21 million ounces of gold held by the Exchange Fund Account constitute over 80 per cent of our international reserves. I do not think anything in the second reply contradicts that.

Senator Smith: I can examine Hansard tomorrow, and, if the difference still seems to me to exist, I will renew my supplementary.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO MASSEY-FERGUSON LIMITED

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to Senator Austin's question of October 7 as to whether the government has suggested that the Canada Development Corporation look into the question of financial support for Massey-Ferguson.

As I have already indicated, and as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has stated on a number of occasions, the government is considering a number of options and has discussed them with the parties involved. It is our intention to work closely with Massey-Ferguson, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and the other interested principals in order to assist them in putting together an adequate plan for refinancing the company. It is our view that public discussion of the options under study would not be advantageous at this time.

I can assure honourable senators, however, that we are attempting to find a solution which would be in the best interests of the workers, the company itself, the farm machinery dealers and the many farmers across the country who depend on Massey-Ferguson equipment, and which would also lie in the best interests of Canadian taxpayers and the national economy.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED RESOLUTION FOR A JOINT ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) rose, pursuant to notice:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada", tabled in the Senate on 6th October, 1980.

He said: Honourable senators—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I gave notice to the Leader of the Government a few moments ago that I would do so.

I told him last Wednesday, I believe, that I had some reservations about the procedure surrounding this inquiry. I have not been able to find any precedents for a debate of the kind that will follow, if the Leader of the Government proceeds—that is, a debate preceding the formal motion that will come to us from the other place, if and when the resolution is adopted by the other place. It seems to me that it is rather irregular, but I am not on that basis objecting to the Honourable the Leader of the Government's proceeding with his inquiry.

However, I tell him this: Such a debate would be entirely out of order, if we were to accept the opinion given a few moments ago by Senator Frith. I do not know if that was a legal opinion, but it was to the effect that it would be improper to have two debates on the same subject. In other words, we should not debate a matter that would come to us later on. And yet it is quite obvious that this debate, the debate that will ensue from this inquiry, will be repeated when the resolution finally does come to us—unless we are told that we cannot debate the resolution when it comes to us because we will have already debated it.

In any event, the position that we take on this side is that, if the government leader and other senators on the other side wish to participate in this debate, they may do so, but so far as we are concerned we will abstain, unless circumstances provoke us into entering the debate. But I doubt that very much.

The Honourable the Leader of the Government should be warned that we do not consider this inquiry as a substitute for the debate that will take place, if the resolution does come to us after having been passed in the other place either in its present form or in an amended version. Obviously, it would be quite difficult for us to discuss now a matter that might come here in a different form. The fact is that we do not know what will happen after the meeting of the premiers or as a result of the trade-off taking place between the NDP and the Prime Minister at this time. The form of the resolution may be changed entirely, for all we know.

My second point is this: I warned the Leader of the Government that this debate could not be a substitute for the questions that we want to put during Question Period on any matter concerning this resolution—and if Senator Frith objects, he is entirely wrong. In the other place, the Question Period continues with all manner of questions related to the resolution being asked. And we on this side intend likewise to continue to put questions on matters relating to the resolution, even if there is an inquiry taking place. We will not be prevented by this ploy from dealing with the resolution in the proper way, when it reaches us, if it does. We will not be deterred by this device from asking in the Question Period all the questions we think are relevant and appropriate.

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition is somewhat more meticulous than it was one week ago, when he turned the Question Period into what was, in effect, a constitutional debate. The point taken then was that certain documents had been laid on the table and were "fair game" for discussion during the Question Period. Apparently, however, those same documents are not fair game for the subject of an inquiry.

May I provide the background to this inquiry for the benefit of honourable senators? Both publicly and privately I expressed the view of the government that this was a means designed primarily to assist the "opposition in setting forth their views on this historic initiative by the government. That is why the initiative was undertaken. It was stated in the house that we felt that so many questions were being asked during Question Period—

Senator Flynn: That is not the same thing at all!

Senator Perrault: —that it would be proper to have an inquiry, in which the substance of those documents could be discussed here.

In the second place, I gave the assurance, which I give again, that this is not a substitute for the debate which will undoubtedly take place at a later time.

Again, let me review the anticipated procedure with you. First there is a desire and an intent on the part of the government to accord all members of Parliament, whether they serve in the Senate or in the other place, a full opportunity to debate not only the motion to refer to a joint committee but also the contents of this resolution. That is of fundamental importance.

The procedure which is now being followed in the other place is to debate the motion to refer to the joint committee. If that motion is accepted in the other place, a message will be sent to the Senate inviting us to participate. There will then be an opportunity for a debate in this place, which will not be restricted; honourable senators will have an opportunity to set forth their views in the frankest possible terms.

Presumably, if we agree to participate in the activities of that committee and we decide on the number of senators from both the government and opposition sides to participate in the Senate component of that joint committee, we shall then make known our views to the other place. The committee will be established and meetings will be held and presumably members of the Senate may speak, put forward suggestions or propose that amendments be made when the committee reports back to Parliament.

The debate opportunities then could be substantial. If eventually amendments are proposed by the government, no doubt that could precipitate further debate in both chambers. Therefore the suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition that somehow an attempt is being made to frustrate the opposition, that there is some effort by the government to restrict debate, is entirely incorrect. If, for example, the Leader of the Opposition wishes this evening to begin, in the frankest possible terms, to offer his views with respect to the resolution and how the proposals can be improved, I will yield my place in this debate and allow him to speak now. That is how forthcoming we are. I repeat, I shall be glad to yield my place here this evening and allow the Leader of the Opposition or his deputy, or any other member of the opposition, to speak now.

An Hon. Senator: What a showman!

Senator Perrault: That is the offer we make. This is an opportunity to enable members of the opposition and members of the government to make known, not only to members of the Senate but to the whole of the country, their views concerning this resolution.

If the debate in the other place continues for some time—I have no idea when it will conclude—I am sure that most senators would share the view that it would be a real disservice to the country not to have the Senate involved in the parliamentary dialogue. That is why I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" and I should like to make a few preliminary remarks this evening.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Unless, of course, the Leader of the Opposition wishes to lead off.

Senator Flynn: No, no. If you are doing it merely for us, you might very well remain seated.

Senator Perrault: We believe this could be the beginning of a process of enlightenment which could be highly beneficial, particularly to those on the other side. Last Monday evening certain documents were tabled in this chamber which may be of significant, indeed profound, importance to the people of Canada. The proposed resolution respecting the Constitution of Canada included a proposed Address to Her Majesty the Queen and the draft of a bill which with or without amendment, as Parliament may determine, and as members of this chamber may help determine, will be despatched to Westminster for consideration and passage by the British Parliament.

The documents which were tabled set out the various measures necessary to bring about amendment and the so-called patriation of the Constitution of Canada. In addition to transferring from the United Kingdom to Canada all authority to legislate for Canada, and providing for future amendments to the Constitution to be made in Canada, the measures contain new constitutional provisions, such as the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and provisions relating to the implementation of the constitutional changes.

Quite understandably many honourable senators in all parts of this chamber have demonstrated a great interest in the constitutional proposals, because these initiatives are of historical importance and significance.

After the tabling of the documents last week, it was obvious from the number of questions asked by senators during Question Period that it would be appropriate to provide an opportunity here for honourable senators who desire to do so to set forth their preliminary views of the proposed resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty concerning the Constitution.

Members of the Senate are aware that a motion to refer the proposed resolution to a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons is now being debated in the other place, as I mentioned a few moments ago. In the normal course of events, members of the other place would vote on the motion to establish the committee and a message would be sent to us asking for our concurrence in the proposal. The explanation of the proposed resolution which I hope to give tonight may help to establish some of the background for this government initiative.

I realize that I cannot hope to answer all of the questions arising out of the documents that have been tabled here, and I cannot hope to answer all of the questions which may arise in the minds of honourable senators, because the resolution and some of the sections of the proposed Constitution Act, 1980, are not without complication.

As I stated here last week, a full and fair opportunity will be given to all senators to participate in the process of considering and debating the proposed government constitutional action.

Honourable senators can feel assured that their views and their proposals for clarification—and indeed their ideas for possible amendment of the proposed measure—will be given every consideration. There have been some reports that the government is inflexible, that there is a desire to have the present measure move ahead as quickly as possible without amendment or change. I wish to give assurance that there will be an opportunity for debate under this present inquiry, and there will be a further opportunity for debate and discussion should a message be received from the other place asking for our participation in joint committee activities. I know that honourable senators will take advantage of those opportunities.

At the present time, while some amendments to the Constitution may be made by Parliament or a provincial legislature acting alone, others require more complex action. They require the approval by both houses of the Parliament of Canada of a resolution to amend the Constitution of Canada. Such resolutions provide for a joint address of the Senate and the House of Commons to be presented to the Queen asking her to forward the proposals to the United Kingdom Parliament for enactment.

In future that procedure would not be necessary. The Constitution could be amended in Canada, and for an interim period it is proposed that the procedure for amending the Constitution would involve the consent of both Houses of Parliament and all of the provinces. Thereafter a permanent amending formula would come into effect by agreement, lapse of time, or after a referendum.

Under the proposed permanent procedure, most constitutional amendments could be made upon authorization by both houses of Parliament and the legislative assemblies of at least six provinces representing all regions of Canada. However, a number of special rules would cover particular circumstances. Specifically, amendments that apply to some but not all provinces could be approved by Parliament and those provinces. Also, as is now the case, Parliament or a provincial legislature acting alone could in some circumstances amend certain provisions of the Constitution.

The major elements of the document that was tabled a few days ago are, first, the proposed resolution. The preamble to the proposed resolution describes the historical position of Canada in respect of amendments to the Constitution; the present status of Canada as an independent state; and the desire for change that has led the Senate and the House of Commons to put forward the resolution. The Address to the Queen, which is set out in the resolution, is similar to previous addresses to the monarch and asks the Queen to lay the Canada Act before the United Kingdom Parliament for enactment.

• (2130)

The Canada Act commences with the recital of the action taken in Canada that makes it appropriate for the United Kingdom Parliament to enact the proposed statute. The act is technical in nature. It provides for the enactment of schedule A, which sets out the French version of the Canada Act, insofar as it is not contained in schedule B. The enactment of the French version in this manner is necessary because the laws of the United Kingdom are enacted only in the English language. As provided in the Canada Act, the French and English versions would have equal authority in Canada. This would be the first time that a United Kingdom act, enacted for Canada, would have an official French version.

The Canada Act also provides for the enactment of the Constitution Act, 1980. This contains the new constitutional provisions.

Finally, the Canada Act provides that no future United Kingdom laws shall apply to Canada.

The Constitution Act, 1980 is in the same bilingual format as acts of the Parliament of Canada, and the English and French versions would be equally authoritative. It contains important new provisions that for the most part are not closely linked to matters now provided for in the Constitution of Canada. It includes the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and provisions relating to equalization and regional disparities, and constitutional conferences of first ministers, as well as procedures whereby the Constitution could in future be amended in Canada.

In addition, the act provides for the preparation of the first official French version of the Constitution, and would change the titles of previous British North America Acts, so that they would in future be known as Constitution Acts. These name changes and other consequential amendments are set out in the schedule to the proposed item.

On the adoption of the Canada Act by the United Kingdom Parliament, Canada would have a revised Constitution that forms part of the body of laws of Canada. It would be exclusively Canadian because in future it could be amended only in Canada.

Some spokesmen for certain parties across Canada are critical of the fact that there is an attempt to amend the Constitution and to patriate it unilaterally; but over a period of 53 years, honourable senators, there have been numerous attempts to patriate the Constitution and to find an amending formula. Attempts were made in 1927, 1931, 1935-36, 1950, 1961, 1964, 1971, 1975-76, and 1978-79. The government quite clearly is moving to break this deadlock which has continued for so many years.

Honourable senators, the question was asked earlier: "Is the government action legal?" Of course, the government believes that it is acting legally, but important as well is the fact that obviously a great majority of the Canadian people, while they may disagree on methods, want to see the Constitution patriated.

A commitment was made to Canadians at the time of the recent referendum that if the concept of sovereignty association were rejected they would be offered a renewed federalism. As a result of this pledge there was a First Ministers' Conference on June 9 which resulted in an effort by both the national government and the provinces to reach a consensus on 12 areas of constitutional renewal. I am sure honourable senators followed those discussions very closely, as did all of the Canadian people, and I think it was realized then that unanimity is a very difficult goal to achieve. While provincial governments agreed on a number of matters, there was very rarely complete and absolute unanimity. Certainly there were disagreements between the federal and provincial governments.

Over the summer, and throughout the First Ministers' Conference in September, every effort was made to reach agreement with the provinces. The efforts by the federal government to achieve agreement can only be described as monumental. Many of the provincial premiers have stated there was a lack of flexibility on the part of the federal government. We have heard that recurring theme in public pronouncements by some premiers. What they are really saying is, "We agreed on a substantial number of matters, though not all of them; but we achieved a compromise in a number of areas, and Ottawa did not agree with our version of the compromise, thus Ottawa is unyielding." That really is not an example of provincial flexibility.

Senator Flynn: Vice versa!

Senator Perrault: To say to the federal government, "You will not give us a hundred per cent of our demands, and thus you are inflexible," is not an example of flexibility. The federal government certainly has the right to say, "In any negotiation there must be flexibility on both sides. There must be an offer to be co-operative on both sides."

I want to remind honourable senators of the fact that the federal government was prepared to make concessions to the provinces in the following areas.

First, the national government was prepared to increase the power of the provinces and further decentralize its own powers. Please note that this is in a federal state which is already among the three most decentralized federal states in the entire world. This is not even a matter for debate. Canada is a greatly decentralized federation.

Secondly, the national government was prepared to give the provinces the ability to levy indirect taxation on resources and make laws governing interprovincial trade in resources. This was a major concession by the federal government. It was a major offer to the provinces.

Thirdly, the national government proposed new provincial powers over fisheries. There was a proposal, as honourable senators will recall, to give the provinces exclusive control over inland fisheries, and a degree of shared jurisdiction in offshore fisheries. It was not a question of turning control over to the provinces, but it was proposed that there be co-operation in many areas.

Fourthly, the national government offered the provinces a greater say in management in the field of offshore resources, despite the fact that constitutional rulings from courts have ruled rather heavily in favour of the federal government. Atlantic Canada, for example, would have received 100 per cent of offshore revenues until the income of those provinces went above the national average. This is a provision that surely appeals to the idea of fair play. Surely the people in the Atlantic provinces perceived this federal offer to be fair.

Fifthly, the national government offered provincial jurisdiction in communications. It did not offer provincial jurisdiction in all types of communications, and this was natural, because there are certain interprovincial aspects to communications, such as the telephone services, and so on.

Sixthly, the provinces were offered a say in the appointment of the Supreme Court.

To all of these things some of the provinces responded by saying, "Look, if you meet more of our demands we will give serious consideration to approving all or part of your human rights package. If you give us the deal we want we, the provinces, will accede to your wishes to enshrine and entrench human rights for the Canadian people." The federal government took the position that you do not bargain human rights. You do not say, "Look, if you give us freedom of assembly entrenched for all Canadians—"

Senator Asselin: They have it already.

Senator Perrault: "—we will be prepared to give you a little more jurisdiction in fisheries; indeed, you can have all of the fisheries," and so on.

You know, basically it came down to that kind of bargaining tactic by some of the premiers. Honourable senators saw it all on television, so it needs no embellishment. It requires no further discussion; it was there for all of Canada to see.

The national government felt that after that meeting, after another failure, the latest in the long and unhappy 53-year chronology, it had no choice but to act, for the following reasons: the commitment made to further constitutional change, to end Canadian frustration with the ability of the government, leaders of governments and parliamentarians, wherever they serve, to make Canada work the way it can and should work; a commitment to provide an alternative to sovereignty association; a commitment to people, whether they live in Atlantic Canada, western Canada, central Canada or northern Canada, to make Confederation work more effectively for them. So the proposed resolution was evolved. It has been criticized because some people say it does not go far enough. They say, "If you are prepared to entrench human rights, why don't we have an entrenchment of all sorts of other matters as well, such as the communication offer made during the constitutional conference, or resources, or this, that and the other thing?" Others say it goes too far. They say, "Look, why don't you just patriate the Constitution? We can agree on that. We can achieve a basic agreement on patriation."

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Some opposition spokesmen here and elsewhere have said this: Premier Davis, of course, wants to go beyond patriation. Others wish for more, but there is a school of thought that we should patriate the Constitution for now, and then, when we develop an amending formula, go into all of the areas of constitutional reform and amendment which are required in this country.

However, after weighing all of the arguments, the government brought in a modified package—indeed, a moderate package—a limited package involving human rights and patriation of the Constitution. We have a resolution for a joint address requesting enactment of a statute by the Parliament of the United Kingdom—a proposed United Kingdom Canada Act, the French version of which is contained in Schedule A which would give force of law to Schedule B which is in the Constitution Act, 1980. The Constitution Act, 1980 contains new provisions of the Canadian Constitution, including Schedule 1 to the Constitution Act which lists most statutes making up the Constitution of Canada but would rename them.

By this measure the government hopes to give Canadians the following elements of constitutional renewal: first of all, patriation of the Constitution. I think we are all embarrassed with the idea of having our Constitution, one that was the product of historic meetings over a century ago, in Westminster. This is not a political hang-up with any of the parties. Surely it is embarrasing for our good friends in Great Britain to still have our Constitution in their country after all these years. They have done us a service by being as tolerant as they have about this whole matter of our being unable to develop a formula to bring back our Constitution or to develop the resolve to do so.

The entrenchment of a charter of rights and freedoms for Canada is the second element of constitutional renewal; third, entrenchment of principles of equalization payments and reduction of regional disparity; fourth, a provision for a completely Canadian amending procedure for the entire Canadian Constitution; and, fifth, some provision for modernization of the text of the Constitution now and in the future.

First of all, I will deal with patriating the Constitution. It is essential to the pride of our nation to bring home the Constitution and not to have to ask another country to amend it whenever we wish to make changes. That is agreed. Patriation of the Constitution has received support from all Canadian parties at the federal level and has also been supported at the provincial level. We have all made political speeches on the subject. The only objections have come from some provinces which wish to use patriation as a bargaining tool for delay. Some appear to have other objectives and have been using patriation as a tool.

Senator Macquarrie: Shame!

Senator Smith: That is a most unfair and insulting comment.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator will have an opportunity to speak in this debate, and I hope he does. Senator Smith has had much experience in the provincial field particularly, and we would welcome his remarks.

Then we come to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It protects seven categories of rights: fundamental freedoms, democratic rights, mobility rights, legal rights, non-discriminatory rights, language rights, and minority educational rights. The interesting thing is, of course, that these rights are based on a number of statutes now found at the federal level such as the Canadian Bill of Rights, the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Official Languages Act, the Criminal Code, as well as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the so-called "U.N. Charter" to which Canada, with the approval of all ten provinces, become a party in 1976. All of the rights proposed for entrenchment are rights which Canadians, through their experience of nationhood over 100 years, have come to accept as fair, decent and reasonable.

There really is no dispute about the desirability of ensuring these human rights. There is a difference of opinion, as honourable senators are aware, between those who believe that entrenchment may be necessary and those who believe that this matter of human rights can be left to provincial legislatures. That is another aspect of this question which is under debate.

Fully nine sections are derived in whole or in part from the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights, while six of the legal rights are derived from the U.N. covenant. Surely they are not bad precedents.

Senator Macquarrie: Smoke screen!

Senator Perrault: Fundamental freedoms include freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and every media and freedom of peaceful assembly and of association.

Democratic rights include the right to vote or stand for office in an election for the House of Commons or a legislative assembly, the requirement that no House of Commons and no legislative assembly continue for longer than five years except in unusual circumstances, and the requirement that there be an annual sitting of Parliament and an annual sitting of each legislature.

Mobility rights give Canadian citizens the right to establish themselves and seek employment in any province of Canada as well as the right to enter, remain or leave Canada.

I should like to stop here and tell you of an experience I had a few weeks ago. I met an MLA while I was attending a Commonwealth parliamentary function, and he said to me, "You know, there are 2,000 people a month moving into our province. They're trying to get in on the gravy train. We've got to do something about them." At that moment I understood, perhaps for the first time, why we need mobility rights in this country. If we are going to start looking on people who move for opportunity from Newfoundland to western Canada, or vice versa, as second class citizens, we're in trouble. If there are some legislation and authorities who are prepared to say, "You can't come here; you can't share in this; this is part of ours and you can't get it; this is our birthright; this is our heritage," then we in this national Parliament should be prepared to do something about it. If provinces are moving in that direction, then it is time to entrench and enshrine the rights of Canadians to move freely around this country.

We never had hindrance to the movement of people when we built this nation in the first place. People came from less privileged parts of the world to seek out a better future in this country, and if they wanted to go to British Columbia, Alberta, Newfoundland, Ontario, Saskatchewan, the north, or anywhere else, they went there and carved out a living for themselves, and they did a pretty fair job in the process. The national government suggests that now is the time to entrench those mobility rights so that no-one can say, "You cannot come in."

Minority language educational rights provide the citizens of the English-speaking or French-speaking minority of a province to have the right to educate their children in that minority language wherever numbers warrant. Every right-thinking Canadian supports that idea as well. Surely this basic right should not be left up to the vagaries of some provincial government to determine. In the ultimate, there should be legal protection of this right. There should be legal guarantees—a court which, if necessary, can determine the meaning of "where numbers warrant." If anyone assumes that somehow a Draconian federal government will move in with a police force to enforce a measure such as this, he would be entirely wrong. Like all provinces, my home province of British Columbia has prior rights in education and would continue to have the right to administer the education provision of the Constitution, the right to implement and to interpret, according to its own standards, the provision, "where numbers warrant." If a person feels aggrieved, feels that he has been unfairly deprived of an opportunity to have his youngster educated in English or French, he would have ultimate recourse to the courts and could appeal to those courts to have that right interpreted and guaranteed. In no way would these human rights provisions render unnecessary or irrelevant existing human rights commissions or ombudsmen or MPs and MLAs, but the ultimate recourse to the courts would exist.

I see an honourable senator shaking his head. I would welcome his remarks in this debate. He can give us his viewpoint on the subject.

Senator Asselin: You are wrong.

Senator Perrault: Legal rights comprise the right of life, liberty and security of the person; protection against unlawful search or seizure and unlawful detention or imprisonment; the right upon arrest to be promptly informed of the reasons and to be able to retain counsel without delay; the right upon being charged with an offence to be informed promptly of the specific offence; to be charged within a reasonable time; to be presumed innocent until proven guilty; not to be denied reasonable bail without just cause; not to be found guilty on account of any act or omission that was not an offence when committed; not to be tried or punished more than once for an offence; not to be subject to cruel or unusual punishment; not to have evidence given used for self-incrimination in subsequent proceedings, and the right to the assistance of an interpreter.

• (2140)

I think if Mr. Diefenbaker were alive today he would say, "Hear, hear!" The surprising part about the situation is that some, but not all, of the opposition say, "No, no, we must not entrench these rights." I think that John Diefenbaker, when he made his great speech in connection with the Bill of Rights, foresaw that if Canadians one day could be inspired to see the entrenchment of human rights in the Constitution it would be an even greater day for Canada than in 1960. This is what the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker said at that time:

> This measure that I introduce is the first step—

The first step.

> —on the part of Canada to carry out the acceptance either of the International Declaration of Human Rights or of the principles that actuated those who produced that noble document.

Many Canadians believe that the new proposals mark a continuation of the work of John Diefenbaker. These are the second and third steps.

Non-discrimination rights—

Senator Asselin: How about the War Measures Act.

Senator Perrault: I would be glad to speak on the War Measures Act, and if time permits I will do it.

There are to be non-discrimination rights which ensure that all Canadians, regardless of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age or sex have the same rights before the law. Mr. Diefenbaker spent his entire life working for that. Now we have some Conservatives saying, "We don't want entrenchment. We don't need it. Don't give it to us. Leave it up to the provincial legislatures." Are they serious?

Senator Smith: Not only Conservatives.

Senator Perrault: If human rights were so well and zealously guarded provincially 20 years ago, why did Mr. Diefenbaker feel it necessary to bring in a Canadian Bill of Rights in 1960? Because he was aware of the difficulties and risks, under certain circumstances, that Canada's very basic human rights and freedoms could be protected adequately by certain provincial governments.

Senator Asselin: You want to destroy it.

Senator Perrault: Surely this is one of the reasons why Mr. Diefenbaker gave us a Bill of Rights. With respect to entrenching existing rights, in addition the Government of Canada believes that those rights that were previously set out in federal legislation or the Constitution should now be enshrined in the charter.

Official language rights give English and French equal status and rights as to their use in all institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada. It was supported by the Conservative Party when the vote was held in Parliament. The statutes, records and Journals of Parliament are printed in both English and French. Everyone has the right to use English or French in Parliament, federal courts, and in communications with any head or central office of the Government of Canada. I notice some concern on the part of the Indian people that their rights may not be adequately protected, but there are sections in here that guard the rights of indigenous people. Time does not permit me to speak at length about all of the sections, but I hope in subsequent debate and discussion to say more.

The use of either English or French in the legislatures, the courts and in statutes and records of the Provinces of Quebec and Manitoba would continue to be protected by existing constitutional provisions.

Senator Asselin: What about Ontario?

Senator Perrault: Finally, Canadians enjoying rights that are not specifically mentioned in the Charter, such as our Indian people and others, would continue to enjoy them. This would include the traditional rights and freedoms enjoyed by the native peoples of Canada. I am glad to speak to that point again today. A number of native Indian groups have sought reassurances since the document was tabled.

Generally speaking, the only limitations that would be imposed on the exercise of any of the rights and freedoms outlined would be those reasonable limits generally accepted in a free and democratic society.

The Constitution Act, 1980, entrenches the principle of equalization and commits both orders of government to promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians, furthering economic development to reduce disparity and opportunities, and specifically providing essential public services of reasonable quality to all Canadians.

Since 1957 unconditional transfers known as equalization payments have been made by the federal government to enable every province to provide a reasonable level of public service without having to impose an undue tax burden on its residents. This practice of sharing has become a fundamental principle of Canadian federalism. Today, I think honourable senators will agree, the concept of sharing is under assault in some parts of our country, and if we ever adopt the philosophy of "I'm all right Jack," if there is a part of the country which languishes and its people have substandard services and the rest of us don't care, I think that is the first signal that Canada is about to be wound up. If in some equitable fashion we do not share our opportunities, our hopes and dreams and our resources, not just natural gas, oil and energy resources but the resources of industrial development across this country, giving the Atlantic provinces, the north and the west an opportunty for economic and industrial development that they have never enjoyed before, together with the sharing of transportation development and other opportunities across this country—unless we accept this concept of sharing in its broadest and most equitable sense, then our future as a nation is dismal indeed.

Now I turn to the amending procedure. Honourable senators have asked a number of questions about it, and for some these are controversial sections. Some senators may have certain changes and amendments to suggest. There are four major proposals for an amending formula made in the past by the national government and the ten provincial governments. First of all, the Fulton-Favreau formula in 1964 called for the unanimous consent for the amendment of certain matters entrenched in the Constitution, such as the distribution of powers. Most other amendments could be made with the agreement of two-thirds of the provinces, representing 50 per cent of the population.

The Victoria Charter formula of 1971 provided for regional consent for the amendment of entrenched powers; that is, two Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario and two western provinces, representing 50 per cent of the population of that region.

In 1979 the Continuing Committee of Ministers on the Constitution called for unanimity on changes to any amending formula, and on provisions that affect provincial ownership of and jurisdiction over natural resources; for other matters, the consent of at least seven provincial legislatures, representing at least 85 per cent of Canada's population, would be required.

The Vancouver consensus refers to a formula based on a proposal put forward by Alberta during the constitutional discussions in the summer of 1980. The proposal called for the assent of Parliament in the legislative assemblies of two-thirds of the provinces, representing at least 50 per cent of the population. In matters affecting the powers and rights of the legislatures, the assets of property of a province or the natural resources of a province, a province could choose to opt out of an amendment that was not approved by its legislature.

Since none of these past proposals have resulted in unanimous agreement among the First Ministers, the Government of Canada has placed before Parliament a proposed resolution which contains provisions for patriation and amending formula. The resolution provides that those amendments to the Constitution which formerly had to be made in London will require the unanimous consent of Parliament and the provinces until an acceptable amending formula can be found, using one of these three methods. As honourable senators are aware, I think, during an initial 24-month period, constitutional amendment would require unanimous consent. These are the other three methods that are held out beyond that period.

If during the next two years federal and provincial governments reach unanimous agreement on a formula, it would be adopted, and there would be no need for a referendum or any other procedure. Let me say that I think there is a good possibility that an amending formula agreement could be achieved.

To facilitate agreement a First Ministers' Constitutional Conference would be held each year until a formula is implemented. If the provinces and federal government fail to agree unanimously on a formula but eight or more provinces representing at least 80 per cent of the total population of all the provinces, agree within two years after patriation on an amending procedure that meets the requirements set out in the resolution, this formula, and a formula similar in principle to the Victoria Charter formula, would be put to the people in a referendum.

The federal government will also have the opportunity at that time to put forward a formula of its own choice instead of a modified Victoria Charter formula. If there is no consensus among the provinces on a formula, the modified Victoria Charter formula would automatically come into effect two years after patriation. In general, that formula would require that amendments to the Constitution be approved by Parliament and by either the legislative assemblies or a national referendum, a majority of voters in a majority of the provinces, including every province that has, or has had, a population of at least 25 per cent of the population of Canada, at least two Atlantic provinces with combined populations of at least 50 per cent of the population of all of the Atlantic provinces, and at least two western provinces with a combined population of at least 50 per cent of the population of all of the western provinces. The decision to call a national referendum on a constitutional amendment would rest with the Canadian Parliament, and the Senate would be involved in that decision.

I know I am going on at some length, but may I present the government's view on this "amendment by referendum," which is something that has attracted so much attention in the media and which has caused so much parliamentary comment.

Section 42, which for some is a controversial section, provides for approval of amendment by referendum instead of by legislatures, as required in section 41. It is being argued that this section allows the federal government to amend the Constitution over the heads of the provinces. Well, in a sense it does. It allows going "over the heads of the provinces" to the people of the respective provinces. A better characterization, however, of the section is to say that it allows constitutional issues to be removed from the hands of governments and placed in the hands of the people for decision—which is not an indefensible and undemocratic concept.

Too often, perhaps, governments have a vested interest in constitutional amendment, which means that they make decisions based on what would lead to the most power for that particular government. This does not necessarily lead to the best solution for the country as a whole.

It is this attitude on the part of governments which perhaps has led to the continued deadlock in federal-provincial constitutional negotiations for more than 50 years. It must be emphasized that a referendum under this section cannot be won on the basis of a national majority only. Two majorities are required in order to assure acceptance of the proposed amendment in all regions—a majority of voters voting and a majority in each region. The purpose of this section is to place authority to consent to amendment directly in the hands of the people as an alternative to amendment by agreement of Parliament and the provincial legislatures. Thus, the required regional majorities parallel the consent required from the provincial legislatures under section 41.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Balfour: How many commercials would you run?

Senator Perrault: On the basis of the present section 41, approval by referendum, therefore, would require a majority of the voters voting and a majority of the voters in every province having, or having had, 25 per cent of the population, a majority in at least two Atlantic provinces having a combined population of at least 50 per cent of the region, and a majority in at least two western provinces having the combined population of at least 50 per cent of the region.

If section 41 is amended as a result of an alternative proposal by the provincial and federal governments under section 38, then the requirement for regional approval in a referendum under this section would change accordingly.

It may be asked why only a referendum authorized by Parliament and not by the provinces is provided under this section. The rationale is that only Parliament represents all of the people of Canada, and consequently the ability to go to them by way of a referendum should be vested in the national Parliament. Again, this is a matter which I know honourable senators—

Senator Balfour: Aided and abetted by Jim Fleming's commercials.

Senator Perrault: —will wish to debate, and I hope that the honourable senator, who has been so vocal this evening, will participate. We will listen with real attention to what he has to say.

Senator Asselin: Let's hear about section 44 now.

Senator Perrault: Section 44 provides that, where the Senate does not approve a constitutional amendment approved by the House of Commons—and the provinces, under the Victoria Charter formula—under subsection 41(1) or section 43, the amendment could, nevertheless, be made after a delay period of 90 days with the House of Commons approving the amendment a second time.

This, essentially, is the same principle that was approved by the Senate in the report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, tabled in 1972. That report recommended:

> The present veto power of the Senate over legislation should be reduced to a suspensive veto for six months.

Section 44 talks in terms of a suspensive veto of 90 days. But let me go beyond that and clarify section 44 again. I know honourable senators have asked questions on this.

Section 44 provides that where the Senate refuses to authorize an amendment by passing a resolution, the House of Commons may override that lack of consent by repassing the resolution.

Senator Asselin: You favour this clause, then?

Senator Perrault: But all such amendments will require the approval of either a majority of the provinces regionally distributed as set out in subsection 41(1), or the provinces immediately concerned, section 43.

It is not thought appropriate that the Senate should be able to block a proposed amendment to which both the elected House of Commons and the relevant elected provincial legislative assemblies have agreed. That section has no application to amendments by national referendum under section 42, and it has no application to amendments which require Parliament's consent alone—those related to the executive government of Canada, or the Senate, or the House of Commons under section 48. In response to a number of questions it must be said, however, that an amendment to abolish the Senate, as unlikely as that may be, could be accomplished without Senate approval by virtue of this section, since the powers of the Senate, by virtue of section 50, are amendable by the general amending formula, section 41, and are not among the items which require Parliament's consent alone.

A similar provision was contained in the Victoria Charter formula. Article 51 reads:

> An amendment may be made by proclamation under Article 49 or 50 without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if within 90 days of the passage of a resolution by the House of Commons authorizing its issue, the Senate has not passed such a resolution, and at any time after the expiration of the 90 days the House of Commons again passes the resolution. But any period when Parliament is prorogued or dissolved shall not be counted in computing the 90-day period.

This is a matter which will be discussed at length, I am sure, by honourable senators, and by others. Perhaps further clarification can be provided in committee.

Senator Tremblay: May I ask a question for clarification? Does section 44 apply to section 47?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall be glad to take that question as notice and provide an answer for the honourable senator. As the honourable senator, of course, is aware, inevitably a number of very complex questions arise, and it would be irresponsible for me to offer personal random opinions.

The other evening, the Leader of the Opposition—

Senator Walker: I will not interrupt you except to verify that you do agree that under section 44 there is the power for the House of Commons to abolish the Senate.

Senator Frith: Not alone.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have been involved in the discussions about the matter, and this is my perception as well. In saying so, I respect Senator Walker's constitutional expertise. But let us understand that it is not the intent of the government to abolish the second chamber in our parliamentary system. There could be some government in the future, perhaps, with that kind of intent, but I foresee no possibility of the abolition of a second chamber here in the foreseeable future.

Apart from that, there is the possibility that a House of Commons some day, but only with the assent of all the regions of Canada, could undertake an initiative which could see abolition of the Senate, that is correct.

Senator Frith: Not alone. It cannot do it alone.

Senator Perrault: No, not alone, not unilaterally; it is done with the provinces.

Senator Asselin: That is the ruling of the Supreme Court.

Senator Perrault: Yes, of course, and that is what I have said. The Honourable Senator Walker appears to believe that with the proposed changes the Senate could be unilaterally abolished by the other place. This is not so.

Senator Frith: Not by the House of Commons alone.

Senator Perrault: No, it cannot be done by the House of Commons alone. The process would require the concurrence of the provinces through the Victoria Charter formula or another amending formula involving the provinces.

• (2200)

Senator Walker: We won't interrupt further. But I don't think there is any question but that it can be done.

Senator Perrault: May I invite Senator Walker to participate in this debate? I think we will all listen with interest to what he has to say, and I do not say that in any antagonistic spirit at all.

I am glad to see that the Leader of the Opposition has returned to the chamber. There has been some discussion of a number of key points. I am glad to see him back.

On section 21, the Charter of Rights, he asked a question about language rights at the provincial level. "Why does the Charter of Rights, unlike the draft charter tabled by the Prime Minister at the First Ministers' Conference in September, not include provisions for institutional language rights in Ontario and New Brunswick?" I promised to bring a reply to this question in this debate, and I intend to do so. The draft federal charter tabled at the First Ministers' Conference in September contained provisions for institutional language rights; that is, the use of English and French in legislative bodies, statutes, courts and in providing services to the public at both the federal and provincial levels of government. Apart from New Brunswick's support there was little provincial support at the First Ministers' Conference for inclusion of these provisions. Consequently when the federal government decided to proceed with the proposed resolution now before Parliament, it was decided to maintain the status quo with respect to institutional language rights at the provincial level. Thus the institutional language rights provisions of the charter are confined to the federal government level. Those are sections 16 to 20 inclusive.

The only reference to institutional language rights at the provincial level is in section 21, which, as noted above, simply preserves the status quo. What this provision means is that the existing constitutional rights respecting the use of English and French in the legislative debates, statutes and courts of Quebec under section 133 of the B.N.A. Act and in Manitoba under section 23 of the Manitoba Act are continued. Provinces such as New Brunswick that may want to entrench some of the language rights for their populations will be able to do so by an amendment to the Constitution agreed to by the province concerned and the Parliament of Canada—sections 34 and 43 of the Constitution Act, 1980.

"Is the omission from the charter of institutional language rights for Ontario the result of bargaining between Prime Minister Trudeau and Premier Davis?" That was the other question. No. As was indicated earlier the federal government took a policy decision when deciding to proceed with the proposed resolution not to include in the charter any provision dealing with institutional language rights at the provincial level. This decision was taken without any bargaining with Premier Davis.

The final question asked by the Leader of the Opposition was this: "Since the federal government decided as a matter of policy not to deal in the charter with institutional language rights at the provincial level, why did it then decide to include minority language education rights?" This is rather a different matter. Here the provincial premiers had all agreed at their meeting in Montreal in February 1978 on the principle that each child of the French- or English-speaking minority in a province is entitled to receive his or her education in the primary and secondary schools in the minority language wherever numbers warrant. I may say for my own province of British Columbia that that is the case today. Those minority language rights are being extended in British Columbia, and I am rather proud of that fact. Indeed, Premier Lévesque had offered to enter into reciprocal agreements with other provinces to give effect to this principle. Surely it is better, as the Task Force on Canadian Unity suggested, to entrench this principle in the Constitution where it can be guaranteed, and not leave it simply to provincial reciprocity.

There is a great deal more in this resolution that is deserving of attention and discussion. It is to be hoped that honourable senators will participate in this debate, and I express the personal hope that members of the opposition will participate. I think we would all like to hear from them and in no way will it impede their opportunity to debate later on when the message comes from the other place.

Senator Macquarrie: May I ask a question of the honourable leader before he resumes his seat? He invited us to cast our minds back 50 years or 53 years. He made that reference a couple of times. I did so. Could he tell us if in his exhaustive research on this definitive statement he saw in any time period since R. B. Bennett inaugurated discussions with the provinces any example of a major issue being brought to Westminster by a federal government, through a resolution or otherwise, without prior and full consultation with the provinces and the approval of these provinces? Did he in that 50-year period see an example of the procedure that is being followed now?

Senator Perrault: I respect the honourable senator's great knowledge as an historian and I hope he will speak in this debate. I think it would be a great service to the country if he were to do so.

[Senator Perrault.]

There have been numerous meetings with the provincial premiers in an attempt to find ways to patriate this Constitution. There have been exhaustive measures made by various levels of government to attempt to achieve a consensus. It seems to me that at some time a national government must demonstrate the qualities of leadership and say, "Let us frankly admit that we have approached the point of impasse, of deadlocks, of frustration. Now let us show leadership. Let us act in the interests of all Canadians." Indeed, I have a copy of a speech made a few months ago which I felt had a great deal of merit to it. These are words that I think provide some of the background for the action the government is taking today.

> The participants in Monday's conference speak for 11 governments, Parliament speaks for 23 million Canadians. If the first ministers of the federation cannot make marked progress toward changes which fit the Canada of the 1980s then the Parliament of the federation may have to assert a stronger role.

Who can argue with that?

> But if it does, that must not be as the instrument of one government but as the forum for all Canada. Parliament alone among institutions reflects that country and can lift the discussion above the question of what governments need and focus on the question of what the nation needs.

Isn't that the spirit of this entire resolution? And that is a speech made by the Honourable Joe Clark on June 6 last. The Conservative leader is the person who made that statement. He said that when a need emerges and when it is obvious that certain actions have to be taken on behalf of the entire nation, then Parliament has a responsibility to act. To his great credit, Mr. Clark supported that view last June.

In conclusion, honourable senators, the modernization of the Constitution does not affect the division of powers between different levels of government in Canada. It gives more powers and rights to the people themselves. That is the entire thrust of this submission. The government measures are a starting point; they are a commitment to the renewal of the Constitution, a commitment to review the division of powers, a commitment to change Canadian institutions, a commitment to entrench the human rights which are to be found in the Bill of Rights advanced by the late John Diefenbaker 20 years ago, with the support of people like Senator Walker and even the Leader of the Official Opposition who were great supporters of that Diefenbaker Bill of Rights package.

Senator Flynn: It was not imposed on anybody.

Senator Perrault: The Constitution Committee of the Canadian Bar Association—

Senator Flynn: It was not done unilaterally.

Senator Perrault: —has come out in support of entrenching these human rights in the Constitution. The Premier of Ontario, and men and women of many parties and of no party at all support patriation and entrenchment. As I have mentioned, in June Mr. Clark spoke eloquently of the need for Parliament to act strongly in certain circumstances. Perhaps at this critical time in the life of our nation we need more light and less heat, more attempt to understand than to be intolerant of contrary views, a greater need to comprehend the greater good. It seems to me, honourable senators, that it would be a highly desirable objective to be able to present a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen which has a substantial national consensus to support it. That objective may not be attainable, but it is to be hoped that our work in connection with the resolution shall be imbued with the spirit that sets the national interest far ahead of partisan considerations.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, I hope I will avoid rhetoric and not exaggerate in an effort to score debating points. I shall try to be matter of fact and deal with the issues as I see them without, if at all possible, causing any ill feelings. I would rather remain silent than run the risk of causing further dissension, but I feel it my duty to put before you, as best I can, the position of Newfoundland as I see it.

Unfortunately, some Canadians see Newfoundlanders as people who, suddenly, in 1949, dropped from nowhere to form the population of Canada's newest province. Some Canadians can also see that Newfoundland benefited greatly from certain fiscal legislation of general application in and throughout Canada. Now they tend to see us as greedy, inward-looking, strident people who, while we have benefited from being part of Canada, nevertheless refuse to share our possible good fortune should we possess some resources of oil. Newfoundlanders naturally see a somewhat different state of affairs.

First, we did not drop from "nowhere". On the contrary, we have been around for just as long as any other Canadians. As I sit and listen to senators wax eloquent on what their forefathers did for Canada, I say to myself, "So what!" I have to point out that Newfoundland has had just as long and just as proud a history as the rest of Canada.

Newfoundland's history began in 1447, nearly 500 years ago. In due course we had to fight England for the right to self-government. We had to fight both France and England over the Newfoundland-France shore question. In both cases we won.

In 1890 there occurred an event which for long poisoned Newfoundland-Canada relations. I quote an excerpt from A. B. Perlin's A Short History of Newfoundland. On page 36 it is stated:

> The other was the negotiation by Robert Bond, Colonial Secretary in the Whiteway Government, of a reciprocal trade agreement with the American Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine. To realize the importance of this to Newfoundland, it must be known that the United States was a very large market for Newfoundland fishery products and that improved tariff arrangements would have given a tremendous lift to the island's economy. Because of Canada's protest, the British Government refused to ratify the agreement. This resulted in bitter resentment towards the Dominion which was not quickly allayed.

We lost that battle. Perhaps, had we won, Newfoundland would have been much more prosperous over the years, and the United States and Newfoundland would have ended up in some sort of union. That Newfoundland would eventually join the U.S.A. was also the fear of the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King. I will refer to this later.

We also disputed among ourselves—English against Irish, Catholics against Protestants—until a few generations ago, when we reached maturity and decided to live together in peace and harmony. Then we fought very vigorously in the two great wars. As a result of our contribution in the First Great War we obtained dominion status. We became a country equal in status to the United Kingdom, Canada and the other dominions.

I ask you to note this carefully, honourable senators, as I shall also return to this point a little later.

This is just a very brief, short history of Newfoundland and Newfoundlanders up to the Great Depression of the 1930s.

In the 1930s Newfoundland's finances collapsed. This was due in no small part to the amount of money which Newfoundland borrowed during the 1914-1918 war to raise, maintain and keep the Royal Newfoundland Regiment in action. England came to our assistance, and I think it is fair to say we sought to repay in the Second Great War the help which England gave us. In addition to the part played by Newfoundland army, navy and air force volunteers, we freely gave, at the request of England, our land to the U.S.A. to create military bases; and, when we were in a surplus position, we lent Great Britain $40 million free of interest.

Then came 1949, when Newfoundland became part of Canada.

I have never regretted that—at any rate, not until now, when I am beginning to have some doubts. I am now having some stirring of doubt, because I fear this strong central government is shafting Newfoundland, and I do not like it.

When we joined Canada in 1949, a bargain was made and set out in the "Terms of Union" which form part of the BNA Act of 1949. The first point to be made concerns the part of our province known as Labrador. By the treaty made between Canada and Newfoundland it is clearly recognized and confirmed that the Province of Newfoundland consists of the Island of Newfoundland and that part of the mainland known as Labrador. This treaty makes the judgment of the Privy Council awarding Labrador to Newfoundland irrelevant. There is no need whatsoever to have regard to any document other than the Terms of Union.

Let me now remind you of what has happened to Labrador since 1949, since union with Canada.

The first item to mention is the development of Churchill Falls. The Churchill Falls were developed and the power sold to Quebec. Fortunately for Quebec, and unfortunately for Newfoundland, the long-term contract has proved to be a bonanza for Quebec. Quebec is now able to export surplus power to the United States at a profit of some $500 million a year, which will tend to increase rather than decrease.

However, I for one will not utter a word of complaint against Quebec because of this. A contract is a contract and that is the end of the matter. But, just to correct an impression many people now have, the contract was not made by the Government of Newfoundland; it was made by the Churchill Falls Corporation, and it was only a few years ago that the Newfoundland government took over the Churchill Falls Corporation. That is only a small point, but I make it because so many people think that the Newfoundlanders were stupid and the Quebecers so smart. The Arabs made the contract for Quebec when they upped the price of oil. Quebec is in exactly the same position as someone who wins the first prize in the Loto draw. Quebec, in this matter, is just plain lucky, and I both congratulate and envy them.

It is possible, however, to develop further large resources of power in Labrador. To do so would necessitate having transmission lines crossing Quebec, but Quebec will not agree to Newfoundland's having the right to cross Quebec.

To my mind, Newfoundland should have the power to cross Quebec as part and parcel of Labrador being part of Newfoundland and Newfoundland being part of Canada. That right should not be subject to a veto by Quebec. What then does the Canadian government do? It does not say to Newfoundland, "You cannot have the right." Such a positive refusal would outrage most Canadians. It does not say, "Yes, you can cross Quebec," for fear that that would outrage its own Quebec caucus. So the Canadian government puts the issue on a back burner and lets it stay there.

I therefore ask honourable senators, in the name of Newfoundland: Is this honouring the treaty made between Canada and Newfoundland in 1949? Surely it is somewhat contemptuous to tell us, after 31 years as a province, that we had better ask the National Energy Board for a permit to export.

● (2230)

Newfoundland is entitled to a clear-cut, positive and definite declaration from the federal government on this issue, and now. How else can plans be prepared, sales contracted for, and finances arranged? And I feel sure there can be no great engineering problems. A second transmission line through Quebec can surely be no problem for the federal government who intends to double track the railways over the Rockies.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Cook: Justice Minister Chrétien says that the government of Mr. St. Laurent made an unilateral decision to amend the B.N.A. Act in 1949 so that Newfoundland could become part of Canada.

Mr. Chrétien, whom I greatly like and admire, says it is ironic that Newfoundland complains about unilateral action. In 1949 we had no right to complain about any action Canada took. We were not part of Canada. For the record, the fact is that had the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent asked the provinces to consent, Quebec, I am told would have said "No, not unless Labrador becomes part of Quebec"—in which case, I can assure honourable senators, there would have been no deal, no agreement, no tenth province, and no need to amend the B.N.A. Act in 1949. In fact, there was a deal, there was a treaty and now Newfoundland requests Canada to honour that treaty.

I turn now to the other important matter which causes Newfoundlanders grave concern. As I have pointed out, largely as a result of the contribution of Newfoundland in blood and treasure in the First Great War, Newfoundland became a self-governing dominion—in other words, an independent country.

As a consequence, I for one will go to my grave convinced that in 1979 both legally and morally we owned all rights to offshore oil. Now along comes the Canadian government which coolly and calmly, without any justification, announces that it owns the offshore oil.

The federal authorities seek to create the impression that Newfoundlanders are bad boys because we dare to dispute the will of the federal government. However, it is already clear that this government can be very wrong about its powers and privileges, and rights. The great constitutional lawyers and legal experts of the federal government have already been slapped down by the Supreme Court of Canada when they claimed the power to abolish the Senate. The government's claim to abolish the Senate, and so amend the Constitution without provincial agreement, did not stand up in law. Perhaps the great constitutional lawyers and legal experts are also wrong when they assert that the federal government owns Newfoundland's offshore oil.

Because Newfoundland does not swallow holus bolus Mr. Trudeau's legal opinion, we are said to be inflexible. The kindest reply I can make to Mr. Trudeau is that, in the words of the homely old saying, this is a clear case of "the pot calling the kettle black".

Honourable senators, at this point I am not discussing how the proceeds which will arise from the development of the oil, if any, should be shared. That will, of course, be a matter for negotiation between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland. At this point I am speaking purely and simply about the ownership of the oil, and, quite frankly, the attitude of the Canadian government has me deeply worried. Who owns the oil will have a profound effect on the formula which will be used to determine how much Ottawa can take and how much Newfoundland will get.

I will sum up this portion of my remarks as follows: First, in my opinion, Newfoundland has benefited to a remarkable extent because it is a province of Canada. For my part, I acknowledge freely, frankly and with deep gratitude what being a Canadian means to me and other Newfoundlanders. In Newfoundland, young and old alike, the war veterans, and indeed, all Newfoundlanders, have benefited. We have had advances in education and health, much of which would have been beyond our own resources to provide.

Secondly, I protest very firmly the inaction of the Canadian government on the matter of the transmission of power from Labrador. I fear that the Canadian government is not sincerely and honestly accepting its obligations which flow from the Terms of Union with Newfoundland. These Terms clearly acknowledge the area which comprises the province of Newfoundland. Under our existing Constitution every province has certain rights governing the passage of its resources through any other province.

Thirdly, I protest the action of the federal government whereby it seeks to take from Newfoundland its offshore oil rights.

Please be clear, I am not arguing the matter of sharing. That dispute may be settled in due course. The first issue is who owns the oil, and I feel that both morally and legally the oil belongs to Newfoundland.

I would also point out that the federal government seems to think it has plenty of ways to make sure that it will get its proper share of any revenue which may arise in the future.

These two points bear very directly on the part Newfoundland will be able to play in the future of Canada. If Newfoundland is to receive little or no benefit from the development of its resources in Labrador, and limited benefit from the development of its offshore oil, then I fear she will be condemned to be forever fobbed off with equalization payments.

I am grateful for the advantages we have received up to the present time, but I am fearful that we are being denied or stripped of our resources, thus depleting our ability to eventually pay our way and to contribute our share to the Canada of the future. In view of what to me are the clear facts, this will be illegal, unjust and ungenerous.

I have spoken of what Newfoundland has received. There is still another side. I again quote from A. B. Perlin's work A Short History of Newfoundland

> The popular majority for Confederation was small. But if there had been a general election with union as the issue, 18 seats in a parliament of 28 would have been won by Confederates. The anti-union vote was concentrated in St. John's and a few districts on the Avalon Peninsula. Yet the majority was small in terms of popular votes. Let a Canadian historian, Bruce Hutchison, in his biography of Mackenzie King, tell the story:
> "Despite his dwindling energies, King was quietly completing his final work of statemanship by joining Newfoundland to Canada. He had laid the foundations of the tenth Canadian province during the war by making sure that every contract relating to Newfoundland contained a clause allowing for a future change in the colony's status. Repeatedly he had indicated Canada's willingness to receive Newfoundland into Confederation, taking care not to press this invitation and alarm the colony's anti-Canadian elements. He never altered his original judgement that if Newfoundland did not join Canada it would join the United States, that ultimately Confederation itself would be endangered if its eastern gateway were enfiladed by a foreign power.
> "The seeds of union thus sown, though observed by few Canadians, had grown steadily. When the Newfoundland people finally faced the issue and voted in favour of joining Canada, King was disappointed by the bare majority for his policy. He had promised to consummate the union only if Newfoundland showed its will by an unmistakable verdict at the polls. Now he wondered if he could regard this close vote as a sufficient mandate.
> "After some hesitation he was persuaded by his colleagues, who pointed out that the Newfoundland majority actually was larger than he had ever received in any election save that of 1940. That argument convinced him. The negotiation of union agreement was left to St. Laurent, but it was King who had fulfilled Macdonald's vision of a nation embracing the northern half of the continent. If King had done nothing else in his life, this achievement would have placed him among Canada's chief builders. Under him Confederation was completed."

● (2240)

I come now to the resolution itself, which, for a number of reasons, I regret I cannot support.

By all means let us re-name the B.N.A. Act and bring it to Canada. Everyone agrees with that proposition. The proposed amending formula, however, is a difficult question, not capable of easy solution. If we depart from requiring the agreement of all, then for my part any reasonable formula has to be accepted. However, I would want to hear the considered views of all the provinces on the referendum proposals suggested in the resolution before I would agree with that portion. In this connection it seems hard to understand the reason for, and to justify, Mr. Trudeau's attempt to impose these deadlines. It almost looks as if he fears to give those who have different views from his an opportunity to express them, in case such views might be so reasonable and sensible he will perhaps have to delay and amend the resolution.

I do not, however, agree with the thrust of the Charter of Rights, which to me gives too much power to the courts. It is not for the courts to legislate.

I quote the following from the judgment of a Canadian case where the judge accepts the words of Viscount Simon, uttered in a House of Lords case.

> What does 'substantial portion' mean? It is plain that the phrase requires a comparison with the whole rent, and the whole rent means the entire contractual rent payable by the tenant in return for the occupation of the premises together with all the other convenants of the landlord. 'Substantial' in this connection is not the same as 'not unsubstantial', i.e., just enough to avoid the de minimis principle. One of the primary meanings of the word is equivalent to considerable, solid or big. It is in this sense that we speak of a substantial fortune, a substantial meal, a substantial man, a substantial argument or ground of defence. Applying the word in this sense, it must be left to the discretion of the judge of fact to decide as best he can according to the circumstances in each case, the onus being on the landlord. If the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Palser's case were to be understood as fixing percentages as legal measure, that would be going beyond > the powers of the judiciary. To say that everything over 20 per cent of the whole rent should be regarded as a substantial portion of that rent would be to play the part of a legislator. If Parliament thinks fit to amend the statute by fixing percentages, Parliament will do so. Aristotle long ago pointed out that the degree of precision that is attainable depends on the subject matter. There is no reason for this court to differ from the conclusion reached in these two cases that the portion was not substantial, but this conclusion is justified by the view taken on the facts, not by laying down percentages of general application.

This reasoning was adopted by our own Canadian Judge Sydney Smith, and I quote:

> If I were to accede to appellant's argument, I would be doing precisely what Lord Simon says I must not do, viz., playing the part of a legislator.

I quote this judgment because it clearly illustrates the common law system, and points up the distinction between the legislature and the courts. It is a good system and I can see no reason to turn our backs on it. Legislatures are the proper forum to legislate for their citizens, not courts. Legislatures legislate, courts interpret.

That is the present Canadian system. It is not perfect but it has worked well, and I have not heard any argument which would make me agree to depart from it, and to sail out into the uncharted seas where only appointed judges may propose solutions and give opinions, which in the case of their proposed solutions, they have no responsibility to implement, and in the case of their opinions, they have no obligation to defend.

I accept without reservation the principle of language rights, but I cannot accept the double standard outlined in sections 20 and 23. An honourable member in the other place expressed my views on this clearly. He pointed out that section 20 refers to the two official languages in federal institutions and Parliament.

Section 20 provides that Parliament will determine what the numbers are, whether numbers are warranted for bilingual schools, whether numbers are warranted for French in the nine provinces that are predominantly English, whether numbers are warranted for English in Quebec.

Then section 23 provides for schools for anglophones in Quebec and francophones outside Quebec. Here the question of where numbers are warranted is not left to the provinces, the provincial legislatures, or the people elected—and education is provincial—but to the courts. This, the honourable member said, introduces a double standard in federalism. He does not accept this and I agree with him. I do not accept it either.

This is because, first, as I have said, in my opinion it is not the function of the courts to legislate; second, the sections create a double standard—one for the federal Parliament and one for the provincial legislatures; and third, section 23 will surely result in a nightmare of litigation in every province. Extremists of every kind, funded no doubt with federal funds, will be suing every provincial government with God knows how many different judgments.

There will be judgments covering all aspects of education about which and to which Parliament has not ever applied its collective will and mind, and in respect of which the provincial legislatures who are responsible for education will henceforth have no input. This provision will create much more ill will than it will cure. It will keep Canadians more apart and more quarrelsome than ever before.

Honourable senators, I have kept you long enough. I trust I have made it clear that I do not agree with some portions of the resolution itself and that further, and more importantly, I am not happy with the federal government's treatment of my province under the provisions of the present Constitution.

"He who seeks equity must come with clean hands" is an old legal maxim. To me, as a representative of the Province of Newfoundland, the federal government—not the Canadian people but the federal government—comes with grasping hands, and its talk of rights has a hollow ring. I will not, therefore, support the government when the resolution comes before us.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, that was a marvellous speech. I just want to correct a misapprehension. I shall be only thirty seconds.

Under section 44, the House of Commons can legislate the Senate out of existence but, of course, this is subject to section 41(1) as to the resolutions of a majority of the provinces. Senator Frith, of course, corrected that himself.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 15, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE JOSEPH A. SULLIVAN

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to the presence with us this afternoon of our very distinguished colleague Senator Sullivan, who has been prevented by ill-health from being with us for some time. I wish to welcome him back, and to say how pleased we are at his presence.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is a great pleasure for me to join in the warm greetings to the Honourable Senator Sullivan that have been brought to the house on behalf of all of us by the Leader of the Opposition. We are delighted to see Senator Sullivan back in his place. He makes a distinguished contribution to this chamber, and we hope that his health will permit him to serve with us for many years to come.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, hope springs eternal in the human heart. By the grace of God, and the expertise of the real men in my profession, I am still here, in one way or another, and breathing. I hope—I fervently hope—that I will be able to play some small part in the momentous crisis that may be coming in this chamber in the near future, as I have done in the past.

To you, Mr. Speaker, I offer my warmest congratulations on being elevated to the high post that you occupy in this bicameral parliamentary institution, which I revere and so heartily support.

I thank each and every one of you.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE HONOURABLE MARGARET NORRIE

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, in rising to speak to the matter of Senator Norrie's retirement from the Senate, I join with those who have already spoken in extending greetings and good wishes to our esteemed Senator Sullivan, who is with us today.

I think it is appropriate for me at this time to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact—the regrettable fact—that this afternoon we have with us for the last time as a senator my seatmate, Senator Norrie.

Senator Norrie will be retiring officially, I understand, tomorrow. She was summoned to the Senate in April of 1972 and has been with us for eight and one half years, during which time she has been—and I know everyone will agree with me—an adornment to this august body.

Senator Norrie was born in New Brunswick into a famous family of that province, and later adopted the province of Nova Scotia as well, where her home is now. She sits in the Senate as a senator from Nova Scotia.

In the eight and one half years she has been with us, Senator Norrie has won our respect and our love. She has been an indomitable fighter for eastern Canada especially; but more than that, she has been a dedicated Canadian.

I know we all extend our appreciation to her for the contribution she has made to this chamber, and we all extend to her our best wishes for many, many years of activity in other spheres of work.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, one of the vital functions of the Senate is, of course, to provide capable regional representation—representation which brings to the attention of Parliament the aspirations and the needs of the various parts of our great country.

Senator Norrie has been an outstanding representative not only of her own province of Nova Scotia, but of the Atlantic region. She will be very much missed here. We know she goes into her retirement prepared to engage in a whole range of new endeavours which will benefit not only her own region but all of Canada. She can be assured that she is welcome in our midst in Parliament at any time. She has been a good friend and a great senator.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, my acquaintance with Senator Norrie goes back a number of years. When I was a politician in Nova Scotia she was always a great supporter of mine. One thing about Senator Norrie that I always appreciated, although some of her associates did not, was that you always knew where she stood in any given situation. If she did not approve of whatever you were doing or saying, she let you know very definitely. This I think is a great characteristic. She is a forthright person, dedicated to public service, to the support of the people in her community regardless of party affiliation, whenever she feels she can be of assistance to them. She is a great advocate and a great person.

I had intended to make my speech tomorrow because I think she will still be in the chamber tomorrow, but if anyone thinks that, merely because she will have achieved retiring age from the Senate tomorrow, she is going to withdraw from public life and stop expressing her opinions, when they have sometimes had such important effects on the determination of public policy in Nova Scotia and elsewhere, then they are sadly mistaken.

I wish my dear friend, Margaret Norrie, the very best in her years of retirement, but I do not expect they will be years of retirement in any of the normal senses in which we use that term.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I too would like to take part in paying tribute to Senator Norrie. She has been an excellent senator; she has brought to the Senate a beautiful personality, independent judgment and bravery when it comes to tackling issues. I know that in her own province of Nova Scotia she was very active in a campaign to have a certain highway routed through an area so as not to interfere with good agricultural land. She has been a dairy farmer in her own right and she has been most interested in the agriculture industry all across Canada. When I was Chairman of the Agriculture Committee, she was active in our inquiry into Kent County, and she helped to prepare the committee's report.

When we undertook some years ago a trip to western Canada to hold public meetings on the question of the difficulties of the beef industry, Margaret Norrie accompanied us, and her presence, inspiration and knowledge were most helpful to the committee.

If I may add a personal note, my daughter Susan, who is unmarried and who is a farmer in her own right, values very, very highly having met Senator Norrie during that trip and having been able to count her as a friend. Senator Norrie, after Senator Michaud passed away, became Vice-Chairman of our Agriculture Committee and in that position she was most helpful in all the work that was going on. I want to wish her happiness in her years of retirement and we shall look forward, Senator Norrie, to hearing from you and to learning of the other activities that I know you will be engaged in in the years ahead.

• (1410)

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to add a word or two about my very old friend, Senator Norrie. I concur, of course, in all the complimentary things that have been said about her, especially about her work in this Senate. I can testify at first hand, because my home is only two or three miles from hers, and has been for many years; I can testify from personal experience as to her accomplishments in community affairs, in being a person who interested herself effectively in a multitude of good causes, and who never spared herself in any way in serving a cause which she considered to be worthwhile.

I can testify also to her years of activity, effective and vigorous activity, in the political life of the area in which we both live, having witnessed it at first hand. I think her party, which all honourable senators well know is not mine, can be most grateful for the devoted work which she put forth on its behalf. Indeed, there were times, perhaps many times, when it seemed that she was the most effective voice of her party in all of the county in which she lived.

[Senator Hicks.]

I have had the pleasure of being able to count her as one of my friends in everything, except political activities, for what seems to me to have been quite a number of years. I am grateful for having had that opportunity. I look forward to seeing her continue in her vigour and her activity for the many good causes she supports, and I wish her the very best of happiness in the years to come.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman: Honourable senators, I cannot stand for long to make a speech so I will just say that I endorse everything that has been said about Senator Norrie. She has been a very dear friend since she came here. We have been very close friends, and I just wish her every happiness in her retirement.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, it is known that our colleague, the Honourable Senator Norrie, came from New Brunswick. She was a beautiful, resourceful and very fine person, when she left there. She still is. Her period in Nova Scotia—I do not know whether it was her association with Henry Hicks or what happened—gave her a saltiness that all of us have come to admire so much. In debate, whether it be in the party caucus or in committee or in this house of Parliament, she has always been forthright and forceful. Many of us have appreciated the contribution of Margaret Norrie and we will miss her very much.

Hon. Margaret Norrie: Honourable senators, I don't think you are talking about the right person. I do not know whether I would have had the courage to come today, had I known I would be listening to all these beautiful things you have been saying about me. I thought that came when you passed away or left the Senate. I did not think it would be prior to my departure.

But I do, with all my heart, thank you for all of the beautiful things you have said about me today. I hope they are true, but I will have to start thinking about it. Anyway, thank you so much. It has been a privilege beyond words to be here.

Incidentally, I don't know how I got here. Probably it was Henry's fault. He has always held me in high esteem and we have always got along extremely well. Every time I get in any trouble I call Henry, and, you know, his advice is always good.

• (1415)

Senator Hicks: But you don't always take it.

Senator Norrie: He graduated summa cum laude from Mount Allison, and I was just an average graduate. That's the difference between us. Thank you very kindly. It is just wonderful.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

LEGALITY OF PROPOSED RESOLUTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In view of the decision taken yesterday by five premiers, who may be joined by two others, if not more, to place before the courts the legality of the resolution which the present government intends to push through Parliament, is it the intention of the government to proceed notwithstanding, or would the government rather join with the premiers in seeking the opinion of the courts on the legality of its intentions?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government is satisfied that its anticipated action is legal. It is the intention of the government to proceed with its plan concerning the proposed resolution and the motion now being debated in the other place.

Honourable senators are aware that if governments were precluded from initiating action each time an appeal was filed with the courts on behalf of an individual or another level of government, it could effectively frustrate the actions of all governments. Therefore the government is proceeding in the reasonable certainty that its action is legal.

Senator Flynn: Is that certainty equal to the certainty the government had some years ago when it introduced Bill C-60 and felt that it could proceed in the manner provided under that bill, only to find that the Supreme Court disagreed with the government's view?

ENERGY

AVAILABILITY OF SURPLUS ALBERTA GAS TO EASTERN CANADA

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Against the background of what I believe to be a correct report that approximately 14 public utilities in the United States have signed an agreement with TransCanada PipeLines for the purchase of large quantities of surplus Alberta gas—I believe the report mentioned 185 million cubic feet per day—and since the gas to be carried eastward by the proposed Q and M pipeline was to be surplus Alberta gas, is such an arrangement likely to interfere with the availability of Alberta's surplus gas for the Q and M pipeline if its extension further eastward into Atlantic Canada is approved by the National Energy Board?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have not seen the report to which my honourable friend refers, but I presume that it is a contractual arrangement for gas that has already been approved for export by the National Energy Board. I think—I guess would be a better way to put it—that it is the contractual arrangement for gas that has already been approved for export by the National Energy Board, perhaps that volume of gas that was approved for delivery through the southern sections of the Alaska pipeline when they are built, formerly known as the prebuild sections.

I can also tell my honourable friend that the requirements for the Q and M, or the projected requirements, have been taken into account as part of the Canadian requirement before an amount was declared surplus to all of Canada's requirements, which is an obligation that they have to satisfy before they issue any export permit.

I can also advise my honourable friend that since the last time the National Energy Board reported its findings on the amount of gas reserves in Canada, both for domestic and other consumption, there has been a further substantial increase in those reserves. I am unaware that there is an application now for sales in addition to what has already been approved.

Senator Smith: I would like to ask a supplementary question. I am not sure whether I sufficiently conveyed the geographical location of the destination of this surplus gas to the minister. I understand that the 185 million cubic feet per day to which I referred is to be delivered to the New England states, or at any rate, the northeastern states, and I would be inclined to doubt whether that would have anything to do with gas transmitted through the so-called prebuild.

Senator Olson: That does clarify the situation. I will have to look into this. I suppose we cannot tell at this point in time whether or not someone is selling or someone is purchasing prospective gas sales. What I can assure my honourable friend of is that there will be no gas exported until and unless it is approved by the National Energy Board. If it has already been approved it has to be included in some previous application; but if it is a prospective approval, it has to go through the National Energy Board, and if anybody buys or sells, or whatever they do, it is not going to leave Canada without that approval.

Senator Smith: I thank the minister for his comments. I wonder if I could treaspass on his good nature a little further by inquiring whether, if I sent across to him the information I have about this matter, he might deal with it further tomorrow.

Senator Olson: Yes, honourable senators.

THE BUDGET

DATE OF PRESENTATION

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

The Minister of Finance told us recently that he intends to bring down his budget before the end of October or rather during the second half of October.

As the constitutional debate will apparently last beyond that date, does the government intend to adjourn that debate to bring down the budget which Canadian citizens are very anxious to see?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Well, the Minister of Finance has been asked a number of times—as ministers of finance always are, several weeks, and sometimes months, before they bring in their budget—when he is going to bring in his budget.

● (1425)

The Minister of Finance did indicate that he intended to bring his budget in some time between the middle and the end of October. Whether or not that will require the interruption of any other debate is not known at this time because I suppose his budget could come in on the last parliamentary day of October. By that time it is possible that the constitutional motion before the other place will have been referred to the committee or otherwise disposed of. We are really making predictions as to how long debates last, and I know my honourable friend who has sat on both sides of the House of Commons for a long time knows as well as I do that we should not try to predict how long a debate will last in that chamber.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: On a supplementary. Is the minister trying to indicate to us that the budget will be brought down before the end of October?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I was repeating or confirming what the Minister of Finance has already said.

AGRICULTURE

HERD MAINTENANCE ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board and is in relationship to his responsibility for the Herd Maintenance Assistance Program. As the minister knows, this program is of particular concern to Manitoba and the eastern half of Saskatchewan where the drought was most serious. Is it correct that this is the final day for applications; if so, is the minister giving any consideration to an extension of this date?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, this was the day set as the last day for applications to be submitted, but the date for application is being extended until the end of October.

Our whole purpose in endeavouring to administer this program was to enable producers, in as large numbers as possible, to make application for this assistance and then to have them processed on the basis of the rules but in as generous a way as possible.

An appeal procedure is being set up where applicants whose applications have been turned down may appeal. My hope is that livestock producers who have the confidence of the livestock producers of western Canada will be on the appeal board.

[Senator Asselin.]

I might say to Senator Molgat that this program, I think, has been of particular benefit to Manitoba where drought has been a larger factor than in any of the other prairie provinces. As a matter of interest to senators, I would say that particularly in the interlake country of Manitoba producers have experienced great difficulties. When I attended a meeting in that area, I was told by one of the producers that there had been 92 days of very hot weather, and that after the drought period the rains came. There were more than 25 inches of rainfall in a short time, and that virtually destroyed the small amount of hay he had been able to salvage after the drought. Therefore, this is an important program which we are endeavouring to administer as fairly as possible. The total federal contribution for the drought assistance program on the prairies will be some $67 million, which I think is money well spent.

Senator Molgat: I thank the minister for his statement. As a supplementary, could he indicate when the cheques will go out to those applicants whose applications have been accepted?

Senator Argue: The process is ongoing. The first cheques have been in the mail now for some days. Cheques are being printed as fast as is physically possible. As many as 30,000 applications may have to be processed. Some cheques are already in the mail and within the next few weeks, after these applications have been processed, all the cheques should be in the mail. Then, of course, there will be an appeal procedure and some of the cheques, no doubt, will follow after appeals have been made.

Senator Flynn: Do you mean the appeals will be granted?

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: As a supplementary, could the minister tell us if there is not some quicker way to get these cheques to the recipients rather than trusting them to Canada's mail service?

● (1430)

Senator Argue: Out in Saskatchewan there is usually overnight service. I would think that in Manitoba it is about the same. I say that from long experience. If you mail a letter in the city of Regina to my community, 100 miles away, the chances are that within 24 hours it will be received, perhaps within 48 hours. The mail service is good. We don't have too many strikes on the prairies. The workers do their job and we don't kick about our local mail service. It may take a little longer if it comes through Toronto.

Senator Perrault: From the maritimes.

ENERGY

DISRUPTION OF OIL SUPPLIES FROM MIDDLE EAST—POSSIBLE EFFECT ON EASTERN CANADA

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. As recently as yesterday, the minister stood in his place and offered us his assurance that eastern Canadians will face no oil shortages this winter. Of course, everybody knows that these shortages might have been anticipated as a result of the Iran-Iraq war. The minister will also know that if existing stocks are exhausted this winter, as they were during the winter of 1978-79, considerable shortages might be expected during the winter. With those considerations in mind, will the minister now give us his assurance that the oil companies will be directed by the government not to reduce their stocks, and that the government will act to build strategic supplies which could protect eastern Canadians during these years of energy dependence on offshore supply?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, perhaps I should reply to the question asked today and at the same time reply to questions asked by both Senators Donahoe and Roblin during the Question Period yesterday concerning these supplies, particularly in eastern Canada, as a result of the Iraq-Iran conflict.

Although I do not today have the specific figures requested by Senator Roblin on eastern Canadian oil supply, hopefully I will be able to provide those tomorrow; if not tomorrow, very shortly. I should like to inform him, however, that stocks in Canada are substantially higher than at this time last year, and that is particularly true of stocks in eastern Canada. I can assure honourable senators that there is no forecast of shortages for that or other parts of the country this winter. Further, I can tell honourable senators that the International Energy Agency member nations issued a statement on October 1 specifically stating that they do not foresee a supply problem which would result in a triggering of the sharing provisions of the international agreement. In short, international reserves are sufficiently high that no shortage is foreseen, particularly since some major oil-producing nations have agreed to increase their production to offset the disruption of supplies which resulted from the Iran-Iraq conflict.

Senator Donahoe: It is to be assumed, I take it, from the answer just given that we will continue to be in receipt of supplies, that we will not be entirely dependent upon those supplies that are now held in reserve. I wonder if the minister is aware that yesterday the United States Congressional Research Service said that if the Straits of Hormuz were to be closed during the current war, oil prices could soar to more than $100 U.S. per barrel. I wonder if the minister is also aware that as recently as yesterday one Iranian naval commander threatened that if Iran found it necessary she was prepared to mine the Straits of Hormuz. With those considerations in mind, will the government reconsider its apparent decision not to take extra precautions about strategic supplies for eastern Canada?

Senator Olson: As I stated in the reply I gave a few minutes ago, and indeed in the one I gave yesterday, the stocks all over the international world, or at least in the western world, including Canada, are at a very high level. Therefore I think the preamble to the question is unwarranted. There are larger supplies now. In addition to that, we have assurances from those oil-producing nations who do not ship through this troubled waterway that supplies will be increased, and therefore there will not be a complete stoppage of the volume that was coming through there, because it will be compensated with increased supplies from other areas that are not dependent on that waterway.

Senator Donahoe: Is it not correct that the price of those increased supplies will be affected by what takes place in the Middle East?

Senator Olson: I think it has been a fact of international trade all through the history of mankind that when a commodity is in high demand and some shortage develops, or even a threat of shortage, the price usually moves up.

GRAIN

DELIVERY QUOTAS FOR SOUTHERN ALBERTA AND SOUTHWESTERN SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: My question is directed to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. It pertains to allegations being made that the Canadian Wheat Board is engaged in discrimination with respect to producers in southern Alberta and southwestern Saskatchewan in connection with delivery quotas. Are the allegations true, and if so what does the minister propose to do about it?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): It is true that in southwestern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta grain has, over the last few months, been moving rather slowly along CPR lines. This situation, of course, is not entirely new, and the Canadian Wheat Board took some extraordinary action on July 25, 1980, providing for an extension of delivery quotas for last year into the new crop year. These quota extensions have now been extended until December 31. There are some 500 producers who have still to deliver on these extended quotas.

There are four blocks, mainly in southern Alberta, but part of the area also in southwestern Saskatchewan, where there are no red spring wheat quotas as yet. However, there are quotas for utility wheat, for Durum, for oats and for barley. There is a very severe congestion in the elevators in blocks 81, 82, 83 and 84. The CPR has been going all out to move the grain along those railway lines, but so far its unloads at Vancouver are still falling very much short of target. The main reason for the shortfall in the shipments is continuing labour troubles through Revelstoke. Attention is being given to these labour problems, and I can only express the hope that they will soon be settled.

In the meantime, CPR, the Canadian Wheat Board and the Grain Transportation Authority are in consultation one with another, hoping that they can provide short-term relief in moving grain from southern Alberta. However, it is a fact that there is a very difficult situation there. It requires special attention, and I think I can report to the Senate that the Grain Transportation Authority, the Canadian Wheat Board and the CPR are giving this problem their concerted attention.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Would the minister inform this chamber whether it is the intention of the government to appoint a Commissioner for Grain Transportation, a post recently vacated by Dr. Horner?

Senator Argue: That is being considered by my colleague in the cabinet, the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, the Minister of Transport. Mr. Pepin is in western Canada today consulting with the various grain organizations about this particular question, and I am certain that he will make a very valuable recommendation. While I am not able to say what his action may be, I am fully confident that it will be based upon the recommendations of the main producer organizations in western Canada, and I hope and expect that it carries with it their agreement.

PARLIAMENT

MEMBERS—ALLEGED PENSION BENEFITS—NEWSPAPER ARTICLE

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government, which I assume he will take as notice because I have been unable to give him notice, unfortunately. My question arises out of an article appearing in yesterday's Toronto Sun by Dr. Morton Shulman in which there appears the following statement:

> If a member of Parliament—

And I take that to be a member of the House of Commons.

> —serves for six years and then retires at 40 years of age and the inflation rate is 7% his pension receipts if he lives to 70 will be over half a million dollars and over a million and a half dollars if he lives to age 80, while his contributions have been less than $20,000.

I would ask the Leader of the Government to make inquiries as to the accuracy of that statement, and, if it is not correct, to provide us with the correct figures under the present pension arrangements in the case in point—namely, a member of the House of Commons serving for six years and retiring at age 40.

The article goes on to state that this same indexing applies to all public servants. If there is any degree of accuracy to these statements, the amounts would be absolutely astronomical.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that information will be sought and, if it can be made available, provided to the honourable senator.

Senator Argue: If he is appointed to the Senate, he loses his pension.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING ASSISTANT DEPUTY MINISTER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in relation to the appointment of Mr. R. J. Fournier as Acting Assistant Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs. Before putting my question, however, I would like to compliment the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board for his system of questions and answers. I do not know whether he plants the questioners or whether the questioners give notice, but we have a perfect example of—

[Senator Haidasz.]

Senator Argue: —of proficient efficiency on this side.

Senator Flynn: —of being well prepared. The minister is able to make extensive replies, giving a lot of details, and I think I should compliment him, and possibly compliment Senator Molgat and Senator Hastings also. I will not compliment Senator Haidasz, because his question was spontaneous, as is usual with him.

Senator Asselin: And we thank them for the copies sent to the opposition.

Senator Flynn: I would ask the government leader to inquire, on behalf of the Senate, whether or not the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was consulted by his deputy minister before Mr. R. J. Fournier was appointed Acting Assistant Deputy Minister, and to inquire also whether the minister was aware that the native Canadian community had made known to the Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs their opposition to Mr. Fournier's appointment. I would also ask the government leader to ascertain whether any native Canadians were considered for this position.

Since I did not give the leader notice of my question, I am sure he will take it as such.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I regret that I do not have that information on my desk this afternoon. The question will be taken as notice.

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE TO SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development. Since the minister are so co-operative and efficient today, I am sure he has his music with him. This is spontaneous. I have not given him notice.

Yesterday, in response to a question from Senator Austin, the minister spoke about assistance for Massey-Ferguson and the workers of Massey-Ferguson. Prior to that, this government had given assistance to and helped out—and I commend it for it—the workers of Chrysler Corporation.

It is my understanding that the leaders of the municipalities affected, as well as the leaders of the workers union, were in Ottawa yesterday to meet with ministers and others concerned regarding the possibility of financial assistance, in conjunction with the Province of Nova Scotia, for the Sydney Steel Corporation—long promised financial assistance. In view of the fact that we have had 600 or 700 laid off at that plant in the last couple of months, is the minister in a position to provide a progress report today, and, if not, would he be kind enough to bring something in tomorrow?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, I can try to get a progress report for tomorrow. I am sure my honourable friend is aware of the fact that the Minister of Finance has been asked a number of questions on this same subject, and perhaps both of us could have some illumination on the situation by reading those answers.

Senator Muir: That is all well and good—read a book, read the answers, and so on—but I think this minister is here to provide answers and I hope he is going to do that; not tell us to read some document. This is another chamber, and the minister possibly—just possibly—may have a different answer from that given in the other place, which has happened on occasion.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it has happened less often than many members sitting opposite would like it to happen. In any event, I shall look into this. If the honourable senator is asking for the position of the government, he will realize that the other people I have mentioned are also members of the government, and therefore their views carry as much—and in some cases more—weight than what I could research independently—

Senator Flynn: I entirely agree.

Senator Olson: —because of the part of the country that I come from.

Senator Muir: I do not agree with that. I think the honourable senator has great weight in the cabinet, as he had in the other place when we served there together. I have no doubt about that, and I am sure he will work like a son of a gun to assist the Sydney Steel Corporation and the workers of the Sydney Steel Corporation.

Having said that, let's look forward to some positive answers. This offer of financial assistance has been outstanding now for some months, but it has never been forthcoming. I realize that there is a problem in this instance in terms of rejuvenating the plant in question to the point where it can be viable, but I do hope that something will be forthcoming very shortly.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. I remind him that on July 14 last he undertook to produce certain papers for me with respect to communications between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States on the Garrison Dam project.

Is that information now available?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information today on the Garrison Dam project. However, it may not be the information which the Honourable Senator Roblin requested. The information I have deals with the new allocation of funds by the United States Congress. Is that of interest to the honourable senator?

I do not have the documentation requested, but I do have further information about the Garrison Dam project with me this afternoon.

Senator Roblin: I shall be pleased to have that further information. The point at issue the last time was an assurance from the Government of the United States that there would be no prospect of water from their watershed moving into the Canadian watershed. I appreciate that there have been some developments since then, and I had expected to ask a question respecting them. No doubt my honourable friend has some further information, and I would be pleased to have that.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is reference to various projects which may, in part at least, answer the inquiry the honourable senator made some time ago. I regret that the information requested has not yet been made available. The specific information requested will be sought once again; hopefully, it can be provided this week.

The Government of Canada regrets the decision of the United States Congress to allocate additional funds to this project, particularly in view of the strong efforts made to acquaint the United States government and Congress with Canada's concerns in this matter. We have received assurances that no final decisions regarding the expenditure of the new appropriations have yet been made. We have sent a diplomatic note requesting information on precisely how the money will be spent.

We expect that any decisions will fully reflect previous United States commitments to Canada, including the 1977 formal undertaking not to let a contract for the construction of the Lone Tree Dam until bilateral consultations have been held on the 1977 report of the International Joint Commission.

The government is continuing to follow all project developments very closely, and is taking steps to ensure that Canada's interests in this matter are protected.

However, as I stated a moment ago, the specific documents requested by the honourable senator will be sought, and I thank him for reminding me of the commitment to provide this information.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I wish to express my concern about the statement the minister just made in respect to this matter, because he left me with the impression that the sole American undertaking was that they would have further bilateral discussions based on the 1977 situation. That was not the impression that was left with me on July 14 last. At that time I was left with the impression that there was a written statement by the American government that they would not merely indulge in discussions—because we know what can happen in discussions; people go their own way in spite of them—but there was a firm undertaking that the watersheds would not be interfered with.

I must say that I place no confidence at all in the statements of the Government of the United States that would lead us to believe that there will be no interference with the watersheds. Everything I have seen indicates that they are simply making statement after statement, which are largely meaningless, while proceeding, albeit a good deal slower than they otherwise might, with the very works that are going to do the damage the ecology of the province of Manitoba, which so many of us fear.

I urge my honourable friend to get beyond the discussion stage and see if we can get a firm undertaking from the Government of the United States that they will respect the spirit of the International Joint Committee's recommendations, regardless of the legal situation, and conform with that good neighbour policy which we all admire so much.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question is an important one, and I agree with the honourable senator that a more comprehensive statement is required. I hope to present such a statement about the situation to the Senate. If it can be presented tomorrow afternoon, then it shall be done. It seems to me that some of the actions by Congress may well indicate the degree of election fever gripping that nation at the present time. I suggest that we should, perhaps, view some of these announced actions in the perspective of the present situation down there.

Senator Roblin: All the more reason to be vigilant, if I may express that opinion.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PROPOSED LOAN TO U.S.S.R FOR COAL PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, if I may continue with a question to the Honourable the Minister of State for Economic Development, I would ask him if he has had any communication with the Government of British Columbia respecting a proposal of the Export Development Corporation to lend $180 million to the U.S.S.R. in connection with a coal project in that country. I would like to know if such a proposal has been considered by the Export Development Corporation, whether they are proceeding with it, and perhaps we could have some comments from the minister as to its implications for the coal industry in Canada.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have read some of the press reports concerning that, and I shall therefore check into it to get the detailed information requested. I think the press also indicated that some level of approval of that application was given two, three or four years ago.

APPOINTMENT

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Leader of the Government concerning Indian Affairs. Some months ago there was the appointment of a person who is stationed in Washington, D.C. I have not been able to get information as to the advantage this has for the Indians of Canada. I would very much like to know the main purpose for this person's appointment and what, in fact, the duties are.

[Senator Roblin.]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That question will be taken as notice.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

ATTEMPTED TAKEOVER OF ROYAL TRUSTCO BY CAMPEAU CORPORATION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have three delayed answers to give today.

I wish to reply first to Senator Haidasz' question of October 7 regarding the attempted takeover of Royal Trustco by the Campeau Corporation and the proposed takeover bid of the National Trust Company.

I am advised by my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, that an inquiry is currently in progress by the director appointed under the Canada Business Corporations Act into the bid for ownership and control of shares of Royal Trustco Limited by the Campeau Corporation. When the inquiry is concluded, the director will submit a report to the minister. I shall be pleased, at that time, to provide the honourable senator with whatever information is available.

With reference to the proposed takeover bid of the National Trust Company, I wish to advise the honourable senator that the National Trust Company is not a federally-incorporated corporation and, therefore, does not fall under the Canada Business Corporations Act. The Director of Corporations therefore, has no jurisdiction to inquire into any matter relating to that corporation.

As to the honourable senator's supplementary question regarding the government's intention to introduce a new Trust Companies Act or a new Loan Companies Act, or amendments, I wish to indicate that during the Bank Act revision process the government has indicated it would be introducing new savings bank legislation. In developing this legislation, questions of concentration of ownership will be reviewed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question respecting the investigations of the proposed takeover of Royal Trustco by Mr. Campeau? Will these investigations also look into the acquisition by the Toronto-Dominion Bank and others of quite a large amount of the stock of the Royal Trust Company?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall convey that information to the director.

ENERGY

STATUS OF APPLICATION BY Q & M PIPE LINES TO CONSTRUCT A PIPELINE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to a question asked by Senator Donahoe yesterday concerning the status of the application by Q & M Pipe Lines to build a pipeline through Quebec to the maritime provinces.

As I indicated in my preliminary reply, it remains government policy to have this pipeline completed as rapidly as possible. The first application to the National Energy Board resulted in a rejection of the portion of the pipeline from Quebec City to the maritimes, primarily on the basis of unsatisfactory information about environmental concerns. The company has now put further information before the National Energy Board, and that information is being considered. As soon as a decision is forthcoming I shall be most pleased to inform honourable senators.

I should add that I indicated yesterday—and I want to clear this up although it was not entirely erroneous—that perhaps no further action could be taken until a new application came before the National Energy Board. I want to correct that by the answer I gave today, that new information is being given to the National Energy Board respecting a previous application, or the application which was dealt with before.

FINANCE

RELATIONSHIP OF GOLD RESERVES TO MONEY SUPPLY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I should at this stage like to clarify the reply I gave to Senator Smith yesterday. I understand the question correctly now, and I checked Hansard to make sure that I did.

If you calculate the value of our gold reserves of 21 million ounces using its former official price of about U.S. $46 an ounce, then the gold reserves held in the Exchange Fund Account constitute 25 per cent of the book value of Canada's official international reserves. If, however, you calculate the value of the gold reserves at current market prices of approximately U.S. $670 per ounce then the gold reserves in the Exchange Fund Account constitute over 80 per cent of our international reserves which, as the honourable senator will realize, is unusually high.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ALGERIA—AID TO EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Macquarrie asked a question concerning the situation in Algeria.

Our embassy in Algiers confirms that no Canadians were injured as a result of the earthquake. The embassy is keeping us informed on a regular basis.

The Prime Minister, in the name of the Government and the people of Canada, has sent a message of sympathy to the Algerian authorities. Beyond that, Canada has sent as immediate aid $250,000 through the Canadian Red Cross. The Government of Quebec has also contributed $50,000. The federal government is presently studying Algerian requests for material aid.

IRAQI-IRANIAN WAR

NUMBER OF CANADIANS REMAINING IN WAR ZONE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked concerning the Iraqi-Iranian War. A check has been made with officials in the Department of External Affairs, and they have assured me that there are only 25 to 30 Canadians left in Iraq, including embassy staff, and another 30 in Iran. There has been no change in that situation for some time.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TERMS OF SETTLEMENT OF STRIKE OF CLERICAL AND REGULATORY EMPLOYEES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with respect to the strike of clerical and regulatory employees Senator Flynn, on October 8, asked to be informed of the difference between the settlement and what was offered before the strike began. The reply I have is rather detailed, and it includes a number of statistics. I propose that it be made part of today's record.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

On September 26, 1980, the Honourable Donald Johnston, President of the Treasury Board, tabled the following position with the Public Service Alliance of Canada (PSAC), bargaining agent for the Clerical and Regulatory Group:

1. A two-year collective agreement effective November 12, 1979;

2. Wages:

(a) For the period November 12, 1979, to November 11, 1980, a lump-sum payment equal to the greater of $1,500 or 10 per cent of salary as of November 11, 1979 (pro-rated for employees on strength for less than the twelve-month period);

(b) effective November 12, 1980, an increase of 20 per cent to all wage rates in the scale of rates in effect as of November 11, 1979.

3. Other Benefits:

(a) Increased benefits related to family responsibilities;

(b) five weeks' annual vacation leave after 22 years of service;

(c) the offer also included increases to other monetary conditions such as shift premium, weekend premium, etc.;

The settlement reached on October 7, 1980, provided for:

1. A two-year collective agreement effective November 12, 1979;

2. Rates of Pay:

Increases in rates of pay as follows:

November 12, 1979—10%

November 12, 1980—9%

May 12, 1981—4%

3. Lump Sum Payment:

In respect to the period 12 November 1979 to 11 November 1980, each employee whose rate of pay increases less than $1,500 by virtue of the application of the above 10% increase shall receive a lump-sum payment equal to the difference between their 10% increase in rate of pay and $1,500. For employees on strength for less than the full 12 months or who work less than an average of 37½ hours per week, the lump-sum will be pro-rated. The lump-sum will be subject to superannuation deductions, and will be used in addition to the 10% salary increase in the first year for the retroactive application of overtime compensation and severance pay for those employees eligible by virtue of the Retroactive Remuneration Regulations.

4. Other Benefits:

(a) Increased benefits related to family responsibilities;

(b) Five weeks' annual vacation leave after 22 years of service;

(c) Increases to other monetary conditions such as shift premium, weekend premium, etc.

5. Disciplinary Action

Review by a joint committee of disciplinary action arising from incidents related to the strike as described in the statement by the President of the Treasury Board.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

RESPONSIBILITY TO CABINET

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on June 27 Senator Nurgitz put the following question to me:

> In light of the further revelations at the McDonald Commission inquiry that some members of the RCMP disclosed information to the minister, some did not, and others only doing so if they were asked, can the leader assure us that there is now in place and working a procedure and practice that overcomes this circus and ensures to the people of Canada that the minister responsible is informed?

In answer to that I say that the government is, indeed, aware of the past situation in which Solicitors General were not fully informed of important matters related to the operations of the RCMP. It is expected that the McDonald Commission will make recommendations on this issue. In the meantime, the Solicitor General is being kept more fully informed of RCMP activity.

AIRLINES

GREAT LAKES AIRLINES SERVICE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on July 15 Senator Thompson asked a question regarding the number of times over the past several months that Great Lakes Airlines had failed to service the airport at Peterborough for reasons other than weather.

May I propose that the rather detailed reply here be made part of today's record?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The following information is provided: for the period April 1, 1980, to August 12, 1980:

Number of Flights Scheduled: 213

Number of Flights Operated: 162

Number of Flights Cancelled: 51

Reasons for Cancellations:

32 flights cancelled due to a strike on the part of maintenance staff;

9 flights cancelled due to mechanical problems;

6 flights cancelled due to weather;

3 flights not operated through Peterborough due to no passenger on or off; and

1 flight cancelled due to airport being closed on account of a disabled aircraft blocking the runway.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

FEDERAL AID FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TRADE AND CONVENTION CENTRES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on July 14 Senator Guay asked a question concerning federal aid for construction of trade and convention centres.

The new national program of financial assistance for trade and convention centres was designed primarily to encourage the construction of new facilities. While a proposal from the City of Winnipeg for assistance to projects involving expansion or enlargement of existing facilities would not be specifically excluded, cabinet would be disposed to review such a request in the light of the following two points: first, an annual cap of $15 million has been placed by cabinet on the program which must accommodate funding already approved for new facilities in certain other cities, as well as include current and anticipated proposals from cities planning new facilities; second, one of the principles governing consideration for participation in the program is that federal assistance cannot exceed provincial assistance. Thus, some form of provincial involvement in a convention expansion plan for Winnipeg would be necessary.

The honourable senator should be assured, however, that a request from Winnipeg for federal government assistance for an expansion of its convention facilities will be reviewed as consistent with the criteria of the federal government's Trade and Convention Centre Program.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HAITIAN REFUGEES—CANADIAN INVOLVEMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Senator Macquarrie asked a question on June 10, 1980, concerning the Haitian refugees.

Canada, in line with recent visa policy elsewhere in the world, now requires visas for Haitians who visit Canada. This measure will facilitate the entry of Haitian visitors at ports of entry. It will also reduce the illegal inflow of Haitians. Canada will accept 300 Haitians under its 1980 refugee and humanitarian program. This group will comprise persons who are in a precarious economic situation outside of Haiti, and who have family members in Canada. These measures were discussed with the Quebec government prior to their implementation.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 44 OF PROPOSED CONSTITUTION ACT, 1980

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to the question asked by Senator Flynn on October 7, 1980, concerning a legal opinion on the constitutionality of the proposed resolution for a joint address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

As the honourable senator knows, with his profound knowledge of parliamentary procedure, a minister does not have to give a legal opinion on such a matter. In this case the minister has declined, with thanks.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He can give his interpretation anyway, even if it is not a legal opinion.

Senator Perrault: The minister is not willing to provide that.

Senator Flynn: That is a better answer.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING PROGRAM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Murray on October 7 concerning the continuation of a government advertising program on constitutional affairs.

Phase one of the constitutional advertising carried on and paid for out of public funds by the federal government should widely reflect Parliament. It is felt that those advertisements run in the month of August did just that. No constitutional advertisements have been featured since September 8, and the billboard advertising expired October 15. There has been no decision on a further constitutional campaign.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

FEDERAL AID FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TRADE AND CONVENTION CENTRES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Yesterday Senator Roblin asked me to locate, if possible, a copy of the letter to the Mayor of Winnipeg from the Honourable Charles Lapointe, Minister of State for Small Businesses.

I have obtained the letter from the Honourable Charles Lapointe to the Mayor of Winnipeg and I shall be happy to provide the honourable senator with a copy. If he prefers to have the letter made part of today's record, I shall be pleased to do that.

Senator Roblin: Just a copy will be fine. Thank you.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

ACCEPTANCE OF RESOLUTION BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Flynn asked a question on October 8 concerning the acceptance of the constitutional resolution by the British government.

The government has no reason to think that the United Kingdom government would do other than accede to a request from the Canadian Parliament to patriate the Constitution. Of course, in the view of the government that is precisely what the constitutional convention requires of the United Kingdom government. It is also precisely what British leaders have assured the Canadian government that they are prepared to do.

The government has been assured by the highest political authorities in the United Kingdom that, in accordance with existing constitutional convention, the British government will act upon a request of the Canadian Parliament to patriate the Constitution.

PUBLIC WORKS

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS UNDER RRAP AND CHIP SINCE INCEPTION OF PROGRAMS

Question No. 10 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. Since the inception of the RRAP program,

(a) what was the total amount allocated by province per year, and

(b) how many homeowners were given assistance in each federal constituency in Newfoundland, per year?

2. Since the inception of the CHIP program,

(a) what was the total amount allocated by province, per year, and

(b) how many homeowners were given assistance in each federal constituency in Canada, per year?

Reply by the Minister of Public Works:

1. (a) See Table I.

(b) Data compiled by CMHC on programs under the National Housing Act are not based on federal electoral constituencies, but on municipalities and municipal counties.

2. (a) See Table II

(b) CHIP statistics are available on a provincial basis only.

Minimum Organizational Standards for Contracts

In view of the many types of CRC's, it is not possible to develop one set of operational standards to apply to all of them. However, the Correctional Service of Canada requires that the following minimum organizational standards be met for a CRC to qualify for initiation or renewal of a contract, to ensure a consistent basic level of CRC operations and at the same time provide freedom of scope for program innovation:

i) that the Centre be provincially or federally incorporated as a non-profit organization;

ii) that the Centre maintain and provide to the Solicitor General or to such person(s) as he may direct, financial records, namely, a budget, record of income and expenditures and a fully audited annual financial statement as may be requested by a representative of the Ministry;

iii) that the Centre provide room and board and supervisory personnel available on a 24-hour basis (except in cases of minimal service facilities, where a facility meets the minimum organizational standards but provides only a minimal level of service such as room only).

iv) that the Centre has a clearly defined program statement including admission policy, program description, termination policy;

v) that the Centre has a policy which requires the reporting of infractions of the law, and terms and conditions of release, to the CSC district office representative.

SMALL LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, October 7, the debate on the motion of Senator Barrow for the second reading of Bill C-44, to amend the Small Loans Act and to provide for its repeal and to amend the Criminal Code.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, technically the explanation given by Senator Barrow on the legislation is unimpeachable. In effect this legislation is aimed at eventually repealing by proclamation the Small Loans Act, and introduces a new concept in the Criminal Code section establishing a criminal interest rate. In other terms, if you lend money at 60 per cent interest you commit a crime, while at 59 per cent it remains perfectly legal. Such is the situation proposed by the bill.

There are two aspects of course. Why repeal the Small Loans Act? The sponsor of the bill told us this was the only protection available against loan sharks. So it would disappear, only to be replaced by a new provision in the Criminal Code that would establish 60 per cent and more as a criminal interest rate. The technical aspect of repealing the Small Loans Act is a problem of interest to whom? The Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was suggested by the sponsor as the one the bill should be referred to. On the other hand, the new proposed section 301 of the Criminal Code is a problem that in my view is the responsibility of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I feel of course that the bill should be first referred to the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to determine the practical, technical consequence of repealing the Small Loans Act, but that later the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs should look into that new provision.

I know that during the short time I was Minister of Justice, I had been asked to consider such a provision. I strongly opposed it. At that time—and I remember they had not convinced me—I felt horrified that someone should be considered as operating within the law as a result of a change in the interest rate to 59 per cent. This is a situation that in my view would please Shylocks, but which otherwise would afford no real protection since in the case of loan sharks the problem is not really the interest rate but how to go about getting their money back, collecting loans and interest on those loans, whether through blackmail, violence, etc. Therefore the bill has not much appeal to me. I find it distasteful. This really looks "fishy" to me. I am very curious to know what the committees, that is the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will have to say about that. For the time being, we will let it go through second reading and will determine in committee what this really entails.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the debate on behalf of Senator Barrow, may I be allowed to add a few comments on the intervention of the Leader of the Opposition.

I merely want to draw your attention to the fact that the principle, which he himself pointed out, is in fact a question that should be of concern not only to honourable senators but to the public generally. For, if I remember correctly, in his remarks Senator Barrow mentioned the fact that 60 per cent, or rather 59 per cent, was not necessarily permitted. But, at the same time, since mention has been made of 60 per cent, for the public in general the conclusion is that the rate of 59 per cent of interest is allowed. So, I agree wholeheartedly with the Leader of the Opposition. I am sure Senator Barrow will also agree. We trust the committee will concentrate its efforts, not only on that question, but will accept the fact that this aspect is of prime importance. I thank you indeed for giving me this opportunity of making a few remarks.

I now move adjournment of the debate, on behalf of Senator Barrow, provided no other senator wishes to speak on the matter. So, it is agreed, and I thank you.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Why not refer the bill to the committee immediately?

Senator Frith: Simply because Senator Barrow is sponsor of the bill and I feel he should be given the courtesy of closing the debate.

Senator Flynn: Senator Barrow is its sponsor and its "patron", in the pejorative sense.

Senator Frith: I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his correction. He has added a word to my French vocabulary.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Barrow, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED RESOLUTION FOR A JOINT ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada", tabled in the Senate on 6th October, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we know, at least for the moment, that there will not be any intervention today on behalf of the opposition. Also we have a committee meeting at the present time and another scheduled to meet when the Senate rises. I therefore propose the adjournment of this debate on behalf of Senator Lamontagne. I defer to the honourable senator and ask that this order stand in his name until tomorrow.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

CANADA AND THE COMMONWEALTH CARIBBEAN AREA

DESIRABILITY OF CLOSER COMMERCIAL AND CULTURAL RELATIONS—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, July 16, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Macquarrie calling the attention of the Senate to the desirability of promoting closer commercial and cultural relations between Canada and the communities of the Commonwealth Caribbean and, in particular, to the desirability of recommending to the government that steps be taken to provide for

(a) subsidization of ocean transport between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean area;

(b) assistance in the upgrading of the seaports of Atlantic Canada;

(c) tariff changes to facilitate the exchange of commodities between the two areas;

(d) greater exchange of students between the two areas; and

(e) assistance to encourage meetings of political, business and educational leaders of the two areas with a view to stimulating a mutually advantageous north-south exchange of goods, people, services and technology.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, believe it or not, I am somewhat surprised that finally this measure has come forward, because we have had some near misses. Although my appearance would not indicate it, I felt very much like the bridesmaid who never really has made it until today. So I am overwhelmed.

I was chatting with Senator Frith at the beginning of our sitting, and we heard tremendous noises in the distance. But remembering my English poet I sent not to ask for whom the bell tolled, but I was delighted that, in fact, it stopped before I was asked to make my harmonic contribution to today's proceedings.

Those of you who know the sport of harness racing will know that in the days before the automatic starting gate there was that activity before the race got under way which was called scoring. I have not been scoring points, but I have been "scoring" on this item for some little time.

I am happy to have the opportunity to discuss this matter which is very dear to my heart. It is an item which, in exactly the same words but in a slightly different form, because the rules were different, I presented in the House of Commons where I was a member for some time. In saying that, I wish to assure honourable senators that I have no intention of boring them with old speeches that I have used before. Why should I bore you with old ones when it is just as easy to bore you with a new one? That is my outlook on life, being a progressive young man.

Mr. Forrestall, my former colleague in the other place, and my successor as chairman of the Atlantic caucus of my party, has a private member's motion, as they call it, in his name, the wording of which is identical. So we are somewhat like the government in its presentation of a joint resolution, except that we in the Senate have shown greater despatch and are commencing the inquiry rather than having to await its commencement in the House of Commons. However, it is not because of Mr. Forrestall's lack of concern, but rather because of the procedures and agenda there.

I believe that for us to concentrate our interest and strengthen our purposes in reference to the Commonwealth Caribbean is a most worthwhile endeavour, and the more I reflect upon this over the years, and the more I have become acquainted with the area and its wonderful people, the more firmly am I convinced that this indeed should be a high priority.

We look across the world and say, "What are those things upon which we should concentrate; to which should we give priority?", and it is not easy to provide an answer, because Canada, although not a great power, is a very important world power, with many interests and a wide range of activities, as it should have. But it seems to me that the Commonwealth Caribbean has special situations which can, I believe, justify a strong interest and a strengthened interest.

I would invoke history. Before we were an independent country, before, indeed, we had earned the right to conduct our own foreign policy, in the days before 1917, which I would say was the time that Sir Robert Borden brought us through to full international independence, from 1890 to 1895, to the first decade of the twentieth century, we had international gatherings with the leaders of the Commonwealth Caribbean, or the British Caribbean, or the British West Indies, as it may have been called. In 1885 Sir John A. Macdonald acquired a special adviser on West Indian affairs. This reminds me of Professor Ivan Head's important role in our own time! We also had Canadian royal commissions studying the situation of improving trade between the various regions. There were meetings in this city in 1912, 1920 and 1925 and, finally, a most impressive meeting chaired by Mr. Pearson in 1966, which was a culmination of a mutual recognition of special relationships, special ties, close ties. I also remember being very proud when the Diefenbaker government made what was at that time an exceptional and interesting contribution to the then existing Federation of the West Indies. It was very forward-looking, and, indeed, quite unique in many ways.

That is the historic aspect. Obviously, however, there is also the geographic aspect, and we in Atlantic Canada—and our departing colleague, Senator Norrie, for whom I have the greatest admiration would agree—have always had a special relationship with the people to the south. This has not all been based on the fact that we sold them codfish and brought back rum—and there, except for nutrition's sake, we had by far the better bargain, in my opinion. We have in Atlantic Canada a race of rum drinkers, if I may use the word "race" for alliteration. I believe that the people of the four eastern provinces buy more rum—and if they buy it you may be sure they drink it—than all other spirits combined. We have, I think, the Caribbean people to thank for that.

But the situation involves more than fun in the sun and rum in the sun—both of which we find stronger than we are used to, with the possibility of what we might call short-term pain.

I am troubled, and I am sure many are troubled, about the future of our own region in Canada. We see the fulcrum of economic power moving ever westward; we see our relative strength, economically and politically, diminishing, and we wonder what we can do. I do not have any simplistic or simple answers, but I do agree that one thing we seem to have lost is the vital reality of an earlier day when our seaward location was a good thing. It was important for us in an earlier age to be a sea-girt land. We were on the corridors of commerce. We were in a good location for important trade. Now what are we? We are the remote eastern terminal of a transportation system, and sometimes we feel we are getting more and more remote as the years go by while great development takes place elsewhere.

I do not think it is too late to re-emphasize the importance of the movement of people and goods by sea. That is why I knew, without being a shrewd businessman, or a prophet, or the son of a prophet, that when we let our merchant navy go down we were in trouble, and that when we neglected our seaports we were in even more trouble.

There are opportunities yet for important trade and the facilitation of the transport of goods and people. That is why the Atlantic region must maximize its economic advantage, which is a rule or a law of economics—one of the few things about that subject that I could really understand.

I believe that there are many things we could do in the realm of trade with our eastern seaboard. One of the best speeches that the present Prime Minister made was his address to the Saint John Board of Trade some time ago, suggesting that it was incumbent upon the people of the Canadian Atlantic region to foster and encourage north-south trade, and I re-echo that point of view.

Perhaps there is an element of the sentimental here, because we like these people, and I am very happy to see the distinguished diplomats from that area in the gallery today. I am far too emotional and sentimental a man to start talking about hard-nosed decisions. I do not like people with hard noses. But I believe that in this there is a pragmatic element which is fundamental. Some of our greatest problems in our program of external outreach have come from the fact that we have got into situations that we do not understand.

The horror stories about our various foreign programs have developed from that kind of situation, in which we do not quite understand the socio-economic pattern, as a result of which we get into trouble, our efforts are frustrated, and the people we are trying to help are bewildered. Here, in the Commonwealth Caribbean, is a group of people that we know. They know us, and, God help them, they still like us, which is quite a compliment. We know their system. Generally speaking we know their language. We have had many decades of association. More significant still, there is, in the Commonwealth Caribbean, a collection of very, very small communities with very, very large problems. Not one of them, however, has a problem or a series of problems that is so large or so monumental that Canada cannot assist it to cope with them. Some of the problems of this planet are far beyond this Dominion of Canada, no matter how wealthy it might be, and no matter how well it might be faring economically. But in the region to the south there is community after community, state after state, where our involvement and co-operation could mean the difference between a viable polity and a prosperous economy, and something very very different.

It is said, and this is the jargon of the day in external affairs departments, where there is as much jargon as in any other, that this is a destabilizing area. We read about tension and troubles and dramatic social change, and some very, very shortsighted people say, "Oh, be very careful. They are a bunch of leftists. Have nothing to do with them. You cannot trust them." That is the counsel of the faithless and the blind. They look at the beautiful little island of Grenada, for example, which is passing through such traumatic experiences, and say, "We cannot have anything to do with those people. They are accepting aid from the Cubans." Well, why wouldn't they? Is it not likely that we, in similar circumstances, would do the same? What has always troubled me is the folly of the suggestion that, when these countries are going through serious social upheaval, we should put them in a position where their only obvious friends are on the left. I feel we should affirm and reaffirm that their best friends are their old friends. This is why I am very anxious that we stay committed to these people and that we stay involved, as much as they wish us to be involved, with these communities whose political institutions are derived from the same source as our own, many of which have survived and flourished under the most vigorous assaults.

It is inspiring to note some of the legislatures, consisting of perhaps a dozen people, in some of the really small islands of the Caribbean, functioning with all the tradition of the "mother of Parliaments," to use a quaint expression. It seems to me that that is tremendously valuable and, I believe, worth sustaining. I believe these people will not let us down.

I was sorry that we had to be so cold to the Turks and Caicos Islands. I had the honour of leading a parliamentary delegation to those islands nine years ago. The natives were so anxious to become more closely integrated with this country, but the response from Canada was negative. It was the feeling of the Canadian government that if it could not give assistance to everyone down there, whether requested or not, that it should not give it to anyone. Probably what was asked for really was not what was needed anyway. This may not be imperialism, but it looks very much like condescension. I was not happy about that development.

I feel we should respond and assist people with their major development programs. I want to close by saying that one of the finest pieces of work done by the Senate was the exhaustive and most excellent study of Canada-Caribbean relations in a committee headed by the then distinguished senator who is now the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, the Honourable John Aird, with the vice-chairman being our distinguished colleague, Senator Grosart. The committee's report is lauded by Caribbean scholars and statesmen far and wide. However, the subject matter of the report is now ten years old, and I believe it should be updated. Much has happened in that decade in the Commonwealth Caribbean, just as many things have happened in our own country. I would recommend to my colleagues a reawakening of our interest in this part of the world, so close to us in geography; so bound to us in history; so meaningful to us in sentiment; and so vital to us if we want a strong, peaceful and prosperous world.

I would renew my support of the committee's recommendations that we continue to reflect this country's special links with the Commonwealth countries of the Caribbean region, and strengthen and increase dialogue on any suggestion that our neighbours may make for mutual improvement of our lots and goodwill between us.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, October 16, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, there is in the gallery a South African delegation of senators and members of Parliament, accompanied by their Ambassador, His Excellency John J. Becker.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1980-2294, dated August 27, 1980, amending Parts I and II of the schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, pursuant to section 8(3) of the said Act, Chapter H-3, R.S.C., 1970.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report entitled "Child at Risk," a study about childhood experiences as causes of criminal behaviour, by the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. With leave, I should like to make a few remarks on tabling this report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, I am pleased and honoured to have tabled the committee's report entitled "Child at Risk." As honourable senators are aware, on March 23, 1977, during the Second Session of the Thirtieth Parliament, the committee was:

> . . . authorized to inquire into and report upon such experiences in prenatal life and early childhood as may cause personality disorders or criminal behaviour in later life and to consider and recommend such remedial and preventative measures relating thereto as may be reasonably expected to lead to a reduction in the incidence of crime and violence in society;

The subject matter was referred to a subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, and I had the privilege of being chosen the first chairman of that subcommittee.

The first witness was called on June 30, 1977, during the Second Session of the Thirtieth Parliament. Following the retirement of Senator Ches Carter, I became the chairman of the standing committee and my good friend and colleague, Senator McGrand, became chairman of the subcommittee studying this important subject matter which was so dear to his heart.

Therefore, my first words of congratulations would have to go to Senator McGrand, for without his interest and assistance the work of the committee would have been almost impossible.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bonnell: Senator McGrand's lifelong concern about the causes of man's inhumanity, not only to his fellow man but also to other forms of life, is well known. As a country doctor in Fredericton Junction, New Brunswick, he had the unique opportunity to observe the effects of medical treatment on women during pregnancy, on their health and the future health of their children, and to study the causes and effects of the development of babies from childhood to adulthood. For many years during his public career he served his fellow New Brunswickers as Minister of Health and Social Services before being summoned to the Senate. Long before the creation of the subcommittee in search of an explanation for human violence, he began to systematically read the available literature linking the history of human violence and the development of society. It was Senator McGrand's motion in 1977 that authorized the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to undertake this study.

We are all grateful to Senator McGrand for his outstanding contribution to this undertaking, and I wish to express to him the sincere gratitude of the entire committee.

In turn, honourable senators, I would like to express my own personal thanks to the committee members for the diligence and concern with which they approached this difficult subject. Without their devoted attention this report could never have been completed.

I would like to especially thank the steering committee which assisted me so greatly in their final report. The steering committee consisted of the Honourable Florence Bird, Deputy Chairman, the Honourable Fred McGrand, the Honourable Jack Marshall and the Honourable Andrew Thompson. To these senators I express my appreciation and gratitude for many, many hours of hard work, their encouragement and support.

A word of thanks is also due to our staff, both part time and full time, whose special knowledge and expertise are manifest in every page of the document. In pursuit of our mandate, our researchers reviewed all available literature on this subject; we heard briefs from outstanding authorities across Canada and throughout the United States. Testimony was received from expert witnesses in the fields of psychology, sociology, mental health, anthropology, education, criminology, family study and, of course, medicine and law.

Let me say frankly that this report does not pretend to give all the answers or to offer all the solutions to the vexing problems of neglect, abuse and deprivation. We do not have all the answers, nor do I believe that any other body of citizens has all the answers.

Well, you might ask, what have we done? We have merely touched the perimeters of the problem in the hope that a concerned and sensitive citizenry will recognize the scope of the problem and the need for action.

• (1410)

We know that the cost of maintaining people in our correctional institutions is enormous and now exceeds half a billion dollars a year.

We know that a pattern of crime begun in early life tends to perpetuate itself unless something is done about it.

We know, clearly, that the influences of childhood have some direct causal bearing on all of that, and we become alarmed when we hear that juvenile crime increased nearly 60 per cent from 1975 to 1979.

We know that many of the hazards of prenatal life and early childhood place a child at risk.

What we do not know is how the susceptibilities of those vulnerable years are translated into the violent, anti-social behaviour of later life. And it is our hope that this report will be taken seriously by social scientists, sociologists, psychiatrists, criminologists, psychologists and anthropologists. We hope that it will be taken seriously by medical personnel and other university specialists, such as philosophers and environmentalists. We hope that it will be taken seriously by those in the private sector, such as industrial psychologists and economists and other qualified citizens such as family physicians, family counsellors, teachers, social workers and others.

It is my hope and the hope of this committee that the 28 recommendations of this report will play some special role in our search for effective and preventative measures to curtail the amount of violent crime in this country and thereby add some validity to the adage that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

Honourable senators, I found a small piece of poetry, the author of which is unknown, which I thought shone a lot of light on the subject of "Child at Risk" and which I would like to quote:

If a child lives with criticism, he learns to condemn.

If a child lives with hostility, he learns to fight.

If a child lives with fear, he learns to be apprehensive.

[Senator Bonnell.]

If a child lives with pity, he learns to feel sorry for himself.

If a child lives with encouragement, he learns to be confident.

If a child lives with jealousy, he learns to hate.

If a child lives with praise, he learns to appreciate.

If a child lives with approval, he learns to like himself.

If a child lives with recognition, he learns to have a goal.

If a child lives with fairness, he learns justice.

If a child lives with honesty, he learns what truth is.

If a child lives with friendliness, he learns that the world is a nice place in which to live.

Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Marshall, that the report be placed on the order paper for further consideration next Tuesday.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move, seconded by Senator Perrault, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, October 21, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS

STUDY BY TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE - NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, October 21, 1980, I will move that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine and report upon the subject matter of the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act, Chapter 36, Statutes of Canada, 1980, and any regulations that may be made thereunder.

It may seem a little strange to honourable senators that we are talking about examining a statute rather than a bill. Perhaps I may be permitted to explain now, so that honourable senators will have an opportunity to familiarize themselves with the subject before Tuesday.

Honourable senators will remember that on July 17 last, at the request of the government, particularly the Minister of Transport, the Senate was asked to give third reading to Bill C-18, to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods, so that it might receive royal assent on that day, or the next day, upon the undertaking that when we reassembled in the fall the Minister of Transport would co-operate with the committee in having the committee make now the study that it would ordinarily have made of the bill before it was passed. I have a letter confirming this from the minister. This notice, therefore, is given pursuant to that undertaking. Discussion of this matter will be found in Senate Hansard for July 17, 1980, at page 729. The report itself is at page 734.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

UTILIZATION OF OIL DRILLING RIGS

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. A Globe and Mail story this morning claims that drilling rig utilization will decline from 100 per cent in 1980 to 59 per cent of capacity by December, 1981. Would the minister tell us how many rigs have already left Canada, and is the government aware of why this exodus is taking place?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will have to seek the information as to the exact number of rigs that may have left Canada. There are, of course, rigs moving both ways across the border, depending upon the drilling contracts that are let, and who gets them. Over the last several years Canadian expertise and capability in this field of activity have gone up very substantially, and, of course, Canadians are participating to a much larger degree in drilling activities in the United States. I will try to get some information as to the movement of rigs in both directions.

DOMESTIC OIL—CALCULATION OF COST OF PRODUCTION

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, may I also pose a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development? The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, earlier this week, stated that the Government of Canada intends to impose a Canadian petroleum price based on the Canadian cost of production. Would the honourable gentleman indicate more precisely how his government proposes to calculate the cost of production of domestically produced oil?

• (1420)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to examine the statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a little more fully before making a response to the question because there may be a slightly different interpretation possible than the one that has just been made.

Senator Flynn: Several.

Senator Olson: We announced as long as nine or ten months ago that we believed that a price for Canadian energy supplies ought to be based on Canadian circumstances and not necessarily tied to decisions made outside this country, whether they are made for economic or political reasons. To that extent there is no question about it. However, in connection with the part of the preamble to the question where the word "imposed" and other words such as that are used, I am not quite sure that that is the only interpretation which can be put on the minister's statement.

Senator Flynn: There could be several interpretations.

Senator Balfour: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the honourable gentleman. The precise quotation is as follows:

> MR. LALONDE: With regard to fairness, first of all we will put a price on oil in Canada which will be related to Canadian cost of production and which will not depend on the gyrations of the international cartel, OPEC.
> MR. CROSBY: Why don't you call it a "made-in-Canada" price?
> MR. LALONDE: Yes, it will be a made-in-Canada price based on the Canadian cost of production.

We would be interested in knowing just what components will be taken into account in calculating the Canadian cost of production. More precisely, would you take into account, for example, the total exploration expenditures in Canada in seeking Canadian domestic production of oil; provincial royalties; ordinary lifting costs; and the cost of development drilling? Just what components would go into the conclusion pursuant to which you would arrive at your Canadian cost of production?

That is my question, and I think it is a straightforward question. I will understand if the honourable gentleman cannot respond to it today, but perhaps he can do so next week when he has had a chance to assemble the data.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take a little time for a more precise answer to the question. I should like to suggest to my honourable friend that apart from all the cost factors that he has mentioned, there will be another one, and that is a reasonable return on investment.

Senator Flynn: In some cases there may be a better return than in others.

EASTERN CANADA—OIL AND PETROLEUM SUPPLIES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to pursue the question of oil supply with the Minister of State for Economic Development and draw his attention to a statement in the press today that the oil stocks in eastern Canada are still below normal. Does he agree with this statement? Does he think that normal stocks in eastern Canada will be adequate to meet the situation he might foresee in connection with the supply of this commodity?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I think at this point I should reply to questions asked by Senators Roblin and Donahoe earlier this week concerning the supplies of oil in eastern Canada by providing the latest detailed information about inventories in that region of the country.

The information which I have had prepared—and which I will table for the information of the Senate if that is agreeable to senators—provides a breakdown of crude oil and petroleum products for the Atlantic region and for Canada as at the end of August. In order that senators will be fully informed on the status of supplies, I have had the information assembled in terms of total inventory today compared to 1979, indicating the percentage increases in supplies for the same period of time in both 1979 and 1978. The table also shows the supplies of the various products in terms of days' supply this year in comparison to 1979.

● (1425)

As I stated in my remarks yesterday, we are satisfied that there are no forecasts of shortages in supplies of these products for Canada in general, nor indeed for the Atlantic region. Similarly, the International Energy Agency has recently stated that it is not forecasting oil shortages and will not invoke the sharing provisions of the international agreement.

In direct response to the question that is now put, the fact is that in the Atlantic region, for example, as of the date mentioned there were 12.714 million barrels of oil. A year ago there were 9.695 million barrels of oil, compared with 12.714 million this year, so it is up rather substantially.

There is one component in the total supplies that is down slightly, and that is the middle distillates. Crude oil is up by two million barrels, motor gasoline is up from 2.058 million barrels to 3.932 million barrels, and heavy fuel oil is also up slightly, so the validity of the story, unless it singles out one particular commodity, is questionable. The overall supply of all of these petroleum products is up.

I could also draw attention to the fact that in the overall picture for Canada, a year ago supplies were 59.230 million barrels, and today they are up to 79.720 million, so they are up very significantly in that area too.

I should also point out that, taking the Atlantic region by itself, with respect to the number of days' supply on hand, assuming no incoming supplies, a year ago there were 47 days' supply; this year there are 64 days' supply, so it is up. For all of Canada, a year ago the total number of days' supply in storage was 47 and it is now 58.

As you look over the entire chart in days and in total for the Atlantic region and for all of Canada there is no validity to that argument at all. If they are picking out one single product, namely middle distillates, they can find a slight reduction.

With honourable senators' permission, I will table this information that I have given and the honourable senator can look at it and decide whether or not the story has any credibility.

Senator Olson then tabled:

Copies of document entitled "Atlantic Canada Oil and Petroleum Product Supplies". (English text).

Senator Roblin: I thank the minister for providing the Senate with that information. The story I am referring to, of course, recognizes the fact that there has been an increase in supply this year. They give the figures for heating oil, diesel fuel and heavy fuel oil, and give the percentage increases, so there is no argument about that. I think what the minister might have mentioned is that 1979 was a particularly poor year for stocks, they were really run down in that year, and it does not provide me with much comfort to know that we have now run up to normal, which is what I think the minister is saying to me. He shakes his head, so he has another point of view.

Senator Olson: I do shake my head, because the table indicates very clearly that the supplies we have now are in excess of the supplies on hand in 1978 as well.

Senator Roblin: That is good to know, and I would be interested to look at those figures.

● (1430)

I am not really interested in trying to convict my honourable friend of negligence, because I do not think that charge would hold. I am looking for information, and I am looking for information which gives a picture of the degree of protection we have against these problems.

The reason I ask this question is that I think the International Energy Agency is itself engaged in making a forecast of a less favourable contingency in the future than that which has prevailed so far. I think most estimates of the supply of oil are based upon the hope that the war in the Middle East will not last very long or, if it does, it will not be very disruptive of supplies. Now opinion is beginning to form that that may be an optimistic reading of the situation, with the result that the International Energy Agency is looking into the future to see what the impact of a prolonged war would be in terms of supplies.

I presume my honourable friend will be able to tell me that Canada is taking part in that study insofar as its impact on Canada is concerned, and if he can give me an affirmative answer in that connection I shall ask him to give us the results of that study once the information is in his hands.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can give an undertaking to try to obtain the results of that study. I think we can presume—although I will check this, too—that Canada is involved in that study, because certainly we are one of the partners in that international energy agreement.

As to the other part of the question, no one can predict accurately what might happen as a result of the war. Hopefully, that will settle down. There are some developments taking place in New York today that may lead to a resolution of that problem. But I do not think anyone should try to predict now what the effect of that war might be. Indeed, the fact that it may go on for some days more is of very serious concern to all recipients of oil coming out of that area. As I indicated yesterday, and in at least one other Question Period, some of the suppliers who are not dependent on that waterway have already indicated that they would increase their production to offset, to some extent, the reduced volume of oil moving through it because of the fighting that is going on in that part of the world.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend be good enough to give us the amount of this extra production that is not linked to this area?

Senator Olson: Yes, I shall try to get that information. I did have some of the figures, but I am not sure that I have all of them here, or indeed whether I was viewing them in that context. I will get those figures.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

MINISTER'S ALLEGED STATEMENT ON AMENDING FORMULA

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. My question is not directly related to his ministerial responsibilities.

I read with interest that the minister told a group of Liberal students at the University of Alberta that he disagrees with Prime Minister Trudeau's constitutional amending formula, and agrees with the amending formula supported by Mr. Clark, the Leader of the Opposition, which I think is called the Vancouver formula as compared to the Victoria Charter.

I am wondering whether it is the intention of the minister to fight for this change in the resolution, and whether he is going to proceed with that fight so as to have the resolution amended in the other place before it is referred to committee, or perhaps while it is in committee, or when it is reported back to this chamber. I would like to know when he proposes to fight for his convictions.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I also have the news report in question in front of me, and I want to say to the Leader of the Opposition immediately and categorically that I did not say some of the things I am reported to have said. I did not say, for example, that I disagree with the Prime Minister, and I did not say a number of other things that are in there. But I did say—and perhaps the Leader of the Opposition wants to make a big thing of this—that my own personal preference—

Senator Flynn: I could hardly make a big thing out of any statement of yours.

Senator Olson: —my own personal preference would be for a formula under which no province has a veto. I suppose you could then argue on the basis of the logic that things equal to the same things are equal to each other. All this comes down to the fact that the Victoria Charter formula is a formula under which two provinces would have a veto, whereas I would prefer a formula under which no province has a veto.

The Leader of the Opposition will know, from two experiences in cabinet, that when a cabinet makes a decision, the ministers support that decision even though they may have some slightly different personal preferences. But I can tell him today, without any reservations, that I intend to support the position taken collectively by the cabinet.

Senator Flynn: A supplementary question. Has the minister decided to renounce his principles and not attempt to have the cabinet change its mind?

Senator Perrault: Oh, come on!

Senator Flynn: Come on what?

Senator Perrault: Renunciation?

Senator Olson: I do not believe I have anything to add to the rather full explanation that I gave to the Leader of the Opposition a couple of minutes ago.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: I didn't expect you would, but I did want to hear you say so.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT FORMS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It was announced last week that the government intends to reduce the number of forms it requires to be filed by business and industry.

My question is in two parts. First, does this come at the initiative of the federal government, or was it in response to complaints made to the federal government by industry and business? Secondly, how much saving will be effected by this reduction in the paper burden by both the federal government and business and industry? Have there been any estimates made in that regard?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall have to get the actual figures of the breakdown. As I recall, we anticipate there will be an annual reduction of about $200 million in the cost to business once the reduction in the paper burden that was announced last week has been in effect for a full year. By way of example, the elimination of the requirement for truckers to keep log books will result in a saving of $36 million to that industry. But the major part of the reduction in the paper burden arises from the much shorter period required for the retention of records, which is very expensive.

I do not believe we have calculated the savings accruing to the federal government itself from this reduction in the paper burden, but certainly the fact that the forms no longer have to be printed will result in a significant saving. I shall try to obtain those figures.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ALGERIA—AID TO EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, my question is for the government leader. I am wondering whether there is any further information on Canadian assistance to the earthquake victims in Algeria, and especially in reference to the most welcome information about the shipment of powdered milk announced today.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no further information with respect to the Algerian situation.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

PROPOSED POLITICAL JURISDICTIONS

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the government leader with respect to representations which have been made to the government for the division of the Northwest Territories into two or more political jurisdictions.

● (1440)

The minister will know that the government has appointed two commissions to examine this question. The first was headed by Dr. A. W. R. Carrothers, who reported in 1966 to the then Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the Honourable Arthur Laing, recommending against such a division; and last year the Honourable Bud Drury, who was a special commissioner, made, in effect, the same report on that particular question.

Can the leader advise us whether the government is today considering the representations of the Inuit Tapirisat and the representations of the Dene nation with respect to the division into two or more territories of the present Northwest Territories?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HELSINKI FINAL ACT—INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION AT MADRID REVIEW CONFERENCE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. Against the background of the fact that certain East and West talks concerning a variety of subjects, including violations of human rights contrary to the Helsinki Agreement of 1975, are being held in Madrid commencing on November 11, and in view of the fact that a number of ethnic groups in Canada have urged that Canada should on this occasion speak out strongly against such violations, my question is: Has the government taken note of the views of these ethnic groups, and, if so, has it given, or is it prepared to give, instructions to the Canadian delegation to speak accordingly at Madrid?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, without wishing to interfere in the affairs of any state, the government takes the position that Principle VIII of the Helsinki Final Act commits all signatories of this agreement to respect national rights. Canadian representatives at the Madrid follow-up meeting of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe will ensure that the question of the implementation of Principle VIII will be given appropriate attention.

At the Madrid meeting we will emphasize that the harassment and jailing of members of the Helsinki Monitoring Groups contravenes the spirit and the letter of the principles of the Helsinki Final Act.

[Senator Perrault.]

So far as the Soviet Union is concerned—being one of the nations accused of some harassment and infringement of human rights—we will urge that country and other participating states to live up to their undertakings as signatories to the Helsinki Final Act, particularly with respect to human rights.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question? Does this mean, in effect, that Canada will draw attention to particular incidents of violations, or will it simply make a general representation to the fact that there should not be any violations? In other words, is it going to be a hard or soft sell approach?

Senator Perrault: I want to assure honourable senators that Canada has never been less than forthcoming in its defence of human rights in international forums in the past, and Canadians have made representations on behalf of specific individuals whom, it is alleged, are suffering violations of human rights. Indeed, members of this chamber were part of a parliamentary delegation that visited the Soviet Union two years ago to speak with Soviet officials concerning a number of cases of alleged restriction of human rights.

I can inform the honourable senator that the situation facing certain people has been brought to our attention, and it is expected that when opportunities present themselves representations will go forward on their behalf to those governments concerned. Those people are:

Oles Berdnyk—writer, founding member of Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group. Sentenced in December, 1979, to six years of hard labour, followed by three years of internal exile.

Balys Gajauskas—long-time Catholic and nationalist dissident. Currently serving 10 years of hard labour.

Malva Landa—founding member of the Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group and trustee of the Solzhenitsyn Fund for the aid of the families of political prisoners. Sentenced to five years of internal exile on March 26, 1980, for allegedly slandering the Soviet system.

Yuri Orlov—founding member and group leader of the Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group. Sentenced to the maximum penalty of seven years of hard labour, followed by five years of internal exile for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda". Alleged to be in very poor health.

Viktoras Petkus—long-time Lithuanian Catholic activist; one of the leaders of the Supreme Committee of National Movements in Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania; founding member of Lithuanian Helsinki Monitoring Group. Sentenced in 1978 to three years in prison, seven years of hard labour and five years of internal exile for alleged "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda."

Mykola Rudenko—poet, founding member and group leader of the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group. In 1977 sentenced in a closed trial to seven years of hard labour, followed by five years of internal exile for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda." Said to be in very poor health.

Anatoly Shcharansky—long-time Jewish activist and so-called "refusenik"; one of the founding members of the Moscow Helsinki Group and leading spokesman for the Jewish emigration movement. Sentenced in 1978 to three years in prison and 10 years in a labour camp for alleged "espionage" and "anti-Soviet activity."

Yuri Shukhevych—nationalist dissident; son of an anti-Soviet partisan commander. Sentenced in 1972 to 10 years of imprisonment and five years of internal exile for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda."

Oleksiy Tykhy—founding member Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group. Sentenced in 1977 to 10 years of hard labour and five years of internal exile for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda." Is alleged to be in very bad health.

I want to say, on behalf of the government of this country, that we take a very deep interest in every one of these cases, and any other instance of alleged violation of human rights or violation of the spirit and the letter of the Helsinki Agreement; and at the Madrid meeting Canadian representatives will emphasize that the harassment and jailing of these and other members of the Helsinki Monitoring Groups contravenes the spirit and the letter of the principles of the Helsinki Final Act. Honourable senators and all Canadians can feel assured that the Canadian government is very aware of these alleged violations of human rights, and Canada's position will be one of a vigorous effort to work on their behalf.

Senator Smith: I thank the Leader of the Government for his informative and extensive reply. I thought I heard him say that the various instances which he enumerated will be the subject of representation by the Canadian delegation at the Madrid meeting, to which we have been referring. Did I understand him correctly?

Senator Perrault: Cases such as these will most certainly be brought to the attention of those governments concerned during the conference in Madrid by Canadian representatives there. In addition, honourable senators are aware of the fact that a parliamentary review committee was formed some time ago. It is chaired by Mr. Caccia of the other place, and includes Senate representation. The committee has been hearing representations from ethnic groups prior to the forthcoming Madrid conference, and it is my understanding that all of the delegates to that conference are fully prepared to focus attention on the plight of these and other people whom, it is alleged, have had their human rights violated. In this respect, I would turn for confirmation to Senator Haidasz and Senator Thompson who, among other senators, have demonstrated a long-time interest in the problem of human rights violations throughout the world.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

LEGALITY OF PROPOSED RESOLUTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the government leader. Yesterday I asked if it was the intention of the government to submit to the Supreme Court the question of the legality and constitutionality of the resolution it is proposed we send to Westminster, its amending formula, and the Charter of Rights which it contains. Yesterday the Prime Minister dismissed the idea with the argument that this was a political debate.

I would like the government leader to say if it is the view of the government that, when there is a political connotation attached to a legal problem, that legal problem cannot be submitted to the Supreme Court. Can he amplify, explain or interpret what the Prime Minister really intended to say?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I stated yesterday, the government is firmly convinced that it is proceeding in a legal manner. Further, we intend to proceed with the parliamentary schedule which has been established. The motion is under debate in the House of Commons, and I understand it will be a few days more before we can expect the message. The government intends to proceed with the debating schedule established.

As far as the legal implications of the honourable leader's question are concerned, I am not prepared to offer a legal opinion.

Senator Flynn: And I hope you never will. I did not ask for that. I was asking you to justify the validity of the argument that when there is a political aspect to a question the legal aspect cannot be submitted to a court. That was my question. Believe me, I wasn't asking you for a legal opinion. What I am trying to establish is whether the Leader of the Government is aware that when he tells me that the government is certain about the legality of its position he simply dismisses the opinion of seven, if not all, of the premiers, and many, many experts in constitutional matters who have not only expressed doubts as to the constitutionality of the resolution, but have also in many cases said it was clearly against the legal way of proceeding in this respect, especially when you bear in mind the decision of the Supreme Court in relation to the reference of the Senate provisions of Bill C-60. I am quite sure that legal experts like Senator Goldenberg, for instance, would have some reservations about that and would not entirely support the position of the government.

Senator Perrault: All I can suggest to the Leader of the Opposition is that he may wish to contact Mr. Yves Pratte, and request of him that the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition be called as an expert witness, or that his talents be employed in some other fashion, when the case comes before the courts.

Senator Flynn: You do not have legal experts appearing before the courts. That is something you should know. You should have spoken with Senator Goldenberg before replying as you just did.

IRAQI-IRANIAN WAR

SAFETY OF CANADIANS IN REGION

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. It concerns the conflict or the war between Iran and Iraq.

As you are aware, a great number of Canadians, including my son, are now in Saudi Arabia working for Bell Canada. I had a phone call at noon today telling me that they are concerned about whether or not the government has arranged for their evacuation, since Saudi Arabia has taken a position in favour of Iraq and Iraqi airplanes are now flying regularly over Saudi Arabia and landing at its airports. Canadians over there are worried and wonder if an emergency evacuation plan has been developed, since we know how quickly this problem can become urgent.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have endeavoured to keep the Senate advised on a day-by-day basis with respect to the situation. The last reports received by me from the Office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that Canadian nationals there are in no immediate danger. However, I shall endeavour to secure an up-to-the-minute report as soon as possible. I shall contact my office in an attempt to find out if there is any updated information. I can understand the honourable senator's personal anxiety in addition to his general concern about the situation.

I can say in a general way that we support Security Council resolution 479 of September 28, which calls for a mediated settlement. If it is continued, the war could interrupt oil supplies and destabilize the Middle East region. This is the general policy position which I emphasize. Shipping through the Straits of Hormuz must not be disrupted. Tanker traffic is at present moving fairly normally, and the threat of closure of the strait has receded somewhat but only an end to hostilities will guarantee that war does not spread.

There appears to be no obvious role for Canada in mediating a ceasefire. As I have said previously in this chamber, Islamic countries are best placed to effect this. We still seek room for an impartial international commission to arbitrate the Iran-Iraq boundary. There are talks going ahead in New York today. But as far as the continued safety of Canadian nationals is concerned, information will be secured just as quickly as possible.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: I have been informed that the United States have already developed emergency plans to evacuate American citizens from Saudi Arabia. I believe that our own Department of External Affairs must also be studying various options. However, to reassure the Canadians over there, I believe it would be proper to give them some assurance that there will be no problem if the conflict extends to Saudi Arabia.

Senator Flynn: I agree.

[English]

Senator Perrault: The situation is being monitored and I understand that at this moment a telephone call is being placed. If information becomes available in the next few minutes I shall seek leave to present it.

[Senator Leblanc.]

ENERGY

AVAILABILITY OF SURPLUS ALBERTA GAS TO EASTERN CANADA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to a question asked by Senator Smith during the Question Period on October 15 concerning supplies of surplus Alberta natural gas for the proposed Q and M pipeline to the maritime provinces and the effect of the recently announced contract for gas exports to the northeastern United States.

TransCanada Pipelines (TCPL) announced on Tuesday that it has signed a natural gas sales contract with Boundary Gas Inc. in the United States for export of up to 185 million cubic feet per day of gas over a ten-year period. This contract is, of course, subject to regulatory approval in both Canada and the United States. TCPL has not yet applied to the National Energy Board for an export permit.

I would further like to point out that to date the NEB has assigned all exportable gas to exporters. Before any additional exports would be approved the government would have to be satisfied that gas reserves are surplus to domestic long-term requirements, and this, of course, would include requirements for eastern Canada.

The board will begin hearings on total energy supply and demand in early November. It is expected that the findings would be available early next year, at which time the government would be in a position to determine whether the public interest would be served by the export of additional energy, including gas.

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE TO SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should also like to reply to Senator Muir's question of October 15 regarding federal assistance to the Sydney Steel Corporation.

Honourable senators will be aware that a task force has been struck to develop a business plan for the future operation of the steel plant in Sydney. The task force is expected to complete its report in approximately two weeks. Upon receipt of the report, the federal government will then be in a position to study it and respond.

I would like to take this opportunity to assure Senator Muir that the commitment made by the Government of Canada to the Government of Nova Scotia to provide $50 million in support of modernization of the Sydney Steel plant still stands. I am sure the honourable senator will agree with the Deputy Prime Minister's comments in the other place that the best course of action we should take on this matter is to wait until we have a completed report or plan that fully addresses all aspects of the plant's present and future potential so that when new moneys are spent we will have some assurance that that will result in a viable and certain future for Sysco.

• (1500)

GOVERNMENT FORMS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I have one more delayed answer, and it is to the question Senator Bosa asked earlier today.

The other part of Senator Bosa's question was whether the government had initiated the action to reduce the paper burden. The answer to that question is that the government did, in fact, initiate that action, but that a lot of the action was taken in response to complaints and suggestions that came from business and industry across the country.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 44 OF PROPOSED CONSTITUTION ACT, 1980—ACCEPTANCE OF RESOLUTION BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Riley on October 7, and by Senator Asselin on October 8, 1980, concerning the alleged length of the meeting of the Honourable John Roberts and the Honourable Mark MacGuigan with the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Great Britain. The reports that the ministers in question met with the Right Honourable Margaret Thatcher for only four-and-a-half minutes are false and untrue. The Honourable John Roberts and the Honourable Mark MacGuigan met with Mrs. Thatcher for nearly an hour, and with Her Majesty the Queen for 90 minutes.

I understand the meetings were very productive.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Roblin on July 14, 1980, and again on October 15, 1980, concerning the production of written assurances from the Government of the United States relating to the Garrison Dam project.

As of today, the Government of Canada has received no written assurances from the Government of the United States. Canada has, however, received high level verbal assurances. The diplomatic note which Canada sent to the United States on October 1 asked for written assurances, but no formal answer has yet been received from the U.S. State Department.

SMALL LOANS ACT CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Barrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Riley, for the second reading of the Bill C-44, intituled: "An Act to amend the Small Loans Act and to provide for its repeal and to amend the Criminal Code". (Honourable Senator Barrow).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved by Senator Barrow, seconded by Senator Riley, that this bill be read a second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I mentioned during the second reading debate that possibly this bill should first be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and then to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, because it provides for an amendment to the Criminal Code. It now seems to me that that should be done in the reverse order, since this proposed new section of the Criminal Code is supposed to replace in some manner the provisions of the Small Loans Act. Therefore, I would suggest at this time that perhaps the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce should seek the approval, or the opinion, of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs before dealing with the abrogation of the Small Loans Act.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: If honourable senators are agreed, I will discuss this with the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 21, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 21, 1980

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Report of the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council for the 1979 calendar year, pursuant to section 21(2) of the Employment and Immigration Advisory Council Act, Chapter 54, Statutes of Canada, 1976-77.

PUBLIC OPINION SURVEYS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege respecting the tabling of the document entitled "Public Opinion Surveys." Yesterday I called the contact persons in at least eight government departments or agencies, and in the majority of cases the contact person did not know he was the contact person. In one case I was given four different telephone numbers to call.

Can the Leader of the Government ensure that senators who want some of these public opinion surveys will be informed as to which department they should call and which person should be contacted? Would he also recommend another public opinion survey which would give information on who should be contacted in order to get this information to the public?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator's surprising proposal that we commission yet another inquiry will certainly be taken under advisement.

Senator Flynn: You will probably do it too.

Senator Perrault: However, the surveys tabled this evening should be accessible to the honourable senator. If the honourable senator has any difficulty obtaining information from one of the government departments, may I suggest that he particularize? Let him set forth the specific nature of his inquiry, and I shall certainly do everything I can to facilitate an early answer.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, Chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, presented the following report:

Your committee recommends that its quorum be reduced to five members.

Respectfully submitted,

EARL A. HASTINGS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Flynn: Not tonight. We have to think about it.

Senator Asselin: It is too important.

Senator Buckwold: The opposition needs time to think about it.

Senator Hastings moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1) (a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, October 22, 1980, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN LEADER OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY AND THE PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. I understand that the Prime Minister has received a letter from Mr. Broadbent, the Leader of the New Democratic Party asking—did Senator Guay not understand?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: I am listening to you.

Senator Flynn: If I might be allowed to finish, and if the honourable senator will keep quiet in the meantime—

Senator Guay: You are taking a long time to get it out.

Senator Flynn: You always take a long time to understand.

Senator Guay: I do understand when something makes sense.

Senator Flynn: I doubt it very much, and I am not the only one. I would ask the honourable senator once more to keep quiet. I know he has a loud voice, but when I have the floor he shouldn't interrupt.

Senator Guay: On a point of order, I don't mind the Leader of the Opposition speaking out of turn but his ears must be wobbling, because he is surely picking the wrong party this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Flynn, do you have a question?

Senator Flynn: I certainly could not have made a mistake of that magnitude. There is only one voice like Senator Guay's.

The Hon. the Speaker: Question.

Senator Flynn: I was referring to a letter sent to the Prime Minister by Mr. Broadbent suggesting some amendment to the resolution concerning constitutional reform. I was wondering if a reply had been given by the Prime Minister and what the nature of that reply was.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have been advised that there has been a heartening exchange of correspondence between the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the Leader of the New Democratic Party, Mr. Broadbent.

Senator Asselin: His best friend.

Senator Perrault: I do not have copies of the letters immediately available. It may be that the Prime Minister may wish to make a statement on the subject at some point in the next few hours—

Senator Asselin: You should have one copy because you represent the government in the Senate.

Senator Perrault: —and if it is possible to bring a statement to the Senate, I will do so.

Senator Flynn: Are you saying that you have not yet received a copy of the Prime Minister's reply?

Senator Perrault: I do not have a copy of the letter attributed to Mr. Broadbent, nor do I have a copy of a reply which is reported to have been sent to Mr. Broadbent by the Prime Minister. I understand that an exchange of letters has been made, but I do not have those documents on my desk.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. If the letter sent to Mr. Broadbent deals with the resolution currently before the house, why does the Prime Minister extend such preferential treatment to Mr. Broadbent instead of making an announcement to the house or Parliament if it has to do with an amendment to the resolution before Parliament?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, surely nothing precludes the Prime Minister of Canada writing to the leader of any party or the leader of any other party writing to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. This was not an exchange of official documents. These were letters written by one party leader to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. I understand that it related to the subject of natural resources. I understand the exchange has been completed in the past hour or so. The document has not yet arrived. That is all that I can say at this time.

Senator Flynn: Could I ask the Leader of the Government if he subscribed in advance to whatever undertaking the Prime Minister would make?

Senator Perrault: It would be unwise for me to comment on the contents of a letter which I have not yet seen personally; but I understand that it was a very encouraging exchange of letters, in which a degree of accord was achieved.

● (2015)

Senator Flynn: I am asking about your own accord, and that of your two colleagues sitting next to you. Did you agree in advance to whatever undertaking has been made?

Senator Asselin: Senator Argue is laughing.

Senator Argue: Solidarity forever.

Senator Asselin: A socialist.

Senator Perrault: I know my colleagues will want to speak for themselves, but I have never signed a policy blank cheque in my entire life, and I have not done so in this case.

Senator Murray: In view of the fact that copies of the correspondence in question have been available to the parliamentary press gallery for some time today, one can only regret and deplore the fact that the minister, who is Leader of the Government in the Senate, has not been given the same courtesy as the press gallery was given by the Prime Minister. Will the minister, however, say whether in fact a decision has been made by the government to accept certain amendments to the proposed resolution?

Senator Perrault: The government said at the outset that constructive initiatives would be considered carefully, and amendments would be considered if they served the public interest. The government takes the position that amendments should be made if they mean improved legislation and if they serve, as well, to meet more effectively the needs of the Canadian people.

Senator Murray: The minister knows the question that I was asking. I will repeat it and perhaps make it more precise. Has the government decided to accept amendments to the proposed resolution covering the area of natural resources and indirect taxation, to name two? Has the government made a decision on this matter?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am prepared to make a statement on that subject later this evening. I do not have available to me a document that is supposed to be on its way over to me at this time.

[Senator Perrault.]

PROCEDURE RESPECTING REPORT OF PROPOSED SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I would like to raise a matter that I hope will be of interest to honourable senators.

If we examine the motion now before the other place relating to the Constitution, we will notice that it is to the effect that a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be set up. The last paragraph of the motion reads:

> That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose—

And so on.

The point I want to raise is this. Although what I have just read is in the traditional form of a motion, the form of the particular resolution that will be considered by this house when the message comes to us from the other place will be similar to the resolution in the other place. The resolution itself, however, that will be before the committee, if and when it is set up, contains in it a draft bill with many clauses. The procedure here in an ordinary case of consideration of a report from a joint committee of the houses would be to move concurrence in the report. In the event there is no concurrence in the report, and the report of the committee is neither accepted nor rejected, but there is a wish to amend any of the clauses in the resolution, presumably the procedure would be to return the report to the committee with an instruction from the Senate to amend the particular clause or to strike it out. That, of course, cannot take place in this instance because the committee is not a standing committee but a special committee. It is also a joint committee, and for two reasons the ordinary procedure cannot take place. One reason is that since it is a special committee it will be functus and will not be in existence. The second reason is that there is no way, as far as I can see, that one house can instruct the members of another house what to do. It just cannot be done.

● (2020)

That being so, the traditional procedure cannot be used, and I would like the Leader of the Government, or his deputy, to take the matter under consideration with a view to clarifying what our procedure will be in the event that the committee makes a report which the Senate wishes to amend in any particular way. What will be the form of our procedure? It may involve providing special rules of procedure for the particular resolution containing a draft bill that will come before us, or there may be some other procedures that I am not aware of that are readily available. Would the leader inform the Senate the procedure to be followed when the joint committee reports to the Senate?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the matter is under consideration at the present time and the helpful remarks of the honourable senator will be taken into consideration as well.

[Translation]

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN LEADER OF THE NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY AND THE PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the government leader and I think that in a way it is the continuation of the one that has been so aptly asked by our colleague.

I would simply like to know how, in our proceedings, in total accordance with our procedures, beyond, outside and within what is officially before us, a proposed resolution containing a motion for the establishment of a joint committee to study that proposed resolution—or the one the government leader put forward so that we could examine it before the proposed resolution comes to us—I would simply like to know how we shall be decently dealing with the trade-offs that will occur in the meantime, such as the current one we have just learned about through the exchange of letters that the office of the Prime Minister gave to the press earlier?

I recall that at some point during the Constitution conference the Right Hon. Prime Minister himself had a good laugh at the trade-off between a barrel of oil and a barrel of fish, for instance, to show that the issue extended far beyond trade-offs. Judging from the two letters that were given to the press earlier and which we have before us, this is indeed a trade-off.

How shall we deal with trade-offs within the limits of our procedures? I think my question follows those our colleague asked a moment ago.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am somewhat mystified by Senator Tremblay's observations. Perhaps I misunderstood what he was endeavouring to communicate. There is now on our order paper an inquiry with respect to the proposed constitutional package, and I am sure that many honourable senators would be more than pleased to hear Senator Tremblay's views. He would feel free to discuss every aspect of the documents tabled in the Senate a few days ago relating to constitutional amendment, and in the context of the inquiry he could certainly discuss the correspondence between the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and Mr. Broadbent and any other aspect of the constitutional dialogue. We would welcome his participation in this debate. Indeed I know that the supporters of the government value the honourable senator's opinions very highly. We would be more than delighted to hear him speak to us this evening.

The honourable senator asks the question, "How shall we proceed?" It seems to me that a good starting point would be for as many opposition senators as possible who have been critical of certain aspects of the constitutional reform proposals to participate in the debate. An inquiry is before the Senate. May we hear their views? As I have said, surely this is a useful starting point.

Senator Tremblay: I have a supplementary question. I have the feeling that the Leader of the Government, because I have not expressed myself clearly, I suppose, has not understood that, in fact, I was not raising a question about the content of any resolution, but about the decency of introducing other matters in the debate, matters which are not in the resolution or any other document that has been presented to us.

We have here a new element. We have a trading-off approach by the government in those two letters. Shall we discuss that as an approach? There is some sort of immorality there. That is why my question was, in fact, a question about decent behaviour. The Leader of the Government just invited me to discuss the content of what was already there, but that is a new element which brings in the question of decency and proper behaviour. Should trade-offs take place at the same time as we have our debate on a so-called resolution? Should basic and more significant things be taking place elsewhere? I would just like to behave correctly in terms of our procedures and in terms of decent behaviour.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator states that he would like to behave correctly as a participant in the activities of this chamber. Of course, we have no doubt on that account at all; he always has conducted himself with the highest standard of decorum. But let me ask honourable senators a question. It has been suggested that some impropriety has been committed by the Prime Minister in that he has exchanged certain important letters with the Leader of the New Democratic Party in respect to the clarification of certain sections of the constitutional package relating to resources. The other day the Leader of the Official Opposition, the Honourable Joseph Clark—

Some Hon. Senators: The Right Honourable Joseph Clark.

Senator Perrault: —suggested that there was some clarification required of the sections relating to referenda generally and a so-called "people's referendum section" in the Constitution. It has been suggested by certain supporters of the government that perhaps those sections should be clarified through amendment to make certain that the intent of the government is expressed adequately in the legislation proposed. Can that process be dismissed as "trading-off" or "bargaining"?

● (2030)

It seems to me the entire parliamentary process is one of bargaining and accommodation, and attempting to achieve a consensus on a number of key points. Surely, this is the very essence of the parliamentary system. It certainly has been for the number of years I have been associated with it, and I am sure that has been the case for all parliamentarians who have been in this chamber for some time, or in the other place or some other assembly. There is nothing wrong in the procedure of compromise; nothing wrong with the process of attempting to achieve a consensus.

I stated the other evening, honourable senators, that it seemed to me that the most desirable achievement from this process of dialogue in which we are all engaged, or should be all engaged, would be a substantial national consensus, which could be brought to Westminster so that the British Parliament and Her Gracious Majesty the Queen could feel that our joint address does represent a preponderance of Canadian public opinion. And if it requires flexibility on the part of this government to accommodate some of the concerns of Canadians, whether they are New Democrats or members of the Progressive Conservative Party or any other party, this is the kind of government that will be flexible in order to achieve the best results.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Donahoe: Hear, hear! It will be flexible all right.

Senator Tremblay: The Leader of the Government has alluded to the stand taken by the Leader of the Opposition in the other chamber. In fact, the Leader of the Opposition has said that section 42 and other parts of the proposed Constitution Act, 1980 cannot be accepted in terms of a federal country. On that point we will not have any flexibility. We will not trade off the federal system.

The trading off is in there in those letters. It is not a question of the federation.

[Translation]

This is surely a less lofty issue, it is the "trade-off" of the specific things, oil barrels, this or that, specifically those things to which the Prime Minister has already referred, saying that we should not be satisfied with those mundane transactions but look beyond. Referring to the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, the leader of the Government meant more essential matters, involving the federal system itself. And on that issue, not only do we not want to be flexible but we pride ourselves that we are not, and if the government is flexible enough to compromise about the federal system itself, as is the case in the resolution, we are going to object. We are adamant on that point. We wish to preserve a Canadian federation and not bring on a unitary state. We will not yield on that issue. If that kind of flexibility is the principle governing the government, as for us, we will remain intransigent.

[English]

Senator Frith: That is a question?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all pleased that the honourable senator has, in fact, made his speech, and we have enjoyed hearing his comments, although they were not made as part of the inquiry debate on the Constitution. However, if the letter of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to the Leader of the New Democratic Party is so controversial—

Senator Asselin: Have you got it?

Senator Perrault: Let me read it to honourable senators who have not seen it.

Dear Mr. Broadbent,

I have received your letter of October 20 in which you express your intention—

[Senator Perrault.]

Honourable senators, do I detect an unwillingness to listen to these words? Will they be embarrassing to the opposition?

An Hon. Senator: They have asked for it, but they don't want it.

Senator Perrault: Well, you know, if you can't stand the heat, get out of the kitchen. Let me start again:

Dear Mr. Broadbent,

I have received your letter of October 20 in which you express your intention and that of the New Democratic Party to support in the House of Commons the "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada."

• (2035)

I am very pleased that you recognize the need at this time for action by Parliament to patriate the Constitution, to entrench certain fundamental rights, to entrench the principle of equalization, and to enshrine minority language education rights. I agree with you that it is desirable that the constitutional package have the broadest possible support in Parliament and in the country.

Honourable senators, I stated that a moment ago. That is the position of the government:

You stress in your letter the importance you attach to the confirmation of the right of provinces to manage and control their resources, the right of the provinces to levy indirect taxation on resources, and to share a concurrent power with federal paramountcy with respect to interprovincial trade in resources. I agree with you that some change for the proposed Resolution with respect to resources will increase the support for the package both in Parliament and in the country. I am, therefore, prepared to deal with this particular issue at this time.

In fact, the points you raise with respect to resources were among those put forward by the Minister of Justice in his opening statement last July at the first meeting of the Continuing Committee of Ministers on the Constitution. I repeated them in September at the First Ministers' Conference.

That is another example, honourable senators, of the flexibility that the national government has demonstrated to the entire process:

The Prime Minister continues:

Of course, during the course of the constitutional negotiations over the summer, we put forward a number of suggested changes. Those relating to resources were expressly acceptable to us only on the condition that agreement be reached to entrench in the Constitution certain basic principles of the economic union.

Accordingly, the type of amendment which I would be prepared to accept would be one which makes specific provision that the increased provincial power could only be exercised in a way that does not allow a province to discriminate against other parts of Canada. Therefore, I would be prepared to accept an amendment which you or one of your Colleagues may propose in Committee which would:

(1) confirm the jurisdiction of the provinces with respect to exploration, development, conservation, and management of non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province including the making of laws in relation to the primary production from such resources;

(2) give the provinces concurrent jurisdiction in interprovincial trade in non-renewable resources subject to full federal paramountcy and subject to a clause which would prohibit discrimination in prices or in supplies of resources exported from the province to another part of Canada;

(3) give the provinces the right to levy indirect taxation in non-renewable resources as long as such taxation does not discriminate between the province and other parts of Canada.

Yours sincerely,
P. E. Trudeau.

Honourable senators, that is a constructive forthcoming letter written in the spirit which has imbued every one of the government's efforts in this constitutional dialogue, and that is to attempt to clarify and to improve the constitutional package without sacrificing any of the fundamental principles.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could prevail upon the Leader of the Government to read again a sentence which I am not sure I appreciated. I think it has to do with concurrent jurisdiction over certain things, including interprovincial trade. I am not clear whether that concurrent jurisdiction relating to interprovincial trade concerns only resources or whether it was modified in some way.

● (2040)

Senator Perrault: I felt that that would bring some happiness to the Honourable Senator Smith. I will read it again:

2) give the provinces concurrent jurisdiction in interprovincial trade in non-renewable resources subject to full federal paramountcy and subject to a clause which would prohibit discrimination in prices or in supplies of resources exported from the province to another part of Canada.

I express the personal hope that this is the kind of letter that will win a great deal of support from the provinces across the country.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: I have a question that touches upon the topic we have now been dealing with for a while but which concerns more directly the conduct of our business.

Are we to understand, in view of the trade-off between the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada and the leader of one of the parties of the opposition—whose relations with one particular province are public knowledge, that the resolution could be amended in the House of Commons so as to include the conclusions of that trade-off. Or are we to take it for granted, in view of the type of letters we will deal with in committee, that the conclusions of the trade-off are to be treated as an official amendment to the resolution that has already been accepted by the government?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, surely that is a decision for the committee itself to make. Those honourable senators who are members of the committee will have full opportunity to discuss the initiatives that are going to come from the New Democratic Party members of the committee. The committee will write its report, and if a majority of committee members believe that these are the types of amendments that they would like to see made to the bill which is part of the so-called constitutional package, then that fact will be reported to the House of Commons, and the House of Commons will then presumably make its decision.

Senator Tremblay: And shall we as the Senate make our decision at the same time, or will the decision of the House of Commons be the final resolution of the question?

Senator Perrault: The Senate, in due course, will have an opportunity to debate those measures and to participate in the decision-making process, as has been the case since Confederation.

Senator Tremblay: I have a further supplementary. Will that be on the basis of the present powers of the Senate, or will it be under section 44 of the proposed Constitution Act, 1980, pursuant to which we would have only a suspensive veto.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the constitutional package is not in effect as yet, so of course section 44 would not apply to the debate that will ensue.

Senator Tremblay: I am glad to hear that.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO MASSEY-FERGUSON LIMITED

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development relating to Massey-Ferguson Limited and the efforts to revitalize that firm. There have been some newspaper reports which I think should be commented on. I do not know whether they are accurate or not, and perhaps the minister can help me.

There was an announcement yesterday of a package put together by the Government of Canada and the Government of Ontario in an effort to help Massey-Ferguson Limited. That package, I understand, is conditional on the agreement of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce to lower the rate of interest it charges Massey-Ferguson and to postpone debt payments.

When it insisted on this condition, did the government know that the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce was willing to comply? In other words, was the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce privy to this, or is it something that has simply been thrown on the table for the bank to consider in public?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, as Senator Doody knows, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce is one of the large creditors of Massey-Ferguson Limited, and certainly it is one of the leading banks in Canada. There is a package of refinancing that the government would like to see in place, and obviously that would include the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. Whether the bank will lower its interest rates or engage in some other form of assistance in this refinancing package will, of course, have to be looked at.

The announcement was that the Government of Canada and the Government of Ontario would be prepared to provide some assurances by way of underwriting some of the new financing required to put Massey-Ferguson into a viable condition. I do not think it would be wise to speculate on what that package is, although it is clear from the press release, and the subsequent press conference held by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, that the offer of government assurances, at this point in time, at least, is dependent upon private industry or private investors putting together a refinancing package that appears to bring the company into a viable position.

Senator Doody: I have a supplementary, honourable senators.

I suggest that perhaps it would be of some benefit to speculate on the conditions of the financing package. It is my understanding from what I see that the governments are, in effect, guaranteeing the purchasers of a new issue of stock or debentures, or some sort of security in the company, that they will not lose money on such a purchase. In other words, if the public takes up this new stock issue, or subsequent stock issues, the governments, as I understand it, will undertake to see that they do not lose financially from such an investment. I am wondering whether this will apply to only new investors in the company, or whether present equity holders, present shareholders, will get the same sort of guarantee.

Obviously, I am very interested, because if the governments are going to guarantee the new shares, I would like to buy some; if they are not, then obviously I do not want to get involved. The information that is available now is not sufficiently broad, wide, or detailed to allow me to invest my meager savings in this government-guaranteed operation.

Senator Olson: If the honourable senator is interested in making that kind of an investment, I think he would be wise to discuss it with the team from Massey-Ferguson and some of the banks which have a great deal of money invested. After he has looked at the package, he can then make his own decision as to whether or not it is an investment for his purposes.

What the government is interested in doing is assisting a total recapitalization, or sufficient recapitalization, of Massey-Ferguson Limited so that it can continue as a viable Canadian company, thereby protecting the jobs of over 6,000 workers and a rather large and effective network of distributors and dealers across this country.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Doody: I have a further supplementary, honourable senators. I get more confused by the minute—which is probably why I should not get involved in discussions of this nature, and why I ask the minister's advice within the confines of the house.

The minister spoke about a major total refinancing of the company. I understand it has outstanding debts right now amounting to approximately $2 billion, and that it desperately needs some $600 million to keep going. What I have heard and read indicates that the Government of Canada may consider guaranteeing new stock purchases to the extent of $100 million, and the Government of Ontario might guarantee $50 million. This is a most unusual type of refinancing.

The minister mentioned the fact that this is a viable Canadian company with some 6,000 employees. I must be off base on that because I thought it was a viable international company with 46,000 employees. Perhaps the minister could correct me if I am wrong in that.

Senator Olson: I have no argument with some of the speculation of the honourable senator with respect to this. I have seen some of those press reports as well. However, I would not like him to misquote me. I did not mean—and I do not think I said—that all the debt of the company would have to be refinanced. I said there would be a recapitalization sufficient to have the prospect of bringing the company into a viable position. Certainly that does not mean the entire debt of the company will be turned over or refinanced. It will, in my view, and I think in the view of the government, require a large measure of co-operation from the present debtholders of the company.

So far as the other figures are concerned, they are essentially correct. There are about 6,000 employees in Canada, and approximately 46,000 in the total international situation. However, the company has its head office in Canada, and that is where its operations are directed from.

Senator Doody: I have one final supplementary. This is such a fascinating arrangement that I think we will probably engage in further discussion of it from time to time. If such an arrangement is made with these hoped-for co-operative creditors, with these would-be financial institutions, and with the company, can this be then accepted as government policy in terms of helping companies that find themselves in serious financial difficulty? Can all other companies, national or international, expect the same sort of treatment from the Government of Canada?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the senator can take it that what is offered to Massey-Ferguson is an offer to Massey-Ferguson.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Would the minister undertake, within the next day or so, to table some information in the Senate as to exactly how this guarantee is going to work? The guarantee of which I speak is the guarantee that the government is apparently offering future purchasers of shares against a fall in the value of shares. Would the minister put a piece of paper on the table in the next day or so explaining how this guarantee is going to work, and exactly what the exposure of the federal government is going to be in this regard?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will undertake to provide as much information as I can. However, I have to advise the honourable senator that one of the other conditions outlined in the offer is a package of refinancing necessary to lead the company into a viable position. It seems to me that we should look at that package and see what the private sector financing does, in fact, involve, and then where the government lays its guarantees—first of all, in what amounts, and, secondly, on what terms and conditions. I know this is part of the instructions of which the representatives of the government and others are aware, and that, at the moment, they are trying to put them together.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question to put to the Leader of the Government.

Since last February, the Secretary of State for External Affairs takes pleasure in criticizing, at every turn, our relations with the United States, to such an extent that there is considerable concern in diplomatic circles about the deterioration of diplomatic relations between Canada and the United States.

Again yesterday, the Secretary of State for External Affairs warned the new American administration about respecting the priorities in Canadian and American relations.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us what financial, trade or economic interest we have in criticizing openly one of our most important neighbours, I feel, in the field of trade and economic relations? What interest does Canada have in conducting that debate publicly instead of negotiating between partners as we do with several countries?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I hope that the honourable senator, with his background in international affairs, is not advancing the rather exotic idea that we should agree with every foreign policy initiative advanced by the United States or any other country, and that for the sake of agreement and accord we should not risk disagreement.

The relationship between Canada and the United States is unique in its openness, its extent, its complexity, and probably in its longevity. Though often complementary, Canadian and American interests are not co-terminous, and problems inevitably arise. At no time in our history has the relationship been trouble-free, but we have usually managed to resolve our problems jointly. For example, in connection with the very complex fisheries negotiations, it was in the interests of Canadians on both coasts to have their government engage in vigorous, tough negotiation. It was Robert Frost, the poet of New England, who said, "Good fences make good neighbours." Honest differences of opinion make for good neighbours in the ultimate.

The present so-called "bad patch", which some have written about in connection with relations with the United States, should be seen as one of the inevitable fluctuations of Canada-U.S. relations. Changes in the relationship of the executive branch with the legislature and the judiciary doubtless have made bilateral problem-solving more difficult. Certainly, in general terms, we have a very good relationship with the United States.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADA'S ROLE IN WORLD PEACE AND STABILITY

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to supplement the question from my honourable and distinguished colleague, Senator Asselin. Considering the state of the world at this moment, with the offal of a Chinese nuclear bomb floating gradually over Canada, and probably now over the maritimes; a dangerous ebullience in the United States; a frightening aggressiveness in the Soviet Union; and a highly explosive situation in the Middle East, can the Leader of the Government advise if the Government of Canada, an appreciated, restrained and important member of the world community, is giving consideration to an ameliorating role in this tense situation? In particular, could the minister advise if the government is considering, in the light of this tense situation, the establishment of a joint committee to study, at high priority and with great urgency, a Canadian role on behalf of world peace and stability—disregarding the fact that the former government suggested such a course?

I put this question to the honourable minister, for whom I have the highest regard, remembering that while he is the government's representative in the Senate, he is also the Senate's representative in the government.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): All honourable senators have a great deal of respect for Senator Macquarrie's views with respect to international affairs. The question will be taken as notice. It is an interesting proposal.

In his earlier remarks he mentioned that there was some continuing nuclear testing in the atmosphere. I think the honourable senator is aware of the fact that successive Canadian governments have persisted in their efforts to achieve a comprehensive test ban treaty, and Canadian initiatives have been going forward in many areas, often without a great deal of publicity. The patient and persistent work of Canadians has won this nation great admiration throughout the world and those initiatives will certainly continue.

The idea proposed by the honourable senator will certainly be communicated to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Senator Macquarrie: I very much appreciate the usual courtesy of the government leader. Can he relay to his colleagues the suggestion that it may be apropos if we conveyed to the Chinese that we do not like this overflow over our country.

● (2100)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in that respect we regret deeply that China, which has not yet adhered to the partial test ban treaty of 1963, has again carried out a nuclear weapon test in the atmosphere. Canada has long opposed all nuclear weapon testing and our position is well known.

A fundamental Canadian arms control objective has been and continues to be the early realization of an effective multilateral comprehensive test ban treaty—CTBT, as the honourable senator knows—to end all nuclear weapons tests in all environments, to which all nuclear weapon states would adhere. As I have stated, we are persisting in our efforts to achieve a comprehensive test ban treaty.

As for the earlier suggestion of the honourable senator, perhaps he would be willing to provide a short memorandum concerning the specifics of his proposal. It would be more helpful in that form, and certainly it will be treated seriously.

GRAIN

DELIVERY QUOTAS FOR SOUTHERN ALBERTA AND SOUTHWESTERN SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and is in further reference to the response that he gave me last week with respect to the inability of the CPR to haul normal quantities of grain to the Port of Vancouver, due, among other things, to labour difficulties at Revelstoke, British Columbia.

I am wondering if the minister has anything new to report on a situation which is becoming intolerable to the producers of southern Alberta.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, this question was raised by Senator Hastings last week, and there was also reference to the situation in the other place in a motion under Standing Order 43. It would seem to me that in this instance in the Senate—

Senator Asselin: Are you making a statement?

Senator Argue: Yes.

Senator Asselin: Would you send a copy—

Senator Argue: I do not think I need to be interrupted now. In providing a reply on this subject, I believe I am able to give a little better answer to the substance of the question than can come from the other place under Standing Order 43, where there is no response. I notice that there is no one in the press gallery. In my view, the sessions of the Senate deserve attendance by the press. It is a shame that the Canadian Press and other news services are not here tonight and on other occasions when important statements are made by senators on both sides of the house.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

With regard to the substance of this matter, I can inform honourable senators that on the sixteenth of this month a telegram signed by the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, the Minister of Transport, and myself, as Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, was dispatched to Mr. F. S. Burbidge, President, Canadian Pacific Limited, and to Mr. E. G. Abbott, Executive Secretary, Canadian Railway Labour Association. The telegram read as follows:

> We are becoming increasingly concerned about restricted grain delivery opportunities faced by southern Alberta grain producers. It appears that, to a large extent, this situation is caused by slow rail movements by C.P. We would ask that every effort be made to resolve this situation as quickly as possible.

In response to that telegram, I received the following reply from Mr. E. G. Abbott, Executive Secretary, Canadian Railway Labour Association:

> Re movement grain southern Alberta—CP rail:
> Our association appreciates your wire October 17th. I will be meeting with senior officers of the union concerned in Winnipeg on Monday, October 20th, to discuss this serious matter and to explore any positive steps that can be taken to alleviate this very serious situation.
> I will advise you of any suggestions or results as soon as possible.

We also received a response from Mr. F. S. Burbidge, President, Canadian Pacific Limited. It is quite a long dispatch. I shall read only those sections that I consider to be particularly pertinent:

> We have no recourse except to proceed with discipline and possibly legal action in order to resolve the matter and we are proceeding on this basis.
> CP Rail has also initiated other arrangements in cooperation with the grain transportation authority and the Canadian Wheat Board to help relieve the effect of these labour difficulties on grain movements. Starting this week, and for the next several weeks, we will begin moving an additional three to five hundred cars from southern Alberta to Thunder Bay.

So that is a very—

Senator Murray: He said that on television last night.

Senator Argue: As I say, that is an important statement. It is important that he has said it on television. It is an important initiative. The information received from Labour Canada indicates that the Canadian Pacific has filed an application with the Canadian Labour Relations Board for a cease and desist order. The hearing is scheduled for Thursday, October 23.

The action by Canadian Pacific is welcome—

Senator Marshall: What was the question?

Senator Argue: —but I should point out that when grain from southern Alberta is shipped east to Thunder Bay, it moves at an extra expense. There is a greater cost involved to move it to Thunder Bay than to the Pacific. Therefore it is an expense to the wheat producer. Nonetheless, this action is most welcome because it will certainly help provide producers in that area with needed funds that can be obtained when they haul their grain to market.

A motion was moved today in the other place by Gordon Towers, seconded by the member for Medicine Hat, Mr. Hargrave:

> That the Minister of Transport immediately request Dr. Hugh Horner to re-assume the responsibilities of his former position for a sufficiently long period of time to get the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board out of this mess and the farmers out of a financial squeeze.

That is really an important Standing Order 43 motion. Dr. Hugh Horner was there during all of the months when the problem existed. He left on October 15. He has been gone for five or six days, and the best that they can offer in the other place is, "Bring him back." But when he left, what did he say? He said, "I have accomplished all of the objectives I had set for myself." It is too bad that one of his objectives—and I say this only because this matter has been raised—was not to help—since they say he can help—solve the labour dispute and get the wheat producers out of this mess. He sent in his letter of resignation, saying that his relations with the federal government, with the Minister of Transport, was wonderful and cordial, and he left almost weeping. He then went home and said, "Well, I had to do that because of those terrible Liberals down in Ottawa that are out to do in the west and cause us so much trouble." All I can say is that I do not think this motion really deserves any more attention than it received, namely—

Senator Flynn: Then why do you raise the matter?

Senator Argue: Because I think it is important.

Senator Flynn: It is entirely irrelevant to the question that was put to you.

Senator Argue: It is important to point out that the solution to this problem is coming from people who are in responsible positions, and it is not coming from members of the opposition in the other place, who have no better recourse than to move that motion under Standing Order 43, which accomplishes nothing.

Senator Flynn: That is none of our business and it is entirely out of order to raise that matter in this house tonight.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO MASSEY-FERGUSON LIMITED

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I should like to go back to the problem that was brought up a moment ago. My question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development and concerns the Massey-Ferguson problem. I feel it is very important and that many solutions have been suggested. I wonder if, at the present time, the federal government is considering the possibility of resorting to the same solution as when Canadair was experiencing considerable difficulties in Montreal; at that time the Canadian government took over the company. Since then, things have been going so well that new jobs have been created and the company is expanding rapidly. Is, as I said before, the federal government now studying that possibility or, possibly, negotiating the possibility of taking over Massey-Ferguson?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the brief answer is no, the federal government does not have that kind of arrangement under consideration at the moment.

FISHERIES

EASTERN CANADA REGIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I hesitate to prolong the Question Period, but I have an important question for the Leader of the Government which I am sure he will have to take as notice. My question has to do with the contemplated changes in the fishery regions in Atlantic Canada. Could the leader extract from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans a statement as to whether they are changing the regions in Atlantic Canada, one of which will take away part of Newfoundland and put it into a new gulf region together with Prince Edward Island, northern New Brunswick, northern Nova Scotia and southern Quebec.

I ask this question because of the displeasure such a change would bring to certain parts of Newfoundland.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

Senator Marshall: If these contemplated changes are indeed going to take place, would the Leader of the Government ensure that the fishermen affected will be able to engage in dialogue with regard to the decisions made by government.

Senator Perrault: That question will be answered as a supplementary.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

STATEMENT BY CLERK OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. It was reported in the press last week that in a recent speech given in the United States by the Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Michael Pitfield, he informed his audience that the only way meaningful and effective reform of the Canadian Constitution could be brought about was when the nation was in a state of crisis. Would the leader undertake to determine if this report has any accuracy, and, if so, to table that part of the transcript of the speech making such a reference.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

Senator McElman: When the leader is making his inquiry, will he find a method of delivering a message to the effect that when matters of great portent, such as the Constitution of Canada, are being debated in the Parliament of Canada, public servants, no matter how high or low in the pecking order, might be little seen and less heard.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I could not have said it better myself. I congratulate my honourable friend on his wise counsel.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN LEADER OF THE NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY AND THE PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, my question is prompted by the statement read to us tonight by the Leader of the Opposition with respect to the letter the Prime Minister gave to the Leader of the New Democratic Party in the other place.

My curiosity is piqued by a word on which I would like clarification. The paragraph numbered 1 at the bottom of page 2 of the Prime Minister's letter says that the amendment would:

> (1) confirm the jurisdiction of the provinces with respect to exploration, development, conservation, and management of non-renewable natural resources—

I wonder if my honourable friend could give me an idea as to what the word "management" means. I take it it means, among other things, not merely the physical management but the economic management of the resource in question. Is that a fair interpretation?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

Senator Roblin: I would like to expand on the question by giving my honourable friend the reason for asking. Obviously this involves a question of price if economic management is included in that expression. I think it will be of some interest to members of this house to know whether or not this is the case.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask another question that is based on a long-standing discussion I have been having with my honourable friend about the Garrison diversion in Manitoba.

The Leader of the Government will recall that on July 14 he left me with the impression that there was a written statement with respect to the policy of the Government of the United States. I see that he has now replied to the effect that there was no written statement, but that there was a high-level verbal assurance. I presume that in the course of receiving that assurance someone made a note of it. Would the leader be kind enough to let me know exactly what that high-level assurance consisted of?

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): An inquiry will go forward, honourable senators.

PROPOSED LOAN TO U.S.S.R. FOR COAL PROJECT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have four delayed answers which are quite lengthy. If it is agreeable to honourable senators I will place them on the record without reading them.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: On October 15 Senator Roblin asked a question as to whether the minister had been in communication with the Government of British Columbia concerning a proposal of the Export Development Corporation to lend $180 million to the U.S.S.R. in connection with a coal project in that country, and whether this proposal has been considered by the Export Development Corporation and whether they are proceeding with it.

(The answer follows:)

> First of all, I should say that I have not been in contact with the Government of British Columbia over this matter, because there is no basis in fact for the report. The Export Development Corporation has not, and is not now considering such a loan to the U.S.S.R. The Corporation did, in 1976, provide export financing for a Canadian company, Unit Rig and Equipment Ltd. of Stevensville, Ontario, for the export of a fleet of 84 heavy duty trucks to the Soviet Union.
> I would like to stress that this financing was approved in 1976. It was provided within the mandate of the Export Development Corporation to assist Canadian manufacturers to aggressively pursue opportunities in the export market, thereby expanding Canadian industry and providing jobs for Canadians. In fact, some 200 jobs resulted from this export financing, as well as more than 1,000 jobs with sub-contractors in Ontario, Quebec and Alberta. In the same interest, the federal government has publicly stated, and remains committed to the orderly development of Canada's resource industries, including the coal industry of British Columbia.

ENERGY

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AUTHORITY—OIL RESERVES EASTERN CANADA—OIL AND PETROLEUM SUPPLIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the second delayed answer is in reply to a question asked by Senator Roblin on October 16, concerning the International Energy Agency study of the western oil supply situation.

(The answer follows:)

> The loss of production to the international market as a result of the Iraq-Iran conflict is significant—between 3-4 million barrels per day. However, other producing countries have agreed to either increase production (e.g., Saudi Arabia) or drop plans for reducing production (e.g., Nigeria). This will assist in making up the shortfall. The greatest concern in the Middle East is not the lost production from these two countries but rather the prospect that the conflict might spread.

Another factor mitigating the impact of the loss in production from Iraq and Iran is that all Western industrialized countries are in an extremely favourable stock position, with an estimated 400 million barrels above normal inventory levels for this time of year. IEA is of the view that the threat of shortages is not significant enough to justify invoking the oil sharing agreement and that pressure on prices in the spot market, which is an early signal of impending shortages, can be controlled by coordinating efforts to draw down stocks.

The IEA, as an agency with continuing responsibilities to monitor international oil supplies, undertakes studies on various aspects of the supply situation regularly. I would like to clarify that the IEA is not carrying out a special study of the supply situation as a result of the Iran-Iraq conflict. A test of the IEA oil sharing system was initiated on October 1, and of course Canada is participating fully in this study. This test had been planned for many months prior to the outbreak of the Iran-Iraq conflict and the fact that it is proceeding now is entirely coincidental. As requested by Senator Roblin, I will be pleased to provide further information on these matters when the study I have referred to is completed, in about two months' time.

FINANCE

SALE OF GOLD RESERVES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Austin on October 14, in which he asked to be informed as to the nature of our interest-earning foreign assets on the sale of gold. He asked whether the government takes into consideration the potential earning gains of these assets on the one hand and the movement of the commodity value of gold on the other and whether the proceeds are converted to Canadian dollars or credited to our current account balance.

(The answer follows:)

The nature of these assets is principally in the form of U.S. government securities. One example is, as the honourable senator suggested, U.S. treasury bills.

In response to the honourable senator's question regarding considerations of the upward or downward movement in the commodity value of gold on the one hand and the potential gains in interest-earning assets from the sale of gold, I wish to assure the honourable senator that the Bank of Canada, as fiscal agent for the government, does indeed take such considerations into account in gold transactions.

The honourable senator also asked if the assets from the sale of gold are converted to Canadian dollars and credited to Canada's current account balance. The assets are not converted to Canadian dollars. Under the current gold sales program, they are added to the foreign currency assets in the Exchange Fund Account. The relationship between these assets and balance of payments accounting is very complex and difficult to assess, but to the extent that gold is sold abroad, it is treated as an export and therefore could have an effect on our current account balance.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT FORMS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I now have a reply to a question asked by Senator Bosa on October 16 inquiring as to what savings the government's recent measures to reduce the paper burden entail for the business community and the federal government.

(The answer follows:)

As I mentioned to the honourable senator last Thursday, we anticipate there will be savings of about $200 million for business in this second series of measures, bringing to $300 million the total annual savings effected during the two year term of the Office for the Reduction of Paperburden. The first series, some of you may recall, was announced by the Honourable Tony Abbott early in 1979, and resulted in savings of $100 million.

The biggest chunk of savings in this latest series, about $100 million a year, will result from a shortening of the period required for the retention of records by businesses.

The honourable senator will recall that I mentioned on Thursday savings of $36 million for the trucking industry. Other measures include changes to Customs and Excise regulations resulting in savings of $20 million a year. Statistics Canada is modifying a number of surveys, notably its monthly survey of Employment Payrolls and Hours, which alone will save business an estimated $21 million a year.

I have made available to the honourable senator a detailed background paper listing all the measures I recently announced and the savings they entail for business.

There will unquestionably be internal savings for the federal government as well as a result of these measures. However, the focus of the Paperburden Office during its two year mandate was on its activist advocacy role for business, not government. The benefits the government derives from the elimination of forms and simplification of procedures will be significant but their total value has not been estimated.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INCREASED GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT—ACTION BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed replies. The first one is the question asked by Senator Buckwold relating to the status of the guaranteed income supplement pass-on issue. This is a very long answer including a survey of all the provinces and whether or not they are passing on their guaranteed income supplement additional amount. I ask that this be included in the record of today's proceedings rather than reading it.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Status of the Guaranteed Income

Supplement Pass-on Issue

PROVINCIAL INCOME SUPPLEMENTS:

The Provinces of Nova Scotia, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and the Northwest Territories have income supplementation programs for recipients of Old Age Security and Guaranteed Income Supplement Benefits. Manitoba, British Columbia and the Northwest Territories also pay these benefits to Spouse's Allowance recipients.

—All of these provinces and the Northwest Territories have confirmed their intention of fully passing on the Guaranteed Income Supplement/Spouse's Allowance increase of $35 per household to recipients of these benefits.

PENSIONERS IN INSTITUTIONS:

—In the case of Old Age Security pensioners resident in provincial institutions, the standard practice is to charge most of the Old Age Security/Guaranteed Income Supplement rate for room and board, leaving an amount called the "comforts allowance" for personal expenditures. If a province has increased the monthly comforts allowance by the full $35 increase, it is considered to have passed on the increase in full.

FULL PASS-ON

Nova Scotia

—The Nova Scotia Minister, the Honourable Laird Stirling, has confirmed in writing that the maximum comforts allowance that may be provided would be increased by $35 to $105.

—Officials have confirmed that an order in council has been prepared to allow the increase to be fully passed on in municipal and provincial institutions.

—However, there is no way of knowing if the municipalities will actually pass along the full increase to residents of institutions.

—Ministerial correspondence indicates that, at least in some municipalities, a full pass-on has not taken place.

[Senator Olson.]

Ontario

—The Honourable Keith Norton sent a telex on August 1, 1980, stating that the $35 increase will be passed on in full to all eligible senior citizens receiving care in facilities funded by Ontario.

—This means that the monthly comforts allowance for institutional residents, 65 years of age or older, has increased from $61 to $96, effective July 1, 1980.

Manitoba

—It was confirmed at the officials' level that pensioners in provincial institutions would benefit fully from the $35 increase.

—Pensioners in institutions are charged a daily rate of $8.50, which is considerably lower than the maximum Old Age Security/Guaranteed Income Supplement benefits that they may receive.

—Thus, the $35 increase would be fully passed on, leaving an allowance for comforts of approximately $125.

Northwest Territories

—The Minister of Social Services, the Honourable Arnold J. McCallum, stated that pensioners in institutions would have the $35 increase passed on in full to them.

—The official comforts allowance remains at $30, but as an income exemption of $35 is now permitted, pensioners in institutions in effect receive $65 for comforts.

PARTIAL PASS-ON

—Following is a list of provinces/territories where it has been confirmed that a partial pass-on would occur:

Province/ Territory	Increase	New Level of Comforts Allowance
Newfoundland	5	50
Prince Edward Island	10	50
New Brunswick	20	70
Quebec	15	90
Yukon	26	90

—Newfoundland has increased the allowance by $5 for all adults, not just pensioners, and plans to improve the quality of care.

—In Prince Edward Island, the Minister of Health and Social Service, the Honourable James M. Lee, has said that he will make every effort to improve the quality and standards of care in institutions with additional funds the province received by increasing the comforts allowance by only $10 of the $35 increase.

—The Province of New Brunswick has increased, on the grounds of equity, the comforts allowance for those under 65 by the same amount ($20) as the increase to Old Age Security/Guaranteed Income Supplement pensioners. The province claims that it is not receiving a windfall gain, as the $20 increase represents the amount it could afford to pay each person in an institution—pensioner and non-pensioner alike—using all the additional funds from the $35 Supplement increase.

—Quebec also pointed out that it increased the comforts allowance by $15 for all adults in institutions, not just Old Age Security/Guaranteed Income Supplement recipients, and that they also plan to improve services to senior citizens.

OTHER

Saskatchewan

—The Minister of Social Services, the Honourable Murray J. Koskie, stated that there would be no increase in the comforts allowance, which remains at $35.

—However, he also said that the province would be increasing by 5 percent the universal special care subsidy. As most institutions have already set, for this year, the rates charged to residents of institutions, these extra funds should result, according to the Minister, in improved quality of care. A check with officials of the Saskatchewan Association of Special Care Homes has confirmed that this should occur.

—Officials of the Ministry will be writing to each institution to ask them to use the additional money in this way or to reduce the rates charged to residents.

Alberta

—The degree of the pass-on—that is, the amount of the increase in a pensioner's comforts allowance—is dependent on the level of care required by the pensioner. Charges for basic care range from $6 a day to $11 a day. The pensioner must pay additional costs for drugs, telephone, etc. After these charges are paid, the pensioner then is permitted to keep what is left, or $47, whichever is greater.

—Thus, the degree of pass-on depends upon the level of care that the pensioner requires and the cost of additional expenses.

British Columbia

—The Minister of Human Resources, the Honourable Grace McCarthy, stated in April that the increase in the Supplement would be passed on in full to pensioners in institutions.

—However, letters from pensioners residing in British Columbia institutions indicate that the rates being charged to pensioners in institutions are being increased by $2 per day, from $6.50 to $8.50. This would mean that pensioners in institutions may not only fail to see an increase in the amount left over from their Old Age Security/Guaranteed Income Supplement benefit after the daiiy rate is paid, they may experience a decrease.

—Mrs. McCarthy recently wrote explaining that the increase in the per diem rate charged to persons living in institutions coincidentally occurred at the same time as the $35 increase in the Guaranteed Income Supplement and the Spouse's Allowance.

—She stated that this daily rate has not been increased since January 1978, although costs had increased along with pensioners' ability to pay.

—Accordingly, earlier this year, the Ministry of Health undertook a review of the per diem rate and decided that it should approximate 75 per cent of the Old Age Security/Guaranteed Income Supplement guarantee level in effect before the $35 increase took place.

—This policy resulted in an increse of $2 a day, from $6.50 to $8.50, in the rate charged to residents of institutions.

—Mrs. McCarthy stated that if the $35 increase in the Supplement had been taken into account, the per diem rate would have been raised to $9.50, rather than the $8.50 now charged.

IRAQI-IRANIAN WAR

SAFETY OF CANADIANS IN REGION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Leblanc on October 16, regarding a possible evacuation of Canadians now in Saudi Arabia.

(The answer follows:)

Officials in the Department of External Affairs have assured me that there is a level of concern and have looked at an evacuation plan. However, of all the countries in the region, Saudi Arabia has caused the lowest level of concern.

The United States has also looked at evacuation plans, but has not officially communicated its concern to Canadian authorities.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ALGERIA—AID TO EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I now have an answer to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on October 14, concerning Canadian aid to Algeria as a result of the El Asnam earthquake.

(The answer follows:)

To date there have been 2,325 deaths formally reported by on-site rescue teams and the official number of people hurt has reached 7,725. The estimate of 20,000 dead by the Algerian Red Crescent has not yet been confirmed.

No Canadians, among the 850 registered at our embassy, were touched by the earthquake.

Ten days after the catastrophe, emergency priority has gone toward feeding and lodging the 150,000 to 200,000 homeless people.

As a result of Algerian requests, we have asked a dozen Canadian companies who specialize in the construction of prefabricated homes to quickly contact Algerian authorities.

We are studying the possibility of sending a technical team to help with preliminary infrastructure work.

Emergency food aid is under consideration and would be added to the $250,000 worth of food already given by CIDA.

A private group of Canadians has arranged to ship $100,000 of evaporated milk using government agencies.

TRANSPORT

EXPENDITURES FOR CHARLOTTETOWN AIRPORT

Question No. 14 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Heath Macquarrie:

1. In each of the last ten fiscal years, what was the total expenditure upon the Charlottetown Airport for

(a) repairs

(b) renovations

(c) additions to passenger terminals

(d) cargo facilities

(e) parking space, and

(f) runways?

2. (a) What is the estimated date of completion, (b) cost, and (c) seating capacity of a new passenger terminal?

3. What other improvements or extensions are in progress, or in contemplation?

4. What area of land has been acquired for extension of the Charlottetown Airport?

5. What is the current seating capacity of the passenger terminal?

6. What is the total passenger capacity of all scheduled commercial aircraft?

1.

CHARLOTTETOWN AIRPORT EXPENDITURES (000's)
FISCAL YEARS 1970/71 TO 1979/80

	Repairs	Renovations	Additions to Passenger Terminals	Parking Space	Runways	Total
1970/71	61.8	—	100.9	—	45.1	207.8
1971/72	—	—	7.5	0.6	5.2	13.3
1972/73	—	—	—	26.5	264.8	291.3
1973/74	14.3	—	—	—	21.6	35.9
1974/75	2.6	67.5	0.2	—	7.8	78.1
1975/76	1.2	35.0	68.0	—	172.3	276.5
1976/77	—	36.4	—	—	91.5	127.9
1977/78	5.2	—	2.4	—	3.7	11.3
1978/79	—	—	—	—	3.9	3.9

The above list includes capital projects only during the last ten years. No projects included under Treasury Board Submission of November 3, 1977 for $21,531,500 for Charlottetown Airport Redevelopment. Expenditures by Transport Canada on Cargo Facilities are included in "Additions to Passenger Terminals".

2. The Air Terminal/Operations Building was originally scheduled for tender call June 1979. Due to the separation of the operations portion from the main passenger processing building and the reopening of the negotiations with the airlines and Provincial Government on space allocation and rental rates, the tentative date for tender call is summer of 1981 with completion in the spring of 1984 at a total estimated cost of $5,400,000.00. Seating will be for approximately 160, depending on the actual layout.

The Control Tower/Operations Building is in the design stage with no major expenditure this fiscal year due to a complete redesign and the requirement to seek amended program approval from Treasury Board. The total estimated cost of this building is $2,600,000.00; tender call is scheduled for the spring of 1981 with completion in 1983.

3. Airport Improvements: Present status and anticipated activity:

A) Combined Services Building completed in the fall of 1979 with the exception of paving and services at a cost of $1.9 million. Contract for paving and electrical duct installation awarded June 5, 1980 at a cost of $220,000.

[Senator Perrault.]

B) Aircraft parking apron and two connecting taxiways to runway 03-21 completed in the fall of 1978 at a cost of $1.7 million.

C) Fire Training Area completed in the fall of 1978 at a cost of $93,000.

D) Infrastructure components of water and sewer including on-site installations and cost sharing agreements with the City of Charlottetown and Village of Sherwood respectively for construction of a water boosting pumping station and 2200 linear feet of 8" sewer line. Total project will be completed this July at a total cost of $530,000.

E) The timing for construction of the new East/West runway 10-28 originally scheduled for 1981/82 at a cost of $5.5 million is uncertain at this time.

F) Roads and car park including landscaping at a total estimated cost of $1.8 million will be constructed to coincide with the completion of the Air Terminal Building.

4. Land acquisition program commenced in July 1978. Settlement with six of the twenty-two owners secured by February 1979. Minister of Transport authorized expropriation December 14, 1978 and Minister of Public Works signed the authorization February 11, 1979. Notice of intent to expropriate published in Canada Gazette April 20, 1979 with public hearings held in Charlottetown June 14-15 and 18-19, 1979. Hearing officer's report submitted June 29, 1979. Present expenditure on land acquisition to May 31, 1980 is $1,351,700.

The total area of land purchased to date is 693 acres:

Purchased by Negotiations	: 147 acres
Expropriation	: 546 acres

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled "Child at Risk," tabled in the Senate on October 16, 1980.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, in rising to speak on the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled "Child at Risk," I would like to state although a lot of research has been carried out pertaining to the causes of adult criminality, juvenile delinquency and the problems of crime generally, there is one very important area of research which has been left largely unexplored, this being the prenatal, the perinatal and early childhood area, which we now know has a definite influence on the future life of the child. He can be in trouble at home; he can be in trouble at school; he can become anti-social and develop into a juvenile delinquent. If something is not done to correct the situation, he can later end up as a violent criminal.

One might ask: What are the influences in the life of a child which will so affect the scope of his development that he will grow up to be aggressive, anti-social or a violent criminal? How is he influenced by the environment in which he lives? Is there some inherited vulnerability to criminal behaviour? Are the reasons basically social or are they psychological, emotional or physical? Whatever the reasons may be, what can be done to alter the anticipated development of such a child?

These were some of the questions which the committee asked during its inquiry. Specifically, it has explored the early childhood experiences which might be causes of criminal behaviour and has considered what steps might be taken to change such harmful circumstances in early life.

At the commencement of the inquiry requests for relevant information were sent across Canada to appropriate provincial government departments, to heads of universities, to faculties of medicine, psychology and criminology, social scientists and inter-disciplinary studies, to research institutes, to professional associations and to organizations and institutions concerned with child care and education. The overwhelming response to these inquiries has revealed the depth of concern in Canada for the well-being of its very young children.

In addition to the wealth of information obtained in this matter, further background information on the subject was provided by the Library of Parliament through an extensive literature search for relevant material published during the last seven years. A great deal of information from international sources was also obtained.

In preparing the final report, the committee relied heavily on the evidence presented by the expert witnesses who appeared before it.

The mandate of this committee has encompassed a broad and complicated study, a task subsuming the whole field of human development in all its aspects, evolutionary, genetic, environmental and behavioural. We hope and we expect that by gathering together and connecting important and authoritative data we may stimulate public interest and encourage appropriate research, education and legislation. As a result, in the future there may be greater understanding of the problems and the needs of early childhood, and more may be done to prevent the small child from developing into a violent criminal.

We have laid before Parliament 28 recommendations which we feel are important steps which can be taken by the federal government, the provincial governments, municipalities, school and hospital boards that will give the unborn child a better chance to survive and to take his rightful place in society which he so rightly deserves.

We also recognize the fact that many of our recommendations are asking for more of the taxpayers' money, but when we realize that during the last decade in Canada there has been an accelerating increase in the number of convictions for violent crime, it is our feeling that it would be money well spent. Between 1974 and 1978 there was an increase of more than 17 per cent in the rate of Criminal Code offences, and more than 10 per cent in the rate of crimes of violence. Nearly 138,000 violent crimes took place in Canada in 1978.

There has been an alarming increase in violent juvenile delinquency. In 1974, 6,908 juveniles were apprehended by law enforcement officials, while in 1978, 10,227 were apprehended. Even more disturbing than the absolute number of young people apprehended for acts of violence is the fact that the rates of apprehension increased by an even larger amount of 65 per cent from 155 cases to 249 per 100,000 juveniles.

Recent enlightened efforts to reform offenders and re-integrate them into society, rather than merely punishing them, have not produced encouraging results, Eighty per cent of persons submitted to federal institutions have been previously convicted. Our prison population continues to grow in spite of improved training programs, psychiatric treatment, counselling services and more permissive granting of parole. In April, 1980, 9,324 men and women were inside federal penitentiaries. Crimes of violence are a source of great suffering to many individuals and their families, and pose a great threat to the stability of our society. They also involve a tremendous financial burden.

The operating expenses of a federal institution average $25,000 a year per inmate. In 1977-78, the total cost of operating the federal penitentiaries alone amounted to a quarter of a billion dollars, and in 1977-78 it cost the provinces approximately $600,000 a day to operate correctional institutions. Thus, it can be said that by 1977-78 the total operating cost of federal and provincial correction services was well in excess of half a billion dollars a year.

The capital cost of building new penitentiaries is a constant drain on public funds. During the decade 1968-78, the federal government spent steadily increasing sums of money in order to build new penitentiaries which are now overcrowded and, what is more important, do little to rehabilitate succesfully the offenders who are sent to them.

In spite of the enormous cost it is obvious that the present treatment of offenders has failed to stem the tide of violence in our society. Improved methods to protect the public and to punish and reform offenders are urgently needed. At the same time, every effort should be made to prevent crimes of violence. This is surely a case of an ounce of prevention being worth 10 pounds of cure.

Criminal behaviour, for the purpose of our study, has been confined to violent anti-social behaviour. We have recognized the importance of patterns of behaviour. In some cases juvenile delinquency is the prelude to a criminal way of life. It may in that way be considered as a link in the chain between childhood experiences and later criminal behaviour. Most often the violent criminal is one who suffers from a personality disorder of an anti-social type and whose behaviour is the result of a learned experience. Probably such a criminal was anti-social as a child. Serious anti-social behaviour does not begin for the first time in adulthood, but is almost invariably preceded by anti-social behaviour in childhood.

The evidence presented to us indicates that the vicious criminal is often a misunderstood member of our society. He may live in a state of emotional turmoil for reasons beyond his control. He may have failed to bond with members of his immediate family in his early childhood and later with his peers. Having failed to develop an adequate personality structure he is unable to understand his own problems and how to cope with them. For centuries he has been punished for his failures to develop a normal lifestyle, and to overcome the disabling and unfortunate influences of environmental, congenital, prenatal and postnatal handicaps.

Today we know much about how these problems develop and how it may be possible to rescue such unfortunate children before they become delinquent and the potential criminals of tomorrow. A child who is disadvantaged may be considered to be living under a condition of stress. Research has now revealed the very important interactive effect on child development of multiple disadvantages. It may tolerate one single chronic stress or risk factor with no apparent harmful effect. An additional stress factor, however, may cause the resulting risk of psychiatric disorder to increase as much as fourfold. In other words, the stresses seem to potentiate each other. One type of disadvantage tends to increase the likelihood of others in very direct and predictable ways. A child who must live with multiple disadvantages is thus in a position of high risk for psychiatric disorder and behaviour problems and is in need of all the assistance society can provide for it.

It also seems clear that there is a genetic factor involved in criminality as in other human behaviours. Its importance, however, is overwhelmed by parental, social and environmental influence.

We have found circumstances in prenatal life that can have a harmful effect on a developing personality. If malnutrition during pregnancy is severe, it would not only stunt the physical growth but also the mental development of the fetus. Smoking, or the use of alcohol or other drugs, by the mother during pregnancy will have a generally deleterious effect on the unborn child. A mother who undergoes serious ongoing stress during pregnancy may have a child whose emotional development has been harmed.

All these influences may be considered causes, not specifically of criminal behaviour, but of a disadvantaged life which may set the stage for other adverse influences on the child's future. Together, these influences may cause the child to develop in undesirable ways. One of these ways may be the path of criminal behaviour.

The period around the time of birth is filled with hazards for the fetus. There is the acute risk of brain damage harmfully affecting the emerging personality. There are dangers inherent in some medical procedures and the use of drugs.

Premature children are especially at risk during birth and from the moment of birth onward. They are more likely than full-term babies to suffer from physical problems as they grow. They are more likely to be prevented from forming early bonding with their parents. Because of their sometimes lengthy isolation in hospitals, away from their parents, they are likely to suffer from emotional deprivation at the very beginning of life. They may be harmed more than usual by drugs used around the time of birth. They are more likely to be born with physical abnormalities and to suffer from learning disabilities. They are more difficult to raise. They are much more likely to be abused. All these circumstances handicap their future development and place them at serious risk.

We have considered many factors during the early years of a child's life which may result in later deviant behaviour. Among them are being born to criminal parents, or mentally disturbed or alcoholic parents, growing up as a member of a large family in circumstances of poverty and overcrowding, growing up in a family that is broken or disintegrating or full of strife, or contending with the serious problems of learning disability or hyperactivity, experiencing abuse, neglect or emotional deprivation in early life.

None of these circumstances can be viewed in isolation as a cause of criminal behaviour. In combination, however, they may well set the course of a child's life so that it eventually becomes a violent criminal.

Good parenting is of overwhelming importance to the developing personality of a child. Close affectional ties with an adult in early life and consistent loving care and nurturing in the early years are essential to the optimal development of the child.

It seems there is really no alternative to tender loving care. Whatever can be done to help parents do the job of parenting well will, at the same time, be preventing future anti-social behaviour. Each child should be given the chance to develop the best of its potential.

Honourable senators, I hope that each of you will find time to read the full report and, if not, at least to spend some time in reading the 28 recommendations which your committee has laid before you.

● (2140)

We have made recommendations for changes in the Family Allowance Act, changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act, changes in the National Housing Act, changes in the Criminal Code, and we are recommending changes in the regulations of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. We are recommending that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the cable television companies adopt a policy to reduce the amount of violence portrayed on television programs. We are recommending changes by the national government, provincial governments, municipalities and school boards. But probably our most important recommendation is No. 28 in which we recommend that an organization be established to be known as The Canadian Institute for the Study of Violence in Society. We further recommend that this institute be financed by the federal government and that it be operated by an independent board representing a wide spectrum of disciplines, and that it have a mandate for at least ten years in order to follow up the results of research and the implementation of its recommendations.

It is our hope that this institute will co-ordinate and evaluate the research that is taking place at the present time in early childhood experiences as causes of criminal behaviour. Our main reasons for wanting to co-ordinate and evaluate the research is that we found that many of our witnesses were experts in their own specific field, but were not familiar with what research was being carried out by other experts in other fields. Many of them seemed to think that their field was the one of most importance and had the most answers to the problem. It was felt that it was necessary to correlate all the different research work carried out in Canada and in other countries and to familiarize the researchers with what others are doing.

This institute should also initiate, promote and assist the funding of new research and pilot projects as they seem to be required to provide for a holistic diagnosis of the causes of violence in our society.

This institute should also initiate, promote and assist the funding of research into those factors which enable most vulnerable children to reach maturity relatively free from anti-social behaviour and crime. The institute, as well, should provide opportunities on a regular basis through workshops, research projects, et cetera, for those in different disciplines to co-operate and study violence in Canadian society. The institute should also attempt to make recommendations into practical methods of reducing the incidence of violence in Canada.

Honourable senators, let me say in closing that I, as chairman, could not have prepared this report without all of the help I had. Let me again thank the committee members for their excellent support over the last three years. I certainly hope that many of our recommendations will be acted upon by the different authorities we have referred to in our recommendations.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I would ask the Honourable Senator Bonnell to elaborate on a point that rather astounded me. Perhaps I did not hear him correctly, but I thought I heard him say that there is a genetic factor in criminality. I realize he went on to say that that was perhaps overturned by other environmental factors, but nevertheless I was astounded to hear of a genetic factor. Could he elaborate a little on that point?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, we did not go into the aspect of the genetic factor in any depth, and it is a rather complicated matter. However, the research that was available to us did seem to indicate a genetic factor in the case of twins. For example, the chances were that, if one twin had criminal tendencies, the other could well be a criminal, too. The chances for that happening were even greater, if the twins were identical.

We were also given to understand that if the father was a criminal there seemed to be a greater chance that the child would be a criminal. Obviously, however, we have to take into consideration the fact that the circumstances of environment can also play a significant part in that relationship.

So although genetics would seem to have a considerable influence in almost everything we do, there is no real proof of a genetic factor in criminality other than the research carried on by those who worked with twins, identical twins and Siamese twins; and it was demonstrated that even in the case of twins who had been separated by a long distance and were unaware that they were twins there was a display of the same anti-social behaviour on the part of both Siamese twins. So it did seem to be a factor according to the evidence presented to us.

On motion of Senator Bird, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN LEADER OF THE NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY AND THE PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Prime Minister, in point (1) of his letter to Mr. Broadbent, offered to confirm the jurisdiction of the provinces with respect to exploration, development, conservation, and management of natural resources.

Since section 109 of the B.N.A. Act confirms as being within the exclusive powers of the provincial legislatures the ownership of natural resources, would the Leader of the Government indicate what the Prime Minister has offered the provinces which they do not now have, and whether the current federal proposal would leave the ownership of natural resources to the provinces rather than merely the right to manage those resources?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think it should be understood that the offer by the Prime Minister in his letter to the Leader of the New Democratic Party serves to reconfirm a previous federal offer made during the course of the constitutional discussions with the provincial governments. These words, or most of them, have appeared in the documents in connection with those constitutional meetings. In fact, in respect of natural resources, they confirm a right which already exists. It is a reiteration of the situation which now exists.

However, a further clarification will be provided for honourable senators when we come to the debate on the motion for the formation of a joint committee on the Constitution proposals, which hopefully will commence its work in a few days.

Senator Flynn: What I grasp from the leader's reply is that it is merely a confirmation and there is nothing new in it.

Senator Perrault: Yes, much of it but not all is a confirmation of that which now exists. There has been a suggestion in the course of the Constitution debate in recent days that the provinces at the present time do not own natural resources. In fact, those rights possessed by the provinces are enshrined in the British North America Act. The Prime Minister's letter restates, reconfirms and reiterates the situation which exists. Additionally, further matters are dealt with in the letter provided by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Senator Flynn: I accept the explanation of the leader. However, in listening to Mr. Broadbent yesterday, I thought he had achieved something rather exceptional. Do we understand from his enthusiasm that he is trying to get his party into a formal coalition with the Liberal Party—the Liberal-New Democratic Party—and is it the intention of the Prime Minister to invite Mr. Broadbent to take a cabinet post?

Senator Perrault: I do not think it would be proper for me to comment on remarks made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party in his press conference yesterday.

Senator Asselin: Is he a friend of yours?

Senator Perrault: He indicated he was very pleased with the response he had received from the Prime Minister, and I think Canadians can all take satisfaction in the fact that there is now additional support for the constitutional package.

Senator Flynn: Who is fooling whom?

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government a supplementary question. Does this point (1), which is set out at the top of the left-hand column of page 893 of the Debates of the Senate of yesterday, and as read into the record by the Leader of the Government, include any implication or reference relating to offshore resources?

Senator Perrault: No, my understanding is that it does not.

Senator Flynn: How do you define offshore resources?

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO MASSEY-FERGUSON LIMITED

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development on the Massey-Ferguson situation.

I wonder if the honourable minister has had an opportunity to look at the situation as we discussed it yesterday. Perhaps he could explain if there is indeed to be preference shown towards new investors in the company, in terms of government guarantees, as opposed to the 30,000 common shareholders of the company.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, what the honourable senator is asking me to do is to try to spell out in detail some of the factors that may be in a recapitalization package that might be put together. Unfortunately he is asking me to do that while the negotiations are going on. I thought I made it crystal clear yesterday in my reply that while these negotiations are going on, with Massey-Ferguson attempting to do what was suggested in the press release given by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, that we are prepared to underwrite some portion of the new financing, that is the Government of Canada and the Government of Ontario. But while those negotiations are being carried on by the representatives or the negotiators for and on behalf of the federal government, and until we have seen what they have put together, it would not be useful for any minister to comment on the details.

Senator Doody: Thank you, that is very helpful. Perhaps the minister might be prepared to tell the members of the Senate what role the Canada Development Corporation is expected to play in the situation. I realize that there are private corporations and banks and so on involved who would, perhaps, much prefer to keep their involvement low-key until after the finalization. But since the Canada Development Corporation is a crown corporation, perhaps the minister could tell us what involvement is planned for it.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, obviously the honourable senator answered his own question in the comments he made in the sense that if they are involved they would obviously require the same degree of non-interference, if that is the right word, by senators or ministers making comments about what may or may not be done until such a recapitalization package has been put together. I think the honourable senator really answered his own question by the time he got to the end of his comments.

● (1410)

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I am a little bit at a loss now. Is there something about this particular arrangement that precludes discussion? Is there something that we should not know about, that the public should not know about? Is it something that is alien to the Canadian business world or to the Canadian public generally so that we are not allowed to discuss it or have some information on it? Or is it some sort of different, strange arrangement?

Senator Olson: No, not at all. The press release issued by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was quite clear. It says in easy-to-understand wording, phrases, sentences, that the Government of Canada and the Government of Ontario are prepared to assure or to underwrite some portion of a financial package that would put Massey-Ferguson back on its feet and into a viable position.

What the honourable senator is now trying to do is to draw me into a discussion of the details of what may be in that package, and I don't know how many times I have to say that I am not going to be drawn into that discussion while the negotiations are taking place. Finally, I can tell him again that those discussions are going on right now.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN LEADER OF THE NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY AND THE PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. It is meant to check on whether or not the reading I have just made of the letter of Mr. Broadbent and the reply of the Right Honourable Prime Minister was, in fact, accurate.

In this proposal, Mr. Broadbent says, and I quote:

[English]

> —on the condition that the government will accept an amendment moved by myself or one of my colleagues confirming the provinces' right to manage and control their natural resources—

And so forth.

In his reply the Prime Minister mentioned only the non-renewable resources. Do I understand, then, that he has refused at least part of the request, of the proposal of Mr. Broadbent?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I stated earlier, the first point in the reply provided by the Prime Minister for Mr. Broadbent really is quite consistent with section 109 of the B.N.A. Act:

> 109. All Lands, Mines, Minerals, and Royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the Union, and all Sums then due or payable for such Lands, Mines, Minerals, or Royalties, shall belong to the several Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise, subject to any Trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any Interest other than that of the Province in the same.

The four western provinces are placed in the same position as the original provinces by the B.N.A. Act, 1930.

There is no deviation from the B.N.A. Act. This statement in the letter from the Prime Minister flows from the B.N.A. Act itself, It is a reconfirmation. It is a restatement of a right which is already enjoyed by the provinces. It is a clarification, perhaps, or a more precise delineation, however it may be described.

Senator Tremblay: What the honourable leader has just said is not an answer to my question. But referring to the B.N.A. Act, there is no distinction in the B.N.A. Act between renewable and non-renewable resources, whereas in the Prime Minister's answer to Mr. Broadbent the confirmation you mention is made only with respect to non-renewable resources.

Do I understand, then, that the doubts about the ownership by the provinces of their resources, which might have been raised as you said a moment ago, are eliminated only for the non-renewable resources, and that with respect to renewable resources the doubts still exist?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the truly contentious issue in some provinces at the present time is the ownership, taxation and disposition of non-renewable resources. The issue, of course, has been under intensive consideration by the various political parties in Parliament and by the public. The Prime Minister's letter to Mr. Broadbent in no way would take away from rights which are contained in the B.N.A. Act. In my view however, the letter serves to clarify the position of the federal government with respect to the non-renewable resources issue which is the subject of so much dialogue at the present time.

Senator Tremblay: Do I understand that for the renewable resources the intention of the government is to maintain the doubt about provincial rights, since the confirmation is just about the non-renewable ones? Is that a government policy—to maintain the doubt about the rights of the provinces with regard to renewable resources?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it may be useful to bring a statement on the matter to the Senate, perhaps at our next sitting, in order to remove any doubt that may be in the mind of the honourable senator. Certainly no such doubts are assailing Mr. Broadbent—

Senator Flynn: No, you can say that again.

Senator Perrault: —nor significantly has there been any comment of the kind made by the honourable senator from the other provincial premiers. Again, I repeat, the Prime Minister's commitments in his letter to Mr. Broadbent in no way detract from the existent rights of the provinces which are contained in the B.N.A. Act. But I would be most pleased to provide further reassurances for the honourable senator. Certainly I would not wish him to have sleepless nights because of his concerns.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I noticed that as the Leader of the Government was listing the provinces whose rights were being reaffirmed, and whose natural resources were being protected, he mentioned Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and the western provinces. The fact that he omitted Newfoundland tends to reinforce the feeling that many people have in Newfoundland that they are being excluded from the natural resource protection.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, none of the provinces are excluded from what the honourable senator has referred to as "national resource protection". In this connection I believe that a growing number of Canadians are becoming seriously disturbed by a number of very inflammatory statements being made by certain professed spokesmen for provincial interests, and by others, who should know better. The suggestion that somehow the government's constitutional proposals constitute some kind of plot to subvert every essential provincial interest is clearly ludicrous. Such allegations are unworthy of this nation and anyone purporting to represent provincial concerns. Perhaps it is about time more Canadians began to speak out about such mischief. There has been a great deal of irresponsible claptrap about the so-called constitutional "package." Some of the statements made by certain premiers in this country to the effect that the constitutional proposals are designed to reduce their rights and influence—yes, and that somehow the proposals would be used to remove Labrador from the jurisdiction of Newfoundland; that somehow the proposals would prevent the extension of education rights—have clearly no rational basis. That is why it is hoped that we can very soon have a debate on the floor of this chamber to discuss these and a number of the other exotic, speculative ideas about what is intended by this proposed constitutional package and the implications of those proposals.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, on a point of order, on a point of privilege, and on a point of everything else that is decent, when I speak as a spokesman for the province from where I was sent to this place, I do not do so in any irresponsible manner. I am not uttering claptrap, as the honourable gentleman has chosen to remark. I consider that remark to be unworthy of this chamber and of those who are in it. Any comment that I make for and on behalf of the people of Newfoundland is done with deep sincerity and feeling for the rights of the people in that province. We did not enter this Confederation to be sneered and snarled at by the honourable gentleman opposite, or by anyone else. I insist that I have the same rights in this chamber as anyone else, and I expect to be treated the same way.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator was not being accused of uttering claptrap. I suggested that there were some spokesmen in this country who were engaging in the very dangerous game of verbal pyrotechnics, and that irresponsible talk by certain spokesmen—and I am not confining that to any one province—

Senator Doody: Don't point at me.

Senator Perrault: —could ultimately destroy this country. That is what I suggested. I could make similar references to my own province of British Columbia, where certain spokesmen have made statements which do not stand any kind of rational analysis. Such talk, apparently, is designed to attract support from the electorate.

Senator Flynn: They are not here today.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I think this is an unworthy exchange, and I do not think it should be prolonged. However, I do not believe it is in the traditions of this country for one honourable senator to have to sit and be lectured at and pointed at in a fingerwaving tirade by the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. I don't expect to see it again, and I sincerely hope that it doesn't happen. In future, if we are going to make general and sweeping statements about irresponsible spokesmen for various provinces, I think that is in very poor form as well. One should not generalize in these instances; one should be specific. I don't want to be tarred with any one brush. I want the right to speak for my province when, where and how I want to do it.

Senator Perrault: I want to ask the honourable senator whether he is alleging seriously that because Newfoundland was not mentioned in the short reply I gave to a question a few moments ago that somehow this omission represented a hostile attitude on the part of the federal government towards Newfoundland—

Senator Roblin: Ask Senator Cook.

Senator Perrault: —that this constituted a form of discrimination? Clearly the government, by its actions, has demonstrated quite the contrary. It was not the intention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to suggest any kind of hostility toward any province. I hope that the honourable senator will credit the Leader of the Government in the Senate with a greater compassion for and understanding of this country, and a greater sense of fair play and decency, than to read that kind of inference into what I said.

Senator Doody: If the honourable gentleman will look back at the record of what he said and what I said he will find that my statement and my question was to the effect that if this was the intention of the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate it reinforces the suspicions of some people in Newfoundland that these are indeed the facts of the case. I did not at any time say that they were my suspicions or my feelings. If the honourable senator pretends that there are no feelings of unrest, that there are no suspicions in the eastern part of this nation, then I am afraid he is moving around in a very deep fog and he is in for a very rude awakening, and this country will be the worse for it.

Senator Perrault: As a former minister of the Newfoundland government, surely the senator is aware of the fact that the same rights given to the other provinces were given to Newfoundland in 1949. This is a matter of historical fact. This suggestion, this inference, of discrimination, being made in this chamber can only serve to further divide the country.

Senator Doody: We could keep this up all day, and I have no intention of doing so. The Honourable Leader of the Government can carry on if he wants to. As far as I am concerned, there are in this country ten provinces of equal status. The terms of union will demonstrate that. If the honourable Leader of the Government—and I emphasize the title and the official position—chooses to designate eight of them and ignore the others, then I feel that that is worthy of being brought to the attention of the Senate. I am not inferring any sinister motive. Other people will be reading the record, and they may do so.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a further question to the Leader of the Government with reference to point (1) in the letter, which I asked about a little while ago. After having listened to him read the relevant section of the British North America Act, which places ownership of resources, whether renewable or not, in the hands of the provinces, I am compelled, I think, to ask him whether ownership, as used by him, as I understood him, when he was referring to the British North America Act, does not include all the characteristics mentioned in the said point (1), namely, exploration, development, conservation and management. If in fact it does, then I would ask him further whether or not the enumeration of these items in point(1) does not in fact lead us to wonder whether or not there is some intention to cut down the attributes and characteristics of ownership by the use of these terms in point (1).

Senator Perrault: I stated earlier that I would bring a statement to the Senate which, hopefully, will serve to further clarify the paragraphs in this letter. I think this would be the responsible thing to do. Secondly, the honourable senator is requesting a legal opinion, which I am not prepared to give at this time.

Senator Smith: I am not requesting a legal opinion. I am simply asking what the Prime Minister means when he produces this sort of paragraph. Perhaps you are suggesting he does not know what he is saying.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am interested to hear from the honourable Leader of the Government that he intends to produce further information to explain, I almost said, the inexplicable, but I guess he will find some way of explaining—

Senator Flynn: As usual.

Senator Roblin: —some of the problems that we on this side foresee in respect of the three points contained in the Prime Minister's letter. I would ask him if at that time he will tell us why renewable resources have been excluded from the concurrent jurisdiction granted in point (2), because in my own province of Manitoba, where we have a very important renewable resource, namely hydro-electric power, we have some real concerns lest the attitude of the present government should restrict us in an improper way in the development and management of that resource. I would ask him whether he would investigate the possibility of seeing that renewable resources are included in point (2) as well as non-renewable.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that will be part of the further explanation which I shall bring to the chamber. Here again, it rather amuses me to hear the former Premier of Manitoba suggest that somehow the federal government may wish to restrict in an improper way the development and management of hydro-electric power resources of Manitoba. May I recall for honourable senators that, during his tenure as Premier of the Province of Manitoba, massive amounts of federal money were invested in Manitoba, the Nelson River Project among others, in order to help Manitoba further the development of its hydro-electric power resources—hardly the actions of hostile Liberal governments. Perhaps the honourable senator may wish to tell us the total amount of federal money invested in Manitoba hydro projects by federal Liberal governments, when he was provincial premier?

Senator Flynn: Come on!

Senator Perrault: Yet today the suggestion is—

Senator Asselin: Don't play politics.

Senator Perrault: The inference is that there is an unsympathetic federal Liberal government—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: —advancing a plot to subvert the hydro-electric rights$0of Manitoba.

Senator Smith: No such thing.

Senator Perrault: Let's have the figures.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, we must recognize what I call the Perrault syndrome, which means that when your argument is a little weak you divert attention by marching in the opposite direction at the top of your lungs, if I may be allowed a mixed metaphor. I do admit that the federal government was very co-operative with Manitoba. The Right Hon. John Diefenbaker was a wonderful man to work with, and in the time of the Conservative government in the federal arena in his day the partnership between Manitoba and the federal government was firmed up and finalized, and I think has been a remarkably successful one. I have no hesitation whatsoever if I owe thanks to anyone else besides John Diefenbaker; I include them in. I am happy to acknowledge help from whatever quarter I receive it, but I am not prepared to stand still for some intimations which have been floated in the wind these days about the federal attitude towards hydro-electric power, particularly when it comes to export questions. I am not aware of any initiative on the part of this administration to proceed with the inter-provincial power grid situation in some new and productive and expansive way. That may be in the cards. I hope it is. I know at the present time the provinces are being left to handle this matter themselves, and I suspect they will manage all right.

I tell my honourable friend that my question is meant in the interests of clarifying the situation; my question is meant in the interests of securing some equal treatment in respect of renewable resources compared with non-renewable resources. If my honourable friend wishes to indulge in his retrospective history he is welcome to do so. As far as I am concerned, I think that the partnership that began between the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker and the government which I had the honour to head has been productive for our province.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I promised earlier that I would bring to the chamber further explanatory material with respect to the text of the letter. I have committed myself to do that, and I shall do it, and an answer to the question asked by the honourable senator will be part of that later reply.

Senator Roblin: That is better.

Senator Flynn: If you had made that reply earlier, that would have ended it.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, my question also aims at helping the Leader of the Government to give the required clarifications about the current position of the government. I am thinking more particularly about the third paragraph which deals with indirect taxation.

I remember that a document published by the federal government in 1969 dealt with that issue. It did so in a context much broader than the recognition for or attribution to the provinces of a right to levy indirect taxes on non-renewable resources only.

What I would like to know is this: to what extent does this new policy of the present government reduce what was a few years ago the approach of the government of the day concerning indirect taxation by the provinces or is this still an open issue?

[English]

Senator Perrault: That will be dealt with in the statement which I shall bring to the chamber at a later date.

TRANSPORT

NEW AIR TERMINAL AT WHITEHORSE

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

As the building of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline has begun, and on the assumption that the whole line will now be built, resulting in a large influx of people into the Yukon, could the minister determine for me the start of the construction of the new air terminal for Whitehorse?

Having visited Whitehorse this summer, I am sure he is familiar with the totally inadequate facility that is now there. We have been promised a new air terminal for a number of years. I am not really interested in knowing when the plans are going to start or when the architects are going to start drawing. I would like to know when it is they are going to start building.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, obviously I shall have to take the question as notice. I shall try to find out whether a date has been projected—and I am not sure that that is so. I shall provide further information on the question, perhaps tomorrow.

THE ECONOMY

OUTFLOW OF ENTREPRENEURIAL CAPITAL

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question or two for the Minister of State responsible for Economic Development arising out of his interesting speech of October 20 to the Canadian Export Association in which he delivered himself of some sentiments with which I heartily concur. I do, however, want to ask him a few questions about their implications.

He started out by saying that Canada would need more capital than ever before and that "to attract this money it will be vital to create a favourable investment climate, first, by reducing the inflation rate, and second by making sure our investment is used as productively as possible."

I have no complaint with those words, but I would ask him how he proposes to reconcile that admirable sentiment with the problem that the country is experiencing these days of massive movements, not of foreign capital but of native Canadian capital out of Canada into other parts of the world for investment.

The honourable minister is aware that in the fields of oil and gas, mining, manufacturing, real estate, and other areas, very significant amounts—I think totalling certainly into the billions—of Canadian investment and entrepreneurial capital are going to the United States.

I bring this to the minister's notice because I think the very first thing we have to do in taking care of our capital requirements is to see why our own Canadian entrepreneurs are not investing their money in this country and explore ways in which they perhaps might be encouraged to do so.

Can the minister give us an indication of policy in respect of this problem?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the first thing the Honourable Senator Roblin should take into account is the fact that once the stage has been reached where there is a sufficient amount of square footage of supermarkets and people wish to continue investing in supermarkets, then they go to where there is a market for that particular kind of construction. I suppose that applies to much of the other real estate industry, too. Whether it is 1980 or any other year, there are, no doubt, gas and oil companies that invest in gas and oil exploration and development in Canada and in other places all over the world, and the same would apply to real estate development.

I do not think it is putting the question in its proper perspective to say that there may be some Canadian investment in real estate outside the country; therefore, that is a diminution in those who want to invest in energy in Canada. That flow goes on across international boundaries all of the time by those who specialize in the various sectors.

I think there was one word Senator Roblin left out in his quotation—and it may result from the fact that he read a newspaper account of my speech—but what I suggested was that it was the government's responsibility to try to reduce inflation, thus improving the investment climate in Canada. And I believe that very sincerely.

I also know that we are very deeply, and properly so, engaged in international trade, and we cannot, if we are going to continue that activity, completely isolate ourselves from inflationary pressures that build up in our trading partners. As a matter of fact, we have done a little better than most other countries on that front most of the time during the last few years, and I think we can take some satisfaction from it.

I am not sure what additional information my honourable friend would like. I stated some objectives and some problems with respect to the economic development that we see taking place in Canada in the 1980s, and additional or massive amounts of capital, even over and above what we have been using over the past four or five years on an annual basis, are going to be required, in my view, by the mid-1980s, and perhaps even sooner. It seems to me that it ought to be stated that we expect a favourable climate for that kind of investment, both by Canadians and by others who are interested in the kinds of sectoral projects that will be taking place in Canada over the next few years.

Senator Roblin: I would concur with my honourable friend that it is to be expected that there will be a certain mobility of capital in our economic structure. That is perfectly true, and I acknowledge that. But it seems to me it is a question of degree, and when we find, as we have in recent years, what seems to some of us to be an inordinate flight—perhaps that is too strong a word—an inordinate movement of capital from Canada elsewhere, one has to wonder, and one also has to wonder about the whole question of where capital goes. It goes where it thinks it will make money. If it is expected that there will be a good return in real estate, capital will go into real estate; if it is expected that there is more money to be made in gas and oil, the capital will be diverted into that sector. It is not true to say that a real estate developer will automatically stick to investing in real estate like the shoemaker sticks to his last, because we see what is happening in the development of the Canadian economic structure.

I stress this point, because later on in the same speech, the minister said—and I have some sympathy with his point of view—that we want to make sure that there is a Canadian presence in this recapitalization or capital development of our country. What better Canadian presence could there be than keeping our own capital at home?

I suggest this to him, not from the point of view that I am prepared to offer him some advice as to how to do it at the present moment but merely to point out that there is a problem in this respect. I also say to him that he has a problem, too, in respect of foreign capital coming into this country, because anyone who has had an opportunity to talk to foreign businessmen—and I have had some limited experience in this connection—is struck by the fact that, whether FIRA is a toothless tiger or not, it is certainly regarded as an obstruction to the investment of foreign capital in Canada.

So the minister has a lot of problems. He has to square the circle. He has to get Canadian capital investment up and he has to get foreign capital into Canada—it cannot be so strong that it will overwhelm Canadian investment—and he has to keep Canadian capital at home.

I sympathize with his target. It would perhaps be unfair to ask him to expand further on his position at the moment, but I hope that before this session is over, and particularly after the budget papers are before us, we will see the minister put some flesh on this rather interesting skeleton that he has erected.

SPEECHES BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT AND THE MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, and it is in relation to a speech of his and a speech of his colleague, the Honourable Herb Gray, as I get them both from the press.

I would like to begin by saying that I sympathize with the position of the government as stated by the Minister of State for Economic Development. My concern, however, is that there appears, judging from the press reports—and that is all I have to judge by—to be some difference between the point of view which he so well expressed and that which his colleague, Mr. Gray, expressed. For instance, as I read the press reports, in a recent speech to the Canadian Export Association, the Minister of State for Economic Development stated that there are prospects for strong growth in all sectors and regions of the Canadian economy. However, some five days before that, his colleague, addressing the Business Council on National Issues, said something which seems to me to be rather different, that being that there is no assurance that Canadian economic performance will be maximized or that we can even keep pace.

In the same speech the Minister of State for Economic Development, as reported, apparently expressed the view that the private sector should, and would be expected to play a very important part in the development of the prospects which he foresees as possible, whereas, judging from the report of his colleague's speech, his colleague looks upon an active role by the government in the development of industry as a major point in government policy.

I am wondering if there really is any difference between these two points of view as reported, and if so, which represents the considered view of the government.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am not attributing anything to Senator Smith, because as he pointed out he was taking it from the press. There have, of course, been a number of articles in the press—and I have about four in front of me and there were some printed about two weeks ago also—attempting to find some significant difference between the view of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and my view on the role of the government and, indeed, the shape and form that economic development will take. I think they would be very hard pressed to really make that case, and I am going to suggest to the honourable senator that he read my remarks more closely. I know he did not have a copy of the speech and that what he is reading is an interpretation and, I suppose, some quotations.

My reason for suggesting that is because there is really no conflict at all between the remarks made by the Honourable Herb Gray in his statement to the Business Council on National Issues, or in any other forum for that matter, and mine. Mr. Gray's statements and my own are completely compatible. Mr. Gray spoke, for example, about the need for imaginative government action and leadership. I could not agree with him more, and that is why I outlined an agenda of eight items that are contained in this speech—and I have a copy of that here too that I would be happy to send to my honourable friend—but in any event I did say that those were eight items on which Canadians will have to move if we are to have sustained economic growth in the 1980s. You can look at some of those specific points, and I am not going to go into them now, that I raised in my speech, but I said that Canadians will have to move in these eight areas. One of the agenda items, as I pointed out in my remarks to the Canadian Export Association, was energy. I highlighted the need to maximize the benefit to Canadians of the massive energy projects which will be coming on stream. Mr. Gray expressed similar concerns to the Business Council on National Issues.

Another agenda item was technology. I talked about industry increasing its share, I think, of R&D. Mr. Gray spoke in his address about the private sector pursuing innovation and both of us have talked about the pressing need to deal with skilled labour shortages. Both of us have talked about working co-operatively with the private sector, and the point is that the remarks of Mr. Gray and myself are completely compatible and are, indeed, part of the co-ordinated effort by the government at this time. I think the last two articles are not so difficult, because any intelligent person reading the arguments that are made there would come to exactly the opposite conclusion of what is written in the headlines. But I remember reading some articles two or three weeks ago that took certain quotations of mine out of context, and then put them along side some statement attributed to some official somewhere. I don't mind that; I have lived with the press in my political career for the last 25 years or so, so I know they do it. But I thought that article was perhaps the lowest yellow political journalism I have seen for quite a long time. But that is part of the game that goes on here, and I am sure my honourable friend who has had so much experience in politics, and the way that people write about it, is not going to be greatly disturbed about this attempt to pick some differences or disputes between cabinet ministers. That is par for the course every day.

Senator Smith: Well, the honourable gentleman delivered himself of some views about the press which I do not wish to be taken as having subscribed to either before or after this intervention now. But my primary concern, as I indicated to him, was whether there was any difference, any substantial difference between himself and his colleague, and if so, which of those represented government policy. That is all that I asked. I presume, and I do not want to put words into his mouth, that what he is saying, insofar as what he said was relevant to the question, is that there is no difference and that they are both in accord with government policy.

Senator Olson: I tried to explain to the honourable senator that an intelligent analysis of both speeches would lead to the conclusion that there is no significant difference.

Senator Smith: I am not sure whether the honourable gentleman is suggesting that I have not made an intelligent analysis—

Senator Olson: I said that you have not read the speeches.

Senator Smith: —but as long as he accepts the view that I have not, that is fine. All I am pointing out to the honourable gentleman is that if he were to suggest that I was not making an intelligent analysis, then I would probably take some exception to that.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: My question arises out of this speech made by the Honourable the Minister of State for Economic Development in which he stated that investment needs over the next ten years will necessitate a trend away from unproductive government offered subsidies. I wonder if the minister would elaborate on which currently offered subsidies he considers unproductive.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, it goes a little beyond that. There has been, and I think there will continue to be times, when, for example, government assistance in one form or another is necessary to take an industry over a difficult period. It happens in fisheries sometimes and it happens in agriculture and in many other sectors of industry. Where there is a prospect that the industry concerned is going to turn or be revitalized into a healthy industry, there is no question. But in my view to prop up industries where that prospect is not present is perhaps not as productive as getting into those areas where there is a potential market for the production.

Senator Charbonneau: I fully agree with the principle enunciated by the minister, but he still has not answered my question. I realize that some programs and some subsidies have to be amended along the way. But the minister has still not answered which ones he considers as unproductive as of this moment or two days ago when he made the statement.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator now is trying to get me to pick out some specific ones and identify them. I do not blame him for asking the question. What I was doing was stating some principles, and since the honourable senator already agrees with me that he too agrees with those principles, then we do not have any dispute over what is in the speech.

Senator Charbonneau: Surely the minister did not make that statement without reviewing which subsidies were unproductive before making the statement. All I am asking now is which ones are unproductive.

[Senator Smith.]

BANKRUPTCIES

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I also have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I am referring to a newspaper report indicating the substantial increase in bankruptcies for the nine-month period ending at the end of September, which indicates an 18 per cent increase in the number of bankruptcies, and worse than that, almost a 30 per cent increase in the volume of default. That is to say that the value of liabilities has increased by somewhere around 30 per cent. Further, statistics indicate that generally these are small- and medium-size businesses that are going under. So I wonder if the minister could tell us, given the importance of small- and medium-sized businesses in providing livelihood for Canadians, what precisely the government might be proposing to do to cut down on this high rate of bankruptcy.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, you will all know that there have been a number of factors in the Canadian economy contributing to what the honourable senator has just pointed out, and I suppose one of them is the substantial increase in the cost of money that is taking place, and which is indeed substantially higher than was anticipated when the investments were made. That, of course, throws budgeting out.

The honourable senator will also know, and it has been acknowledged by the government, that there has been a downturn in economic activity not only in Canada but all over North America. Historical reference to that will show that, whenever there is a downturn there is an increase in bankruptcies, and in what he has referred to as the level of default in some payments.

I am not sure that it is significantly out of line with other things, but I would expect that within the next few days, when the budget comes in and a number of other things occur, the honourable senator will hear a number of encouraging ideas for dealing with these kinds of problems.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENTS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development arising out of testimony given yesterday before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance by several senior public servants in the Government of New Brunswick.

Agreements between the Government of New Brunswick and the Government of Canada in the areas of forestry and industrial development expired some time ago. I am speaking of DREE agreements. Although new agreements have been negotiated between the province and the federal government at the official level and approved some considerable time ago at the political level in New Brunswick, they have not yet been approved by the federal government.

We were led to believe in committee yesterday that those agreements are pending some form of approval by the Ministry of State for Economic Development.

My question is in two parts. First, will the minister, today or tomorrow, shed some light on the status of those two DREE agreements; second, will he address himself to the larger question of the role of the Ministry of State for Economic Development in respect of the subagreements under the general development agreements signed between the federal government and the provinces? I should like to know whether his Ministry of State for Economic Development must approve those agreements after they have been negotiated by DREE, by the federal line department, and the province, and, presumably, have been approved by the federal Treasury Board. At what stage is his ministry involved in this process? Is it at the beginning or at the end? I ask this so that we can be sure that the Ministry of State for Economic Development is acting as a spur to economic development rather than, as it appears to be in the present case, a drag.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will have to look at the evidence that was taken before that committee to find out precisely the terms in which the replies, if that is the right word, were given to the questions asked by the members of that committee.

However, I can say that if it was alleged in those replies that the Minister or the Ministry of State for Economic Development was required to make some final decision with respect to the approval of those agreements, or, indeed, the subagreements that were involved, then somebody is being misquoted somewhere, because I am sure they meant the Cabinet Committee on Economic Development, of which the Minister of State for Economic Development is the Chairman. That is a different perspective on that.

With respect to the suggestion that apparently some subagreements had been made by the department involved, in this case, DREE and the provincial government, and that those agreements have been held up and so on, I will look into that matter to see whether or not the stage has been reached where the agreements are about to be announced, or, indeed, have been agreed to. The honourable senator will also realize that the Minister of State for Economic Development has stated in this chamber before that he will not make announcements for and on behalf of his colleagues. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion will make that announcement when he is prepared to do so.

Senator Murray: I am not asking the Minister of State for Economic Development to make announcements on behalf of anybody else, but perhaps on his own behalf he could tell us today whether it is a fact that the Ministry of State for Economic Development is not involved in the negotiations of, or in the approval process of, the subagreements negotiated between the federal government and the provinces under the general development agreements.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, it ought to be well known to the Honourable Senator Murray what the purpose of the Cabinet Committee on Economic Development is. It is to consider economic policies from all of the economic departments to see that they are in keeping with the economic policy of the government. That is not new for this government. I believe it was present in the procedure of the last government and the government before that.

I can assure Senator Murray, however, that it is the committees that take these economic policies under advisement, and give their approval or delay them or take whatever other action they choose to take.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO MASSEY-FERGUSON LIMITED

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have certain delayed answers that I should like to give today, if I may.

First I should like to reply to a question asked by Senator Murray during Question Period on October 21 concerning the offer of federal assistance to Massey-Ferguson.

What is involved in the answer, although it is quite brief, is essentially the same material as I gave to Senator Doody a few minutes ago, but because I gave an undertaking to answer Senator Murray I will do so.

I would like to stress once again the importance of the negotiations which are now under way in order to assemble a package of recapitalization for Massey-Ferguson. Obviously the success of those negotiations will determine the final form of the assistance from both the federal and the provincial governments, and it is therefore in our interest not to prejudice the outcome of the negotiations. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce announced that the government would participate in the recapitalization effort in order to quickly restore confidence on the part of lenders, buyers and suppliers so that Massey-Ferguson might take advantage of merging favourable market trends. I know that there has been speculation about the amount of government assistance, but I am not prepared to disclose a stated amount until such time as a satisfactory recapitalization package has been assembled.

ENERGY

DOMESTIC OIL—CALCULATION OF COST OF PRODUCTION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to a question asked by Senator Balfour during Question Period on October 16 concerning the calculation of the cost of production of domestic oil.

As I have already stated, one of the major elements of federal energy policy is that Canadian oil prices should be made in Canada rather than set arbitrarily by the OPEC cartel. This in turn implies that oil prices should reflect the cost of producing oil in this country.

The issue of determining cost of production is, of course, a complex and important one. The government has recently announced the appointment of Mr. H. Renouf to head up the Petroleum Monitoring Agency. One of the agency's prime goals will be to determine the cost structure of producing oil in Canada in order that the government may properly administer a blended oil pricing regime.

The blended oil price, I might add, will include a number of components in order to arrive at a price that will be based on Canadian conditions rather than on an OPEC-mandated price which bears no relationship to cost factors. The components of a blended price regime would take into account the cost of producing oil from existing fields, the cost of tertiary or enhanced recovery from existing fields, the cost of tar sands oil, and, of course, the cost of imported oil from international producers. When our frontier oil comes on stream it would also become a factor in establishing a blended price.

I would like to add that the government will be providing detailed information on the oil pricing question in the budget and energy statements which will be brought in next week.

PARLIAMENT

MEMBERS—ALLEGED PENSION BENEFITS—NEWSPAPER ARTICLE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Lang on October 15, 1980, concerning pensions of members of Parliament. It is rather detailed. If honourable senators agree, perhaps it could be incorporated in today's record of proceedings.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Relatively speaking, the benefit formula and the contributory requirements under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act are comparable to related provisions of pension plans for members of provincial legislatures. The current pension plan for Members of Parliament has been in effect since 1979 and incorporates major recommendations for change made by an independent study commissioned by the Government prior to that time. Among other elements, this study took into consideration for comparison purposes the pension plans for the elected representatives of a number of other countries.

Under the terms of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, a Member of Parliament is eligible for a pension after six years of pensionable service. This pension is payable for life upon termination as a Member of Parliament. In consideration of the fact that pensions are payable in such a manner, however, Members of Parliament are required to pay a very high percentage of their salary towards the cost of their pensions, 8½ per cent of salary in total.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING ASSISTANT DEPUTY MINISTER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition on October 15, 1980, concerning the appointment of Mr. R. J. Fournier as Acting Assistant Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs. The reply is lengthy, so perhaps it should be incorporated into the record.

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

I am informed that the appointment of Mr. R. J. Fournier on an acting basis was discussed by the Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with his Minister before announcing such acting appointment. The views of certain leaders of the native Canadian community, to the extent that they had communicated such views to the Deputy Minister, were indeed part of the Deputy Minister's discussion with his Minister concerning Mr. Fournier's appointment.

As this appointment was made as an interim measure pending the completion by the Public Service Commission of the regular staffing process, the normal practice in such situations of designating an acting appointee from amongst officers immediately available to the Deputy Minister was followed. In this context, one native Canadian who is a member of the Deputy Minister's senior management team was considered; this officer, however, was in the process of being promoted by the Public Service Commission to another senior position within the Indian Affairs Program and it was not considered appropriate to request him to act as Assistant Deputy Minister at this time.

APPOINTMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Williams on October 15, 1980, concerning Indian Affairs. The question concerned the appointment of a person who is stationed in Washington, D.C.

I am informed that the appointment to which the honourable senator refers in his question must relate to the assignment of Ms. Theresa Nahanee, an officer of the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs, to the Bureau of Indian Affairs of the Department of Interior, U.S. Government, in Washington, D.C. Ms. Nahanee is a native employee of the Department who is currently participating in the Career Assignment Program (CAP) of the Public Service Commission of Canada.

Her assignment to the Bureau of Indian Affairs of the United States government has been arranged as part of her development plans for future senior management responsibilities in the Canadian Federal Public Service. Her duties in the Bureau of Indian Affairs will have included over the year a series of assignments in various sectors of the bureau where she will gain knowledge of their operations and policies and benefit from the American experiences in the field of Indian administration. She will, by the same token, share with her hosts her knowledge of the Canadian Indian administration. While it is anticipated that the assignment will contribute significantly to Ms. Nahanee's personal development as a prospective senior manager in our own public service, her sponsoring department, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, expects that the knowledge and experience acquired will benefit them as well in the contribution she will be able to make on her return to the continuing review and development of departmental policies and programs designed to serve the Canadian Indian and Inuit people.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled "Child at Risk", tabled in the Senate on October 16, 1980.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, the public hearings and the preparation of the report, "Child at Risk", have been an illuminating and mind-expanding experience for those of us who worked hard on the subcommittee.

Senator McGrand was, of course, the heart, the brain and the philosopher of the inquiry. The single-minded humanitarianism of our colleague, and his profound belief in the importance of the operation, were an inspiration. The report is the result of his indefatigable pursuit of knowledge, his insistence on getting the best possible witnesses in a wide spectrum of disciplines, and his patience in writing and rewriting the careful drafts prepared by the support staff.

The printed record of the submissions by 27 high-powered witnesses will be an invaluable source of research material for many years to come. Already it has been in great demand by institutions and individual researchers not only in Canada but in other countries. It, in itself, justifies the work of the subcommittee and brings great credit to this house.

[Translation]

The report "Child at Risk" is well documented and concise. I can assure you that it is an impartial and accurate summary of what we have read and heard. We wanted it to be short in the hope that it would be read and re-read not only by legislators, public servants, social workers and educators, but also by parents and young people.

This report is not expensive. At $2.95, it is really a bargain to enrich the mind!

The 28 recommendations are pragmatic in the sense that they are politically practicable. They are sensible and they are realistic. Some of them will cost some money, but I am convinced, honourable senators, that they will bring about savings in the long run. We have only to think about the $500 million that we spend each year to build prisons and keep people behind bars. We have only to think also about the expense in human values.

[English]

There is no one single cause for the accelerating velocity of violence in our society. There are many contributing reasons for it, such as urbanization, over-crowding, rising expectations that cannot be fulfilled, weakening of the influence of the family and the church, and being cut off from our contact and interaction with our natural animal environment.

An important factor is, of course, genetic inheritance that goes back for generations and is, in part, responsible for the inability of an individual to endure stress or to have a toleration for alcohol.

Important as all these are, they did not fall within the terms of reference of your committee. Our mandate was concerned with early childhood experiences as causes of criminal behaviour. Our inquiry over the last 3 years has proved, without a shadow of doubt, that environment is a tremendously important factor.

The witnesses convinced us that the future adjustment of an infant and the behaviour of an adolescent and adult are greatly influenced, for better or for worse, by what happens to a fetus in utero, to an infant during and immediately after birth, and to a child during the first few years of its life. We know now that physical and emotional deprivation during these periods can lead to resentment, social withdrawal and violence.

Our recommendations are, therefore, designed to prevent some of the environmental causes that put a child at risk of developing criminal behaviour.

For example, we recommend an extension of day care services for the following reasons: Today, one out of every three marriages ends in divorce. As a result there are many single parents with children. As a rule, these men and women must work to support their families. Every year more mothers go out of the home to work because two pay cheques are no longer a luxury; they are a necessity for many families. That means that someone must look after their children; most of them cannot afford home help. Many now put their children into private homes where there is no one to check on whether or not a child is at risk, or to provide counselling and guidance for the parent. Well run day care centres with professional staff can give those children and their parents the help they need. At present, there are not enough day care centres to fill the need. There is a long waiting list in most cities, and day care is needed not only for pre-school children but also for school children.

• (1510)

The report of the Commission for the International Year of the Child supports our opinion in this respect. It states:

> The reality is that over 600,000 children under the age of seven have no access to day care, and there are probably over one million "latch-key" children in Canada. This situation has worsened since it was examined by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in 1970, and if the present trend continues, it could become a major crisis in the future.

Recommendation 3 is that family allowances be extended to pregnant women provided they receive prenatal care, and is based on the information that the nine months in utero are as important as any other time in the life of a child. The allowances would only be given for seven months, longer than they are now, since it takes time for a woman and her doctor to know if she is pregnant and if she is able to keep her child. In 1981 the gross cost of extending the allowance would be about $83 million. Of this, about $16 million would be recaptured through the taxation system, so that the net cost would be about $67 million.

This is not a particularly revolutionary recommendation, since for years now pregnancy allowances have been paid to women in France and Belgium. Similar legislation was introduced in Britain right after the war in order to make sure that pregnant women understood their nutritional needs and were given prenatal care.

All these recommendations in regard to day care centres and the extension of family allowances will obviously cost money in the short term, but, as I mentioned earlier, I am convinced that they will save money in the long term.

As I said before, we are spending half a billion dollars a year to keep people behind bars. At the same time, the cost of violence in the destruction of life, health and property is incalculable. There is no way to put a money value on the human suffering caused by violence in the home—the anguish of the battered child, the physical and psychological misery of the wife who has been beaten again and again. There is no way to calculate the trauma of a woman who has been raped, the misery of an elderly couple who have been tortured and beaten, or the grief of the family of a storekeeper or taxicab driver who has been killed during a hold-up.

Nor can we put a money value on the cost of the violence people commit against themselves instead of toward others—and here I refer to the people who become alcoholics, drug addicts or prostitutes, or who take their own lives. I find it horrifying that in the last decade the suicide rate for young people under 15 years of age has increased by 59 per cent, while the rate for those between the ages of 15 and 19 years has increased by 236 per cent.

The cost of mental illness and of keeping people in institutions is also increasing. We know now, as a result of our inquiry, that many serious neuroses are caused by early childhood experiences.

As Senator Bonnell mentioned last night, violence has become one of the great dangers to our society. Between 1974 and 1978 there was a 10 per cent increase in the rate of crimes of violence. What is an even greater worry is that during the same period there was a 61 per cent increase in the number of juveniles apprehended for crimes of violence. In 1978, about 139,000 violent crimes took place in Canada. The 80 per cent recidivism rate indicates a high degree of failure in our efforts to rehabilitate the inmates of our penitentiaries, in spite of the Archambault Report, the Fauteux Report, the Ouimet Report and, more recently the MacGuigan Report. It is obvious to your committee that we may be able to save money in the future by preventing violence by getting at some of the root causes, rather than continuing to spend money, unsuccessfully, to punish and reform offenders.

Recommendation 28 is perhaps the most important single recommendation in our report. It recommends setting up The Canadian Institute for the Study of Violence in Society. The reasons for it are as follows.

As we listened to the witnesses we had the impression that each was working in isolation and was unaware of what was being done by other researchers in Canada and in other countries. The doctor who was working on brain damage was sure that he had the answer. The social worker involved with battered children was sure that he or she had the right and only answer. The same can be said of the psychiatrist, the anthropologist, the gynaecologist and the psychologist working in the field of emotion deprivation—each was sure he or she had the only answer.

After a while we asked the witnesses if they thought there should be some multidisciplinary organization where information could be pooled and further research could be undertaken. Each of them said, "Oh yes, that is the thing we need more than anything else. We must be able to work with others and find out what is being done elsewhere". They all agreed that more research is needed, and that too was obvious to your committee.

We have spelled out in detail in Recommendation 28 what we hope the institute will do, so I will not burden you with it now, since you will, of course, read it yourselves, if you have not already done so. I hope the money will be found somewhere to set up the institute, because I think it is of paramount importance.

In conclusion, I personally am sure that our recommendations can do much more than help to prevent children from getting into trouble with the law. If they are implemented, I believe they will give our country a greater number of healthy, happy children who will grow up to be well-adjusted adolescents and adults. Surely, honourable senators, that is something which all of us, on both sides of this house, want for the future of Canada.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada", tabled in the Senate on 6th October, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Lamontagne is not able to be here this afternoon—at any rate, he will not arrive until later—and I am authorized to yield to Senator Manning on his behalf.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I enter this debate with some trepidation because of the seriousness of what we are discussing. Seldom in the long history of this chamber has there been greater need and obligation to honour the twofold responsibility which is ours, to give sober second thought to those propositions which come before us and to bring to bear on parliamentary debates the desires and concerns of the regions we represent. If ever a proposition cried out for sober second thought it is the one before us now. It bears directly on Canada's future as one strong and united nation. Unwise decisions may create a backlash that could inflict mortal wounds from which Confederation would not recover. If Canada is strong enough to endure the blows already dealt to national unity, we still may be confronted with constitutional provisions which will be permanent causes of regional alienation and dissent.

We are all aware of the long series of efforts to reach agreement on constitutional reform. On at least two occasions agreement was reached, but when it came time for ratification, someone always lacked the fortitude or necessary political support to take the final step. The long series of efforts and failures reached a climax at the last meeting of first ministers.

The major factors militating against success were apparent. The first was unrealistic objectives and time constraints. Both the pre-conference committee and the conference itself tried to reach agreement on a much too broad spectrum of reform, thereby opening up too many areas of disagreement. Had the committee and first ministers concentrated on the single goal of reaching agreement on an amending formula and patriation, I am confident that that initial goal would have been reached. The way would have been opened for immediate patriation and impetus given to concerted efforts to resolve the remaining issues in an atmosphere of co-operation and goodwill.

Secondly, the time constraints placed on both the committee and the conference were unrealistic. Such negotiations are, of necessity, slow and laborious processes, requiring much patience much perseverance, and much time. They simply cannot be hurried. By insisting on unrealistic deadlines, the propects for success were impaired.

The third cause of failure was the Prime Minister's almost total rejection of the viewpoints and concerns of the 10 provincial premiers. In a philosophical approach to what he regards as Canadian nationhood, he held that Canada is more than the sum total of its provinces, and the federal government, rather than a partner with provincial governments, is a power above and apart, representing national interests which transcend those of the ten provincial governments combined.

While attaching great importance to his so-called "people's package," including his "Charter of Rights," he was unresponsive to the equally important concerns of the provincial premiers in matters which affect not merely their regional interests but the well-being of the nation as a whole.

For example, every part of the country today is adversely affected by unresolved jurisdictional disputes involving the ownership and management of natural resources, including offshore mineral rights. In my province alone, two major projects for increasing Canada's energy supply, by developing the Athabaska oil sands and the Cold Lake heavy oil deposits, are close to being abandoned because of the jurisdictional conflicts over energy-pricing policy.

These two projects alone would infuse over $13 billion into the Canadian economy, would create thousands of new jobs for Canadians, many in central Canada, and, when in production, would reduce imports of costly foreign oil by over 250,000 barrels a day. It is estimated that the value to Canada of these projects alone would be approximately $15 million a day.

Recent reports indicate that some $2 billion of oil exploration and development capital has already been diverted to the United States, and scores of drilling rigs are following, with the loss of hundreds of Canadian jobs—all because of federal-provincial controversy over energy management and pricing policy. A similar situation is developing on the Atlantic seaboard with respect to offshore mineral rights.

I cite these examples not to impute blame but to emphasize that the national as well as regional interests are severely damaged by unresolved jurisdictional disputes. The solution to these problems does not necessarily require constitutional amendments, but it does require a recognition that often the national and regional interests of this country are inseparably related and the provincial governments must therefore be treated as equal partners with the federal government in the policymaking process through which solutions to these problems must be found.

Concerned that Ottawa is committed to exercising increasing control over the management of provincial natural resources and regional economic policy, the provincial governments made it clear that if the Constitution is to be amended they want their right to the ownership of natural resources and the management of provincial economic policy reaffirmed and entrenched. A twentieth century Constitution must provide the framework for a meaningful new national economic policy.

The Prime Minister's response to their insistence that economic rights be given equal recognition with what he describes as people's rights was to say that he was not prepared to bargain freedom for fish or fundamental rights for oil. Under such circumstances, it was not surprising that the conference ended in failure.

The wise and prudent thing to do at that point would have been to set aside temporarily all issues other than patriation and agreement on an amending formula, which even then could, in all probability, have been reached. Instead, the Prime Minister decided to embark upon a course of unilateral action to both repatriate and amend the Constitution, despite warnings from most of the premiers that such action could have dire consequences for Confederation.

I do not question the Prime Minister's belief that he has chosen the right and responsible course, but he is wrong—terribly wrong—and he is risking unnecessarily the danger of tearing Confederation apart.

May I comment on the implications of what he is attempting to do? To begin with, patriation per se is not a matter of disagreement among the Canadian people or Canadian governments. Practically all agree that our Constitution should be our own statute, passed by our own Parliament and domiciled in our own country. It is equally true to say that patriation is not a matter of widespread public interest or concern, even after the federal government has spent millions of dollars on television advertising telling Canadians that it is. Certainly, it is not regarded by the public as a matter of urgency. On the average Canadian's list of concerns, patriation would have a very low priority compared with the really serious and urgent problems of unemployment, inflation, energy, balance of payments, and budget deficits.

I venture to say that, left to their own good judgment in assessing the public mood, few if any government party members in the other place, or in this chamber, would be making patriation and constitutional reform a major national issue at this point in time had not the Prime Minister, as Leader of the Liberal Party, insisted on making it a national issue.

I repeat, while it is not a matter of urgent public interest and concern, few if any Canadians, and certainly no Canadian government, are opposed to patriation per se. For this reason, it was improper for the Prime Minister, at the press conference announcing his intentions, to say that those who might propose petitions or resolutions to Westminster would look silly saying to the British Parliament, "We don't want our Constitution in Canada." No one is saying that at all.

What the provincial governments and many individual Canadians are saying is that they do not want the federal government to act unilaterally in a matter with such far-reaching implications for every province and every Canadian citizen. Particularly, they do not want the Prime Minister acting unilaterally to make patriation a smoke screen behind which the government of another country is being asked to make significant amendments to our Constitution, unacceptable to many Canadians and to at least seven of the ten provincial governments.

The course of action on which the Prime Minister has embarked embodies two grave consequences for the unity of Canada now and in the future. The first is the divisive impact of what already has taken place. It is beyond comprehension why the Prime Minister would arbitrarily initiate the course of unilateral action he has announced having regard to the circumstances which exist at present. With the ties of Confederation already under severe strain, he could not have chosen a worse time to embark on a course of divisive unilateral action.

[Senator Manning.]

To proceed in the manner proposed violates the spirit, if not the letter, of established provisions for altering the B.N.A. Act, and does violence to long-standing Canadian traditions. It ignores entirely the valid objections voiced by the ten provincial governments. It makes a mockery of Canada's commitments to those people of Quebec who defeated the sovereignty-association referendum on the strength of federal promises that there would be speedy and acceptable constitutional reform.

The claim that the action proposed honours those commitments is one of the most dishonest aspects of this entire exercise. Much effort towards constitutional reform in recent years was prompted by a desire to meet Quebec's aspirations and concerns. What is now proposed is unilateral action rejected by Mr. Lévesque representing the supporters of sovereignty-association, and by Mr. Ryan representing the majority of Quebecers who rejected sovereignty-association. The course the Prime Minister is pursuing is one which both Quebec leaders not only reject, but publicly affirm they will go to court to prevent. To say that this action is being taken to meet Quebec's aspirations is ludicrous.

In a confederation such as ours in which a co-operative partnership between the two levels of government is vital to national unity and strength, no government should act unilaterally to override the expressed objections of a substantial majority of the other partners, except in cases of extreme necessity. Even then the central government should not act unilaterally unless it has a substantial majority in the House of Commons and unless its members are drawn from all regions of the country, thereby truly reflecting the national will. This essential requirement does not exist in the present Parliament.

Of a total membership of 282, there are at the present time six vacancies in the House of Commons. The government party supporters number 143 for a majority of 33 seats. But 72 of the government's members are from one province—Quebec—and over 86 per cent of its members are from the two central provinces of Quebec and Ontario. It has only 20 members from the eight other provinces combined, only two members from west of the Ontario-Manitoba boundary and none west of the province of Manitoba. Under such circumstances it is in no sense a truly national government. What we have is the leader of what has become a regional political party with only regional representation in Parliament presuming to alter the face of Canada and remake it in his own image, after his likeness, by imposing unilaterally on the entire nation an amended Constitution that significantly changes the structure and basis of Confederation.

That the Prime Minister recognizes this weakness is evident from his recent concessions to the New Democratic Party to gain their backing to give the semblance of support from more regions of Canada. The extent to which these concessions are substantive remains to be seen. Of one thing I am certain—the Prime Minister and his government have not begun to appreciate the amount and intensity of the animosity his decision to act unilaterally has engendered in many parts of this country, particularly western Canada, and how grievous the wounds already inflicted on the unity of this nation.

The second grave consequence is that which we will face in the future if the unilateral action is carried to fruition. It is inaccurate to say that the provisions embodied in the proposed Constitution bill do not significantly alter the status quo. They are provisions which have far-reaching implications and hold the potential for future controversy and dissention. Let us consider their implications briefly.

First, there is the matter of the so-called Charter of Rights. All provincial governments and the overwhelming majority of the Canadian people unreservedly support the concept of respecting and protecting human rights. The point of contention is whether a Charter of Rights should be entrenched in the Constitution, or whether the protection of human rights should remain the responsibility of Parliament and the provincial legislatures.

Certainly an argument can be made for entrenchment. Entrenchment would give such rights an immutability they do not possess when embodied in federal or provincial statutes. Entrenchment is used in the United States to ensure basic rights. Ironically, it is also employed by the Soviet Union which, on paper, has one of the most idealistic constitutions in existence. This is significant only in that it proves that entrenchment in itself is not a guarantee that human rights will be respected.

It is interesting that entrenchment is strongly supported by those who abuse their rights to advance a particular cause or serve their own interests. In the United States professional criminals and subversives seem to be among the best-informed on the matter of their constitutional rights. The work of law-enforcement officers frequently is thwarted by such people employing every legal device to escape justice on the grounds that some constitutional right has been at least technically violated. Those who are obviously guilty often are acquitted by the courts on the grounds that the process of justice did not show due regard for some aspect of their entrenched constitutional rights.

The alternative to entrenchment is the British system based on a concept of human rights too broad and comprehensive to embody in a constitution and that respects the sovereignty of Parliament to legislate wherever necessary to ensure that individual rights are protected. This is the system we have followed in Canada for over 100 years, and which has worked eminently well. The Honourable the Leader of the Government in initiating this debate said that if the late Right Honourable John Diefenbaker were alive he would be saying, "Hear, hear," to the proposal to entrench a Charter of Rights. Without presuming to speak for the late Mr. Diefenbaker, I doubt the accuracy of the leader's conclusion. Mr. Diefenbaker, above all else, was a champion of the supremacy of Parliament, and his confidence in Parliament as the proper custodian of human rights was demonstrated by his decision to establish his Charter of Rights as a bill passed by the Parliament of Canada.

When parliaments are the guardians of human rights, if weaknesses develop or changes become desirable, elected representatives soon feel the pressure of public opinion, and the necessary statutory changes can readily be made in response to the public will. In our diverse society in these changing times it is my conviction that this is an eminently better system than that which takes this matter out of the hands of Parliament by constitutional entrenchment, where new provisions can be added or old provisions strengthened or changed only by controversial constitutional amendments, and where those who feel aggrieved have recourse not to their elected representatives but only to the courts.

However, in the matter before us, the primary issue is more than which of these two systems is best. The question is: Should the federal government, lacking true national representation in Parliament, move unilaterally to change an established system which is working eminently well, when such$0a change has obvious disadvantages and is objected to by all but one or two of the ten provincial governments and a large body of Canadian people?

My submission is that it should not.

But there is another feature in the proposed Charter of Rights which, if entrenched unilaterally, will prove to be a permanent source of disunity and will certainly be counterproductive. I refer to the provision regarding language rights.

The stated objective is to ensure that English or French minorities have the right to have their children educated in either official language, if the number of students in the community warrants. That involves an indisputable change in the Constitution as it relates to provincial rights in the field of education. It takes away from provincial legislatures a power they have exercised for over 100 years, and exposes them to the obligation to provide and fund language education facilities for minority groups able to claim such service as a constitutional right.

Regardless of the merits, no one can say that that is not a fundamental change in the Constitution, and since it directly affects long-established provincial rights, it is one that should not be made without the concurrence of the provincial governments.

If implemented in the manner proposed, it will become a continuing source of controversy. It will be impossible to avoid disputes over what is the proper number of pupils that should require school authorities to provide instruction in the language of the minority. That question will be decided by the courts. The adverse consequences of school authorities being forced by court orders to provide and fund education in the second language for minority groups are obvious, especially in communities which are hard-pressed to provide adequate educational opportunities in one language.

But what should give us further concern is the negative aspect of all of this on bilingualism itself. Unfortunately, bilingualism is such a sensitive and emotional issue that most people tend to avoid discussing it for fear of being misunderstood. Bilingualism has been a national issue in this country for 15 years. We have had an Official Languages Act for 11 years. Surely by now some facts are apparent to us all.

The passing of the Official Languages Act gave official status in the federal field to the French and English languages, but it did not make a single Canadian bilingual. Eleven years later, and after spending hundreds of millions of dollars on language education, Canada remains a bilingual nation in name only. Surely by now experience has taught us that you cannot attain bilingualism by legalistic means. It must be a matter of individual desire and choice, stemming from an appreciation of the value and satisfaction of being able to communicate in both English and French.

Entrenching language rights in our Constitution will be counterproductive so far as fostering bilingualism is concerned. What it will do is increase the resentment and resistance of those who will interpret such entrenchment as a further attempt by the federal government to unilaterally force on them and their region of the country something they do not want and cannot be made to accept. If bilingualism is a national goal, we do not hasten its attainment by creating situations which mitigate against it.

I turn now to the matter of equalization. If by equalization is meant entrenching in the Constitution the existing formula for redistributing revenue to subsidize provinces whose income from certain fields of taxation falls below the national average, there will be little objection, even though such entrenchment would rob the formula of desired flexibility.

The real danger in such entrenchment, and the reason it is opposed by at least some of the provinces, is uncertainty as to the interpretation that may be placed on guaranteed equalization. The question is being asked in more than one province, "Is this a provision to enable the federal government to grab a lion's share of the revenue from temporarily lucrative but depleting provincial natural resources on the ground that such action is a national necessity to increase federal fiscal grants to other provinces to comply with the Constitution's equalization provision?"

Government supporters will argue that such is not the intent, and certainly they have every right to so argue. But I draw your attention to two important facts. First, many Canadians in western Canada at least, and the leaders of a number of provincial governments east and west, simply do not trust the Prime Minister when it comes to respecting the ownership and management of their depleting natural resources and the revenues that accrue therefrom. Second, no matter what the intent may be, the precise meaning of equalization in the Constitution will be subject to different interpretations, and will inevitably lead to controversy and references to the courts, all of which will have a negative impact on federal-provincial relations and national unity.

Finally, there is the proposed provision with respect to an amending formula. It is proposed that following patriation no changes will be made for two years unless unanimity is attained. In the national atmosphere of resentment which unilateral action will produce, there is little hope of unanimity being attained during the two-year period. After two years, amendments will be made in accordance with one of three options: first, the so-called Victoria Charter; second, a new formula agreed to by that point in time; or, third, a national referendum.

With respect to the Victoria Charter, while it represented a substantial measure of agreement, it contains features to which some provinces take strong exception. One is the power of veto to be permanently enjoyed by the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec but denied to all others. Having regard for the difference in population between the provinces, it would be unrealistic to argue that each should have a full power of veto. But surely, in those matters involving the rights and powers which provinces now enjoy, they should not be altered or taken away without the consent of the province affected.

Regarding the possibility of working out a new amending formula, if good methodology is employed, I believe that can be done provided the federal government is prepared to modify its uncompromising rigidity in the matter of retaining centralized control over government policy decision-making processes in Canada.

I am well aware of the federal government's claims of flexibility, but what it ignores is that there are two kinds of flexibility. It is one thing to be flexible in agreeing to move the pieces around within a certain parameter you have defined—in this case its own particular concept of Canada—but it is another thing to be flexible by agreeing to move the pieces beyond the parameter you have defined in order to respect and accommodate the equally valid positions of other levels of government.

It is not a matter of denuding the federal government of its proper and necessary federal powers. It is a matter of recognizing that Canada has undergone tremendous change in recent years and the old concept of a nation with a protected industrialized central region with a hinterland east and west no longer is viable. Having regard for national growth and economic development, especially in the western provinces, major decision-making powers can no longer be concentrated in the central government dominated by representation from one region of the country. Unfortunately, there has been little federal flexibility in addressing this major national issue.

In the matter of a national referendum as a method of implementing constitutional amendments, this is surely one of the least desirable courses of action. It is a method whereby the federal government could attempt by massive national propaganda to persuade a majority of the Canadian people to accept its proposals for constitutional change, no matter what the views and concerns of the provinces might be. Reports that the federal government's propaganda fund has been increased to $35 million are not without significance.

More serious is the fact that referendums inevitably produce polarization. People are asked to choose sides on issues which invite fundamental differences of opinion. The resulting polarization divides families and communities, and could seriously further divide the country. This latter danger is aggravated by the imbalance of population and interests between the various regions and provinces. Nationally the citizens of the two central provinces, who have mutual interests significantly different from those of other regions, could always outvote the rest of the population.

It is true that a referendum on a constitutional amendment under section 41 will require a double majority for acceptance—that is, a national majority of those voting, and a majority in favour in each major region of the country, namely, Ontario, Quebec, the maritimes and the western provinces. This would enable citizens in any one region to defeat the referendum even if it received a favourable majority nationally and in each of the three other regions; but such an outcome would generate resentment and further aggravate the already serious regional differences which impair the unity of this country.

Honourable senators, the irony of this whole situation is that it is man-made and totally unnecessary. As I have said, constitutional reform is not in itself a matter of urgent public importance and concern. The extent to which it has become a contentious public issue is because the Prime Minister has chosen to make it so. It is now dividing the country and consuming the time and energies of governments which could be better spent in co-operative efforts to resolve the nation's far more serious and urgent economic problems.

Having regard for these circumstances, I appeal to all honourable senators to weigh most carefully the role that this chamber can and should play at this crucial time in our national history. I suggest there are three things that we can and should do. First, we should do all in our power to persuade the Prime Minister to reconsider the dangerous course on which he has embarked. This obviously rests primarily with senators who are members of the government party. As such, their individual and collective judgment is something which I am certain the Prime Minister respects. I am equally certain that they have deep respect, and even affection, for their leader which must surely be a motivation for them to dissuade him from a course that can only enshrine him in history as a leader who did more to divide Canada than any other Prime Minister since Confederation.

Secondly, we can act to prevent the proposed resolution from being approved by Westminster by withholding our endorsation. Westminster might act without the concurrence of the provincial governments, but it would not act without the concurrence of this house. Surely this is a situation in which all partisan interests should be set aside and we should all act solely in the interests of Canada as a nation. This can well be an historic occasion, when the wisdom of the Fathers of Confederation in providing this chamber of sober second thought will be demonstrated as never before.

Thirdly, we can initiate within this chamber an alternative course of action that could lead to a resolution of disagreements over constitutional reform. We should establish a small task force and employ a wholly different methodology to develop acceptable constitutional amendments. The substance of future amendments in areas of concern should first be embodied in temporary political agreements between the federal and provincial governments with the understanding that after a trial period of perhaps two years their substance would be adopted as constitutional amendments and implemented under whatever amending formula has been worked out. I am confident that such a procedure could be successful, and certainly it would be an appropriate and constructive role for this house.

I close with an earnest appeal to those who in their resentment and frustration are reacting to the government's present proposals with talk of separation. I am deeply troubled by the large number of serious-minded responsible people in western Canada who a year ago would have rejected the idea of separation out of hand, but who are now joining or supporting organizations advocating that the west separate. Such organizations are attracting members and fringe supporters not by hundreds but by thousands. It would be a grave mistake for the federal government to ignore the potential danger to Canada inherent in such trends.

I am unalterably opposed to any attempts to break up this country in any way. I am certain this is still the position of the majority of Canadians east and west, and I appeal to all such to remain steadfast in their commitment to Canada as one united nation from sea to sea no matter how great the provocations may be.

I appeal with equal fervor to the Prime Minister and his government for the good and future of Canada not to go on imposing more strains on ties which already are at the breaking point. Let none of us fail Canada in this crucial hour.

On motion of Senator Olson, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was presented on Thursday, July 17, 1980.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, as Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, together with the other Joint Chairman, the Honourable Perrin Beatty, M.P.; the Vice-Chairman, Mr. Kenneth Robinson, M.P.; the Honourable Ramon Hnatyshyn, M.P.; and Mr. Svend Robinson, M.P., I recently attended a conference in Canberra, Australia of, as they described it, "Delegated Legislation Committees" of the Commonwealth.

"Delegated legislation" is just another name for subordinate legislation, which is the name used by most of these committees, although some have somewhat similar names to ours. The public, of course, has not the vaguest idea of what we are talking about when we use such expressions as "delegated legislation" or "subordinate legislation". In our report, which is the main subject of my speech, we recommend that our present committee be renamed the Standing Joint Committee on Regulatory Review, so that the public would have a better understanding of the function of the committee from its name. For the sake of convenience, I will use this name when referring to other committees in other jurisdictions exercising the same function, and I will use the term "regulation" as interchangeable with "subordinate" or "delegated legislation."

● (1600)

Because we were attending the conference in Canberra, we were anxious to present our report before Parliament adjourned in July so that it would be available to delegates attending the conference. Our legal counsel, Graham Eglington, worked under extreme pressure in producing the first draft and subsequent re-drafts, and I want to pay tribute to his efforts. He is an outstanding authority in this field and the committee leans very heavily on his expertise and advice, not that we always take it, as the minutes of our proceedings and evidence will show.

I might also say that I spent many hours in the re-drafting process, which is the kind of contribution a senator, particularly one with a legal background, can make, as we do have more time than members of the House of Commons, who are much busier than we are on other matters.

Our report was the result of the committee's being originally empowered, in February 1979, to conduct a comprehensive study of the process by which government regulations are enacted and how that process can be improved, with particular reference to "the means by which Parliament can better oversee the government regulatory process."

We had just got going—in fact, we were in Washington studying how they handle these matters in the United States—when the election was called, which stopped our work. We had just nicely got going again when the government was defeated and another election was called. Finally, on June 4 of this year both houses again referred this matter to our committee and, as I have mentioned, we were able to complete our work on July 17.

This question of regulatory reform is being studied to death in Canada right now. The Institute for Research into Public Policy in Montreal has been studying the matter for several years. At a federal-provincial meeting of first ministers held in February 1978 it was agreed:

> —that the whole matter of economic regulations at all levels of government should be referred to the Economic Council of Canada for recommendations for action, in consultation with the provinces and the private sector.

Shortly thereafter, the Prime Minister formally requested the Economic Council to:

> —undertake a number of studies of specific areas of government regulations which appear to be having a particularly substantial economic impact on the Canadian economy.

[Senator Godfrey.]

The chairman of the council, at the request of the Prime Minister, prepared a preliminary report on the regulation reference for the meeting of first ministers in November 1978. In light of the discussion of the preliminary report by first ministers, some modifications were made in the council's research plan. The Prime Minister had requested the council to prepare an interim report by the end of 1979, and this report was actually issued in November 1979. It would appear from their report that they undertook five general or framework studies and fourteen specific areas of study. In contrast, our committee relied on our own experience, including what we had learned of the procedures in other countries, the expertise of our counsel, Graham Eglington, and studies made by others, including the interim report of the Economic Council, which we found helpful.

One would have thought that the activities of our committee and the Economic Council would have been enough, and that the federal government would await these reports before having someone else do a study. Not at all. During the Clark government, the Honourable Perrin Beatty was given the responsibility by Mr. Clark to look into the whole question of regulatory reform. As soon as the present government took office, it was announced that a task force of parliamentarians would be appointed to look into regulatory reform. Its terms of reference were:

> —to examine and report upon government regulations in order to minimize the burden on the private sector.

That was followed by some details.

The task force also had to report by December 19 of this year. It was, therefore, required to accomplish in less than seven months what the Economic Council was given nearly three years to accomplish. The task force wisely decided this was impossible, and in a discussion paper that they issued it was stated that:

> The task force has decided to focus on the process of regulation. We will be examining both the process of establishing regulatory schemes and the process of administering them.

Part, therefore, of what they intend to study would duplicate the work of our committee, and I would presume that they will find the report of our committee very helpful. I would hope that they will reach the same conclusions as we did. If they do, this will be very helpful in persuading the government to do something about our recommendations.

I will not discuss at great length the 66 recommendations we made. These are summarized at pages 22 to 25 of our report. I would like, however, to touch briefly on the highlights.

First of all, I would read paragraph 6 of our report, and the first sentence of paragraph 7:

> 6. Subordinate legislation is an historically accepted means of governance. There is no longer any point in arguing that it is fundamentally improper or that it should be used only occasionally or for mere matters of detail. What is essential is to surround the making of subordinate legislation with procedural safeguards and measures of control so that the rights and liberties of the subject, which it is the object of our constitutional order to protect while maintaining a viable system of government, may be secured as well under subordinate legislation as under statute. Subordinate legislation must not-$0become a means, even unwittingly, of suppressing rights and liberties or of subverting parliamentary supremacy over the law. The Crown's power has never stood higher; the potential for its abuse has never been greater.

7. Subordinate legislation may be inescapable and the implementation through it of policy, even policy never debated by Parliament, may be inevitable; but that is no reason to allow subordinate legislation to be made without adequate check, without any democratic element in its formation, and embodying any provisions Parliament's delegate chooses.

We emphasize in our report that the means can be in certain circumstances just as important as the ends. Too often for the sake of administrative convenience, proper procedures are not provided for. It is the provision for proper procedures that protects the hard-won rights and liberties of the people secured over centuries of constitutional conflict. It is to protect these rights that it is now proposed to entrench some of them in our Constitution. If you examine that part of the proposed Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms set out in Schedule B of the resolution on the Constitution, under the heading "Legal rights," you will notice that it deals essentially with procedures.

In our view, a parliamentary democracy should require that means and procedures be subject to public scrutiny and parliamentary control, as well as the policy or merits of regulations and other subordinate legislation. How do we propose that this be done? Well, we think that the process by which regulations are enacted can be improved from start to finish. I believe that I can best explain how we propose to improve the process by which regulations are enacted by going through the actual process of enactment and explaining with each step our recommendations.

The first step in the regulatory process is the introduction of a bill in Parliament, which, among other things, authorizes the enactment of regulations. This is usually referred to, as far as regulations are concerned, as the enabling clause in a bill.

When a bill receives second reading, it is referred to a standing committee which then considers the bill clause by clause, and that committee can make amendments, which may or may not be accepted by the government or Parliament. Often such amendments are negotiated between the chairman of the committee and the minister responsible for the bill. While this committee may have some expertise in the area covered by the bill, it is rarely that it has any particular expertise with respect to clauses enabling regulations to be enacted.

Our recommendation at this stage of the process is two-fold: First, the enabling clauses of the bill should always be referred to the Joint Regulatory Review Committee, which has an expertise in this area, and which will be charged with the responsibility of reporting on these enabling powers to the standing committee considering the whole bill. Thus, that committee will have the expert advice of the Joint Regulatory Review Committee as to whether or not these enabling clauses conform to approved criteria. Much of the present difficulty with regulations stems from the fact that enabling clauses are drafted by officials in the government who are much more interested in giving themselves wide and practically unfettered powers to enact regulations than they are in protecting the rights of citizens who are subjected to the regulatory process.

The second recommendation we make at this stage of the process is that, when a bill which includes powers to enact regulations is being considered by a committee, a draft of the proposed regulations be submitted to the committee for consideration at the same time. Many bills are, in varying degrees, skeletal in their nature—that is they provide for the enactment of regulations but not much else. When a committee is studying a bill, that committee, in many cases, hasn't much idea how the bill will operate and affect the public unless it sees the regulations which the government proposes to enact under the enabling clauses.

I shall refer to only one instance where this has been done in the past. The committee studying the new Immigration Bill a few years ago requested the government to provide information as to what it proposed to put in the regulations. This was done, and the committee was thus in a much better position to consider the bill itself and its implications.

The next step in the regulatory process is the drafting of regulations by the department concerned. The only requirement under the Statutory Instruments Act is that the department concerned submit the draft regulations to the legal advisers to the Privy Council Office, who are, in fact, officers of the Department of Justice. As we point out in paragraph 19 of our report, it is doubtless the case that the legal advisers have managed "to weed out many offensive or ultra vires provisions in regulations," and our committee has undoubtedly "assisted the legal advisers in their own work." While in the opinion of our committee the existing means of checking and controlling the enactment of regulations as to their legality and propriety is a considerable improvement over the situation existing before the passage of the Statutory Instruments Act, it could be improved still further.

Our committee, and the legal advisers to the Privy Council Office, have not concerned themselves with the policies or merits of the thousand or so regulations that come before it each year. Our committee believes that it is more appropriate for regulations to be scrutinized by the appropriate standing committees of the houses as to policy and merits.

We state in paragraph 14 of our report:

Your Committee believes that the appropriate stage for the review of subordinate law as to its policy and merits is well before it is finally made. Your Committee also believes that more effective than any scheme of parliamentary scrutiny of the policy of a proposed subordinate law that can now be devised is an obligation to make that proposed law public, to state the reasons for its making and to consider representations from the public, whether individuals or groups.

This can be accomplished by the introduction of what are called notice and comment procedures, somewhat similar to the notice and comment procedures provided for in section 553 of the Administrative Procedures Act in the United States, which has been in effect since 1946. An eminent authority in the United States has described this system as "simple and overwhelmingly successful," and there is no reason that the committee can see why it should not be equally so under our system of government.

Put very simply, this procedure requires that departments and agencies of government provide to those parties particularly interested, and to the general public, advance notice of their intent to propose new regulations and allow as much advance consultation in the formative stages of draft regulation making as circumstances permit. Experience in the United States shows that simple procedures have a greater chance of being accepted by those who must operate under them, and give promise of swifter results.

The Economic Council of Canada in its interim report recommended that a 60-day notice and comment procedure be adopted for all new regulations which have a significant implication in terms of cost or impact on the distribution of income and are susceptible to cost-benefit analysis.

Our committee did not believe that notice and comment procedures should be confined to regulations which meet economic or monetary criteria or are susceptible to cost-benefit analysis. We were of the opinion that, with certain exceptions, "the reasons for and the policy of all subordinate legislation be subject to the light of public scrutiny."

The exceptions would be, for example, those regulations made in urgent circumstances, some involving small-scale amendments to existing laws or of a housekeeping or domestic nature governing matters within the Public Service where it would be impracticable or unwise to subject them to any notice and comment procedures.

May I at this point confess to a particular bias in favour of our recommendations as to notice and comment procedures? I was considerably more enthusiastic about this recommendation than were some of the other members of our committee and our legal counsel. This enthusiasm stemmed from frequent dealings with regulatory agencies over many years while I was practising law.

To give one example, at one time I represented the second largest mutual fund group and the Canadian Mutual Funds Association before the provincial securities commissions across the country. For some years, these provincial securities commissions would publish policy statements which were virtually indistinguishable from regulations, without prior consultation with the industry. In about 90 per cent of the cases, these statements would have some technical defect that would make them either unworkable or not as workable as they should be. When these defects made them unworkable, the securities commissions would always, of course, have to amend them, much to their embarrassment. When they were workable but could have been improved upon, they would often not amend them. Being only human, they did not like to admit they were in error unless they had to.

After some years of this, and particularly after a change of chairman in Ontario, things got much better. The Ontario Securities Commission, for example, for a good many years has always consulted closely with that segment of the financial community that is most affected by a proposed policy statement, and publishes draft policy statements for comment from the industry, the professions and the public before adopting them.

I should point out that, with respect to many bills, the federal government has gradually adopted notice and comment procedures. These take many forms. They can be by way of publication of green or white papers, or by having first reading of a bill accompanied by an announcement that it was not the intention to proceed with the bill in that session but merely to give the public a chance to comment on it.

The problem with proceeding by way of what is really a draft bill when it is only intended to give it first reading is that sometimes it is so faulty technically that the whole bill is discredited. The industry affected, when it is opposed to the principle of the bill, just loves to pounce upon the technical defects in a bill in order to discredit its principle, and often keeps up the criticism long after the government has admitted the errors and announced that it will correct them.

More and more government departments are calling in representatives of groups that are particularly interested in a bill or who have particular expertise in the subject matter of a bill. The new Bankruptcy Bill is an excellent illustration of what I am talking about. This bill was originally given first reading back in 1975. It had been prepared by the department without outside help and was a disaster, being ripped apart by the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. The committee suggested 139 amendments, with the result that the original bill was withdrawn.

Since that time, the department has worked very closely with a committee from the Canadian Bar Association and the Licensed Trustees in Bankruptcy. They have also paid a great deal of attention to what the Senate committee had to say, incorporating in the new bill most of the amendments suggested by that Senate committee, with the result that the bill in its present form is a vast improvement over the one originally proposed. A great deal of time would have been saved had the committee of the Canadian Bar Association and the Licensed Trustees in Bankruptcy been consulted from the start.

Procedures which provide for public input and make sense when bills are being prepared, surely, in most instances, make sense when new regulations are being considered. Some departments do follow these procedures voluntarily, and they appear to work. For example, in the presentation of the regulations under the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act, the department worked very closely with the industry. The department did not wait for the bill to become law. Draft regulations, which are of a highly technical nature, were being considered by an industry association at the same time that the bill was before Parliament. In fact, I am informed that these regulations have gone through four drafts and, no doubt, the regulations will be better for having this industry input.

I have already spent some time on our recommendations for notice and comment procedures. We made 16 recommendations with respect to them, and I will only mention two more. We recommended that, wherever possible, notice of proposed regulation-making should be given before a draft regulation is prepared and published. This is because very often policy has become frozen by the time a draft regulation is prepared. Attempts at modification, change or abandonment are likely to be met with resistance.

Our committee, of course, studied the whole question of freedom of information a few years ago and made an extensive report on it, which was substantially adopted by both the Conservative and Liberal governments in their respective bills. We consider that the principle of freedom of information is important in the regulation-making process, and we recommended therefore that both the document which forms the factual basis of the decision to make a new regulation, and the comments submitted on it, should be open to public scrutiny.

The next step with respect to the enactment of regulations is for them, with some exceptions, to be registered and published in the Canada Gazette. Our committee recommends that, in addition, all regulations be tabled and laid before Parliament immediately upon registration and be referred to the appropriate standing committees of the houses for review on the merits and as to policy. It would be unrealistic to expect such committees to review the merits of, and hold hearings on, all regulations, even entirely new ones. However, they should be permitted, on their own initiative, to review and report on such regulations coming under their jurisdiction as they may select. The Regulatory Review Committee would, of course, still consider all regulations as to their legality and propriety and we recommend that they also have the power to recommend to the appropriate standing committee that they review certain regulations on their merits.

There is no point in having committees of Parliament consider regulations unless they can do something about them. In the United Kingdom, they have procedures by which a majority of regulations are subject to either affirmative approval in either the House of Commons, or both houses, before they can be made, or are subject to annulment after they have been made in either the House of Commons or both houses. These are commonly called affirmative and negative vote procedures. In 1976, in the United Kingdom, approximately 13 per cent of general regulations as opposed to regulations that are local in their character, were subject to affirmative vote procedures, and 65 per cent were subject to negative vote procedures.

Under the Statutes of Canada to the close of the 1976-77 session, in only 21 instances is Parliament allowed the opportunity to disallow a regulation or to prevent its coming into or continuing in force by refusing to affirm it. Because of the rarity of the procedure, there are no rules in either the Senate or House of Commons dealing with affirmative or negative vote procedures.

Our report recommends that a commitment be made by the government to use the affirmative vote procedure where practicable. In this connection, I would like to read from paragraph 26 of our report:

> It is not possible to specify all those cases in which affirmation would be possible and desirable, although its virtue in cases of subordinate laws made under skeletal statutes is obvious. Affirmation would also be highly desirable in cases where the exercise of enabling powers may
> (a) substantially affect the provisions of the enabling or any other statute;
> (b) impose or increase taxation, fees or charges;
>
> (c) lay down a policy not clearly identifiable in the enabling Act or make a new departure in policy; or
> (d) involve considerations of special importance.

We further recommend that all regulations not subject to a statutory affirmative procedure be subject to being disallowed on resolution of either house. At the conference in Canberra, the United Kingdom representatives told us that their negative vote procedures were largely useless because the rules of their House of Commons did not provide for adequate debate, or that there must be a vote on a negative resolution.

We anticipated this in our report because in paragraph 24, we recommended that if any resolution for disallowance of a regulation is moved, and is not withdrawn, the regulation should be deemed to have been disallowed if a debate on the resolution does not take place and culminate in a vote within a fixed number of sitting days. Our committee favoured a minimum of five signatures for a motion of disallowance in either house, and also recommended that no debate can be commenced on a motion to either affirm or disallow until the expiry of a time limit for receipt of a report from the Regulatory Review Committee as to that regulation's legality and propriety, and from the appropriate standing committee on its merits.

I have already taken up a great deal of the time in this house, but I cannot sit down without commenting on the recent Conference of Delegated Legislation Committees which I referred to at the start of my speech.

The opening address at the conference, which can properly be described as the keynote speech, was given by the Governor General of Australia, Sir Zelman Cowan, who was a law professor before he became Governor General. This was a most excellent, interesting and scholarly effort and helped to explain to those delegates coming from outside Australia why a law professor was chosen to become Governor General.

The conference highlighted what we already knew, namely, that Australia was well ahead of Canada in the area of regulatory and administrative reform and, in fact, as Sir Zelman Cowan pointed out in his speech, Australia has one of the best systems of administrative law in the world. This has all occurred mostly in the last 10 years following a series of committee reviews in the late sixties and early seventies. As Sir Zelman Cowan pointed out:

> The recurrent themes have been the need for a comprehensive structure of independent institutions to supervise the administration, the avoidance of the haphazard growth of government bodies, the provision of basic rules of fair conduct and the need for assurance that the system works by providing that the citizen may secure access to government information to make sure that the decisions by government made on that evidence and affecting him were fair and right.

Sir Zelman points out that out of this has come a body of legislation in Australia of a very comprehensive sort.

There is legislation providing for an ombudsman "to investigate complaints, to involve himself in the decisions of government departments and of ministers whenever there is a complaint of abuse, unfairness and maladministration."

There is legislation in operation providing for a national administrative appeals tribunal. I might mention that this appeals tribunal has jurisdiction to hear appeals from administrative decisions in certain areas, while in Canada we have specialized appeals tribunals like the Immigration Appeal Board.

There has recently come into operation the Administrative Decisions (Judicial Review) Act, which provides for a review by the Australian Federal Court, by a single simple procedure of administrative review, of administrative decisions made under Australian federal law. To quote Sir Zelman again:

> It has the great merit of simplicity, and of the greatest importance is the provision that a person whose interests are adversely affected by a decision given in the exercise of powers or functions conferred by a Commonwealth statute may obtain a full statement of the reasons for that decision.

● (1630)

Sir Zelman also referred to the establishment of the Administrative Review Council "to keep the new structure of administrative law and discussion making under review".

In its first report, the chairman of the council spoke of the issues with which it was concerned. He said, "They concern the balance between the citizen and the government, a balance which is critical to a free society".

In our report we recommended, in paragraph 35, the establishment of a similar council, composed of members from the regulatory agencies, government departments, public interest groups, industry and labour, to maintain a continuous review of the regulatory process. We noted that similar councils exist in the United States and the United Kingdom, and have proved effective.

While in Canberra, the Canadian delegates spent an hour and a half with the distinguished members of their Administrative Review Council. After this meeting and after reading their annual reports, I am more convinced than ever that we should have the same kind of council in Canada.

There is one final matter that I would like to refer to. In Australia, regulations, after they are enacted, are reviewed by the Senate Standing Committee on Regulations and Ordinances. That committee has the power to recommend that a regulation be disallowed, and the Senate itself has the power to disallow. Whenever the committee in the past recommended disallowance, the Senate invariably adopted the recommendation and disallowed the regulation.

The Australian government decided to bow to the inevitable with the result that no regulation has been disallowed since 1971. The minister involved pays heed to the objections of the committee, and by a process of informal negotiations a satisfactory amendment is agreed upon. This illustrates that if a committee has the necessary power, and the proper procedures are in place by which that power can be exercised, it does not need to actually use the power to achieve satisfactory results. The actual workings of our own Senate committees when considering legislation is a good illustration of this.

If, therefore, greater accountability to Parliament is to be achieved in the regulation-making process, the powers that we recommend should be given to the Regulatory Review Committee and the appropriate standing committees of both houses of Parliament to recommend the approval or disallowance of regulations, even though that power, in actual practice, may rarely be used except as a threat.

In our report we state that after six and a half years of operation the committee "cannot be said to be well known". That is certainly the understatement of the year. Our report was, with one or two rare exceptions, completely ignored by the press. I can say that the committee is also completely ignored by many of its members. While its work is extremely important, it has no political sex appeal, not only because of the nature of its work but because it is completely non-partisan. To emphasize this aspect, the House of Commons co-chairman is always chosen from the opposition.

Membership in the committee involves many hours of work in reading the material beforehand in preparation for its meetings. Since its inception we have never been able to get a full complement of senators to fill the Senate vacancies on the committee. Often senators who are appointed quickly discover how much work is involved in preparing for much of the routine work of the committee, and want to beg off in order to leave themselves free to attend meetings of more interesting committees.

We have a nucleus of devoted members who come to the meetings well prepared and thus can make an effective contribution, and that is all we really need. Senator Forsey, as co-chairman from the inception of the committee, was, of course, a tower of strength. I would also like to particularly mention Senator Lafond who has been a devoted and effective member of the committee from the start. There were and are also devoted and effective members from the House of Commons.

The fact that our report was so completely ignored by the press creates serious problems. I think the Honourable Perrin Beatty put the matter very well at the conference in Canberra when he said:

> Perhaps the single most difficult problem that we have had to deal with is encompassed in the following questions: How do you reach the consciousness of the Government in the first place; how do you create that demand that is necessary with so many competing sources for the attention of the Government; how do you create that demand for changes on issues which you think are vital to the liberties of Canadians?

The five parliamentarians who went to Canberra were all keen and devoted members of the committee. That was why they were chosen. One of the great benefits we received personally from the conference, and from meeting members of other similar committees in other parts of the Commonwealth, was that it reinforced our belief in the importance of the work of the committee and the importance of trying to somehow move the government to adopt the reforms recommended in our report.

The fact that the press ignores our work and our recommendations is not unique to Canada. We discovered the same situation existed in other countries, particularly Australia. Yet the forces for reform were able in Australia to move the government to do something. I believe that it was, as Sir Zelman Cowan pointed out, because of the series of committee reviews in Australia in the late sixties and early seventies.

We are presently going through the same process in Canada. Our committee, spearheaded by Mr. Jed Baldwin, and with the help of other outside committee reports, was able to persuade a reluctant government to bring in a proper Freedom of Information Bill. We, of course, were greatly helped because the press gave the whole issue lots of publicity. We have pledged ourselves on our committee to take up the cudgels on behalf of reform of the regulation-making process and, with the help of those other bodies that are presently studying this question, I have high hopes that we may get somewhere, even without the help of the press. It would, however, be a lot easier for us if we could get them to take an interest in this issue.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, October 23, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to draw attention to the presence in the north gallery of members of the Society of Canadian Ladies of Friulano origin, most of whom are visiting the Parliament Buildings for the first time. I extend to them, on behalf of the Senate, a hearty welcome and an enjoyable visit.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

NEWSPAPER REPORT—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege which I believe affects the rights of members of this party in this place, if not all honourable senators.

My attention has been drawn to a statement attributed to the Prime Minister in the city of Quebec yesterday when commenting on a demonstration outside his hotel by representatives of the federal government's translators and interpreters. Speaking of the groups that had come to protest, the Prime Minister said:

> The first was a group of translators who came, I suppose, to protest against my government without whose policies the job of translation would probably disappear.

Senator Flynn: The emperor!

Senator Murray: The inference is pretty clear that under a government constituted by any other party, save his own—

Senator Flynn: No, save himself.

Senator Murray: Under any other government constituted by any other party, the policies of bilingualism, which are the law of the land, would not be honoured. That is false; it is despicable; and it is divisive as a tactic for the Prime Minister of Canada to employ.

The fact of the matter is that there are language rights under the Constitution of the country. There is also an Official Languages Act, which was passed in 1969 with the support of all parties in both chambers, and a resolution which passed at least the other place in, I believe, 1973, with the unanimous support of Parliament. To suggest that those policies would not be honoured, that that law would not be honoured, that bilingualism would disappear under the government of another party, is a despicable and divisive and inflammatory thing for the Prime Minister of Canada to say. It is false and, therefore, an affront to members of this place and the other place belonging to a party other than the Liberal Party. I wish to protest most vehemently against this kind of statement coming from that source.

• (1410)

A little while ago I accepted an invitation to become joint-chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Official Languages. I did so, not because I do not have other ways of occupying my time but because it was represented to me that this acceptance on my part would reinforce the non-partisan or multi-partisan commitment in both chambers of Parliament to the concept and the spirit and the policy of bilingualism.

If this is the attitude that the government is going to adopt, I simply say that a good many of us in other parties are wasting our time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, first of all I question whether the alleged point of privilege is in fact a valid point of privilege.

Senator Flynn: If you don't know, just say so.

Senator Perrault: Secondly, the Honourable Senator Murray has ascribed to the Prime Minister motives which the Prime Minister has never espoused. Thirdly, the honourable senator has raised an alleged point of privilege on the basis of truncated and fragmentary newspaper reports—

Senator Flynn: How do you know that? Come on!

Senator Perrault: I know that Senator Murray is perfectly capable of speaking for himself without the writhing Leader of the Opposition attempting to intervene.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but you are speaking through your hat.

Senator Perrault: The Honourable Leader of the Opposition, who is showing an undue degree of sensitivity this afternoon, should be reminded of the fact that Senator Murray talked in terms of newspaper reports when he rose to his feet.

Senator Flynn: Yes, and I invite you to deny them, if you can.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition can tell us when fragmentary newspaper reports were accorded the status of Holy Writ in this Senate chamber.

Senator Flynn: It is so typical of the Prime Minister that I challenge the Leader of the Government to deny that he said it. If he does not deny it, let him apologize. But that is never the case for the Prime Minister. He never apologizes.

Senator Perrault: While I must express admiration—

Senator Flynn: I don't want your admiration. You can keep it for yourself.

Senator Perrault: While I must express admiration for the honourable leader's fine Perry Mason courtroom form this afternoon, he is entirely out of order in standing at his desk and pointing his finger at the Leader of the Government.

Senator Flynn: Pointing my finger at nothing.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act, for the month of August, 1980, pursuant to section 16 of the said Act, Chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

He said: This is a program that is enjoying remarkable success across the country.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN SENATE GALLERY OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as previously announced, the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech in the other place on Tuesday next, October 28, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Senator Flynn: At long last!

• (1415)

The Hon. the Speaker: May I be permitted to remind honourable senators that none but senators will be admitted to the Senate Gallery of the House of Commons on that occasion. This step is being taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible. In this manner, senators will not be excluded from the gallery on account of many of the places being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

May I add that such instructions were first issued in 1931 by the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, and that this practice has been followed ever since by succeeding Speakers.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE BUDGET TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled a report approving the budget of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to comment on the state of affairs regarding the motion in the other place concerning the Constitution and to explain how I understand it will affect us.

If I understand correctly the proceedings and rules in the other place, yesterday the house leader there gave notice under Standing Order 33 that he would be invoking closure on that motion.

Some hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Frith: The significance of that, so far as we are concerned, and so far as timing is concerned, is that he must present that motion, of which he gave notice yesterday, before the Commons adjourns at 10 o'clock this evening. That motion is not debatable. If it is passed, then debate on the resolution must be concluded by one o'clock the following morning; in other words, one o'clock Friday morning.

Senator Flynn: Not the debate on the closure motion.

Senator Frith: No, not the debate on the closure motion; the debate on the motion that is the subject of closure. There is no debate on the closure motion itself. In other words, once it is put, it must be voted upon. I will leave aside for now questions of substance and just explain how our hours of sitting will be affected.

Under our rules we would sit at two o'clock tomorrow, unless the usual Thursday adjournment were moved. Let us suppose we are sitting tomorrow and we receive the message at 2 p.m. At that time we could not deal with the message, or the resolution that is the subject of the message, without leave. There must be two days' notice, and under our rules two days' notice means that a sitting day must intervene. Therefore, if leave is not granted and we wish to deal with the matter on Monday, we will have to sit tomorrow in order to give the notice, and again on Saturday in order to have a sitting day intervene. If for any reason we wish to adjourn until tomorrow morning, we will have to have leave today to put such an adjournment motion.

That is the context in which the Leader of the Government, the Leader of the Opposition and I discussed how the Senate should proceed with regard to the imminent message which, it would appear, will be forthcoming from the other place. In other words, we cannot deal with the message, without leave, any time before Monday. We could deal with it as early as tomorrow morning, with leave, or tomorrow afternoon with leave, or on Saturday with leave. But we must have leave to deal with it before Monday. I can say that the Leader of the Opposition has stated that he is prepared to give leave for Monday evening or Monday afternoon, and in that case we would not be required to sit tomorrow or Saturday. You will understand that the only purpose for sitting on Saturday would be to—

• (1420)

Senator Flynn: Or tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Or tomorrow—would be to give the notice. I do not agree completely with what the Leader of the Opposition has said. If we have leave it is perfectly clear that we could commence our debate on the motion tomorrow morning.

Senator Perrault: Immediately.

Senator Frith: As I say, if we have leave we can commence work tomorrow morning. Without leave—

Senator Flynn: We cannot have it tomorrow morning.

Senator Frith: Of course, we can have it tomorrow morning. If I may review the situation again, the likelihood is that the motion before the House of Commons will be agreed to at one o'clock tomorrow morning. If we are sitting we will be able to receive the message tomorrow morning, and if we have leave we will be able to proceed immediately. If we do not have leave, we cannot deal with it until Monday. Even then we will have to sit on Friday and Saturday in order to start our debate on Monday. The point is that we can, with leave, deal with it as early as tomorrow. We can deal with it as early as Monday without leave, or we can deal with it Monday with leave which saves our sitting tomorrow and the next day. That is how I understand the situation.

Senator Perrault: Perfectly clear.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: Is it not clear?

Senator Flynn: I am quite sure that if the Leader of the Government understood, then it must be very, very clear indeed. I do not know of anybody who would not understand it if he did.

Senator Perrault: Leave is granted, and we start immediately.

Senator Flynn: No, leave is not granted for tomorrow and leave is not granted for sitting on Saturday. Can you just imagine the Senate rushing to consider a resolution of that importance, when the debate on it in the Commons is about to be forced to a conclusion by the use of closure. How silly we would look. But I'm sure many on the other side do not mind looking silly.

Senator Frith: We would look sillier if we were not here to work on it.

Senator Flynn: Oh, no.

Senator Frith: Well, we have a legitimate difference of opinion.

Senator Flynn: It is a difference of opinion, but I feel strongly that after so many years of looking silly, it's about time the Senate should wake up and try to assume its responsibilities.

● (1425)

In any event, the only thing that is important is that I have agreed that if the Senate adjourns today until Monday—and I suggest Monday night—we will be prepared to consider the motion assuming it has reached us by then. I say that out of respect for the other place. I am quite sure, however, that if I had been in my honourable friend's situation I would have said "when it reaches us"—because it will reach us, of course. The servility of the majority in the other place is even greater than the servility one finds in this house.

In any case, it will be a very interesting debate. I do not mind giving the assurance on behalf of the opposition that we can start debating the motion on Monday night.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say that it is with great regret that the government must accept the fact that the Leader of the Opposition is unwilling to give leave to have this debate commence tomorrow. This debate is of historic importance, the constitutional proposals are of historic importance. One might have expected the members of the opposition, who have asked a great many questions on the subject of the proposals—

Senator Flynn: And we did not get many replies!

Senator Perrault: —and the Address to Her Majesty, would have sought eagerly the opportunity to commence this debate as soon as possible.

With great regret, let us note again the position of the official opposition. They are not prepared to commence this debate tomorrow morning, or even tomorrow afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Are you moving the motion to adjourn?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think the position of the Leader$0of the Opposition is clear, and I sugget that we meet on Monday afternoon at 2 p.m.

In fairness, I should say that the Leader of the Opposition has said he would prefer the evening, but would agree to sitting at 2 p.m. I know that is the normal hour but I accept his agreement as a courtesy on his part. We would prefer, in the circumstance, to proceed at 2 o'clock on Monday.

Senator Flynn: I would suggest—but I am not insisting, and I am not going to be upset if my suggestion is not acted upon—to the honourable the deputy leader that if the Senate were to meet on Monday evening at 8 o'clock, we on this side would be able to meet before the sitting of the Senate and decide on our course of action. We might just as well assume that the house will pass the resolution tonight but I think we have to consider the position that we must take once the House of Commons has made its decision, and I would have preferred to have a few hours in which to discuss that before the Senate sits on Monday. If the rule of the majority prevails, however, that will not upset us unduly.

Senator Frith: Well, we are only in a position to invoke the rule of the majority by sitting tomorrow and Saturday, and, in the circumstances we do not intend to do that.

Senator Flynn: You can do it if you want. You can impose it on your side.

Senator Frith: We are not now talking about the rule of the majority. We are talking about leave, and an agreement between both sides. I appreciate the concern that the Leader of the Opposition has, but we would prefer to sit at two o'clock on Monday afternoon. In that way, perhaps what would seem to the opposition to be impatience on our part gets a little room, and what might seem to us to be more patience than is necessary on the part of the opposition will have an equal amount of room, and we achieve some compromise. I appreciate the concern of the opposition, but I also appreciate the offer to sit at 2 o'clock on Monday afternoon.

I ask, then, that it be understood that when that item appears on the Orders of the Day next week, leave will be granted to deal with it.

Senator Flynn: But move the motion to adjourn before that.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, October 27, 1980, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

• (1430)

Senator Manning: May I ask for clarification on one point? If the house sits on Monday afternoon, will it also sit Monday evening?

Senator Frith: I am afraid I cannot give an undertaking on that at this time.

Senator Asselin: Why not?

Senator Frith: Because it may be that we will want to continue the debate Monday night. We are sitting Monday at two o'clock—

Senator Asselin: And Monday night, too?

Senator Frith: We don't know. We hope not.

Senator Smith: I really don't follow this at all. If it is not intended to sit Monday night, why sit Monday afternoon? Why not simply sit Monday night? You are not gaining anything. If the desire is to gain only the equivalent of a night, then it seems to me that could be done equally well by sitting either in the afternoon or at night. It should also be taken into consideration that not all of us live within easy distance of Ottawa.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as it has been indicated by a number of senators that they wish to participate in this debate, meeting at two o'clock Monday afternoon will give honourable senators, especially those in the loyal opposition, an opportunity—

Senator Flynn: Please, please!

Senator Perrault: —to contribute to the debate. It is expected that there will be enough speakers to continue on into Monday evening, unless, of course, the opposition wishes to have an early vote on this important motion.

Senator Smith: All I can say is that reason seems to have deserted my honourable friends, entirely, if they are not prepared to say that we will be sitting Monday night as well as Monday afternoon.

Senator Murray: Maybe those on the government side will not be speaking.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am sorry if we did not make our position clear. It is that we would like to have as much time as possible available for all senators to debate what we consider a very important motion. I think everybody does. That is why, if it seems that there are speakers still wishing to speak on Monday night after our having started our sitting on Monday afternoon, we would like to be able to give those senators, no matter who they are or on what side, the chance to speak on this motion. That is why we would like to sit on Monday at two.

If nobody is ready to speak Monday evening, we will not continue with the debate, but, if people do want to speak, we would like to give them the chance to do so.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I had intended to ask this question during Question Period. However, with leave, I shall ask it now, as there is obviously a relation between what is being discussed at the moment and the question I wanted to ask. With your permission, I shall read as an introduction the document in question, and you can tell me if I can ask my question now or if I should wait until later.

Senator Frith: It is up to you to decide whether you will ask your question during Question Period or right now.

Senator Tremblay: Since the Deputy Leader of the Government has so suggested, I shall ask my question now and make it as brief as possible.

Does the Leader of the Government stand by his statement or the assurances he gave us and which appear on page 848 of the Senate Hansard? This is my question. I do not have the document with me. I have been asked not to read it. May I ask my question?

Senator Frith: Do you want clarification on what was asked yesterday?

Senator Tremblay: No, this is another matter. It would have been better for me to read the document, but you asked me not to do so and to put my question instead.

It concerns something which came up during the debate which followed introduction of a motion by the Leader of the Government under the heading of notices of inquiries, which motion has brought about certain exchanges recently. I think I should read this document, because otherwise my question makes no sense.

The Leader of the Government said at the time:

> —I gave the assurance, which I give again, that this is not a substitute for the debate which will undoubtedly take place at a later time.
> Again, let me review the anticipated procedure with you. First there is a desire and an intent on the part of the government to accord all members of Parliament, whether they serve in the Senate or in the other place, a full opportunity to debate not only the motion to refer to a joint committee but also the contents of this resolution. That is of fundamental importance.

The procedure which is now being followed in the other place is to debate the motion to refer to the joint committee. If that motion is accepted in the other place, a message will be sent to the Senate inviting us to participate. There will then be an opportunity for a debate in this place, which will not be restricted; honourable senators will have an opportunity to set forth their views in the frankest possible terms.

My question is as follows: Does the government leader still stand by this statement? Do we have the assurance that the debate in the Senate will be in no way limited?

• (1435)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): May I once again remind honourable senators about the rules of this chamber. We have no time limitations. We have no closure procedure and we do not propose to introduce closure rule changes. Honourable members of the opposition will have a full opportunity to set forth their views and, indeed, we shall await with anticipation what they have to say about the government's constitutional proposals. The rules of the Senate, of course, differ from those existing in the other place. I stated on October 14 that we hoped there would be participation by honourable senators in this debate. Not only that, let it be reiterated that the motion to be debated next week relates to whether a joint Senate-Commons committee shall be formed to study certain constitutional proposals. This will be the substance of the debate. The committee at some point in time will be reporting back to the Senate with its proposals, if any, and there will be further opportunity for debate at that time. Again I remind honourable senators that we have no closure procedures in the Senate.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: On a supplementary.

In the assurance he has just given us, the Leader of the Government stated specifically that the members of the opposition in the Senate would be entirely free to debate the matter as they see fit. Bearing in mind the fact that, in the other place, when the motion for closure was announced, there were more speakers on the waiting list from the government side than the opposition, when the Leader of the Government indicated that members of the opposition in the Senate could debate freely, was he limiting the privilege to senators of the opposition only?

[English]

Senator Perrault: There is no intent on the part of the government to limit the privileges of the opposition. I reiterate that this debate shall proceed under the rules of the Senate known to all senators.

Senator Tremblay: I am just asking if the members of the majority will have the same privilege that we, the opposition, have been granted, if I understand the words of the Leader of the Government, in view of the fact that yesterday more government members of the House of Commons were prevented from discussing the question because of closure than members of the opposition?

• (1440)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a different set of circumstances exists in the other chamber. It should be borne in mind that a budget is to be presented this week, a budget that has been advocated for many, many months by the opposition. The parliamentary schedule in the other place is a very full one. Members there have been discussing the constitutional motion for many, many days. In fact, and on balance, there has been no restriction on freedom of expression in the other place. Far be it from me to comment further on matters before members of that house. I can only say that as far as this chamber is concerned, honourable senators, we are awaiting with interest the comments of Senator Tremblay and others. Indeed, we shall listen with interest to speeches from all parts of the chamber.

I think that the Leader of the Opposition's statement that somehow the government supporters are servile—I think he used that word earlier today—

Senator Flynn: In the other place.

Senator Perrault: —really is a reflection on the entire Senate, and I think it should be resented by all honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: I said in the other place. If I were to suggest to the Leader of the Government that as far as we are concerned we thought we could spend about two weeks of debate in this place on this resolution because of its importance, would he agree?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no idea of the speaking intentions of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition and his followers.

Senator Flynn: But would you be satisfied?

Senator Perrault: It is of little value to engage in speculation about the future course of events.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN LEADER OF THE NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY AND THE PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he is going to bring in the statement that yesterday he undertook to make concerning an interpretation of the exchange of correspondence between the Prime Minister and Mr. Broadbent.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Yes, I am very pleased to do so. Yesterday and the day before a number of questions arose concerning the exchange of correspondence between the Leader of the New Democratic Party and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada.

First of all, it is now incumbent upon Mr. Broadbent, the Leader of the New Democratic Party, to move an amendment in the other place when the resolution reaches the committee. The supporters of the government are very eager to reach that stage so that they will have the opportunity to explain in detail some of the questions that have been raised in the other place and in this chamber over the last two weeks. However, I should like to respond to the concerns raised by several honourable senators, insofar as it is proper for me to do so.

I caution that the latest initiatives taken by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister are in the form of a letter, and as such have no legal status. It is, therefore, difficult to ascribe legal interpretations to a letter in response to another party leader, who will determine the language of the amendment when it reaches committee.

Having said that, I would like first to deal with Senator Roblin's question regarding the definition of "management" in paragraph (1) at the bottom of page 2 of the Prime Minister's letter. I suggest, honourable senators, that the word "management" means precisely what it means in the dictionary, since there is no legal definition for "management" and the Prime Minister did not qualify the word in any sense. That word, if it is included in the amendment—and I remind the honourable senator that this is all hypothetical—will be equally open to the interpretation of the courts as it is to the honourable senator. I would therefore suggest that the honourable senator may apply a broad interpretation to include economic management if he wishes.

The Honourable Senator Tremblay said that the Prime Minister specified only non-renewable resources in his letter. In fact the Prime Minister specified forestry resources in paragraph (1) at the top of page 3 of his letter. Forestry resources, so important in my own province as well as others, are a renewable resource, of course.

The second question that the Honourable Senator Tremblay raised was whether the Prime Minister had worded the letter in such a way as to maintain doubt over provincial ownership of resources. This is clearly not the case, since these provincial rights would be over and above what is already guaranteed to the provinces in section 109 of the British North America Act, and the government has no intention of changing section 109. However, I would caution once again that this is all hypothetical, since the onus of the wording is in the hands of Mr. Broadbent, the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Senator Roblin yesterday asked why renewable resources were excluded from concurrent jurisdiction in paragraph (2) on page 3 of the Prime Minister's letter. The honourable senator, as an experienced parliamentarian, perhaps recalls that that is precisely the type of question that would best be dealt with in committee. Therefore, the sooner we are able to set up the proposed joint committee the sooner we will be able to discuss the dynamics of the resolution and the draft bill, and any amendments that are proposed, from whatever source.

Lastly, the Honourable Senator Tremblay asked about the possible provision for indirect taxation on non-renewable natural resources by the provinces. At this the first stage of constitutional discussions the government is not prepared to go beyond that. However, in the next stage of the discussions the provinces will be free to bring up anything they want, including the broadening of indirect taxation, and the national government can re-introduce the concept of an economic union. The letter from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to Mr. Broadbent merely says what we are prepared to accept within the context outlined by Mr. Broadbent in his letter.

I hope that this rather lengthy explanation of a hypothetical subject has been satisfactory and of help. I would urge honourable senators to move to set up the proposed joint committee as soon as possible, just as soon as we receive the motion from the other place, to remove this debate from the realm of the hypothetical.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as a human being my heart goes out to Ed Broadbent, because he has been hung out to dry by the Prime Minister of Canada and by the government.

Senator Flynn: And vice versa.

Senator Murray: The Prime Minister, through the instrumentality of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, has tried to place the onus back on Mr. Broadbent to explain what the Prime Minister meant in making what the Leader of the Government calls his offer to Mr. Broadbent the other day. The Prime Minister of Canada made an offer to accept an amendment from Mr. Broadbent or one of his colleagues in a certain context, and it is surely up to the Prime Minister and the government to state what the limits of that offer are, to define what that offer is, to explain what it is about and to state what they will accept.

Perhaps I can focus on the point at issue by asking the Leader of the Government now whether he and the government stand by the statements he made yesterday during the Question Period. I will very briefly put on the record the salient points. At page 907 the Leader of the Government said:

> In fact, in respect of natural resources, they confirm a right which already exists. It is a reiteration of the situation which now exists.

A little later on on the same page, when the Leader of the Government was talking about natural resources, he said:

> In fact, those rights possessed by the provinces are enshrined in the British North America Act. The Prime Minister's letter restates, reconfirms and reiterates the situation which exists.

• (1450)

At page 908, in answer to a question from my colleague, Senator Smith, as to whether the offer has any implications relating to offshore resources, the minister said:

> No, my understanding is that it does not.

A little later, at page 909, the minister said:

> There is no deviation from the B.N.A. Act. This statement in the letter from the Prime Minister flows from the B.N.A. Act itself. It is a reconfirmation.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: The statement goes on:

> It is a restatement of a right which is already enjoyed by the provinces. It is a clarification, perhaps, or a more precise delineation, however it may be described.

The questions I put to the minister are whether he stands by those statements; whether the Government of Canada stands by those statements; and whether those statements define the context and the limits within which the government will accept an amendment from Mr. Broadbent or one of his colleagues relating to natural resources.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have nothing to add to the statement I made yesterday and the statement I made this afternoon. I think those statements were reasonably complete.

I suggest, however, that we move as quickly as possible in this chamber so that this matter may be referred to committee and the committee can get to work on its analysis of the constitutional proposals. I know that Senator Murray will make a contribution to that committee if his leader allows him to participate in its activities.

Senator Tremblay: I should like to point out that we raised this question yesterday and it was taken as notice. We have today received a written answer, and I wish now to discuss the content of the answer. I have been impressed by one omission. The honourable leader referred only to section 109, but made no mention of section 92(5) which mentioned the administration and > —"The sale of the Public Land (. . .) and of the Timber and Wood thereon".

[Translation]

[English]

Has that omission some meaning? Since the honourable leader took the question as notice, he has had time to consider this section of the B.N.A. Act, and yet it is not mentioned in his reply. I should like some clarification.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have nothing further to add. Again, the honourable senator requests a legal interpretation. May I say that this is precisely the kind of question that could be discussed, very profitably and at some length, in the joint committee.

Senator Tremblay: I am sorry to insist, but I am not asking for a legal interpretation. It is a question of understanding the meaning of an omission on the part of the Leader of the Government in his written reply to a question asked yesterday. Is there some reason for his omitting to mention section 92(5)?

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: May I ask the Leader of the Government for clarification of comments he made a few moments ago concerning one point? If I understood him correctly, he referred at the outset to initiatives by the Prime Minister. A little further on he referred to the Prime Minister's correspondence as being in response to correspondence of Mr. Broadbent. How did this whole exercise start? Did it begin by a letter from the Prime Minister to Mr. Broadbent, or did it begin by a letter from Mr. Broadbent to the Prime Minister?

Senator Asselin: It started a long time before that.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have copies of this exchange of correspondence on my desk, and I am in the process of attempting to locate it. The initiative came from Mr. Broadbent.

Senator Asselin: Suggested by the Prime Minister.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think that is a most unfair comment.

Senator Flynn: Poor little Prime Minister.

Senator Perrault: I understand that the final written initiative came from Mr. Broadbent on October 20 of this year. I am not going to read the complete letter, but it does say:

> Dear Prime Minister:
>
> I am writing subsequent to the introduction in the House of Commons of the "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" and to the meeting I had with you at your request on the day that you also met with the Leader of the Opposition.
>
> You will recall that at the meeting on October 1st—

And the letter goes on.

The Right Honourable the Prime Minister, in an endeavour to develop a consensus among the parties for certain constitutional proposals, met, quite properly, with the Leader of the Opposition and with Mr. Broadbent, and spent considerable time with both of those leaders in separate meetings. As a result of the Prime Minister's initiatives, Mr. Broadbent wrote the October 20th letter.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to return to the question of renewable resources mentioned by my honourable friend, the Leader of the Government, when he spoke previously. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister of Canada has indicated his willingness to make special concessions, or give special consideration respecting non-renewable resources and some renewable resources, could the minister tell me what the policy of the government would be if he were requested to include all renewable resources—and I am particularly referring to hydro-electric power?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only take the question as notice. Again I say that this is the kind of question which should very properly be discussed in the joint committee.

Senator Smith: The answer should be available from one who occupies the position of Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Roblin: I am sorry to hear that my honourable friend cannot give me that information because my colleague, Senator Murray, I think outlined, in a very succinct way, the desirability of knowing the limits of the government's "flexibility" in respect of amendments that might be suggested in connection with this. I would ask my honourable friend to inquire of his leader with respect to this matter so that when the debate commences he will be able to tell us what the facts are.

Senator Murray: Poor Ed Broadbent.

ENERGY

UTILIZATION OF OIL DRILLING RIGS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Bielish during Question Period on October 16 concerning the status of the reported exodus, or what was alleged to be an exodus, of oil drilling rigs from Canada. I say that because my reply, of course, requires me to use the word "alleged" instead of "reported."

The drilling industry is forecasting a slack market for the next 15 months. This, to some extent, is due to the fact that the industry has expanded rapidly over the past few years and has over-built its capacity. In addition, it appears there will be a particularly good market in the United States over the next one to two years, reflecting a shortage of drilling rigs in that country. Canada is fortunate to have a healthy drilling industry with half the fleet being less than three years old. The industry is, therefore, very competitive and in a good position to capture some of the U.S. market.

We must also realize that at present there is a surplus of gas, and therefore a reduced incentive to continue exploring for it. In addition, of late there has been some difficulty in marketing and exporting heavy oil which has also resulted in reduced demand for drilling rigs in Canada. However, the slowdown in drilling from these circumstances is a temporary situation.

It has been estimated that the capacity of the industry in 1980 is about 11,000 wells. The industry had forecast drilling some 8,900 wells in 1980, but the current estimate is about 8,300. Today there are 572 rigs in Canada, with 475 actually drilling or working. This represents a deployment rate of about 83 per cent, which is a very high utilization rate for any industry, and is by far the highest utilization rate for the oil drilling industry in the last 12 years.

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY—OIL RESERVES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I intended to ask my honourable friend a question before he rose to give delayed answers, and I wonder if he would allow me to do so now.

I mentioned in the house the other day a report from Reuters dated October 16 respecting a study being conducted by the International Energy Agency with respect to the effect of the war between Iran and Iraq on both price and supply in the next few months, and I asked whether that information was available.

In his reply, the minister left me with the impression that there is no such study going on, and I just want to confirm with him that that is the correct information.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I may have to go back and read what I said, but my impression from memory is that I said I would attempt to get the results of the study that was going on. It seems to me I also said—and this, again, is strictly from memory—that there was a report or press release, or at least a public pronouncement, that has already been made by that organization, particularly respecting supply, stating the view that they did not anticipate a shortage within the next few months because of that situation.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I can provide my honourable friend with his statement with respect to the matter. I initially raised this question on October 14, and my honourable friend replied on October 21 as follows:

> I would like to clarify that the IEA is not carrying out a special study of the supply situation as a result of the Iran-Iraq conflict.

That is the statement which does not seem to jibe with the Reuters dispatch, and I am curious to know who is right.

We do know that the IEA has looked at the shortfall in supply and decided that, while it is over the 6 per cent test line, it does not require any rescheduling of supply among the various countries. But what I am talking about is quite a different matter.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall recheck with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and perhaps the Department of External Affairs, and any other department which might be involved, to determine whether or not a study is under way.

THE ECONOMY

UNPRODUCTIVE SUBSIDIES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a further question for the Minister of State reponsible for Economic Development arising out of that interesting speech he made on October 20 to the Canadian Export Association in relation to this question of unproductive subsidies. He has referred to them, so he undoubtedly thinks that there are some. I am wondering whether he has any intention of changing any of the subsidies that operate today on the ground that they are unproductive.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, what I tried to do in that speech, as I tried to explain to those honourable senators yesterday who had questions in this regard, was discuss the statement of principle involved in whether funds are used by way of subsidization to prop up industries that perhaps do not have a highly productive prospect, or whether the emphasis should be put on those that have a potential for higher productivity in the future and for which subsidization to keep them viable would not be required.

Senator Roblin: I think that is an admirable statement. I might be inclined to agree with it. However, if that is the policy of my honourable friend, could he provide us with the guidelines under which he rules, decides or adjudicates as to what constitutes a productive subsidy and what constitutes an unproductive subsidy?

Senator Olson: Yes, I shall try to get an expanded explanation on that. My honourable friend will know that there are a number of applications before various departments of government, almost on a continuing basis, and my honourable friend will realize that some choices have to be made. I do not know of any government that has been in the position where it can accept all applications.

The principle that I stated in that speech will be applied in terms of which may be the most productive. It is not a matter of making a choice between a so-called good application and a bad application. It may be a choice between two applications, both of which may be good ones. The choice still has to be made, and the principle enunciated in that speech is to apply the priorities as they are stated there.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has now confused me more than ever. I thought I understood what his policy was. Now he tells me that he might have two requests for a subsidy, both of which are good. In that case, one assumes both are productive. That being so, why the question of choice?

I want to encourage my honourable friend to apply what is a very loose and woolly statement in a rigorous and economic fashion, and I would appreciate any help he can give the chamber in assessing the merits of his policy.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am very sorry that my honourable friend did not understand what I just said. To me, it is perfectly clear, and that is that the government usually has before it a multiplicity of applications, all of which are not bad and all of which are not altogether good. The financial constraints, however, are such that not all of the good ones can be accepted. Some choices have to be made. Part of the art of governing is to make choices. Governments cannot accept all applications for assistance.

It seems to me perfectly clear that the government has to make these choices. The ministers responsible for the various programs have to choose from among any number of applications, all of which may be good. They cannot accept all of them. They have to make those choices, and the principle that I outlined in that speech is the one that will be applied in these cases. There is nothing woolly about that.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has simply shifted the ground from what is productive and unproductive to what is good and what is less good. That is what I think he has done.

Senator Olson: More productive.

Senator Roblin: I would encourage him to content himself with his previous undertaking to give us some kind of a definition as to what he means by the term "unproductive" and how he intends to apply it. If he would do that, I, for one, would be satisfied.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not want to add anything more to what I have said. I shall try to put some words together that will clarify the situation for my honourable friend.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin, on October 21, asked a further question regarding the Garrison Dam project, and I now have an answer.

The verbal assurances received stated that newly allocated funds will not be used for any purpose which will have a negative impact on Manitoba water systems until such time as bilateral negotiations are complete.

Canada sent a formal diplomatic note on October 1 asking for written confirmation of these assurances. The Government of Canada has received no reply to date.

I think those in government in the United States are somewhat preoccupied this month, which may account for there being no reply to date. However, I can inform honourable senators that the oral assurances have come from high level officials in both the United States State Department and the United States Department of the Interior.

FISHERIES

EASTERN CANADA REGIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on October 21 Senator Marshall asked whether I could extract from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans a statement as to whether they are changing the regions in Atlantic Canada.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced in Memramcook on September 25 that a new fisheries region will be created in Atlantic Canada which will basically be, as I understand it, a Gulf of St. Lawrence region. The boundaries will be drafted shortly, but they will focus, as a principal preoccupation, on the whole fishery of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

The minister has placed the former director general of his Newfoundland region, Mr. Len Cowley, in charge of organizing this new region. As the minister has stated, one of the reasons for the selection of this individual is that he has proven himself to be a good conciliator and one who has experience and good contacts with fishermen.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

PROPOSED POLITICAL JURISDICTIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): On October 16 Senator Austin asked a question respecting proposed political jurisdictions in the Northwest Territories. In reply, I should like to outline the position of the government in that regard.

As has been stated a number of times by cabinet members, and in particular by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, since the publication of the Drury Report in early March 1980, the government intends to fully examine the recommendations of the Drury Report, as well as the reactions and comments made by various organizations and groups since the publication of that report. In particular, the government wants to hear the position of the Legislation Council of the Northwest Territories. The next session of that Council is due to open on October 22 in Frobisher Bay, and it is expected that its Special Committee on Unity will present its report.

● (1510)

In making its decision on the future of constitutional development in the Northwest Territories, the government is committed to take into account the aspirations and representations of interested parties, particularly the Government of the Northwest Territories, the Inuit Tapirisat and the Dene Nation. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has recently met with each of these three groups in the north, and has undertaken further meetings.

It is only when the respective positions of interested groups and organizations have been aired, and the advantages and disadvantages of each scenario fully considered, that the government will take a decision on that issue.

FISHERIES

EASTERN CANADA REGIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I was well aware of the announcement by the minister of the creation of the gulf region; but an important aspect is the fact that no boundaries have been announced, and I gather that the fishermen, who should be in dialogue with the government, should have that information before the announcement is made and should be able to state their views concerning the boundaries. The fishermen cannot react unless they know the boundaries. I am wondering if the Leader of the Government can provide us with the information concerning those boundaries and the regions that are delineated.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a further inquiry will go forward. I would remind the honourable senator that during the course of my reply I stated that one of the reasons for the selection of Mr. Len Cowley was that he had proven himself to be a good conciliator, who has experience and good contacts with the fishermen. So there is no question that there is going to be dialogue with fishermen in the development of this new region.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

CANCELLATION OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Goldenberg has asked me to announce that the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, scheduled for when the Senate rises today, will not take place. I understand he has discussed the matter with the Leader of the Opposition, and notices will be sent to honourable senators advising them of the cancellation of the meeting. It will be reinstated some day next week.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Austin moved the second reading of Bill S-11, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I will not keep you long, but I hope that I will keep you interested for a few moments in an issue, small in proportion but nonetheless significant, concerning our national unity.

When one lives in British Columbia, Alberta or, indeed, western Canada, there is a view held of the electoral process that, by its very nature, it leaves a feeling of alienation from the rest of the country, a feeling that westerners are not participating in the most significant political act in which a community of citizens can participate—namely a national election.

We turn on the television or the radio at the time the polls close in Vancouver and the final results of the election are available to us immediately. If we have an inquisitive nature, we can discover, by phoning friends in eastern Canada—before we go to the polls to vote—precisely what was the outcome of the election. The result enhances disunity in the country because it gives rise to the exasperation that the western vote does not matter—that we are on the fringe and we simply do not count. However, it is not an electoral practice that needs to continue.

The purpose of Bill S-11, honourable senators, is to ameliorate this disunity or practice during the course of elections and, quite simply, to reduce the present disparity in the closing of the polls and the beginning of the counting of the ballots from a total of four-and-a-half hours, as between Newfoundland on the one hand, and British Columbia and the Yukon on the other, to a total difference of one hour and a half.

If honourable senators will look at page 2 of the bill, they will see how that is done. Clause 3, which would be schedule V of the Canada Elections Act, indicates that the polls across Canada would open at somewhat different times, namely, 10.30 a.m. in Newfoundland, closing at 9.30 p.m. In the maritime provinces the times shown in the respective columns are 10 o'clock to 9 o'clock; in Quebec and Ontario, 9 o'clock to 8 o'clock, which is the present voting time; so there would be no change whatsoever in the central provinces. For central time—Winnipeg, Manitoba, and eastern Saskatchewan—the times shown in the columns are 9 o'clock to 8 o'clock, which is an hour later than eastern time. The columns for Alberta show 8 o'clock to 7 o'clock and, for British Columbia and the Yukon, 7 o'clock to 6 o'clock.

I have investigated and I am satisfied that no real difficulty would be occasioned to anyone in terms of the adjustments that appear in the schedule. I know, in my own province, that the voting having to be closed by 6 o'clock will inconvenience some people. I know that in Newfoundland it will inconvenience others—but election practices and the rules have changed dramatically during the last decade and we now have had a liberalization of the advance polls so that nearly everyone who is inconvenienced by virtue of the polling hours on election day can cast his ballot at the advance polls.

Honourable senators, in order not to prolong the debate, may I say that the point is simple. It is that all Canadians should be present at the counting of the results of a national election. All Canadians should feel emotionally that they participate equally in the great democratic act of electing a government; and western Canadians, who have not had that emotional feeling for a long time, would be well served by all of the country if they were brought into that comprehensive act in order to feel the essential unity that flows from participating with the rest of Canada and from seeing that they are equal in that participation.

In closing, I wish to assure honourable senators that the bill has the support of some members of all parties in the other place. I have spoken to members of various parties, particularly from the west, and I would like, in particular, to recognize Bill Clarke, the Progressive Conservative member for the riding of Vancouver Quadra, who has long been interested in such a measure. He informed me after I had introduced Bill S-11 here that he was pursuing the same point in a private member's bill in the other place, which has not yet been published. He is willing to sponsor this bill in the other place, should it be the wish of this chamber to pass it.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: May I be permitted a question? I do not know if daylight saving time applies in all 10 provinces. Does the honourable senator know? If it does, what changes would have to be made?

• (1520)

Senator Austin: I appreciate the question, senator. All national elections, it is my information, are held on standard time across Canada. I would be glad to answer the question more specifically, but as I understand it, it would not affect the disparity of one-and-a-half hours across Canada.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled "Child at Risk", tabled in the Senate on October 16, 1980.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I am quite pleased to follow Senator Bonnell and Senator Bird and make a small contribution to this debate on the study of early childhood experiences as causes of criminal behaviour, and particularly to have been involved with the steering committee in the publication of "Child at Risk".

May I add my congratulations to those extended to Senator McGrand who, I think, should be called the father of the report, for his perseverence and steadfastness in getting the agreement of this chamber to conduct the study which culminated in the report which we are addressing. That report is a tribute to his long devotion to human rights.

As a member of the subcommittee which went through the voluminous pages of evidence by many expert witnesses—and went through them line by line and word by word—I was able to gain a learning experience as a layman of some of the medical technicalities which gave me an appreciation of the reasons for criminal behaviour as a result of the birth process and the ongoing development of the child.

Senator Bonnell and Senator Bird have adequately directed our attention to many highlights in the report to convey the seriousness of the problem. They have documented the many influences which affect the proper physical development of the child, such as emotional disturbances, physical and psychological abuse, brain damage and many others. There is no need to repeat them because they expressed them very well.

As the report points out, in simple language, the simple truth is plain to all. It is that various anti-social behaviour does not begin for the first time in adulthood, but is almost invariably preceded by anti-social behaviour in childhood. Honourable senators, it should be obvious to all who have read the report that we are faced with a very complex problem when considering the various influences which affect the psychological and emotional development of the child in early life, and the solutions which are reflected in the recommendations which are so complex and costly.

The first question that will be asked by the governments responsible is: How do we pay for any agreed-to recommendations? I think it is worthwhile to look at the exorbitant costs of our social services as they stand today.

In 1979-80, the Department of National Health and Welfare was responsible for expenditures of $14.1 billion or 26.4 per cent of the total budgetary expenditure of the federal government. Nearly 98 per cent of those expenditures were transferred directly either to individual Canadians or to provincial governments to support health and social assistance programs. For example, over $6.3 billion was transferred diretly to ederly Canadians under the Old Age Security Act and the guaranteed income supplement and the spouses allowance programs. A further $1.7 billion was transferred directly to families with children through the family allowances program. Together these direct payments to Canadians accounted for over 50 per cent of the department's expenditures. Cash transfers to provinces to finance hospital and medical insurance programs amounted to over $3.9 billion, while $1.7 billion went to finance provincial social assistance programs under the Canada Assistance Plan. These transfers to provincial governments accounted for about 40 per cent of the total expenditures.

There are many other related grants and contributions made which cost many, many millions of dollars. The remaining expenditures of $323 million represents 2 per cent of the departmental total. A total of $89 million was spent on the administration of the department, $173 million was spent on the direct provision of medical services to Indian and northern communities, and the balance of $61 million was devoted to the development and implementation of health protection measures relating to health hazards in drugs, food and other products in the environment.

I mention these figures, honourable senators, because of the proportion of the budget that is directed to medical costs. We should underline the amount of $4 billion, which was cash transferred to provinces to finance hospital and medical insurance programs and medical research. I feel very strongly that a high proportion of those costs of health services that the government pays could have been avoided if money were directed where it should be directed, to the source of the problem. The source of the problem is in the fetus stage and infancy. The many thousands who require health care now are the poverty-stricken who started life in poverty, lacking nutritional food and development. This has created part of the problem we are facing today because, as was brought out by the witnesses, poverty is associated with a higher-than-average degree of family instability, stress, violence, low self-esteem, alcoholism and criminality.

In 1979 there were more than one-and-a-half million children in Canada under the age of 18 living in poverty, and these are the children who are at a disadvantage in the areas of health, education, family life and social activities. But they started out at a disadvantage because they came from poor families; they came from parents under stress, who could not cope with society and with the high cost of living. These are the children who are more likely to have been born prematurely and underweight, to have health problems and suffer social pressures. Unfortunately, as the title of the report says, they are the children at risk.

Furthermore, another alarming statistic is that 80,000 Canadian children live in foster-care homes. There is evidence of a growing trend to one-parent families with, in 1976, over 83 per cent of them with a woman as the head, and some 69 per cent living in poverty.

Honourable senators, I do not think we should measure the needs of our children, our future citizens, by the dollar sign. I feel it is imperative that we stress the need to government for a change in their priorities. This is one of the reasons why I mentioned the exorbitant costs of medical care and hospitals which are running to a point where we cannot cope. Anybody who has read the report will understand the depressing situation that exists with our children across the country. We must act now, in view of the startling evidence that every attention must be directed to the unborn child, with a co-ordination of all present social programs to ensure the proper development of our future citizens.

The minister herself, it was enlightening to hear, said that the cost of administering the social programs is small in relation to the value of the benefits involved. She pointed out, too, that of 17 OECD countries, ten spend a bigger share of their gross national product on health and welfare programs than Canada does.

For some reason or other, honourable senators, we seem to have enough money to increase our police forces, and to build more jails, but we do not direct enough effort towards training social workers to guide and lead the unprepared mother and her child. We concentrate on amendments to the Criminal Code, and on abortion and drugs, but we forget to direct our efforts, or enough efforts or more efforts, towards the education required to find out the dangers of these habits to potential mothers.

We direct millions of dollars of lottery funds to the chosen few, the athletes, who excel, or to recreational facilities and elaborate equipment, but not enough to facilities for the child who lives in the ghettos, who is too poor to participate, or who does not belong to the centres where the concentrations of these facilities exist. What happens to that child when he wants to expend his energy? Too often he turns to crime.

All levels of government spend millions upon millions of dollars on schools and educational facilities, and yet the doors of those places are closed at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, when they could be used for educational programs for mothers, and the recreational facilities used to direct the efforts of their children. At this very moment we are discussing the entrenchment of human rights for our citizens, and yet we do not hear much about the human rights of children.

I think I should quote in this regard from one of the paragraphs on child abuse in the report. It is very alarming:

> Historically, children have been viewed as the property of the parents whose right to neglect and abuse them was seldom even questioned. Today society is hampered in its efforts to help children by this concept of the child belonging to the parents. It is now time to recognize that the rights of parents over their children should exist only so long as parental responsibilities are fulfilled. These responsibilities involve not only the provision of food, clothing and shelter, but also a secure and nurturing emotional environment.

In the past our society has paid more attention to cruelty to animals than to cruelty to children . . . Even today under the Criminal Code of Canada the rights of the child appear to be less important than the rights of an animal because the caretakers of a maltreated animal must show that they did not cause the maltreatment, while the caretakers of an abused child do not suffer under this burden of reverse onus.

Honourable senators, in the few moments I have taken, I have directed attention to only one aspect of the ever-increasing criminal activity in our country. I have dealt with the poverty aspect because it has such a wide relationship to all aspects of criminal behaviour, and I do so because I feel that that is the one matter that should be addressed on an urgent basis by our government.

We have seen countless studies repeated time and again on the handicapped and the disabled that are laid aside too often with little or no attention. We have seen countless studies on criminality too often greeted with little or no attention. The report of the Canadian Commission for the International Year of the Child entitled "For Canada's Children" bears a great rapport with the report "Child at Risk", and points out the intensity of the problem. So we have an international basis for, and agreement with, the report produced under the guidance of Senator McGrand, who should again be mentioned for credit.

Honourable senators, there could be no better challenge to this chamber than that of insisting that our government lead the way in ensuring a quality of life for our citizens which we continually proclaim, but which we sometimes take too much for granted.

I maintain that we should accept the recommendations of this report, and that this chamber should urge the government to direct all its attention in the other place to ensuring the care of the child, if, as Senator Bird said yesterday, we want better future Canadians.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault calling the attention of the Senate to the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada", tabled in the Senate on Monday, October 6, 1980.

[Senator Marshall.]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I want to make a few comments on the inquiry that is before the Senate respecting the suggested amendments to the Canadian Constitution.

At the beginning I want to outline some of my own views as to why this resolution is necessary, and as to the manner in which it is being brought before this house, which will presumably be by way of a message from the House of Commons asking us to concur in the establishment of a special joint committee to examine the resolution and to report to both houses by a certain date.

A number of questions have been raised in the debate here, in the other place, and, indeed, in the public domain, if I may call it that, because of the speculation of a number of premiers of various provinces and other commentators. One of the questions that has been asked from time to time is: Why at this time? In reply to that you have to ask yourself another obvious question: If not at this time, then when? When you try to answer that question you can go back over 53 years of attempts to get all of the 11 governments in Canada together—and for part of that time there were only 10 governments—to try to come to a unanimous agreement as to what ought to be in the Canadian Constitution; indeed, as to whether the Canadian Constitution ought to be domiciled in Canada.

Honourable senators, I do not have any problem with the latter question. I believe our Constitution ought to be domiciled in Canada. For all the attempts that have been made by several governments, and by a long list of very competent personalities, to try and reach that agreement, the fact is that they have been unable to do so for one reason or another. Unfortunately, the reasons are not the same, and what is still more unfortunate is that the objections sometimes come from different provinces for different reasons.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a question at this point?

Senator Olson: Well, yes, I think you could, but perhaps at the end of my speech.

Senator Flynn: It is pertinent to what you are saying now. It resides only in part in Westminster. Why does it reside there only in part?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition says "partly resides"—

Senator Flynn: What about section 91.1?

Senator Olson: The fact is that it is partly residing in Westminster, which is not in this country. My honourable friend knows that.

Senator Flynn: Why is that part there?

Senator Olson: That part is there, I suppose, for a variety of reasons, and in its simplest terms the reason is that that is where it was put in 1867, when Canada became a country. Why it is still there is equally simple, and that is that all of the governments of Canada have been unable to reach an agreement over the years to bring it to this country. There is nothing complicated about that.

• (1540)

Senator Flynn: That part of section 91.1 was brought home in 1949, but why was the rest left in Westminster under section 7 of the Statute of Westminster? Why? Because the provinces, not the federal government, asked for that.

Senator Olson: Well, obviously, when you try to answer the question I posed a few moments ago, it seems unfortunate that everyone agrees that the Constitution ought to be patriated—

Senator Flynn: Well!

Senator Olson: There is no one I know of, including the Leader of the Opposition, who is prepared to rise and state without equivocation that the Constitution of this country ought to be in another country's statutes. Of course, he would not say that.

Senator Flynn: I will say that.

Senator Olson: Neither will any premier of any province in Canada—

Senator Flynn: I will say that.

Senator Olson: —object to the fact that Canadians ought now, after all this effort, to have their own Constitution in their own country.

Senator Flynn: I would agree that the provinces should ask, but not Ottawa.

Senator Olson: Well, let us go to that part of the question. My honourable friend knows that one out of eleven governments, in the attempts that have been made over these years, has prevented that from happening. He has been involved in these matters long enough to know that on many of those occasions it has been one single province, although not always the same province, that has raised objection so that it just simply did not happen. That is why this is the time.

There is another reason, honourable senators, why it is particularly appropriate for the federal government, indeed, for both houses of the federal Parliament, to take their responsibility—

Senator Flynn: It is not ours.

Senator Olson: —and that is that there has probably never been a time in Canadian history when the Constitution has been debated in the public realm for so long or so exhaustively. We believe that the people of Canada, the citizens, the electorate, or however you want to describe them, have now watched a discussion taking place all summer with the continuing committee on the Constitution, the ministers from all governments and, indeed, in 20 or so hours of live television time. There has probably never been a time when there has been as much understanding as there is now of what is involved in that question. I sincerely believe that the people of this country have reached the stage where they want their Constitution in Canada.

As a matter of fact, it is interesting to hear such arguments as, "Yes, we want the Constitution patriated. We want the Constitution in this country, but somehow it is the wrong time and somehow it is the wrong procedure for bringing it here." Surely, even the Leader of the Opposition, at some point in time, has to call a spade a spade and not something else.

If everybody agrees that the Constitution ought to be in Canada, as I do, and if everybody agrees that we should have some basis for bringing that Constitution here and for amending it in the future by a formula that requires agreement somewhere short of unanimity—because that has always stopped it before—then, surely, there is no more appropriate time than now, in light of that general level of understanding of what is involved in this constitutional matter which I suggest is higher in the public mind than it has ever been before.

Senator Flynn: I doubt it very much.

Senator Olson: Well, the Honourable Leader of the Opposition says he doubts it, but he is also unwilling to say that he does not believe the Constitution should be in this country.

Senator Flynn: Oh, I do.

Senator Olson: Then he agrees with the objective.

Senator Flynn: I merely want to mind my own business.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Keep quiet.

Senator Olson: So the Honourable Leader of the Opposition agrees.

Senator Flynn: I think Senator Guay has a point of order to raise.

Senator Guay: The other night I was given a lesson by the Leader of the Opposition on keeping quiet when someone else is speaking. I only wish he would practise what he preaches.

Senator Flynn: I agree, but on the point of order raised by Senator Guay, may I suggest that, if someone has to complain, it should be Senator Olson and not Senator Guay.

Senator Guay: That is why I say I always listen to you, when you make sense.

Senator Flynn: Continue. You do that well, at least.

Senator Olson: I can see, honourable senators, that we are having the same high level of agreement on the point of order as we have been having on the point that the Constitution ought to be in Canada. I am pleased at that.

Honourable senators, the second part of the resolution that is before us, deals with some fundamental rights of Canadian citizens. The strange part about this is that everyone agrees that every single one of the rights that are spelled out in the proposed amendments to the Constitution is a right that Canadian citizens are entitled to have. They are rights that cannot be violated or abridged by any government. I have not heard any disagreement with that, even from those people who object to bringing home the Constitution or to whatever the government is doing. Not even they have selected any of those rights, saying, "We disagree with the citizens having this right."

I will not go over these rights in detail, because I know my honourable friend opposite has read every one of them carefully. But does he disagree with the guarantee of rights and freedoms? Does he disagree with Canadian citizens having those fundamental freedoms that are spelled out in clause 2?

Senator Flynn: Freedom of speech!

Senator Olson: I don't think so. I do not think the leader would disagree with the democratic rights of citizens that are contained here. They are enshrined or entrenched in our Constitution so that we have the right to vote, to select our government. That is what is in here. He does not disagree with that.

Senator Flynn: We have always had those rights.

Senator Olson: I am sure he does not disagree that there should be a limited duration of any legislative body. I am sure he does not disagree with that either.

Senator Flynn: I must say it is badly worded.

Senator Olson: At any rate, he does not disagree with the principle involved. So I have to ask myself, "Does he disagree with some rights Canadian citizens have, for instance, to enjoy the entire country?"

Senator Flynn: Well, you are putting a question to me.

Senator Olson: No, I am not.

Senator Flynn: In any event, these rights are already in the Constitution. They are already entrenched there. So what are you adding?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, these rights are not in the present B.N.A. Act. They are not.

Senator Flynn: Certainly, they are. The duration of Parliament is in the Constitution. You could not change that. It is in the Constitution. Try to study it.

Senator Olson: If my honourable friend wants to nitpick about these things, I believe it is fair to say that there is not a limitation in the Constitution on the duration of legislative bodies that applies to all the provincial legislatures. They write some of their own constitutions.

Senator Flynn: It is in the Constitution. It is there.

Senator Olson: Well, if it is there, I think it is a good thing that it is there, and it ought to be in the Canadian Constitution, too.

Senator Flynn: It is!

Senator Olson: Then we get to mobility rights. I believe that the citizens of Canada have the right, or ought to have the right, to enter, to remain and to leave Canada. I believe that every citizen of Canada ought to have the right to move and to take up residence in any part of Canada.

Senator Flynn: They have that right now.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: But this says "any province." I also believe that every Canadian ought to have the right to earn a livelihood in any province, and that has been challenged by some of the provinces. They have set up some rules that limit the right of Canadian citizens to move anywhere, and to seek gainful employment, in this country.

• (1550)

Hon. G. I. Smith: Pursuant to the Constitution.

Senator Olson: Well, pursuant to the Constitution. This is a right that is going to be entrenched in the Constitution, and obviously has not been either severe or strict enough to be applied.

None of the honourable gentlemen opposite wants to argue that Canadian citizens should not have that right. It can be seen that they are not willing to do that.

Senator Smith: Who says they are not willing to do that?

Senator Olson: Are you willing to argue that Canadian citizens should not have the right to seek employment anywhere in this country? Of course not.

Senator Smith: You wait and see.

Senator Flynn: You want to impose that on the provinces.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Perhaps we should wait and see what the speaker has to say about that.

Senator Olson: Well, we should wait and see what they have to say about it, but I just don't believe, honourable senators, that the opposition is going to say that they are opposed to Canadians being able to move anywhere they like in this country—

Senator Flynn: I didn't say that.

Senator Olson: —and to seek gainful employment wherever they like in this country. That is a fundamental freedom that I believe every Canadian citizen is entitled to. That's what's here.

I don't think anybody is particularly opposed to some of the other legal rights that are spelled out in this matter. There are some, for example, respecting non-discrimination, which I endorse completely, but I realize that it will take some time for all of the provinces and, indeed, perhaps even the federal Parliament, to search out and amend some of the statutes that are on the books now so that those non-discrimination rights can be taken out. So there is a provision that that would not become applicable for three years, in order to provide time to make that search and to make the amendments.

Then there are the official languages of Canada.

Senator Flynn: Then there is no urgency.

Senator Olson: Well, the honourable Leader of the Opposition wants to make a lot of contributions to my speech. I am not discouraging that—I think he should go ahead—but I would like him also to participate in this debate so that we can hear what his views are. So far, despite its having been called every day, he has refrained. To use another word, he has so far boycotted this debate, and I think that that is unfortunate because I know he would make a great contribution. I also believe he is not doing as good a service to Canada by refraining from participating in this debate.

Senator Flynn: Don't you worry about that.

Senator Olson: I remember very clearly that the members opposite were asking for some opportunity to participate in the discussion about the matters that are in that resolution.

Senator Flynn: No, not accurate.

Senator Olson: And then, when an opportunity is provided, they refrain from participating.

Senator Flynn: You are mistaken.

Senator Olson: That I don't understand.

Senator Smith: You don't understand it because it isn't true.

Senator Olson: Oh, no, it is true all right.

Senator Smith: It is not true.

Senator Frith: It's the kind of truth that hurts.

Senator Olson: I would like to turn to another aspect of this, honourable senators, and that is that I think we have a responsibility in this chamber to examine just what it is we are protecting. Why do we need—

Senator Smith: Or giving.

Senator Olson: —this kind of action taken by the federal Parliament of Canada which, of course, includes both houses? And that is very simple to me.

Senator Flynn: It has to be.

Senator Olson: I believe there is some value to Canadian citizenship. As a matter of fact, when I compare the values that we have—and I could spell them out, if you like—such as the respect for human beings and for human dignity, and the respect for our structure of law and order which, even though it may not be perfect, is, in my view, better than that of any other country in the world.

Senator Flynn: That's why we don't need that.

Senator Olson: And that is why, when we find a trend towards restricting the rights of Canadian citizenship along provincial boundaries, we have a responsibility to stop and to reverse that trend.

You can argue that it may not be serious yet, but there are some trends that are extremely serious to me. One of them we have just talked about, and that is the trend towards restricting the right of a Canadian citizen to seek gainful employment anywhere he chooses in this country. I don't like that trend. There are some other restrictions with respect to investment and the ownership of land, for example, in more than one part of this country. I think that there ought to be some rules perhaps on the use of some of those assets, but I tell you very frankly that I do not accept that those rights ought to be confined to residents within a province. For example—

Senator Flynn: You are changing the Constitution in this respect, aren't you, because there is a decision of the Supreme Court with respect to the restrictions in Prince Edward Island with regard to ownership of land. It has been declared intra vires of the legislation of Prince Edward Island.

Senator Frith: Order.

Senator Flynn: I am not talking to you.

Senator Olson: I was talking about some of the trends that are taking place in this country in the way of setting up different rules for different people because they happen to live within a provincial boundary.

Hon. Lowell Murray: That is not covered by your resolution.

Senator Olson: It is covered in my concern over the trends that are taking place in this country.

Senator Murray: It is not in your resolution.

Hon. Duff Roblin: No, it is not.

Senator Olson: Take it as you like. We are demonstrating that we are going to set up some rights that belong to all Canadian citizens no matter where they live.

Senator Smith: No matter whom they take them from.

Senator Olson: Oh, no.

Senator Smith: Oh, yes.

Senator Olson: Rights don't necessarily restrict somebody else. Rights are something that cannot be violated by any government in this country.

Senator Smith: You are trying to take away from the provinces the jurisdiction and authority they now have under the Constitution.

Senator Frith: If we could hear one full sentence before you bootleg your way into this debate.

Senator Flynn: If it makes sense, I agree.

Senator Frith: We are listening to a lot that doesn't make sense from the other side.

Senator Olson: Well, I guess some of the freedoms in this country, the Honourable Leader of the Opposition may agree, include the right to be wrong. That is why we listen to some of the garbage that comes from the other side of the house in Question Period every day. We agree that you have that right.

Senator Flynn: That's certainly big of you.

Senator Olson: I am sure the Leader of the Opposition, even if he doesn't agree with my views, will respect my right to state them. I am sure he would be one of the greatest champions in defending my right to do that, but along with defending that right he should respect the fact that both of us can't speak at the same time.

Senator Smith: That is not impossible.

Senator Flynn: Three of us. You have Senator Guay, too.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I don't think there are any fundamental differences in the fact that there ought to be some bill of rights that guarantees Canadian citizens those rights.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: So now we have come to the point where we agree that the Constitution ought to be in Canada. We agree that citizens ought to have some rights no matter where they live in this country. We come to the next question, and that is: Should we have in the Constitution the equalization requirement? I don't think honourable senators opposite are going to argue against that being a fundamental right of Canadians. It isn't changing very much because it is practised now, but I think it ought to be in the Constitution so that it is known that that is part of the basic law of this country.

Senator Smith: Which can't be enforced.

● (1600)

Senator Olson: I hope Senator Smith has got some notes some place so that he can make all these points himself rather than inserting all these comments into my speech, because I would like to listen to him make an intelligent speech, which I know he is capable of doing, in this debate. So far honourable senators opposite have refrained or boycotted it, as if—

Senator Flynn: We are trying to help you.

Senator Olson: —they are afraid to say what they think except by interrupting somebody else. Anyway, I don't mind that.

Senator Smith: It is no good having all this shadow boxing on a thing like this that we have before us now. Wait until the resolution comes.

Senator Perrault: Make your own speech.

Senator Olson: Now, honourable senators, we get to the next major part of the resolution that will be before us, which is the matter of an amending formula. Here I am sure honourable senators opposite will agree that for the first two years there will be no amendments to the Constitution of Canada except by the unanimous consent of all eleven governments. If that is not well understood by my friends opposite I could read them chapter and verse here to point it out, but I think it is, so that is clear. By the way, I should also point out, in case they haven't noticed, there is a requirement that for those two years there shall be a conference called by the Prime Minister of this country respecting that matter. It says very clearly in section 32:

> Until Part V comes into force, a constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once in every year unless, in any year, a majority of those composing the conference decide that it shall not be held.

Obviously it would take six governments to decide that it should not be held, otherwise it will be held. What that means is that there are going to be at least two more attempts—

[Senator Flynn]

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Olson: —to come to an agreement on an amending formula to the Canadian Constitution that would have a requirement of something less than unanimity, otherwise the unanimity provision prevails for those two years. I think we have to agree that we cannot lock ourselves into the situation where there can never be any further changes or amendments to the Constitution with something less than unanimity for ever. I am sure that after the last 53 years, particularly the last eleven years or so, when very sincere attempts have been made to find an amending formula, we cannot lock ourselves into a unanimity requirement for all time. I am sure everybody will agree that is a reasonable proposition.

What it says is that if no agreement is reached in those two years, then we go into the next section, which is what happens in the following two years to try to find an amending formula to which all eleven governments could agree, but at the end of that period—that is four years later—it will be referred to the people of Canada. I believe that that is the essence of democratic procedure, to refer it to the people of this country if their governments cannot reach an agreement, so there are certain sections to deal with that. In Part IV there is an interim amending procedure and rules for its replacement. You can go through section 38, for example, and so on.

Part V deals with the procedure for amending the Constitution in Canada. Section 41(1) is the general procedure. I could read it all, but I am sure honourable senators know that is the amending formula known as the Victoria Charter. Let us examine what that means for a moment. That means that there has to be, first of all, a resolution of the Parliament of Canada, both houses, plus a majority in all four regions of Canada—Ontario, Quebec, at least two of the four Atlantic provinces with more than 50 per cent of the population in those provinces, and at least two of the four western provinces, constituting a majority in those four provinces. It isn't one or the other. It means a majority in all the regions, plus the federal government—not the federal government; it is the federal Parliament, and there is obviously a difference, a very important difference. It does not seem to me that that is an unreasonable requirement.

There will be those who will still argue that it ought to be unanimous. I think, quite properly, we have come to the conclusion that there has to be something short of unanimity, but in my view this charter is not imposing anything on any province except those who still want unanimity, so that they can hold up all eleven governments. I think it is a reasonable proposal that amendments to the Canadian Constitution can be made when they are agreed to by a majority in each of the four regions of this country. That is what it says, and any other interpretation that is being put on it is just not valid, because that is what it says here.

By the way, there was a point in time, in 1971 for example, when all eleven governments did agree that that was a satisfactory amending formula, but then it broke down. I don't want to go back over the reasons, but it did, in fact, break down.

Senator Murray: Just for the record I want to ask the minister—

Senator Olson: I wonder if you could hold your questions until after my speech is over. I will try to answer them then.

Senator Murray: It is not a provocative question.

Senator Olson: I don't mind if it is a provocative question, but it seems to me that if I am to put the argument in its right scenario—

Senator Murray: That is why I am asking the question.

Senator Olson: —perhaps we ought to leave the questions until after my speech is over, and I will try not to keep you too long.

Senator Murray: I wanted to do that.

Senator Olson: I know. I have been around for a while. I know what honourable senators opposite are trying to do, and I hope they will try to do that when they are speaking too, because their views, their honest, sincere views, without any political overtones, really ought to be in the context of this debate, so I hope it is coming.

Senator Flynn: Don't worry about that.

Senator Olson: Then we get on to other things. One that is important here is that if it does, in fact, require a referendum to set down the amending formula in this Constitution, it will be the Victoria Charter or another amending formula, as yet unknown, but supported by eight of the ten provinces and 80 per cent of the population.

Senator Murray: The referendum question would have to pass by a 50 per cent plus one majority. Is that not correct?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is throwing in "buts" there. The question in the referendum will be one or the other.

Senator Murray: The question would have to pass by a 50 plus one majority.

Senator Olson: Yes, that's right, but it is what is put in the question that is also important, and in my mind there is no question but that the Victoria amending formula does in fact carry the requirement of a very substantially higher than majority support from the provinces and the people. Obviously if eight of the ten provinces with 80 per cent of the population come along with another formula, I am sure my honourable friend will agree with me when I assume that that amending formula that would be put in the referendum would also contain a very substantial majority, considerably more than a simple majority, of provincial support for any amending formula in the future, because that is what it says.

● (1610)

Senator Flynn: It could be subjected to serious distortions.

Senator Olson: My friends opposite seem to be afraid to let the people express themselves.

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Olson: They seem to be afraid of a referendum. They are afraid that the people might select some amending formula which somehow would be an irresponsible act.

Senator Flynn: By an emperor like the one we have now.

Senator Olson: I believe that if one of those questions is put to the people of this country they will make an intelligent decision. I am not afraid of having the people vote.

I did not want to make a long speech here today, but the opposition unfortunately are lengthening it.

Senator Flynn: We wanted you to make a substantial speech.

Senator Olson: It is a substantial speech.

There is some concern, honourable senators, about section 44 which provides for a suspensive veto by the Senate. I think honourable senators ought to read that section very carefully.

Senator Flynn: Have you?

Senator Olson: I would like them to.

Senator Flynn: I think I read it before you did.

Senator Olson: I do not think you did, but you may have read it quite a few times since.

That section states:

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation under subsection 41(1) or section 43 without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation—

Then it makes mention of the 90-day provision and the House of Commons having to pass the resolution. I will not deal with that again. However, what I think is important here is that this suspensive veto applies to subsection 41(1) and to section 43 only. It says that. There is no more in there. It mentions subsection 41(1) and section 43 only.

Senator Murray: Give us your argument in favour of that.

Senator Olson: Let us deal with section 43 to begin with. Section 43 states, "An amendment to the Constitution . . ." and so on. Section 43 provides a rule whereby amendments that would not apply to all provinces, such as terms of union with certain provinces, could be made upon authorization by$0the Senate, the House of Commons and the provinces concerned.

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator Olson: That means that if you are going to have any amendment to section 43 which deals only with constitutional matters that apply to that province, you must have the support of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies—that is clear.

Senator Flynn: Come to section 41.

Senator Olson: It is clear what section 43 says. Why would any senator object? Why would they want to insert a veto that is not only a suspensive veto to a resolution or an amendment that applies to their province because that is absolutely and unequivocally required. If they are in favour of it, and the House of Commons is in favour of it, why would the Senate want a continuing veto? I cannot see the logic of that.

We will dismiss section 43 since you are not concerned about that.

Senator Flynn: No, no. I should like to put a hypothetical case to my good friend.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Ask permission.

Senator Olson: Perhaps at the end of the speech.

Senator Flynn: You have a protector there.

Senator Olson: I do not see that there is any logic in suggesting that the Senate is somehow going to superimpose its opinion over the House of Commons and the legislature of a province who have agreed to the amendment.

Senator Flynn: I was going to give you a case in point.

Senator Olson: I do not think we have the right to stand in the way when all the provinces affected by the amendment have agreed with the resolution of the legislative assemblies—that is, if you have any respect for the democratic process. Certainly the democratic process is going to be exercised within those provinces.

Senator Flynn: Let us take an example of a legislature where the government has no mandate—for instance, the Quebec legislature. Mr. Lévesque would approve of an amendment, but would have no real authority, since it passes by one vote in the legislature. Do you not think that the Senate should be able to intervene in a case like that?

Senator Olson: I must remind my honourable friend that it is not only a legislature that can do that, it takes an amendment of the House of Commons, the Senate and the legislature.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Olson: What is left in section 44 is the requirement for a suspensive veto under subsection 41(1) only. I have heard all kinds of interpretations around the country that it is something greater than that. It is not greater than that; subsection 41(1) or section 43 is all that is contained in there.

What is subsection 41(1)? Subsection 41(1) is the amending formula under the Victoria Charter.

Senator Flynn: There is no limitation.

Senator Olson: There is a limitation—the limitation is subsection 41(1) or section 43.

Senator Flynn: Not on the kind of amendment.

Senator Olson: If you want to put it around the other way, it says that there shall be no suspensive veto—there would be a veto absolute for any other purpose other than section 43 of subsection 41(1).

Senator Flynn: Subsection 41(1) covers the whole country.

Senator Olson: Subsection 41(1) is the amending formula that may be in place if and when Part V comes into effect. That is clear.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Flynn: But it is any amendment.

Senator Frith: But section 42 is another amending formula.

Senator Flynn: Subsection 41(1) covers the whole territory.

Senator Frith: It covers everything so far as subject is concerned.

Senator Flynn: It could abolish the Senate; it could abolish the provinces.

Senator Frith: With their consent.

Senator Olson: The Honourable Leader of the Opposition seems to be right in the middle of this debate now. I am glad to see that because before he did not participate.

Section 42 is the amendment to the Constitution that may come into being if, indeed, there is another formula. It is the one that might come into being as a result of eight of the ten provinces—that is, 80 per cent of the population—putting it into the question as a choice in the referendum. Then the veto does not apply.

Senator Tremblay: Are you speaking of section 42?

Senator Olson: Section 42 is what may turn out to be some kind of substitution for section 41 when that other part comes into play.

Senator Flynn: If you want to abolish the Senate, under section 41 can you do it?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, those are the kinds of extremes that my honourable friend would like to inject into this debate. I should like to put this question to him: If the Victoria amending formula were to apply, that means that the House of Commons would pass a resolution to amend the Constitution of Canada by either abolishing or very significantly changing the Senate. If a majority in all four regions of the country supported that resolution, would he want to sit here? Would he want to sit here if that sentiment came from all those places?

• (1620)

Senator Flynn: No, I would not.

Senator Olson: Then, why do you object to it?

Senator Flynn: Not if it is a very simple majority resulting from a predominantly "yes" vote from a given region. If, for example, the population of the province of Alberta voted 90 per cent against, the Senate should be able to delay the action for more than three months.

Senator Lamontagne: Order.

Senator Flynn: If you could have Senator Lamontagne mind his own business occasionally, that would be very helpful.

[Translation]

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I believe that one of the rules of this house is that before interrupting an honourable senator one should have the decency of asking his or her permission.

[English]

Senator Tremblay: I wonder if I might have the permission of the honourable senator to ask a question, then.

Senator Olson: Yes, you have my permission to ask as many questions as you wish as soon as I finish my speech. I am not going to be much longer.

Senator Flynn: He put the question to me without asking permission.

Senator Olson: The Leader of the Opposition is the closest one to me across the aisle, and that is why I direct some of these questions to him, but I am really raising these questions so that honourable senators generally can ask themselves whether they have a correct interpretation of it.

The question was whether you really believe the Senate should somehow be able to stand in the way if the Victoria amending formula has been applied and the condition of a majority in each of the four regions of Canada has been met, plus a resolution having passed the House of Commons twice. That is an important question. In those circumstances, do you want a situation where the Senate can stand in the way of that kind of public support for an amendment to the Constitution?

Senator Smith: That is not the point at all.

Senator Olson: I do not believe we should.

Senator Smith: That is not the point at all. The point is that it is being done to evade and avoid the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, and the Parliament of a foreign nation is being asked to do it.

Senator Olson: No, I do not agree with that.

Senator Smith: Of course; you do not agree with anything that makes sense.

Senator Olson: I have always respected Senator Smith's views and his intelligence and his contribution to this debate—

Senator Flynn: And rightly so.

Senator Olson: I am afraid that when he says that I never agree with anything that makes sense, he is really lowering the credibility that I have given him up to this point, and that is unfortunate.

Senator Smith: It does not worry me much, if that is the point you are making.

Senator Olson: No, but it does worry me. The position that the Senate is going to take with respect to standing in the way of an overwhelming majority of the public of this country does worry me very greatly, and that is what we have to ask ourselves.

Senator Smith: That is not the point at all.

Senator Olson: Well, it is the point as far as I am concerned. You may disagree, and I would be very happy to listen to you outline your arguments. Up to this point, honourable senators across the way have chosen not to outline their arguments. We just have to imagine some of these things. I hope you will get into the debate.

Senator Smith: Well, use your imagination.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think we ought to pass the motion that will come to this house—

Senator Flynn: Are you sure.

Senator Olson: —within a reasonable period of time. It may be that once we get into the debate on the motion and the resolution, honourable senators will find some weaknesses that ought to be corrected once it gets to committee, but it seems to me that we ought to send it to the committee so that there can be a detailed examination and so that reasoned arguments on amendments that ought to be made can at least be presented to the committee.

I have no doubt in my mind that the nominations to that committee from both sides of this house, as well as the nominations from the other place, will be of good men and women who will try to do the best possible task of examining in detail what will be in that package, and to make amendments where they see weaknesses. We do not claim that there will not be some things that ought to be corrected. I think we would be discharging our responsibility in making any necessary amendments.

I can tell my honourable friends opposite that, at the end of a four-year period or so, I would have no problem in asking the people to make a selection because the governments have not been able to agree over that period of time. That, to me, is the essence of the democratic process, and we in this chamber have an obligation to support it.

Senator Murray: Since the minister invited me to put a question that was on my mind earlier at this stage, I wonder whether he would now accept a brief question.

Earlier in his speech, the minister expressed his concern about certain developments in various parts of the country which he felt were unduly restraining interprovincial mobility, and he alluded to the need for the entrenchment of mobility rights. As I understand it, those rights are not included in the present resolution, and I simply want to ask him whether he is arguing that they ought to be.

Senator Olson: I have to disagree with my honourable friend. Section 6 of the proposed resolution contains some mobility rights.

Senator Murray: I was referring—and the minister's reference was to some of the developments in the country—to the so-called economic union, provision for which is not included in the present resolution. Section 6 reads:

> 6(1) Every citizen of Canada has the right to enter, remain in and leave Canada.
> (2) Every citizen of Canada and every person who has the status of a permanent resident of Canada has the right
> (a) to move to and take up residence in any province; and
> (b) to pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any province.

I understood my honourable friend to be referring to the situation, for example, with regard to the B.C. government's action against the attempted takeover of MacMillan Bloedel a few years ago in British Columbia, and situations of that kind that it was proposed might be corrected by some provisions relating to the economic union which are not in the present resolution. My question is whether he is arguing that those provisions should be included.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not arguing that that particular circumstance could have been dealt with through the provisions that are in the resolution. I was expressing my concern about the number of limitations on the rights of Canadian citizens that are building up in several parts of this country that do, in fact, put a limitation on the right of a Canadian to do things. There are, for example, as my honourable friend knows, some limitations on who can buy land in some provinces.

Senator Flynn: There is nothing there about that.

Senator Olson: No, it is not in here. My honourable friends opposite will have to remember that in that portion of my remarks—I have said it three times now, and I will say it a fourth, if it is necessary—I was expressing my concern about some trends in this regard. It is perfectly clear that the matters dealing with the economic union of Canada are not in this resolution.

Senator Murray: Capital, goods and services.

Senator Olson: Yes, and a whole lot of other things. The federal government and the Prime Minister have been perfectly clear on that. The government has not put in the resolution all of the 12 items that it wanted to negotiate with the provinces. The resolution is not full, complete and comprehensive, but we are still concerned about them. We are concerned about some restrictions in trade between the provinces, and so on. But it is not provided for in this package. You are perfectly right in saying that it is not here.

Senator Murray: And you are not arguing that it should be.

Senator Olson: Well, I am arguing that once we get an amending formula we can then address that question so that we can further enhance the rights of Canadians. But obviously that would be done in accordance with the amending formula, whether it is the Victoria Charter or some other one agreed to by eight of the ten provinces constituting 80 per cent of the population.

● (1630)

Senator Denis: May I ask the minister a question? He was talking about abolishing the Senate. If the House of Commons, the provinces, and everyone else is in favour of abolishing the Senate, we would not be in a position to object; and, if that is true, does the minister not think that section 44 is useless?

Senator Olson: Section 44 would not be used, for example, if we agreed.

Senator Flynn: How amusing.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Olson: I also put the argument that the Senate just does not go out of existence in that way. It would seem to me that no senator would want to retain the level of authority that is there if all the provinces and the House of Commons passed such a resolution.

Senator Flynn: The simple answer is "yes."

Senator Denis: If this veto power of the Senate has not been in use for 113 years, why put in that section when it is of no use?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it certainly has some use—

Senator Denis: Then I want to know what it is.

Senator Olson: If it were not there, then, of course, there could be no act of Parliament of Canada without the concurrence of the Senate. Everyone knows that.

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator Olson: Therefore, if a situation arises under the provisions of section 41(1) which requires—I must go over this carefully—a majority vote in each of the regions of Canada, plus the House of Commons, and the Senate stands in the way, then the Senate would have an interminable veto; and I do not believe that we should have that interminable veto.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: May I ask the minister a question about the use he is making of the expression "vote of a majority in all regions" and apply it to section 41? I believe there is no question of a referendum there. It is only a question of the legislatures. It is a majority of legislatures. In my view, it is important not to have people think that under section 41 it is a majority of the people in the region; under section 41 it is a majority of legislatures, which is not the same thing. In a sense, to have the Senate removed from the decision under section 41 is juxtaposing the Senate to the legislatures and not to the people.

Senator Olson: It seems to me that there is only one way that the legislatures got there, and that is by a vote of the people.

Senator Flynn: Not the majority.

Senator Tremblay: I expected that answer. To substitute the modified Victoria formula, which is in section 41, it will take eight provinces representing 80 per cent of the people; so that in the first referendum, to make a choice between the modified Victoria formula, or something else which the government might devise, and a formula which will have had the support of 80 per cent of the population, it would take just a simple majority, which is 50 per cent plus one.

If the minister tells me that because the legislatures have approved something under section 41 they are expressing the will of the majority of the people, why does he not apply the same principle to where 80 per cent of our population will be represented when eight provinces propose another amending formula?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is confusing me a little, because apparently he does not like legislatures making decisions. But that is what section 41 says, that legislatures shall have the right to make decisions with respect to amending the Canadian Constitution.

Quite frankly, I do not agree with that argument. Legislatures are elected to make decisions. In fact, they are obliged to make decisions and laws, and the leader of the legislature is the one who speaks for and on behalf of that legislature when he attends, for example, a first ministers' conference. If a premier attends a first ministers' conference, we have to assume that he speaks for his government. I just do not understand the honourable senator's reasoning.

Senator Tremblay: Why, then, require only 50 per cent plus one to defeat a proposal representing 80 per cent of the population through the legislatures?

Senator Frith: If you like referendums, we have referendums; if you like legislatures, we have legislatures. Make up your mind what you like, and whichever way it is, you can have it; it is there.

Senator Smith: You should make up your mind which way you want it.

Senator Frith: I have made up my mind.

Senator Smith: Obviously the honourable gentleman opposite wants one, wants it all.

Senator Frith: When the honourable senator was a premier, did he not think that he represented anyone? Did Senator Roblin not think so? I bet you were not talking about how you were not very representative when you were a premier, and that is all that we are talking about—the whole legislature, even more than the government. If you want to have a debate such as we have in Committee of the Whole, when we can sit here and yack at each other, then let us do it.

Senator Smith: Perhaps the minister will allow me to ask him the following question, which is not on the same subject. It is one that I raised a little earlier. Assuming, for the moment, that he is correct, that if there were a great feeling in the country that the Senate should not exist, or should not do something, why does he feel that it is necessary to make this possible by asking the legislature of a foreign country to do it, rather than to leave it to Canadians to do it after they have the right to deal with their Constitution?

Senator Olson: The answer is very simple. If we bring the Constitution home and domicile it here in Canada, and put it here so that there is no way that we can amend it in the future without unanimity—

Senator Smith: I did not say that.

Senator Olson: You sort of said that, because if it is brought over here and there is no suspensive veto with respect to any one of them, including the Senate, then the Senate could, in theory at least, stand in the way of further amendment to the Constitution. That is pretty simple to understand.

Senator Smith: How long do you think it would last if that happened and it was against the will of the people of Canada?

Senator Olson: That exactly describes the logic that I used in my argument.

Senator Smith: Why are you not prepared to leave that change in the Constitution to the people of Canada rather than ask the legislature of a foreign country to establish it for you?

Senator Olson: Because it would be brought over here in such a way that we could take those steps that are outlined in here without anyone, including the Senate, absolutely blocking any further amendment. That is pretty clear.

Senator Smith: "Pretty clear"—that is exactly what I thought you would say.

Senator Flynn: If no one on the other side wishes to move the adjournment, then in case a Liberal senator might wish to continue the debate, I will move its adjournment. I made it clear; perhaps it is difficult for some people to understand the subtlety. Any Liberal senator may feel he is free to speak.

● (1640)

Senator Frith: Before the question is put, could I ask the Leader of the Opposition if he intends to speak or if he is just adjourning the debate.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: He does not intend to speak?

Senator Flynn: I am just doing what you do—adjourning in case some other honourable senator might wish to speak on it.

Senator Perrault: That is a misuse of the rules.

Senator Frith: Could I ask him if anyone on his side is intending to speak on it?

Senator Flynn: I do not know, but some members may wish to do so.

Senator Frith: Oh, then I think we cannot give consent.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Honourable Senator Flynn P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., that this debate be adjourned to the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Flynn: But somebody else may want to speak and that is why I am adjourning the debate.

Senator Frith: And we do not consent to that adjournment.

Senator Flynn: But, as I say, somebody else may want to speak.

Senator Frith: Then let someone else adjourn it.

Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate, and I can say in case there is any question, that either I or some other honourable senator will speak on this order when it comes up next week.

Senator Flynn: I have no objection.

The Hon. the Speaker: If Senator Frith moves the adjournment of the debate, what happens to Senator Flynn's motion?

Senator Flynn: I withdraw my motion if Senator Frith says he wants to move the adjournment.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, which was presented on Tuesday, October 21, 1980.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved that the report be adopted.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—HISTORICAL FACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA REFERENCE CASE—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores which distinguish that claim from the British Columbia claim as dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights (the British Columbia Reference case), (1967) Supreme Court Reports, 792, and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, and submit that the said decision does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, in a moment I shall ask that this inquiry stand because of the time of day, notwithstanding the fact that I had indicated my intention to speak to various authorities in the leadership of the house. I just want to make it clear that I do not wish to impose myself on the Senate at such a time as this, and I now ask that the inquiry stand.

Inquiry stands.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, October 27, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, October 27, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HONOURABLE RAYMOND EUDES

TRIBUTES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, all members of the Senate were saddened this weekend at the news that our colleague, the Honourable Senator Raymond Eudes, had passed away. Senator Eudes, of course, had a distinguished record of public service in this country.

He was born in Montreal and attended l'Académie Saint-Joseph, Montreal College and the University of Montreal. As honourable senators are aware, his profession was that of the law.

He was elected to the House of Commons in 1940 for Hochelaga, and went on to establish an enviable record of service to his constituents, to his province and to his nation by being re-elected in 1945, 1949, 1953, 1957, 1958, 1962 and 1963. He sat until the dissolution of the Twenty-sixth Parliament. He was not a candidate in 1965.

He was very active in committees of the Senate and was a distinguished representative of the Senate on a number of Canadian delegations to world councils, associations and organizations, including the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

We knew him as a friend and a colleague who had compassion for the people of this country and a great sense of understanding of the problems which exist in this country.

[Translation]

He made a substantial contribution to Canada. All his colleagues in Parliament were distressed by his death.

We wish to extend to his family our deepest sympathy on their great bereavement.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I knew our colleague, Raymond Eudes, in the House of Commons from 1958 to 1962. He was then critic of the official opposition for the business of the Department of Justice. He discharged his responsibilities with brilliance.

As the Leader of the Government pointed out, he was elected in 1940 and he sat in the House of Commons until 1965, when he had to give up his seat to Mr. Gérard Pelletier, if I remember well, who with the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau and our distinguished Speaker was one of the three doves which were then supposed to save the Liberal Party.

In 1968, Raymond Eudes was appointed to the Senate. He was a charming man, an excellent lawyer and I would say a poet of sort. He had a very nice voice and he liked to sing. He had a gift for painting and he regularly devoted part of his time to oil painting. He was an extremely pleasant man.

I am sure that I speak on behalf of all senators in the opposition when I extend to his wife and his family the assurance of our fond remembrance and our deep sympathy.

[English]

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I should like to associate myself with the remarks that have been made about our colleague, the late Senator Raymond Eudes.

I was elected to the House of Commons at the same time as he was, in March 1940, and served in the House of Commons during all the time he was there, that is to say for the next 25 years.

It was a very different atmosphere in the House of Commons at that time. The war was on and during the war years the pressures on members were quite different from what they are now. Indeed it is quite obvious that current parliamentarians are not familiar with the problems that arose in those days.

● (1410)

It was said of Raymond Eudes, when he was first elected to the House of Commons, that he was too young, a charge that seems strange in these days, when one is eligible to be elected to the House of Commons at the age of 18. But at that time, some 40-odd years ago, it was not customary for people to be elected to Parliament even in their twenties. Although I had been practising law for nine years, it was a charge that I shared with him, a charge made against both of us. Time, of course, corrected that charge quickly.

Senator Eudes was a man of very fine nature, and, so far as I know from all my experience in Parliament, had the finest singing voice of anyone in Parliament in our time. He was really outstanding as a musician, and, indeed, in the other arts. He was of high quality.

I will not go through the various details of his parliamentary life, except to say that after the 1965 election he was then out of Parliament for a couple of years until the spring of 1968, when he came here, where he served until his passing. Regrettably, all too many of his last few years here were spent under the greatest health handicap, concluding in the final illness that took him from us.

I want to join with other honourable senators in expressing sympathy to his wife and the various members of his family.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I should like to associate myself with the remarks of those senators who have just spoken.

Senator Raymond Eudes was my seat mate for some six years. He was a gentleman of the old school: kind, considerate and helpful. We both arrived in this august chamber the same day. However, his knowledge of parliamentary procedure gained in the other place over a quarter of a century of service enabled him to advise and counsel the new boy from Newfoundland.

He was, as has been said, elected to the House of Commons from 1940 to 1965, after which he served in the Senate from 1968 until his passing. He was faithful in his attendance in this chamber and in committees until his health prevented it.

His family has lost a devoted husband and father, and I a great friend. To his wife Marguerite and to his daughters I extend my deepest sympathy.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I should like to make a short interjection in connection with Senator Eudes, whom I began to know really only after he came to this house, although, as Senator McIlraith has said, he served from 1940 until 1965 in the other place and served here for nearly 15 years, giving him a total of 40 years in Parliament. That is a long time to give to public life, and I am sure that it is something his family will always be proud to speak of and will cherish.

Raymond Eudes and I first became friends at a NATO meeting which wound up in Paris back in about 1950 or 1960. I was so glad to hear Senator Flynn refer to his artistic talents. I remember that Senator Eudes' wife came to Paris at that time to meet him and we went together to the Paris Opera one night. Almost every time that I met Raymond Eudes after that, he would start to sing:

La fleur que tu m'avais jetée.

● (1415)

He was an extremely civilized and most intelligent man. Unfortunately the illness that overtook him in the last few years of his time here prevented his participation in the work of this house.

To his wife and daughters, for whom all of us who know them have great affection, we send our deepest sympathy.

THE LATE HONOURABLE JUDY LaMARSH, P.C.

TRIBUTES TO FORMER CABINET MINISTER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will have learned of the news early this morning of the passing of the Honourable Judy LaMarsh, a member of the Queen's Privy Council, in hospital in Toronto.

Judy LaMarsh was a lawyer, author, professor, broadcaster, and former cabinet minister. Judy LaMarsh commanded great respect from Canadians from coast to coast regardless of party. From 1943 to 1946 she was a linguist with Canadian, British and American intelligence teams in the Armed Forces and was always very proud of her time in the wartime service of her country.

In 1958 she was the only woman delegate to the first conference of NATO Youth Leaders in Paris. From 1957 to 1960 she was the first woman municipal solicitor in Stamford Township, Ontario. She was first elected to the House of Commons in 1960, in her home town seat of Niagara Falls. Subsequently, as honourable senators are aware, she was Minister of National Health and Welfare and Secretary of State and did an immense amount to advance human rights and a betterment in the human condition.

In 1968 she resigned from the federal cabinet and returned to her law practice. While there she was also very active as author, broadcaster and visiting law professor. She will be remembered as Chairman of the Royal Commission on Violence in Communications.

She was admitted to the Order of Canada in July, 1980, a further recognition of her great contribution to Canada. I knew Judy LaMarsh from my earliest days in politics. Behind her, at times, brusque manner was a warm, sensitive person deeply concerned about helping the less advantaged. She did much to advance the status of women.

I know that all honourable senators, regardless of party, will mourn her loss.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I should like to join in the messages of condolence concerning my former colleague in the other place, and in the government, during the period when the Right Honourable Lester Pearson was Prime Minister of Canada.

In 1960, when Miss LaMarsh was elected to the Parliament of Canada in a by-election, there were, in the House of Commons at that time 48 Liberals and 208 on the government side—in a house of 265 members. So honourable senators can well imagine the warmth with which she was welcomed by the members of the official opposition in the House of Commons, of which I was one.

When Mr. Pearson formed the government in 1963, she was appointed a minister and served throughout the rest of his term of office.

The finest speech that I have ever heard anywhere on the subject of Canadian social welfare was that delivered by Miss LaMarsh to a group of women in the west end of Ottawa. I have never heard a speech on this subject given with such understanding and knowledge, and delivered in terms that were so well understood by that audience. I have often thought about it since.

Miss LaMarsh was, of course, a controversial figure politically, and perhaps because of that her tremendously powerful and able brain was not sufficiently appreciated. She had tremendous ability in law and parliamentary matters, and it is sad that someone so young, and who appeared to be so strong, should be taken from us so soon. I want to join with the others here in expressing my sympathy at this sad loss, and sending that expression to the members of her family.

● (1420)

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I would like to associate myself with the complimentary remarks that have been made about the late Miss LaMarsh.

You may wonder why I would think it incumbent upon me to do so, but I occupied two positions in Nova Scotia which were paralleled by those held by Miss LaMarsh in the federal administration, and so I was thrown on many occasions into contact with her. As a consequence of this I came to have a very real appreciation of her, and of her qualities. I never was quite sure what her opinion was of me, and I can recall on one occasion when I arrived a little late at a committee meeting over which she was presiding, she greeted me by saying, "Oh, here's Old Sorrow from Nova Scotia to join us."

She was the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and she was a dedicated and devoted one. I can remember the strenuous efforts she made to put down the curse of tobacco smoking. I think she always had great difficulty in mastering her own relationship with the noxious weed, but she was firm that the proper position for her to take was that Canadians' health would be improved if they would cease to use tobacco. I remember well how vigorously she was involved in that campaign.

She also served as the minister in charge of the federal centennial committee. I served as the centennial minister for Nova Scotia, and as a result of that I came in frequent contact with Miss LaMarsh. She had the wisdom and foresight to see to it that all of the various meetings of the centennial committee that were held from time to time were held in a different part of Canada. As a result of this I can say that she and I travelled Canada together, if you want to put it that way. In any event, I remember her coming to Nova Scotia at the time when the miners' museum was opened. That was a centennial project in Cape Breton. Miss LaMarsh came down for that, and I remember her singling me out in the group when we went to the entertainment after the official function. She said she had called me aside because she wanted to tell me that she was going to be appointed a justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario. That is something which, regretfully, never materialized. I think she should have had that recognition, but she did not and I always thought that it was because she was too frank and too outspoken. She took her position, she made her selections, she indicated where her support lay with regard to the leadership of the Liberal Party, a little too definitely, a little too vigorously, ever to be the recipient of a judicial appointment from the man who eventually won on that occasion. She chose the wrong horse to back and she suffered the penalty.

At any rate, I was greatly distressed this morning to hear that she had died. I had known that her health was failing, but she always seemed to be a person of such great strength and vitality that one finds it hard to believe that she should have left us at what someone has referred to as such an early age.

I do not know what members of her family survive her, but I want to express my deep sympathy to them. I would also like to go on record as saying that I consider that Canada has lost a great citizen.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, one of the great things about Judy LaMarsh was the fact that she had great courage. The courage demonstrated by her in the last few months of her life was perhaps the most outstanding of any example of courage she had ever displayed. For personal reasons, I have very warm recollections of Judy. When I joined the cabinet of Mr. Pearson in 1964, she was at the beginning of the process which led to the introduction of the Canada Pension Plan. That must remain, I think, the greatest monument to Judy's efforts here. I remember so well the many meetings devoted to the review of the legislation concerning the Canada Pension Plan wherein, among other things, mathematical formulae had to be converted to legal jargon. Judy worked extremely hard on that and with a dedication that was inspiring.

● (1425)

Senator Donahoe has spoken about her work in connection with the Centennial Year, when she was the Secretary of State. That is another monument to her ingenuity as well as her determination to push through projects in which she believed. She gave a remarkable performance that summer of 1967. At times I used to substitute for her in Ottawa—and I was only too happy to do so—when she was engaged in meetings all over the country in connection with her duties as Secretary of State.

She sat in the cabinet for four years, along with my deskmate, Senator McIlraith. He knew her as well as, if not better than any other cabinet minister, and certainly as well as any senator.

I wrote a letter to her about a week ago because I had been talking to some of her friends who told me then that the prospect of her surviving for another week was very dim indeed. She appeared on television just a few months ago, while she was just a shadow of her former self, she did not convey any sense of the foreboding of what was eventually to catch up with her.

It was with great sadness that I learned of Judy's death, and I am sure that everyone who knew her also feels this way.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps one of the significant pieces of evidence as to how important a person Judy LaMarsh was in Canadian life is the difficulty many of us are having in letting her premature death pass without comment.

I spent all of my professional and political career with Judy so I too have many memories of her. However, what I should like to mention now is her career as a Canadian woman. In doing what she did for herself and her country, Judy accomplished much in the advancement of equality of rights for women. That battle is certainly not won yet, but the cause was dramatically advanced by Judy LaMarsh, and she did not do that in any token way. She was as good as any man in everything she decided to do. With her it was never in the context of any patronizing tokenism or patronizing concessions when she was in the process of advancing those or any other human rights; there was none of that, and everything she did, she did well.

• (1430)

She has left her mark. Only history will decide, in its perspective, how important was her work on behalf of women, but we know what an important contribution she made to the development of Canada. We have lost a great Canadian. May her soul rest in peace.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, although I am probably prevented, because of my position, from expressing any feeling, I want to associate myself with the tributes which have been paid to Senator Eudes and especially to Judy LaMarsh, who had been my colleague for many years and with whom I never had any problem, contrary to others. I do not know why, but I intend to try and find out. I want to join all those who have paid tributes to these two Canadians who have marked, each in his or her own way, our political history.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that I have received a message from the House of Commons in the following words:

Thursday, October 23, 1980

Resolved,—That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 Members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the Committee have power to appoint from among its Members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when 6 members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, Members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Attest

C. B. KOESTER
The Clerk of the House of Commons

• (1435)

Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave, later this day, and immediately following Question Period.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING REPORT OF PROPOSED SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question to put to the Leader of the Government before we begin the debate on the resolution concerning the Constitution of Canada.

I wonder whether the leader has an answer to the question asked of him by Senator McIlraith last week, reported at page 890 of Hansard. If my memory serves me correctly—and I shall just check it—Senator McIlraith wished to know what would happen if the Senate wished to amend the report of the joint committee.

● (1440)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government is aware of the situation delineated by Senator McIlraith. A number of avenues are being considered to ensure that a procedure will be available should such an eventuality arise. The proposed resolution, in its final form, would have to pass both houses. There would be no message sent to Her Majesty unless both houses agreed.

Furthermore, I should like to refer honourable senators to page 206 of Beauchesne's Rules and Forms, House of Commons of Canada, with Annotations, Comments and Precedents, 1978, Fifth Edition, specifically to paragraph 663 on page 206, which reads:

> A special committee ceases to exist at the moment its final report is presented to the House. Therefore the report cannot afterwards be sent back to the committee with instructions to amend it in any particular way unless the House agrees to revive the committee by adding the following words to the motion for recommittal: "and that the Committee for such purpose be revived."

Additionally, honourable senators, other avenues are being explored to ensure that there will be a satisfactory recourse should that situation arise.

Senator Flynn: Is it the view of the government that the concurrence of both houses in the report would be deemed to be a resolution of both houses to Westminster?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would not want to anticipate what the committee may decide in terms of the form of its report to the other place and to the Senate. I think that would be presumptuous on my part. I would hope that this is a matter we can explore during the course of the debate that we anticipate occurring very shortly.

Senator Flynn: I would hope that we would not have to raise the question at all.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, could I address a question for further clarification of this matter?

We have two problems here, one of which I raised on Tuesday evening, as appears at page 890 of Senate Hansard where I pointed out that there is no procedure for the Senate to amend the content of the resolution or the draft bill appended to the resolution, both of which form the document referred to in the motion. There is no procedure whatever for that.

The first part of my question is this: Can we have the assurance from the government before we terminate our debate on the motion to set up a committee, that we have that right, because the consequence of not having the right of sending something back to a committee is very, very serious, particularly when one remembers that the latter part of the motion provides that only one member from the Senate—or, indeed, from the other place—need be present in the quorum of 12 at the meeting at which a decision is taken on the matter? I, for one, with the utmost respect to any and all of my colleagues, am not willing to grant the right to any senator in this place to speak for the whole Senate on something that will affect the Constitution of this country for the years ahead.

The second part of my question, also arising out of the peculiar procedure followed in this instance, is the simpler of the two, and that is: Is it proposed by the government that the resolution or Address being sent to the Parliament of the United Kingdom will come back before our Parliament for approval once the proceedings we are now engaged in are totally finished and reported upon and dispensed with?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I want to give the assurance again that there will be a procedure whereby the Senate may ask the joint committee to reconsider certain points in its report. That procedure will be established, and of course it is subject to the approval of the Senate itself to send that report back to the joint committee.

Secondly, there will be many more opportunities for debate. There has been a great deal of publicity over the weekend about the alleged closure in the other place. It is not for me to become involved in debating that issue again, but honourable senators surely are aware that the motion under discussion in the other place was for the Address to the Queen to be referred to a joint committee in order that testimony could be taken and detailed consideration given to the constitutional proposals. The joint committee would report back to the Senate and to the House of Commons, and at that point the views of this chamber could be made known and a procedure would be in place to send the report back to the joint committee should a majority of senators wish certain changes to be made in the report. The opportunities for debate would be rather extensive. The proposed process does not constitute a restriction on the freedom to debate.

Senator McIlraith: That does not deal with the point I raised.

Senator Flynn: I would have been very surprised.

Senator McIlraith: The point I raised is whether, after all of the proceedings arising out of the motion that will be before us this afternoon—and that motion does not bring either the resolution or the proposed bill before this house, and they have not been before the other house—whether it is the intention of the government to bring the resolution itself, together with the proposed bill before Parliament for whatever action Parliament may take.

It makes all the difference in the world in what we are debating today, being the motion to set up a committee.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, at this point I am not willing to add to what I have already said. I would like to meet the honourable senator and discuss with him more fully the basis of his concern. I would like to have more detail as to the technical nature of the question he raises.

Senator Flynn: We are interested in it, too.

Senator McIlraith: So that honourable senators will be very clear on this, the basis of my concern is simple. To me, it is unthinkable that a message be sent to the Crown asking another Parliament to return to us our Constitution with many things in it that are not related to its return to this country on the strength of the action of the government of the day alone without Parliament ever having had that resolution or draft bill before it. I know of no precedent for such action, and I hope there is no attempt being made to establish such a precedent now.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps we can find a more thorough answer to the question than what I am about to suggest. The question has a connection with the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

If I understand the procedures, the question of a resolution of the type described—a resolution of Parliament, in other words—eventually going to the Crown will depend on what the committee reports. It is quite possible that the committee will report exactly that—namely, recommending that a resolution be sent, in which case, when we debate that, we will be debating, in effect, the resolution. If it does not, then, of course, whatever it does recommend is also going to be the subject of some debate.

In my opinion the question being raised is relevant for the reasons advanced, but it ought to be put when we get the report from the committee. At that time the very points that are now being made by Senator McIlraith and Senator Flynn can be made; that is, whether they object to the report, agree with it, or disagree with it because it does not fulfill such-and-such a requirement.

So while I do not think the question is irrelevant, I think it is premature and is one which should be dealt with when the committee reports.

Senator McIlraith: No, it is not premature. The question is whether the government proposes to submit the resolution containing the draft bill to Parliament for approval before it goes to Westminster. All we can approve when the committee we are now being asked to set up reports back is that committees's report. That is one thing. Let's assume we approve that report, and the report recommends that the message be sent—

Senator Frith: That is what I said.

Senator McIlraith: No, you did not say that. Let's assume that it recommends that a message similar in form to the one contained in the document tabled by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister on October 2 be sent and that we concur in that report. My question then is: That procedure having been finished, will the actual message that is to be sent come before Parliament for Parliament's approval?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in the course of this debate I would be pleased to bring to the chamber a statement from the government on the particular point raised by Senator McIlraith. I can give him the assurance, however, that since he raised that point and other points the other day, a good deal of discussion has been held with advisers to the government and with the ministers to make sure that the rights of both houses are zealously protected. Certainly every effort will be made to assure that the rights of both houses are zealously protected. Honourable senators, of course, are aware that the procedures in which we are involved lead us into some uncharted waters. There is a lack of precedents. I give the assurance again that a statement will be brought to this chamber in the hope that honourable senators will be satisfied on certain points. Certainly, as I have said, the question raised by Senator McIlraith has been under study.

• (1450)

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, while Senator McIlraith's point is a very important one, mine is much simpler and I think the public of Canada will understand it more readily. I ask if the Leader of the Government will tell me how any senator who represents a region is going to make any kind of a significant input into what goes on in the committee, other than being a member of the committee, a committee which will probably be chosen by the government, and hand-picked by the government, I might add. Could the leader please tell me how I, as a representative of Saskatchewan with certain regional interests, am going to be able in due course to make my contribution—other than by making the usual speech on the resolution—to what is eventually going to become the Constitution of Canada? This is one of the things that worries senators and, indeed, the people of Canada.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, let us make it clear that a four-stage "constitutional" procedure exists in the Senate in contrast with the three-stage procedure in the other place. We have had an inquiry on the order paper for many days. Regrettably, a number of senators chose not to take advantage of the opportunity to speak.

Senator Asselin: It was a trap.

Senator Perrault: If honourable senators have certain regional concerns, this inquiry debate would have been the first opportunity for them to state those concerns and other views respecting the content of the documents tabled here the other day. The inquiry debate was launched to enable all honourable senators in all sections of the house to speak for their regions and their provinces, and to set forth, as well, other views. That was stage No. 1.

Secondly, very shortly we shall be considering a motion to refer to a joint committee this so-called "constitutional package" or Address to the Queen. Honourable senators should feel free to participate in that debate and set forth their views with respect to the advisability of referring that motion to committee. I have no doubt that in the course of that debate they will take the opportunity to set forth their views with respect to some of the provisions in the draft bill appended to the proposed Address.

Thirdly, there is the committee stage. Of course, not all senators can be named to that joint committee. The usual balance in a committee of 25 members is to have 10 from the Senate and 15 from the House of Commons. That is the usual approximate membership of joint committees of that kind. Honourable senators may well have an opportunity, under certain circumstances, to make their views known to that committee. It would be for the committee to decide whether such requests could be accommodated.

Then the joint committee would present its report to the Commons and to the Senate. I think we would be unwise to anticipate the form which that report would take. Senator McIlraith referred earlier to the fact that when the committee reports back there could be no opportunity to debate, or words to that effect. But we cannot anticipate what kind of report the committee would make. We cannot anticipate. We do not even know what witnesses they would invite to appear before that joint committee. The committee eventually would report to the Senate. I would anticipate another full debate on the committee report. As well, there would be a debate in the other place. But in the Senate debate honourable senators would be free to discuss the recommendations of the committee and to discuss, for example, any further ideas they might have with respect to the sections in the draft bill proposed for Westminster.

Senator Denis: Can they amend sections?

Senator Perrault: Their views with respect to amendment could certainly be set forth in this house. The Senate could determine then what kind of action, if any, it would wish to take. But no restriction is proposed on the right of honourable senators to debate. Those who have suggested that there will be a muzzling of debate in Parliament are wrong.

Let me suggest to honourable senators that they participate in the forthcoming debate. I invite them to do that. In reality, in this Question Period we are getting into debate stage on the motion. Procedurally, we have not come to the motion yet, but it seems to me that already we are debating it. However, I am not against having this matter discussed in Question Period.

Back to what I was saying, a majority of senators may decide that a certain section of the draft bill does not meet their criteria and may decide to send it back to the joint committee. The most effective way of achieving this is under discussion. These are the facts. They are "on the table." So may I suggest that honourable senators participate in the debate.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I don't really think that I have had a response to my question. We were told first of all that we had the opportunity to discuss the resolution before it was really a resolution. It was an inquiry. I did not participate. I advised the Whip that I would like to do so but that I was waiting for certain information from the Government of Saskatchewan, the province that I represent. I would like to hear the views of the provincial government, and that information will be forthcoming. But even if I had participated, what impact would it have had? Where do we have an opportunity to make amendments? When the resolution comes back it will be in a committee report. It is not a bill; it is not a law. It will be a committee report that will be dealt with.

I hope that this situation is clarified so that resolutions, amendments, or proposals will be seriously looked at and not just discussed. The leader quite rightly has told us that we will have every opportunity for discussion and that we will not be muzzled. We will have the opportunity to talk. But that does not say that anything will change. Again I am making the point that I feel that it is absolutely imperative that members of this house, if they are to have any regional responsibilities, must have the opportunity, if necessary, to propose amendments when the proposition is finally in front of this house.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must have missed a point. I cannot see how any senator can be under the impression that it is not possible for him, if he is able to persuade enough of his Senate colleagues to do so, to propose changes in the committee report and to suggest amendments in the draft bill which is to be sent to Westminster. Changes and amendments could be sent back to the joint committee for consideration and action. Again I reiterate the fact that senators who are concerned about certain points should participate in the debate. It is for them to make a decision on the motion to refer.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government a specific question on the subject we have been discussing during Question Period. Would he be kind enough to look at Schedule B, by way of an instance, and tell us if it would be possible for senators, during the debate on whether or not we send the resolution to a committee, to move amendments to the contents of Schedule B?

Senator Perrault: The motion under discussion is to refer this package to the joint committee. Is the honourable senator suggesting that we proceed to attempt to amend the draft bill to go to Westminster before we have even called witnesses from various parts of the country to determine whether such a need exists?

Senator Smith: Certainly I am. And I am glad to have it on the table at last. The government does not intend to permit any amendment of the contents of any of the schedules before this document goes to the committee, if it does go. That is the situation that the Leader of the Government has just confirmed and that is a situation to which I object most vigorously.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I appeal to the parliamentary knowledge and wisdom that Senator Smith has acquired over his years in public life. Surely he understands that there is a motion that has been passed in the other place. The conditions and details of that motion are well known to him. We have received a message from the other place and we are now about to debate the motion to refer this matter of the constitutional package to a joint committee.

• (1500)

But it is not accurate for the honourable senator to say now that he understands there will be no changes in the Address to the Queen, that the government's views will be applied without any possibility of amendment. The honourable senator cannot be serious in making an allegation of that kind.

Senator Smith: I don't know whether the honourable gentleman does not know what he said himself, but I just asked him a few minutes ago if it would be possible for this house, before the document before us is referred to the committee, to move amendments to the contents of Schedule B to the resolution, and he said, "No." That is what he said.

Now he appeals to my great wisdom, which I do not claim; but, if I have any, it indicates to me that the minute a body like this lets a thing go to a committee with objectionable matters in it, it will not be easy to get them out. The time for deciding what this house wants to go to a committee is before it goes there, not after it comes back.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we are going to debate, surely, whether or not this constitutional package, so-called, is to be referred to a joint committee. The honourable senator may be able to persuade a majority of senators here that it ought not to be referred to that committee. That could well happen; but, surely, Senator Smith, with his distinguished record of service, is not seriously suggesting that we go well beyond the bounds of the motion and get into amending a certain feature of this package before we even have it in committee.

Senator Smith: Certainly I do, and I am glad the honourable gentleman refers again to my distinguished record of service. I say again, however, that I am not claiming any such distinction; but since the leader ascribes it to me I must repeat that it tells me this is a highly improper way to deal with the subject; a highly improper way to ask this Senate to deal with it.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I would express the opinion that we are dealing with a matter of some substance in this question that has been raised by Senator McIlraith, and say that I share some of his concerns as to where the present course of the debate is leading us. I require some assurance from the leader of the house that we will be able to deal with this matter in a way that is consonant with our parliamentary traditions.

The proposition that the report of the committee might come back to this chamber for concurrence, and that, if it received concurrence, that would be the end of the matter and it would not require a further presentation of the actual legislation itself before this house is, it seems to me, a matter of some consequence. I am bold to make the point, because the material the government has delivered to every householder in Canada, if my information is correct, states that, after the committee has reported, the motion of concurrence will be considered an adequate foundation to send the matter to the United Kingdom Parliament for action there.

Well, I think we need some clarification from the government on whether this is, indeed, its policy. I want my honourable friend to take a look at that householder mailer that has been sent out, to see if what I have said about it is correct. If it is correct, I want him to tell us if that is, indeed, just some public relations hack's idea of how the Government of Canada can be run—although it seems to me that PR hacks have a good deal to say about how the government of the country is run these days—or whether that is, indeed, the considered policy of this administration.

I want to make my point doubly clear by saying that we are now dealing with a matter of paramount importance, a matter of real substance—the Constitution of the country. How is Parliament to address the matter? Are we to address it in the way we do with ordinary tuppenny-ha'penny bills? No. We are going to short-circuit the whole operation of Parliament, it seems to me, by this method of going ahead. I do not go so far as to say it is done deliberately, but I am sure there are some who might make that allegation.

When we have an ordinary, tuppenny-ha'penny bill we have second reading, and a debate on its principle. The bill then goes to a committee outside the chamber where other people can be asked to express their views, and a further discussion can be held among those who are fortunate enough to be members of the committee. But it is possible—in the House of Commons almost always; in this house on occasion—to have that legislation come back from committee for consideration by a Committee of the Whole.

The reason for that is quite clear. While we make speeches on the grand principle, and outline any particular points we have in mind ad nauseam—and we are being invited to do so by the leader of the house and I think he is right to so invite us—in the Committee of the Whole we deal with each particular item so that we can express the sense of the Senate not just on the whole principle, which is vital and important, but also on the matters of substance in the bill which equally have their place and their influence.

I think that is what my friend, the honourable senator from Saskatoon, is thinking about when he asks whether or not we members of the Senate will be able to express our opinions, because it is all very well to talk—and no doubt there will be a lot of that done—but it is just as satisfying, and I think just as important, to record the sense of this house, not merely on the grand principle—we are all in favour of patriation, for example—but on the details of the amendments to the Constitution which, in a rather peculiar manner, are being passed forward to the Government of the United Kingdom for their approval without any detailed consideration being given to the actual points with all their substance, force and weight in the Constitution of this country.

I think that is not right. I think that we, who are members of the Senate, should not only have an opportunity to discuss the principles that are before us, but also an assurance from the gentlemen opposite, who are organizing our affairs, that we will have an opportunity to test the feelings and sense and vote of the Senate, not only on the grand principles but on all the other subordinate but important matters that are included in this whole motion that is before us.

So I ask the leader of the house to give us that assurance. Obviously, he is not prepared to give it at this moment, because he tells us we have to wait and see what the committee has to say. I have a strange suspicion that the committee may report in a manner that he finds congenial; but I, for one, would like an assurance at this particular moment that we can have this right asked for by my honourable friend Senator Buckwold, and alluded to by Senator McIlraith, which seems to me to be central to the discussion we are having here.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the speeches which have been made clearly transcend the bounds of normal Question Period procedure. We have not entered any objections to that, and I do not do so now. But the honourable senator, in the fine fury which he has demonstrated, indicates the desirability of getting into the debate on the motion just as quickly as possible.

We have listened with great attention to the arguments that he set forward; but I appeal to the rationality of honourable senators. A government interested in short-circuiting democratic procedures, may I suggest, would have—

An Hon. Senator: —done exactly this!

Senator Perrault: No, honourable senators. We listened with great attention to what has been said. There seems to be an attempt by the official opposition here to try to portray the government as less than democratic.

Senator Smith: It certainly is less than democratic.

Senator Perrault: If we were undemocratic, we would have introduced a different procedure. We would have put down a resolution in the House of Commons, and in this place, calling for a majority support for the Joint Address to Her Gracious Majesty the Queen. We would not have proposed referring that Joint Address to any committee. We would not have suggested that various interests be invited to come before the committee, as the committee decides, to testify and to contribute their views. We would not have suggested that at some point in time this joint committee report be brought back for debate in the Senate and in the other place. We would not have done any of those things, had we been willing to misuse, or desirous of misusing, any kind of majority which we have in this chamber or in the other place.

Senator Flynn: That is exactly what you are doing.

Senator Perrault: These are the facts: The government has proceeded in the most democratic way possible, under the given circumstances.

Senator Flynn: Those are not the facts.

Senator Asselin: Closure!

Senator Perrault: The facts I have set forth are beyond dispute. I must admit now that I, myself, am going beyond the norms of the Question Period by making these remarks. May I suggest we get on with the debate on the motion as quickly as possible?

Senator Denis: May I put another case to you? Suppose that by December 9th some organization or a dozen people wish to make representations, but because there is no more time they cannot be heard. What will happen with respect to the suggestions or amendments they wish to make?

• (1510)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is conceivable that the committee may say, "Because of the vast public interest in the work of the committee, we recommend to both the Senate and the Commons that we be given an additional period of time in which to hear other witnesses from across the country." I wonder if we really underestimate the capacity or the willingness of a joint committee to do some creative thinking with respect to the problem placed before it.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. In my view, it is not a matter of debating the question, but rather of having further information to follow up Senator Buckwold's question. With regard to our speaking in the Senate, I am sure that we are all aware that we can do so on the resolution that will be before us. Will all senators and members of Parliament be given an opportunity to make representation before the committee on each clause, or will we be given just one opportunity to make a statement? Will all members of Parliament and senators be given an opportunity to be heard by the committee?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, first, members of Parliament are of two types: they serve either in the Commons or in the Senate. Therefore senators are members of Parliament. Secondly, I am in no position to bind that committee, its joint chairmen or its membership. If we now presume to send directives to the committee ordering whom it may or may not hear, we would be accused of totalitarianism by this ever-vigilant opposition.

If any honourable senator feels a great compulsion to set forth his or her views before that committee, may I suggest that he or she apply to the joint chairman of the committee and let the committee decide whom it will hear.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I may be rather slow on this point, but I am still not clear as to when, on the floor of the Senate, an amendment can be moved to the resolution. I would ask the government leader to clarify as to when an amendment can be moved to this package on the floor of Senate.

Senator Perrault: Again, without attempting to anticipate the work of the committee, probably some time after December 9.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. Did not the letter from the Prime Minister to Mr. Broadbent constitute, on the part of the Prime Minister, a commitment to amend the motion?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the correspondence has been incorporated in the record of the proceedings of this chamber, and the Prime Minister, in his communication to Mr. Broadbent, suggested that if some member of that party wished to propose in committee certain changes to the Joint Address to her Majesty the Queen, then those proposed changes would be regarded sympathetically by the government. There was, then, a suggestion in that letter that the government would be prepared to modify certain aspects of that joint address.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is very simple and is addressed to the government leader, or his deputy, his legal or constitutional advisor in the matter.

Senator Frith: Counsel.

Senator Asselin: All right, counsel.

When the committee report is before the House of Commons and is referred to the Senate, if, as requested by Senator Roblin, we cannot sit in Committee of the Whole to discuss amendments, will the Senate be able to refer the resolution or this report to one of its committees so that it can propose and pass amendments and then report on the matter to the Senate for a full vote?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, of course, that is possible, and a number of other "scenarios" may emerge. Some senators may anticipate the possibility of a report coming from the joint committee, with which in some respects they disagree. If such a situation should arise, they would have a full opportunity for debate. Senators would be in a position to vote whether certain changes should be made in the Address to Her Majesty recommended by the joint committee, and they would have the right to send the report back to the joint committee. A method will be found whereby that may be done.

I note that Senator McIlraith has another observation, a suggestion that such a procedure may not be possible. I assure honourable senators that the government is committed to finding a way of doing this—

Senator Smith: You should read this one.

Senator Perrault: —and every effort will be made to observe the highest parliamentary standards in the process.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Also, could the government leader find out, before the end of this debate, and tell us clearly what will the powers of the Senate be once it has the report. Will the senators sitting on the committee be able to propose amendments, suggested by other senators, to certain sections of the proposed resolution and if the joint committee rejects honourable senators' suggestions,—and I ask the government leader to give us a definite answer to this before the end of the debate—will the amendments proposed by the senators to the joint committee be introduced before the Senate or a Senate committee so that we can dispose of them here?

[Senator Riley.]

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a moment ago I committed myself to bringing a statement before the house which will deal with some of the concerns that have been raised during the past half hour or so. I repeat my willingness to bring forward a statement on behalf of the government with respect to those points.

I again reiterate something that is obvious to all senators: There is a lack of precedents for the parliamentary process in which we are engaged. This is the first time in the history of Canada that we have been engaged in an endeavour precisely of this kind—

Senator Smith: No, it isn't.

Senator Perrault: —of submitting a Joint Address to Her Majesty, in which there are constitutional amendments contained in a bill which it is proposed should be dealt with by the Parliament at Westminster. The process most certainly differs from our usual procedure wherein ordinary bills are considered, debated, and amended, then passed or defeated. There are major differences, and honourable senators are aware of that fact. So I have committed myself to bringing a statement to the chamber. I think that I understand some of the questions of certain senators, and, with leave, I will present a report as soon as possible.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I should like to direct two questions to the Leader of the Government. First, I want to be clear in my mind that the Leader of the Government is saying that he will bring in a statement that answers the questions raised by the honourable senator from Saskatoon and others. It is important that we should have that early in the debate, because it will have a bearing on how we approach the question that is raised. Can the Leader of the Government tell us when he will bring in that statement?

Secondly, we were presented with a message from the other place. We do not have a copy of that, and I am not certain whether it is customary to make copies available. I presume that we shall be dealing with the matter immediately following Question Period, if it ever ends. Would the Leader of the Government, for the benefit of all honourable senators, explain how that will be done? Will leave be asked to present a motion? If that is the procedure to be followed and I presume it is, could steps be taken to provide us as soon as possible with a copy of the motion, and of the message from the other place, so that we can see what we are debating and can look into some of the details?

Senator Perrault: First, we shall take action to make available copies of the motion which may be under debate this afternoon. Secondly, my statement to the Senate will be prepared just as quickly as possible.

● (1520)

I must say that there have been very preliminary discussions concerning the way in which the joint committee might operate. For example, there appear to be a number of ways in which the joint committee could frame its report for the Senate and the House of Commons. The method could affect greatly the debating process here. I understand that there would be a range of options open to the proposed joint committee.

I will do what I can to have that further report prepared, and when it is available, perhaps tomorrow, I will ask leave to present it.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, when the Leader of the Government makes that statement, I would like him to bear in mind that my problem is that it is one thing to move an amendment in a committee, which may be favourably inclined to accept government policy, and another matter entirely to move an amendment in the Senate.

My question is: If we pass this resolution and refer it to the committee, is it then out of our hands to move an amendment in the Senate subsequently?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the answer to the question asked by Senator Cook will form part of the statement I shall bring to the Senate.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, in the last few minutes it seems to me that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has been more or less restrained judging by the verbosity he displayed at the beginning of this afternoon, particularly with reference to what Senator Smith and others had to say. Now he is prepared to give a statement.

A few moments ago, however, before Senator Steuart asked him a question, he condemned himself out of his own mouth. He said that this was something new, something entirely different. I am paraphrasing, of course.

Senator McElman: Question!

Senator Muir: Relax, Senator McElman. Remember your blood pressure.

Senator McElman: Question!

Senator Muir: I have all the time in the world.

Senator McElman: Good. So have we.

Senator Asselin: There will be no closure.

Senator Muir: May I continue, honourable senators? I can relax, of course, take it easy—

Senator McElman: When you have finished the homily, let us have the question.

Senator Muir: Well now, between you and wee Davey—why don't you relax, and I'll relax.

Honourable senators, I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether, in view of the fact that he acknowledges that this is something new, something entirely different from what has previously transpired, he is willing to bring in a statement encompassing all the questions that have been posed, not only by this terrible opposition but also by the loving and congenial senators on the other side?

While the honourable leader is at it, would he also incorporate in that statement an explanation of something referred to by Senator Roblin—I think it was something mailed to householders—and tell us whether this contains government policy, enunciated for the public of Canada, to be delivered through the Post Office, and perhaps by letter carriers. Again I am paraphrasing, but I think it says that when the committee reports, that report will be deemed to be a Joint Address to Westminster. Correct me if I am wrong, but if that is what it says, I would think that that is rather unusual. It would, as it were, make any further discussion with regard to amendments or anything else null and void.

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, first of all, much has been said about an alleged pamphlet circulating through the mails of Canada. I have not seen it yet. I wonder if the honourable senators opposite would pass their copies across the aisle to the government side.

Senator Roblin: I would be glad to.

Senator Perrault: I would like to have a look at it.

Secondly, if a majority of members of the Senate, and a majority of members of the House of Commons decide that this shall be the content of the Joint Address, then that shall be the content of the Joint Address.

As far as the earlier question about further questions is concerned, which the honourable senator believes requires an answer, in the course of the debate I presume there will be a number of other questions not yet voiced this afternoon, and I would certainly like to provide the assurance to honourable senators that as many answers as possible will be provided to those questions. If information is not available, and cannot be made available, in acceptable form, hopefully the Leader of the Government can admit that at an appropriate time.

However, it seems to me, honourable senators, that if possible, the best manner in which an Address can be sent to Her Majesty is one which suggests that it has received careful consideration by Canadians of all political parties, and that it represents a substantial consensus of Canadian opinion. I think Her Majesty would like to see that, and I think our Commonwealth colleagues at Westminster would like to see that too. Surely, the whole exercise should be imbued with a spirit of flexibility and co-operation rather than of recrimination and rancour.

Senator Smith: In other words, lie down and be kicked.

Senator Muir: I thank the Honourable Leader of the Government for his answer.

Now may I ask him this? When he has an opportunity to read the pamphlet which was referred to by Senator Roblin as being written by the hacks among the PR people, or someone like that, of the government, would he inquire who the flakes were who put out this flak. You see, if what this pamphlet says is the government's stand, then no further amendments can be made, and there can be no further discussion. It will be deemed to be a Joint Address of both houses.

When the government leader started on this subject he was complaining about questions being asked. I am sure he is now in a more co-operative mood. We are asking questions because this is something new, and, therefore, we have to be educated further by the house leader.

Senator Perrault: I am not certain yet whether the pamphlet issued in support of our constitutional proposals was published by the federal government or by the Province of Ontario and Premier William Davis. I have yet to see a copy of it, and thus be able to ascertain who was responsible for the alleged publication. I must, therefore, withhold comment on that.

THE CONSTITUTION

STATUS OF REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Goldenberg I have a question for Senator Lamontagne, the chairman of the subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Could the committee issue its report as soon as possible, because there are certainly some parts of it that are very relevant to the debate we are beginning now? I was wondering if Senator Lamontagne would think it irregular if I were to refer in general terms to some of the conclusions of this report, which, as I say, are relevant to the resolution before the Senate.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: I am sure it is not according to our rules for me to answer that at this stage because, as Senator Flynn suggested, I was just the chairman of a subcommittee, which has already reported. Therefore, the subcommittee is not in existence any more.

Senator Asselin: You are the sponsor.

Senator Lamontagne: I am sure Senator Flynn is aware of the fact that Senator Goldenberg could not be here today. However, I believe, he intends to have a meeting of the full committee when the Senate adjourns tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Tomorrow afternoon?

Senator Lamontagne: That is what he told me last week.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: A supplementary question for Senator Lamontagne. Will the report to be tabled in the Senate also be put before the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons? Does Senator Lamontagne intend to appear before the Senate committee to defend it or would he rather become co-chairman of the committee?

Senator Lamontagne: I think this is all hypothetical.

[English]

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

CONFISCATION OF THE LADY ANNE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have a question to address to the Leader of the Government in the Senate which, I suspect, he will require to take as notice in order to answer it, since I cannot give him any more particulars than I am about to give him now.

[Senator Muir.]

Is it correct that a ship of some kind named the Lady Anne was confiscated by some federal authorities for some infraction of our customs law, or similar laws, and was then sold at auction after such confiscation, according to the provisions of the law?

• (1530)

Was it sold at auction? If so, to whom was it sold? Was it delivered to the person who made the highest bid, whatever that bid was, for the amount bid? Was any effort made to obtain from the purchaser a higher amount than the amount bid after the auction had been completed? Could the honourable minister provide any other relevant factors which may relate to this particular matter? I believe this incident occurred in Nova Scotia sometime this month.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice because of its detailed nature.

ENERGY

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY—OIL RESERVES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to a question asked by Senator Roblin during Question Period on October 23 concerning a study being carried out by the International Energy Agency of the international oil supply situation.

I should like to quote from my earlier answer to this inquiry from Senator Roblin when I informed him that the IEA study is not being carried out as a result of the disruption in supplies caused by the Iran-Iraq conflict. In my reply on October 21 I said:

> —the IEA is not carrying out a special study of the supply situation as a result of the Iran-Iraq conflict. A test of the IEA oil sharing system was initiated on October 1, and of course Canada is participating fully in this study. This test had been planned for many months prior to the outbreak of the Iran-Iraq conflict and the fact that it is proceeding now is entirely coincidental.

I should like to repeat my earlier assurances that the IEA does not envisage a serious international supply shortage that would require invoking the sharing provisions of the international agreement. This is largely due to the fact that inventories at the international level are in an extremely favourable position, and that some producing nations have agreed to increase production to offset the disruption of supplies from Iran and Iraq.

As I offered to do in my earlier response, I would be pleased to provide information from the International Energy Agency study to senators when that study has been completed.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN LEADER OF THE NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY AND THE PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin on October 23 concerning the inclusion of hydro-electric resources in the exchange of letters between the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I am pleased to announce that the Prime Minister fully intended that hydro-electric power be covered in the exchange of letters between himself and Mr. Broadbent.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IRAN—DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a note from the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the subject of the American hostages in Iran. Canada will normalize its relations with Iran once the hostages are released. This would entail repeal of the Iran Economic Sanctions Act and action to lift the export embargo and other measures now in effect against Iran.

Lifting measures imposed since the hostage-taking will not, however, mean that Canada would be ready to send arms or defence support equipment to Iran. Our present policy on arms sales would exclude Iran, as a country involved in continuing hostilities, from receiving such equipment.

Reopening the Canadian embassy in Tehran will not automatically follow the hostages' release. The decision on how and when to reopen the embassy will depend on circumstances at the time and other priorities.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(d):

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to her Majesty the Queen;

That ten Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;

That the Committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during the sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the Committee be twelve members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

He said: Honourable senators, since the motion before the chamber has been rather well discussed during Question Period, I do not intend to speak for a great length of time.

I think all honourable senators welcome the fact that this very important and historical motion has arrived in the form of a message from the other place. I know that many honourable senators will wish to contribute to the debate. I know many of them still have a number of thoughts left after Question Period, queries regarding the Joint Address, and will make certain that we have a good debate in the Senate.

As honourable senators are aware, the motion includes a proposed deadline of December 9 for the joint committee to report back to the Senate and to the House of Commons. The longer the period of time available for public dialogue, the longer the period of time available for that committee to study the submissions which are going to undoubtedly come from many parts of the country, and the longer the period of time for witnesses to be heard, the better it will be for Canada. I am sure that many honourable senators feel the same way.

The concept of a joint committee is a positive government initiative to ensure the broadest possible discussion of this historic proposed Joint Address to Her Majesty. I mentioned a few moments ago that a government with a lack of concern about the need for full parliamentary debate of these proposals would have placed a resolution before the House of Commons, a resolution before the Senate, and sought the support of both houses where it has a majority and, in short order, sent the Joint Address to Westminster. This has not been the case.

The government believes that the joint committee is a better, more democratic, way, and the committee should be established as soon as possible. It is proposed that there shall be 15 members of that committee from the other place and 10 members from the Senate. Based on parliamentary precedents, this appears to be a reasonable proposal. A number of honourable senators have asked, "Who shall appear before the committee?" This will be for the committee to decide. It will establish its own procedures; and it will establish its own method of calling witnesses. Perhaps some witnesses could be assisted financially to enable them to testify.

I speak as a senator from one of the extremities of Canada, and I think that if this committee comes into being, it should seriously consider providing travel funds within practical limits for certain various groups to come to Ottawa to testify. I am sure that a majority of that committee might be sympathetic to that viewpoint. It would not be possible for the committee to travel throughout Canada because of the time frame. Again, I offer the personal opinion that it would be unfair to some parts of this country to have the committee sit in Toronto, Montreal, or the Atlantic provinces to the exclusion of the west, or vice versa. Time would not permit the committee to travel throughout Canada.

In any case, the subject of the Constitution, the patriation of the Constitution, and the amendment of the Constitution have been subjects of extensive discussions in many parts of the country over many years. Honourable senators are aware that an effort has been made over a period of 57 years to find a way to patriate the Constitution and, for one reason or another, it has not been possible to agree on a method of patriation, the desirability of patriation, or an amending formula. The frustrating difficulty in achieving an agreement on how this might be done is one of the reasons for the resolve of this government to patriate the Constitution now, and to introduce, at this time, proposals for certain constitutional amendments which meet some of the basic human rights needs of all Canadians.

Who shall appear before that committee? In my view, the committee should hear from as many "umbrella" groups representing as many Canadians as possible. I suggest that the representatives of the provinces might be allotted time before that committee. Premier Hatfield has suggested that he may wish to appear before the joint Senate-Commons committee. It seems to me that that would be a good thing. If this motion passes, perhaps the committee should accommodate the desires of Premier Hatfield and any other premier who wishes to appear before that committee.

● (1540)

Again, offering a personal opinion, I think it would be for the committee to decide that perhaps it should hear from the Canadian Human Rights Commission or perhaps church organizations. Certainly it should hear from the native Indian people. Some of the native Indian groups have expressed concern about the process of patriation and some of the proposed amendments that relate to their rights and historic privileges. Certainly they should be heard by that committee. They should have their concerns discussed. Canadians of all parties would want to give assurances to Canadians of native Indian descent that their rights are going to be protected. I would welcome that kind of testimony and those representations from "umbrella" native organizations.

[Senator Perrault.]

Labour and business organizations are important and should be heard, and perhaps also credit unions and co-operatives. Honourable senators may wish to suggest groups that should be heard by that committee. I know honourable senators will feel free to contact the joint chairmen of that committee, when they are selected. There will, undoubtedly, be joint chairmen—one from the Senate and one from the Commons. The desire of the government is to have a joint chairmanship of that committee representing both the Senate and the other place so that one of our members will have a key role to play in ordering the business of that committee. Indeed, I have had discussions with my colleagues in cabinet and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, and they have concurred with the concept of co-chairmanship.

Senator Asselin: It has been the case in the past.

Senator Perrault: Yes, it has been the case in the past, honourable senator, in certain committees and it has been a good practice. Joint committees have had joint chairmanships. I want to give that reassurance to the Senate that the proposed committee will not be solely a Commons creation designed to foist a set of opinions on honourable senators.

I spoke earlier about the three-stage procedure. Honourable senators will recall that a number of days ago I initiated an inquiry in the Senate to provide an opportunity for honourable senators to participate in the debate on this Address to Her Majesty coincidentally with the debate in the other place. Most honourable senators chose not to participate in the debate, but that opportunity was presented and some senators took advantage of that opportunity to speak. Instead of arbitrary action by the government to use its majorities in the Senate and the other place to force through its constitutional proposals, we have opted for a very democratic and parliamentary option. A joint committee is to be formed. It will be provided with the resources and opportunities for detailed study. Representatives of both houses will be present and will have an opportunity to contribute their views and to hear representations. I have mentioned some of the organizations which I believe could be invited to provide testimony.

I reiterate that it is not known yet what procedures will be adopted by that committee and what form a report by the joint committee could take. The form of the report may well allay any concerns which are apparently held by certain senators. Certainly, there could be a recommendation from the committee that certain procedures be adopted by the Senate and the Commons whereby both houses have a clause-by-clause study of the bill. Various recommendations are possible from committees, and honourable senators are aware of that fact. I know that as far as the Senate representatives on the committee are concerned, none of them would go as pre-committed people; they would not serve as muzzled representatives of the Senate. It is fair to speculate that of the ten senators serving on the joint committee, three would represent the official opposition. I think that's the usual number—and I know that they will be outspoken, as will senators from the government side, in the views which they express. Of course, that is always the case. Government members have demonstrated their capacity to speak out in the past.

Senator Flynn: We will see.

Senator Perrault: But it would be presumptuous of any of us to suggest that the committee is going to report in a pre-ordained way that somehow fits the government's legislative time schedule.

What I want to convey to honourable senators is that the government is flexible; the resolution is flexible. The Right Honourable the Prime Minister has already suggested that he would welcome clarifications and amendments in the sections relating to natural resources. Certain members from the opposition and the government have suggested that the referendum sections may require greater exactitude of language. More than one government spokesman, including the Honourable Jean Chrétien, has said, "Let us look at this. Perhaps there is a better way to work these sections."

Senator Asselin: What about Pepin?

Senator Perrault: The committee will be the master of its own procedure. It is going to be able to select its own witnesses and establish its own method of operation. I want to put that on the record. The committee will then report back to both houses and there will then be an opportunity for further debate and full consideration of views of members of both houses. With respect to the concern of honourable senators that the committee will be dead after it submits its report—again I want to put this on the record—the government is committed to finding a procedure that will allow further amendment. In other words, the committee could be revived if there was a need.

As with bills, the proposed resolution in its final form would have to pass both houses of Parliament, both the Senate and the Commons, and there will be no Address to Her Majesty unless both houses agree.

Honourable senators, I have spoken enough on this motion this afternoon. In effect, I made one speech earlier during Question Period, but at this time I wanted to reiterate certain basic facts, to place certain commitments on the record. I now would welcome further discussion. I want to remind honourable senators that during the inquiry debate I dealt with the substance of the bill. May I refer honourable senators to this earlier speech should they wish to know some of my comments regarding the proposed constitutional amendments.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, having sat either in the Commons or in the Senate since 1958—here in the Senate since 1962, 18 years ago shortly—I cannot remember a more important debate than the one we are starting today. It is important, of course, because it concerns the Canadian Constitution. But it is important as well because of the context, of the particular circumstances surrounding this debate, of the events that have occurred since the initiative taken last spring by the Prime Minister when he announced a further round of constitutional discussions. Since we learned that the government intended to submit to Westminster an Address in the terms of the document referred to in the motion now before us, I must tell you that, having considered all the factors involved in this debate, I am anguished. I am puzzled; at times, I even feel dizzy.

I could not help remember that last spring, after the February 18 election, in order to forget the election campaign, or perhaps my brief stay in cabinet, in the justice department, I went to Italy. While sightseeing in the beautiful city of Florence, which is a sight for sore eyes, I went to Santa-Croce Church. In that church I was admiring the monuments erected in honour of great men: Michelangelo, of course, Raphael, Dante, Rosselli, Galileo; almost all spheres of activity were represented there. I finally came to the last monument on the right side near the chancel, the monument to Machiavelli. Suddenly, everything I had been trying to forget in Canada came back to me! I went through the electoral campaign all over again, a Mr. Trudeau coming to life anew, a phoenix rising from his ashes and deciding to launch that electoral campaign on the theme that easterners would pay less for their petroleum than the price suggested in the Crosbie budget. Of course, with a platform like that, the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau could not possibly miss. He was telling people in the east that he would continue to give them subsidies at the expense of westerners. He had the result that could be expected, but at the same time he divided the country.

In any event, I would point out that during the campaign there was no question of revamping the Constitution. It was not unlike the events of 1974 when the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau fought with utmost energy the proposal made by Mr. Stanfield to freeze prices and wages for two years. Then, and without any excuse, he told Canadians that he would indeed freeze prices and wages.

Still let us get back to the Constitution. I could not have foreseen what was to happen. That was even worse than everything I knew about the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau's file. Indeed, he once wrote about Confederation that no one should ever act unilaterally. It was a contract. A consensus was needed. He wrote that. But, as I was saying a moment ago, never throughout the electoral campaign did anyone say that he would go ahead with the constitutional proposal as we know it now.

Be that as it may, I came back to Canada in May and was immediately involved in the referendum campaign right next to Mr. Ryan, Mr. LeMoignan and even the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau himself. I can still recall that meeting in Quebec City's convention centre where all speakers, except the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau, clearly and brutally explained to Quebecers that a no in the referendum would mean renewed federalism, but in the sense expected by Quebecers. Mr. Trudeau was very, very careful on that occasion. I even tried to make him talk, but no sir. People swallowed it. They said that it must be all right since it was coming from him. People in Quebec are quite used to swallowing everything from the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau.

In any case, on the night of the referendum when Quebec residents were told that 60 per cent of them had denied Mr. Lévesque the mandate to negotiate sovereignty-association, Mr. Ryan explained:

> The people of Quebec denied their government the mandate to negotiate sovereignty-association. So the people of Quebec have chosen my option (Mr. Ryan) the option of the Liberal Party. I hope that you will have the decency to let Quebecers decide what they want to negotiate with Ottawa.

At that time it was assumed that the Right Honourable P. E. Trudeau would have said: "We shall now see with whom Quebec chooses to negotiate renewed federalism", but he did not. Instead the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau immediately released his program, thus compelling Mr. Lévesque to negotiate with him and excluding Quebecers who were not separatists. It was all planned. I contend that it was done on purpose because in so doing the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau wanted his opponents to be identified with Mr. Lévesque's cause. That was his idea, and that is why we now have to negotiate, in Quebec, with a government whose main option is secession, instead of negotiating with a new government which would have been elected after the referendum and therefore would have been a supporter of renewed federalism. I emphasize that opening the constitutional talks immediately after the May 20 referendum, prior to the Quebec elections, was a purposeful manoeuvre, and that the Right Honourable P. E. Trudeau's intention was to create a situation whereby those who opposed his plan could readily be assimilated with Mr. Lévesque's option and the separatists.

At any rate, the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau has released an agenda which has been regarded as most unrealistic. Less than a month after the referendum he called an organizational meeting of the ministers to set up a schedule for the summer talks while the provincial premiers were supposed, each on his own, to prepare for the oncoming meeting in the month of June. From July 7th to July 25th, the federal and provincial ministers who were responsible for this work held discussions for three weeks. Then, between July 26 and August 24, each government studied the possible conclusions to the discussions which took place. Finally, from August 25 to August 29, the ministers met again. They reconsidered their positions during the following week and we ended up with the famous federal-provincial conference which was held here in Ottawa from September 8 to 12.

● (1600)

There you can see that in a little less than two or two and a half months the whole program was set up and all the questions were put forward. That was the agenda. When the federal-provincial conference was called in September, it was quite easy to see—and that had been rather clear during the summer discussions—that the federal government, the Trudeau government, was now putting the emphasis not on what so far had been the real subject of the discussions between the two levels of government, but mainly on the issues which had always been of concern to Quebec. The objective of this constitutional review was centred on a certain decentralization of powers, on a review of the divided jurisdictions. The other questions, such as the patriation of the Constitution, were quite ancillary. Besides, the amending formula goes with the patriation of the Constitution. If there had been agreement on what Quebec wanted, the rest would have been rather easy. But this was never done, or at least when proposals to that effect were made the federal government rejected them.

What the federal government wanted to emphasize was its own concept, which meant additional economic powers to the central government. The attack, of course, is the best defence. Mr. Trudeau did not want to make any concession. Therefore, he asked the provinces to give him more power to make it possible for him to refuse the granting of any concessions. In that kind of climate, failure, of course, was inevitable. Besides, it had been planned. The secret document that was circulated some time during the conference presented all the options open to the federal government in the event of failure.

There were four options. The first one was to proceed with the patriation by telling the people that Ottawa was confident that there were no legal difficulties in its position or intention. Therefore, the provinces would be shown as obstructing the process. The second option was to proceed with the patriation at the same time in Ottawa as in London, with the promise to refer the matter to the Supreme Court and to delay implementation until the decision of the Supreme Court. But that option was also based on failure. The second option was to immediately refer the matter to the Supreme Court and to keep Parliament waiting. This instance, too, was on the basis of a failure. It was a reasonable option but it was not selected.

Finally, there was the option of the federal government going it alone by the means of a resolution of Parliament with perhaps a waiting period before going to Westminster. But once more the agenda only allowed one possibility and it was to do what has been done. That is to say, as of October 2, since there was no consensus in sight, it would be up to the House to decide. A committee was appointed and would have to bring down its report before December 9, which is totally unrealistic when you think of the long list of people that Senator Perrault would like to have appear before the committee. Were all these people scheduled to appear before the committee, it would have to sit at least until next summer. The Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau wanted the committee to report by December 9, and Parliament to complete the debate and concur in the committee report before Christmas in order that the resolution could be referred to Westminster early in the new year so that this so-called new Constitution could be returned to us by July 1, 1981.

I cannot remember on which date Bill C-60 was to have come into effect. In any case, it seems to me it was to be sometime around that date. Now having missed the boat with Bill C-60, they are coming back at us through the back door.

On October 6, the draft resolution was tabled. The Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau had addressed the nation on the 2nd, and reconvened Parliament one week ahead of time. He had said that it was high time, after 53 years, that the Constitution be repatriated. In the debate which took place in the other place, about one out of five members was given the opportunity to speak on the resolution and then the debate was cut short with the passing of the motion of closure. The government leader refers to this as being a major issue. It is a major issue but then after a few weeks of debate they brought down the closure. There have been, if I am not mistaken, something like 30 hours of debate in the House of Commons on this proposal. I cannot foresee what the situation will be in this house but I hope things will be different. I hope no pressure, direct or indirect, will be exerted here. The problem now facing us is not really the resolution requesting the referral of a document to a committee. The question is: do we agree with the fundamental issues which are involved in the proposed resolution to be forwarded to Westminster.

● (1610)

What are we presented with? What is that constitutional package the government leader mentioned earlier? What is in it?

Of course, the first proposal is to repatriate that portion of the Constitution which the provinces wanted Westminster alone to decide upon. That is what it is because with the 1949 amendment the portion of the Constitution which concerns the federal jurisdiction exclusively has been repatriated.

In 1931, when the Statute of Westminster was passed, Canada was sure to request that any amendment to the Constitution would be within the legislative competence of Westminster alone. Why, you may ask? You just have to read the debates of the time and you will learn from Mr. Bennett that it was because Mr. Ferguson, the Premier of Ontario and Mr. Taschereau, the Premier of Quebec, had specifically requested that Westminster alone had the right to amend the Constitution. It is obvious that at that time, in 1931, the provinces wanted to make Westminster the guardian of our Constitution. In 1949, when the federal portion of the Constitution was repatriated once again and more precisely this time, we wanted Westminster to remain the guardian of the rights of the provinces. And this is what they want to repatriate now. I have no objection to it. The principle is fine. But I will mention to you, federal parliamentarians, that we are dealing with a matter which is primarily a provincial matter.

If a portion of the Constitution is still in London it is because the provinces wanted it that way. It is because the federal government agreed that it should stay there. There was a protection in that system. It will be argued that we should not leave it there. That may be, in principle, if there could be an agreement, of course, on the amending formula and on other things. This will come, but I submit to you that by forcing a unilateral patriation we are imposing upon the provinces a decision which concerns them much more than it concerns us here in the federal Parliament.

I submit to you that these two amendments, the Statute of Westminster and the 1949 amendment, define in much more precise terms the role of Westminster with regard to our Canadian Constitution. When I hear Mr. Jean Chrétien, the Minister of Justice, say that there is not the slightest doubt that the federal resolution is legal, I find this very amusing because there are many experts who do not share his view. Furthermore, what we have learned from the reference of the Senate to the Supreme Court should make him a little more cautious. But what I want to mention is the fact that since 1949, Westminster has never once amended the Constitution without the approval of the provinces. If Westminster can, on a simple joint resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons, do something to which the provinces object, then what was the point in 1931, of making the amendments to the Constitution the sole responsibility of Westminster and in 1949 of doing the same with the amendments to the Constitution which concern the provinces? What would be the use if actually Westminster only had to say yes to Parliament? There would be no protection. It was a useless gesture. It was an empty gesture that was made then, especially when I think of the reference to the Supreme Court last year regarding the Senate. The Supreme Court said: You cannot go ahead without provincial consent. The Supreme Court did not go so far as to require unanimous consent. This is debatable, but the Supreme Court said: You cannot go ahead without provincial consent.

This would simply mean that the government, unable to go ahead unilaterally, could simply go to London to have the Constitution changed into anything at all, and that London would simply have to say yes. Well, if that is true, Mr. Trudeau is crazy to forego such a simple method of amending the Constitution as he pleases. He is crazy. If it is that simple, if he only has to ask London, with Parliament's approval, to amend the Constitution as he now proposes to do, let him propose every provision contained in Bill C-60 and even more; let him take away from the provinces all the jurisdictions that he will not acknowledge as being theirs; let him settle the problem once and for all and create a centralizing state. It is the easy way out. It would be foolish to abandon such a simple formula. It really does not mean anything.

I am saying that Westminster is playing the role of fiduciary for the provinces, that unless it betrays its mandate, Westminster cannot legally amend the Constitution the way it is being proposed now without the consent of the provinces.

I am saying that Westminster, acting as fiduciary for Canada, cannot consider itself beyond the jurisdiction of Canadian courts on that subject because it is indeed a Canadian statute that Westminster would then be enacting.

I entertain no doubt whatsoever that this case will eventually land before the Supreme Court and that in the end the ruling will be the same as the one rendered last year in the case of the Senate.

So why, after the failure or so-called failure of the September conference, did the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau, instead of proceeding unilaterally as he did on October 2, not wait for awhile and convene the provinces saying: We will simply ask that the Constitution be patriated, or that only that part which is of interest to you be patriated, but with an amending formula—even without an amending formula, because that is possible. I am not sure, but he might have had the necessary consensus to go that far because he had shaken them enough and perhaps, backed by public opinion on that aspect, he could have secured their agreement.

Well, anyway, he went for strong tactics. He decided to shake them up, and here we are with this proposed resolution which includes the principle of patriation—which everybody endorses, but not when it is to be done unilaterally—the Victoria amending formula.

Here again the discussion is rather relative; there was near agreement. Quebec had said yes and then said no because there was no use patriating if there was no agreement on the distribution of powers. Obviously that formula has its faults. Since then some people have said that they would rather have the Vancouver formula. That does not seem to me to be a major aspect of the problem—Victoria amending formula or Vancouver amending formula. At a pinch the Constitution could have been patriated, and from then on the amendments would have been made in accordance with the judicial customs and traditions prevailing in such instances. This would have meant that Parliament would have had to obtain the agreement of the provinces—I do not know of how many, possibly all of them. It is said that when the Right Honourable Mr. St. Laurent asked London for an amendment back in 1949, he thought of adding to the content of that amendment: "that all future amendments to the Constitution beyond the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal Parliament will require unanimous consent." However, he conceded that enforcing that rule might prove a risky business. In any event, it still could be done while negotiations are in process.

But there is something more substantial to the amending formula by way of a referendum, and that is section 42 of the proposed resolution. There have been many criticisms about it, as it provides a way to bypass the provincial legislatures.

Senator Asselin: Senator Lamontagne is against it.

Senator Flynn: I do not know. But one thing is sure: Section 42 enables the central government to change a federal state to a unitarian state. There may be temporary conditions which may prove favourable to a proposition which may completely alter the Constitution, either in time of war or in time of apprehended insurrection, for instance, when people get emotional and do not have a clear understanding of what is happening and we would then have to face those changes. Someone could by way of a referendum propose major constitutional changes. The Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau says that he wants to deal with the people. He does not care a damn about the media, the intelligentsia, those who know something about this. He was in Quebec City recently poking fun at them all. It can happen. Obviously, he is anything but a disciple of Jean Lesage who used to say that constitutional debates were not for the uneducated. He, Mr. Trudeau, claims the opposite. He claims that this issue is something for the uneducated, that it should not be dealt with by those in the know. Anyway, that is an amending formula which may be used to foist anything on the provinces.

• (1620)

Then there is the entrenchment of the Charter of Human Rights. As a matter of principle, even if people get very emotional about this, those rights could be entrenched. Opinions do differ on this. For instance, Senator Manning mentioned this problem the other day. He explained that there is a school of thought which raises very serious objections against the entrenchment of rights. I think that during the discussions held in Senate committees that problem was considered, and very serious differences of opinion were raised in that respect. That may be the reason why there will not be any report by committee, for if the latter had been required to file a report stating that the committee was not in favour of the entrenchment of the Charter of Rights, this might not have been well received at that time because the entrenchment of rights is an integral part of the resolution of the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau. I do not know what would have had happened if the members of the committee had raised objections or reservations in that respect. However, it remains that the entrenchment of rights will change some provincial laws and that the result of these changes will perhaps be very good. In some cases it will, but in others I am not too sure.

We are going to change some laws by presenting a request to London such as, for instance, in the case of Quebec's Bill 101. Although I advocate some of the changes that would be brought about, just think about it: Go to Westminster and ask them to change a Quebec piece of legislation which had been passed and considered constitutional. In other words, we would ask Westminster to settle our own problems.

Once again the only satisfactory solution was to wait for the elections to be called in Quebec in order to establish what party would be entrusted with a mandate to negotiate; whether it be a government under the leadership of Mr. Ryan or Mr. LeMoignan, either a Union Nationale government or a Liberal government, which would have agreed to change Bill 101 in such a way as to include a Charter of Rights. Some other provincial laws could also be affected but I think that this is not the way to solve this kind of problem.

Let us deal now with the change in the powers of the Senate. This is another obsession of the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau—the abolition of the Senate. Of course, section 44 is quite clear. In 1972, there were discussions in the joint committee to limit the powers of the Senate by applying a six months' suspensive veto. I think that Bill 60 also mentioned six months, if I remember clearly, but it was with reference to the new House of the Federation. At any rate we are now at 90 days, which makes it possible to abolish the Senate. If a resolution of the House of Commons, with the support of the provinces, comes here, and although there may be a disagreement, or we might find reasons to delay or to turn down the resolution intended to abolish the Senate, this would be of no avail because 90 days later the House of Commons could come back with the same resolution and the result then would be final.

The other day Senator Olson said that the Senate could not resist if all the provinces requested its abolition. I agree, it is obvious. If everybody is for its abolition I will not object because I think that by answering such a popular wish we might indeed readily contribute to the solution of our constitutional problems. If all the provinces agreed, of course.

However, the problem remains that if, for instance, certain provinces decide in such circumstances that it would be proper to postpone a resolution which substantially modifies the Constitution or abolishes the Senate, we should maintain this legislation, in my opinion. I believe that six months is not too long. As I recall, when we discussed this problem at the joint committee which reported in 1972, there was talk of giving to the Senate a suspensive veto of six months for ordinary legislation and an absolute veto such as we have now for amendments to the Constitution.

Obviously, this problem must be solved. What is most important is that we want to amend substantially the powers of the Senate through a resolution addressed to the Parliament in London. The Supreme Court ruled that this could not be done through Bill C-60. The government is now proceeding indirectly by asking a foreign Parliament to decide for us since we cannot do so legally here. It then states that this is the right way to proceed.

Finally, a carrot is dangled before our eyes in the form of equalization. It is nothing else. Equalization works very well. I quite agree with those who want to entrench the principle of equalization, but it is useless. It is simply a carrot. We are being told: We give you equalization. Nothing is given to the provinces; everything is taken away from them. Then, they are told: To make you feel better, we shall give you a piece of candy—equalization.

What I want to underline is that this proposal is very far from the conception that Quebec had and still has of a renewed federalism. Quebec only wants a re-arrangement of jurisdictions. This is the only thing that would satisfy Quebec. To those who say that giving this to Quebec because of the decision of May 20 is doing what Quebec has wanted all along, I say that they are wrong. Much more serious words have been used. It is indeed a betrayal—the word is not too strong—to try to suggest that Quebec will be satisfied with this proposal. This is not true. In fact, the three parties are clearly opposed to this measure. You will have noted that Mr. Ryan after some hesitation is beginning to make himself heard. What he said yesterday is interesting, and I quote:

> The Leader of the Quebec Liberal party might not have resisted a request aimed only at patriation. Mr. Ryan might have supported a patriation attempt by Prime Minister Trudeau if it could have helped him to free himself from this obsession and enhance his pride.

The author probably meant "safeguard his pride." This is what Mr. Ryan meant.

I therefore say that nothing in this resolution meets the aspirations of Quebec as expressed by the referendum. What strikes me as characteristic of this project is that it calls for an unrealistic schedule. What is so urgent? Of course, we know that the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau is unable to control himself when he has something on his mind and that he must rally everyone to his point of view. At least, he must try to do so. Perhaps he wants to retire before 1982 and be able to say: I was the one to patriate the Constitution. I was the one to change the Constitution. I am the father of the new Constitution. This is no reason—

[English]

Senator Olson: To provide leadership is the main reason.

Senator Flynn: One can provide leadership in leading one's people to war. That is a kind of leadership. If that is the kind of record you want to leave behind, that is your responsibility.

[Translation]

That is not an argument. There is leadership and leadership. You can show leadership by being prudent or by being realistic. There is leadership which makes a man forget his own pride and his own arrogance and think of nothing but the general well-being. There is leadership which does not degenerate into conflicts, needless virulence and division within the country. That is real leadership.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear.

Senator Flynn: In fact, the outstanding characteristic of this initiative of the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau is contempt for any opinion contrary to his own. It is the basic characteristic we can find everywhere in the timetable, in the nature of the resolution. Contempt for the opinion of others. Contempt for the provinces which are considered as mere spoiled brats. You do not want it? Well, you will get it anyway! That is contempt.

[English]

Senator Olson: He went out of his way to get the provinces—

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Six provinces are squarely against the resolution. Another one is objecting on principle. There may be two that accept it, but I am not too sure. I would like to ask this question of Mr. Davis and Mr. Hatfield: You agree with the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau, and that is your privilege, but do you agree that he should proceed unilaterally against the opinion of the other provinces? If it were you, Mr. Davis, or if it were you, Mr. Hatfield, who had objections, would you say it is fair that they go ahead unilaterally without any regard whatsoever for your opinion?

I am not sure that Mr. Davis agrees with this unilateral approach, and the same goes for Mr. Hatfield. In any case, I say that it is contempt for almost all the provinces. It is also contempt for the Supreme Court. There was no way to get a favourable decision so they just ignore it and claim, to boot, that the Supreme Court will have nothing to say on a real decision of Westminster to adopt the proposed bill.

There is no doubt, it is contempt—contempt for the Canadian Parliament. They are forcing closure. We will see how it goes here in the Senate. Besides, the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau is well known for his very low opinion of the parliamentary regime. He would feel much more at ease if he were an emperor, and often we have the impression he believes he is an emperor.

Senator Thériault: The people of Quebec, what do they think?

Senator Flynn: The people of Quebec? All you need do is observe all the political parties which are not in favour—oh, you mean about Mr. Trudeau! They have great admiration for him, no doubt about that. As a man he is interesting. He is interesting but extremely dangerous. I think one of the serious mistakes of Quebecers is to accept anything from Mr. Trudeau.

Let me put this question to you, Senator Thériault. If this proposed resolution were presented by Mr. Clark instead of Mr. Trudeau, what would you say to the people of Quebec? You would object. What would happen in Quebec, with three provincial parties squarely against, if it were Mr. Clark trying to have Quebecers swallow that? Of course, it takes Mr. Trudeau to make them swallow grass snakes. There is no doubt about that. He has done it before. That is why I was telling you about Machiavelli earlier—

Senator Thériault: Mr. Clark asked—

Senator Flynn: Certainly, but not with that type of leadership. Certainly not. You may crack jokes, that is your business. Be serious. Mr. Clark trying to make Quebecers accept something which is unanimously rejected by all provincial parties? Just try!

Obviously it is contempt on the part of Mr. Trudeau for the public opinion of western Canada and Quebec. Senator Manning spoke about reactions in the west. I feel that if anyone is qualified to speak about that it has to be Senator Manning. He is deeply worried about the reactions of the west towards the initiatives of Mr. Trudeau. It is a show of contempt toward western public opinion. It is a show of contempt for Quebec public opinion. The three provincial parties are not in favour of this measure. Yet he tells them to go the devil. "I am right despite all they can say." It is a demonstration of contempt for the British Parliament, because he takes for granted that the British Parliament will comply at once, and dutifully.

So in my opinion, especially since 1949, the Parliament of Westminster holds once again a position of trusteeship for the interests of the provinces in cases of constitutional amendment. There is also contempt for the possible consequences. If you have legal decisions stating the illegality of Mr. Trudeau's move, the fact that it was ultra vires and unconstitutional, and if these decisions were to come after the fact, you can see the problem. I say once again that in my opinion when the Parliament of Westminster acts according to section 7 of the statute of 1931, as amended in 1949, it is acting in conformity with Canadian law and it is subject both to Canadian law and Canadian courts.

In any event, the conclusion remains. In the Senate what do we do if we do not agree? I think that a large number do not support Mr. Trudeau's initiative because it is illegal, divisive and because it forces upon the provinces things they do not want.

In this case the role of the Senate becomes essential. Under those circumstances, we have a special responsibility. Once again, I cannot recall any time where the responsibility of the Senate has been so specific.

The government is proceeding unilaterally and, at least in my opinion, and certainly as concerns the spirit of the law, unconstitutionally. Furthermore, I am convinced that this procedure is unconstitutional according to the letter of the law.

The Senate must represent provincial interests. This has already been said. It has also been said that the Senate has never lived up to this role. Bill C-60 tried to replace us under the pretext that we had never really played our role, especially with respect to protecting regional interests and provincial rights.

The reports that have been submitted have repeated that the Senate must assume the responsibility of protecting provincial rights and regional interests. Honourable senators, I say that, under the circumstances, if we are unable to stand up and meet the challenge of the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau or state that we are going to assume our responsibilities in this regard and reject this resolution, we shall have co-ratified it with Mr. Trudeau, because he has already signed our death warrant twice.

• (1640)

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto: Honourable senators, I support with some reservations the action taken by our government to patriate the Canadian Constitution.

Patriation would enable us first of all to become the masters of our own Constitution and to amend it as we may wish. Canada is the only country in the world whose Constitution is in the hands of another country.

A constitution is the foundation of the sovereignty of a nation, the doctrine on which its statutes and political institutions are based. It is only by patriating its Constitution that Canada will reach its full maturity and take its place among the other nations.

Honourable senators, as you can see, I also support the principle of patriating the Constitution, but my involvement with the linguistic problems of Quebec leads me to tell you of the difficulties which can come up if we do not amend section 23.

I believe that sections 22 and 23 aim only at protecting the rights of Canadians of French or English origin. They do nothing for those citizens whose mother tongue is neither English nor French, and yet, hundreds of thousands of Canadian citizens will be forced to accept a legislation which will change their everyday life.

Who are those people? They are people who came here several decades ago and others who were born here and who went to the same schools as the other Canadians, either English or French, but who are excluded from section 23. Why? Very simply because if we ask them what is the first language that they have learned and still understand, they will have to reply either Italian, Greek, Polish, German, and so on.

What I find surprising is that the Right Honourable Prime Minister, with all his humanitarianism, told Quebecers last week in a speech before the Chamber of Commerce that he did not like Act 101 and that he found it unfair. What Mr. Trudeau must find unfair, I believe, is that the Quebec legislation does not allow all Canadians in the other provinces to enjoy the same rights.

I think Bill 101 respected the choice that all Quebecers had already made.

First, that children whose parents went to minority schools could register in the same schools.

Second, before Bill 101 had been adopted, when children were already in minority schools, other members of the family could register in those institutions.

The Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau is not aware of privileges granted to new Canadians living in Quebec under Bill 101 and which are not protected by clause 23.

In my opinion, we should guarantee to all Canadian citizens that their children can go either to French or English schools if their parents went to those schools.

In this way not only could we respect the rights of all Canadians but we would not have two classes of future immigrants.

The press have reported that we will create two classes of our future immigrants, but they did not mention that we will also create two classes of citizens because, indeed, they do not have the same economic and political power. However, some members of the House of Commons—including the Minister of Multiculturalism, Mr. Jim Fleming—have in their ridings as their constituents up to 35 percent of those people. Even though they live in the Toronto area and they have no education or language problems, they are not included under clause 23. Mr. Fleming must have responsibility for all new Canadians, and I hope he is aware that those in Quebec may lose their vested rights.

The only thing that seems to have concerned Mr. Jean Chrétien is that Canadian citizens could move between provinces and that their children could be instructed in the minority language in French or in English. That means that to enjoy that privilege the people concerned would have to move to another province.

Let us take, for example, a Canadian citizen living in Hull whose mother tongue is neither English nor French. To have the same rights according to the second subsection of clause 23, he would have to move and live for one year on this side of the river, that is in Ontario. Then he would go back to Hull and enjoy the same rights as those who moved to the Province of Quebec.

Under the provisions of clause 15, all fundamental rights of Canadian citizens will be protected, without discrimination because of origin, colour, religion, et cetera, and in order to abide by the provisions of clause 15, we will have to amend clause 23.

I hope that all the honourable senators who are sitting here will see that all rights of those Canadians will be guaranteed by clause 23. Here are the options that will essentially take into account the Canadian situation:

> 1. That any Canadian citizen who received his primary or secondary instruction in Canada, in French or in English, has the right to have his children registered in the school where he was instructed in all the Canadian provinces where the number of children of those citizens warrants the provision, out of public funds, of educational facilities in that language.
> 2. That any Canadian citizen, when one of his children is being or has been instructed in English or in French, has the right to have his other children receive their primary or secondary school instruction in that minority language either in French or English, everywhere in Canada, where the number of children of those citizens warrants the provision, out of public funds, of minority language educational facilities.

I should like to conclude by asking you, honourable senators, to ensure that the worldwide image of a Canada which is recognized for its humanitarian sense and the individual respect it gives to all its citizens be maintained.

I ask honourable senators, especially those who will be members of this joint committee, to be aware of the fact that some Canadian citizens are completely excluded from clause 23.

[English]

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, as others have said before me, we are participating in one of the most important debates in the history of this chamber and indeed in the history of our country. We are here with a shared pride in what Canada is and what Canada can become. We are here with a shared concern for the future of Canada in all of its regions. We are here with a shared determination to express our views each according to his or her own wisdom or conscience as to what is the best course for our country to follow with respect to our Constitution.

Against that background let me speak as a Canadian living in Nova Scotia. One hundred and thirteen years ago we went from a colony to a nation. We went from four provinces to 10 provinces and to two territories, and the immense continental shelf. We went from a population of three million to 23 million. At the time of our Constitution, 60 per cent of our population was Anglo-Saxon, people from the British Isles, and now that group represents only 40 per cent. Thirty per cent are those of French expression and 30 per cent are from other extractions and countries, many of whom made enormous contributions to building this nation. I recognize as well the legitimate aspirations of the native people and the place they have in the Canadian mosaic.

In the past five years I had the immense good fortune to travel to almost every corner of this country and to meet and become friends with people who proudly and properly represent the Ukrainians, the Germans, the Italians, the Polish, the Dutch, the Chinese, the native people—people from every race and country in the world, all of whom made an immense contribution to the building of Canada. I live in and love Nova Scotia. British Columbians live in and love British Columbia. Quebecers live in and love Quebec. But Canada is our country. It is a country whose beauty and immense wealth we wish to keep, to preserve intact and to strengthen for ourselves and our children wherever they may live.

Despite our origins or our linguistic differences, we all have one common denominator—we are Canadians. I believe, just as one loves his or her own family, that we can love Nova Scotia, Quebec, British Columbia and Canada passionately, but our provinces and our country are not mutually exclusive.

Ernest Renan, a philosopher who lived about a century ago, said that a nation is a referendum, a plebiscite, every day. He meant that a nation cannot exist unless it wants to exist as a nation and unless it acts as a nation. What we must have, honourable senators, is a collective will to live together.

● (1700)

When we think of the rights that we enjoy as Canadians, we tend to think of our fundamental freedoms and our basic democratic and legal rights. What first comes to mind is freedom of religion, freedom of thought, freedom of expression, of association, our right to vote, our right to liberty, our right to equality before the law and protection against unlawful imprisonment. But, we tend not to think of the economic rights that are so important to the well-being of all Canadians. One of those rights, the right to mobility, has been especially important to people from Atlantic Canada. That is why I am happy to see mobility rights included in this resolution.

For decades, maritimers and Newfoundlanders have been going to other parts of Canada to find work. We are not the only ones who have had to do that, of course. Ontarians moved, Albertans moved and British Columbians moved. One of the glories of Canada is the fact that when we see opportunities in this country we can go after them, wherever they may be.

At one time, those who left the Atlantic provinces went to the Boston states, as we used to call them. More recently they have gone to Ontario or to the west. Why is this so? Because Ontario and the west are in Canada, and a person does not need entry papers to get a job. That is something which I believe we have always taken for granted, and perhaps too much so. Lately we have seen attempts to raise barriers to that kind of movement in places such as Newfoundland, and, sadly, in my home province of Nova Scotia. Yet our provinces in the east are the ones who would suffer most from such barriers if they were put up by some of the wealthier provinces.

The great beauty of the right to mobility is underlined by what happened in the Atlantic provinces in the 1970s. People can migrate out, but they can also migrate in. In the past decade, thousands of people have moved to the Atlantic provinces, sufficient to balance the flow going elsewhere. Many of these people coming east are simply returning home after absences of years or, indeed, decades. But whether they are, to use the Newfoundland expression, if I may, "come from away, or return from away," they bring with them skills, knowledge and attitudes which we need in the Atlantic provinces. Without that movement, I believe we would go stale. We would never get the injection of new ideas which we need to remain vibrant as a society. I am not afraid of outsiders taking jobs from Nova Scotians. I say that probably because I know that we, as Nova Scotians, can learn from them. I say that partly because they are not outsiders at all, honourable senators, but are Canadians, just as we are all Canadians.

As a Nova Scotian, I must also say a few words about equalization. Equalization, to my mind, is an example of what Canada is all about, because it means sharing. It means that Canadians are not automatically disadvantaged solely by their place of birth or residence in terms of the essential public services available to them; it means that they are not forced to pull up their roots and move just so that they can get some schooling or adequate health care.

The principle of sharing has rightly received the widest consensus among the provincial governments. Some people may believe we do not need in the Constitution the provision to make those payments, to keep on sharing, but I believe that such a critical ingredient in the future of our national life is important enough that it should be enshrined in our Constitution. Constitutions, by their very nature, tell us and tell others what kind of people we are. Equalization is one of the things Canada's Constitution should be saying. In a very real sense the Constitution should be saying that we are more than Nova Scotians, we are more than Quebecers, we are more than Ontarians or Albertans. It should be saying that we are Canadians, and that because we are Canadians we help each other when we need help.

For years now Nova Scotians have been receiving help from other Canadians in the form of equalization. It is a matter of record that in the difficult days of the "hungry thirties" Nova Scotians and maritimers generally shared in a very meaningful way with their fellow Canadians in western Canada. In those years the economic cycle moved more in favour of the more easterly regions, a situation which, as you know, has completely reversed itself in the intervening half century. But if there is one thing that we have in abundance in Nova Scotia, it is optimism. We know that someday we will be able to return the favour again. When that day comes, I know that there will be no one in Canada prouder to make a contribution to this country, no one more ready to share his or her benefits, than a Nova Scotian.

In that context, I must say something about resources. All of us in Nova Scotia are watching with keen interest the exploration work that is being conducted off our shores. Some of my fellow Nova Scotians are firmly convinced that offshore resources should be treated in the same manner as onshore resources. However, I do not happen to share that view. The only reason, in my judgment, that we have the clear right to exploit the material resources off our coast is that Canada, not Nova Scotia, went out and acquired that right through negotiation. It did so, not on behalf solely of just the residents of coastal provinces such as Nova Scotia, but it did so on behalf of all Canadians. Even so, the Government of Canada made to the coastal provinces a very reasonable offer at the First Ministers' Conference. It did so because of a serious economic situation in the Atlantic provinces, and because the development of offshore mineral resources will be so important for the people of Atlantic Canada. The federal government proposed that revenues from offshore resources be treated—that is, distributed—in the same manner as are revenues from onshore resources. It suggested that this continue to happen until the coastal provinces became sufficiently affluent to be considered so-called "have" provinces, and when that happened they would begin to share their wealth with other Canadians.

I have been following with a great deal of interest statements made by the Premier of Nova Scotia to the effect that the governments of Canada and Nova Scotia were close to an agreement, and that he is still hopeful that an agreement can be reached. I said earlier that Nova Scotians are optimistic, and I share Premier Buchanan's hope. There is no question that the federal government's offer is a reasonable basis on which to build an accord on the question of offshore resources. I am satisfied that the Government of Canada will be eminently fair in ensuring that the people of my province are given the best possible advantage in the final disposition of this very difficult problem.

The offshore frontier is an area where both levels of government can and should work together. It is an area where each level of government has responsibilities to its people, from which each level of government can draw benefits for its people. It should not be an arena of continuing discord between the two, because there is simply too much at stake for that.

[Translation]

This year we are witnessing a historical event of great significance for my province, Nova Scotia. It was 375 years ago that remarkable men settled in that region; they created Acadia. Their descendants can be found throughout the province in appreciable numbers.

● (1710)

[English]

From Yarmouth in Digby County and Nova Scotia's western tip to Antigonish on the eastern mainland, and Inverness and Richmond Counties on my own Cape Breton Island, in recent years, the young people, as is the habit of young people everywhere, have migrated to the cities. As you walk through downtown Halifax, or shop at its stores or eat in its restaurants, you can frequently hear the voices of those descendants of the French pioneers still speaking French.

It has not been easy for the Acadians. This year, as I have said, we have been celebrating 375 years of French presence in Nova Scotia. But what we have not been celebrating is another anniversary, the 225th anniversary of the expulsion of the Acadians by the British in 1755. But I know that Acadians have been remembering that date well.

Their ancestors' attachment to l'Acadie was so strong that they came back. The story is told in Nova Scotia of 335 Acadian families who are said to have walked from Boston to Digby. I presume they took boats for the last leg of their journey. That was in the summer of 1768, just 13 years after the expulsion.

[Translation]

They survived by chance, but they survived.

They built a country to reflect that dream. It was a long and painstaking undertaking.

Each generation has carried its share of the burden and reaped its share of satisfaction.

[English]

They did so within an educational system that was basically anglophone. Today, through the resolution that we are debating, we have the opportunity to guarantee the rights of the Acadians to educate their children in the French language.

There are French schools in Nova Scotia, to be sure—even a French language university. But now, honourable senators, if this resolution passes, they will have legal recourse should that kind of education ever be jeopardized. I suggest the Acadians have been extraordinarily patient, and I believe that this patience deserves vindication.

Honourable senators, Nova Scotia has been a part of Canada since it began in 1867. Our history within Confederation has been a proud one, but not always a prosperous one. We are as proud to be Canadians as we are to be Nova Scotians. We share, with other Canadians, no matter where they live, the desire to have a Constitution that is ours—ours to write and ours to rewrite, as the necessity arises. Perhaps more than Canadians in some other provinces, Nova Scotians feel strong ties with Great Britain. Yet, we want to put an end to this hangover of colonialism, this embarrassing situation in which our Constitution is a law of a foreign Parliament.

Nova Scotians actually have a longer history of wanting to run their own affairs than perhaps any other Canadians. After all, my province was granted its own representative assembly in 1758, a mere nine years after the first English settlers sailed into Halifax harbour. That first assembly, more than 300 years ago, was the first halting step on the road to full self-government, the first transfer of authority from London to a part of what is now Canada. The resolution we are considering today, hopefully, is the last. The patriation of Canada's Constitution has been a long time coming; but finally we must be able to say: We run our affairs. We run all our affairs.

Surely by now we have the maturity to resolve our own differences here in Canada. The resolution we are considering today, I believe, is a statement of that maturity.

On motion of Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motion:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Tuesday, October 28, 1980, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Before moving the adjournment, I wonder if I might give honourable senators some indication of what is expected for this week.

As honourable senators know, had we sat until 6 o'clock it would have meant that we would have continued the sitting this evening. I mentioned last week that we might wish to sit this evening. However, we have had some discussion about the business for this week and it is hoped that we can complete debate on the constitutional proposal by the end of the week. We would like to work towards that, in any event, and have discussed that objective with the Leader of the Opposition. While we do not intend to sit this evening, we hope that we will be able to sit every afternoon from 2 o'clock to about 6 o'clock, including Friday, if necessary. That will depend on how things stand on Thursday.

That is the plan for the week. Unless there are questions, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 28, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN MERCHANT SERVICE GUILD—FIRST READING

Hon. Charles McElman presented Bill S-12, respecting the Canadian Merchant Service Guild.

Bill read first time.

Senator McElman moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING REPORT OF PROPOSED SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday during Question Period I offered to provide a statement respecting the procedures which have been launched by the government with respect to its constitutional proposals. With leave, I would appreciate the opportunity to present that statement at this time.

● (1405)

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: The government had two choices of procedure in seeking the approval of the Senate and of the House of Commons for a Joint Address, the first of which was to proceed directly with a motion for approval by each chamber of the text of the Joint Address. I mentioned that yesterday. This procedure would have involved using the government majorities in both chambers to achieve the passage of a resolution, without the possibility of the general public participating in the process.

The second procedure was a three-stage one, the first stage of which could be the establishment of a joint committee—and that is where we are at the present time. We have received a message from the other place asking us to participate with them in the formation of a joint committee.

The second stage would be consideration of a proposed resolution by that joint committee. That committee, assuming that the traditional ratio prevailed, would be made up of 15 members from the Commons and 10 members from the Senate. The committee would then proceed to invite certain individuals and groups to testify. I suggested yesterday some of the groups which, in my personal view, should be invited. But that is for the committee to decide once it is established.

The third stage of procedure would be the review and, if considered appropriate, approval of the work of the joint committee by both houses. In other words, the joint committee would report back to the Senate and to the House of Commons and ask for approval of its report.

The last of these three stages would provide a full opportunity for detailed debate of the text of the report of that special joint committee in both houses. Again, we are not in the position of anticipating what the committee might do. We are not sure at this stage what the committee might propose in its report.

The second option was chosen by the government because, first, it provides greater opportunity for public input and, second, it provides a flexible forum for detailed study. The three-stage procedure, though longer, is, in the view of the government, fairer to the people, and fairer, as well, to both houses of Parliament.

I mentioned yesterday that at least one provincial premier has indicated a desire to testify before such a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons should one be established. I also mentioned yesterday that native organizations, women's organizations, and human rights organizations have also indicated a desire to appear. In any event, the government believes that opportunity for public input constitutes a procedure that is fairer to both houses of Parliament and to the people of Canada.

The complex procedures that have caused concern in this chamber arise, I think, from two sources: first, the normal procedure in dealing with a report from a special joint committee; and, second, the fact that the Joint Address can neither be amended nor approved without the concurrence of members of both houses. In the latter respect, the text of the Joint Address is treated no differently from the text of proposed legislation.

• (1410)

These procedures, as complex as they may seem to be to some honourable senators, do not, however, prevent the Senate and the other place from amending the Joint Address. They do not remove in any way the requirement that both chambers explicitly approve a Joint Address before it is sent to Her Majesty. Unless the Senate approves the Joint Address, it cannot be sent to London.

It is felt by the government that this procedure, as involved as it may be, is a small price to pay for the openness and flexibility of committee proceedings. I would remind honourable senators, of course, as is the usual practice, that all parties are going to be represented on that committee, including the official opposition both in the Senate and the other place, and also members of the New Democratic Party. Moreover, the Senate is master of its own procedures, although it must act—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: I am gratified to hear some applause for something I have said in recent days.

Senator Flynn: It is a change.

Senator Perrault: Moreover the Senate is the master of its own procedures, though it must act in a way that allows it to act jointly with the House of Commons on this matter, as in the case of any legislation or joint resolution.

A question has been asked as to whether the Senate can amend the proposed resolution. First, the special joint committee can amend the proposed resolution as it sees fit, subject to the rules applying to all committees. I hear a comment from the Leader of the Opposition who has raised an interesting point, and presumably one of his members may wish to speak to that point in the course of the debate. But let me repeat that the special joint committee can amend the proposed resolution as it sees fit, subject to the rules applying to all committees. Senators will be voting members of that committee. Some senators will say, of course, that we do not have a majority on the committee. Well, it is unrealistic to assume that we should have a majority, and the traditional balance for joint committees of this kind is being suggested for this proposed joint committee.

Secondly, the Senate can act to amend the text that may be reported out of the committee by—and these are the procedures—moving that the special joint committee be revived, and by instructing the special joint committee to consider amending the text in the way the Senate specifies. So when the report of the special joint committee comes back to the Senate, senators will be able to engage in a debate, propose amendments to that report, propose changes in the report, changes in wording, changes in the Address to Her Majesty the Queen, and changes in the draft bill which is an integral part, indeed, the essence of the Address to Her Majesty. These Senate proposals, these amendments, if adopted by the Senate, would be referred back to the special joint committee for consideration. The committee could only be revived in this way and for this purpose, if the other place concurs. Of course, concurrence in any amendment made by the Senate is necessary, where approval of both houses for a measure is required.

• (1415)

The question may be asked: Is the approval of a committee report sufficient authority for asking the Queen to act? The answer depends on the wording of the committee report. If the committee report recommends, and I quote these words:: "That a Joint Address be sent to Her Majesty in the following terms," approval of such a report is felt to be adequate authority to ask Her Majesty the Queen to act. If the words recommend some other course of action, they may not provide sufficient authority, and a fourth stage might become necessary to seek the approval of the Senate and the House for a Joint Address. For example, senators may ask the question: What if the words recommend some other course of action? For example, the committee might recommend that the government present motions to the Commons and to the Senate proposing a detailed study of the measure. Before the address is adopted, that process would be somewhat equivalent to a clause-by-clause study and consideration of the Address. But again it is for the joint committee to decide how its report might be framed.

With respect to questions which may arise in the course of this debate, may I make this offer: If honourable senators have questions relating to certain technical details of this Address to Her Majesty, I will be more than pleased to assist them in understanding better those proposals. I am not suggesting that these questions should necessarily be raised in the Senate, although there is no prohibition against that; but if I or my office can be of help in providing information for honourable senators, we will be as helpful as we can. I realize that some of the procedures in this instance are unfamiliar to most senators and, naturally, technical questions may arise.

I should like to deal now with some of the specific questions I was asked yesterday outside the subject areas I have dealt with to this point. In response to a question by the Honourable Senator George McIlraith, I can assure the Senate that the final resolution will not be sent to Westminster without the approval of both houses of Parliament.

In response to Honourable Senator Smith's question about dealing with amendments now, as I suggested yesterday, that has been discussed with procedural authorities and advisers, and it is impossible because the motion before us does not deal with the substance of the resolution but asks us to concur with the other place in establishing a special joint committee. The Joint Address can, of course, be amended in committee or during the third stage, which is when the joint committee report comes back to the Senate for consideration.

What is before us now is nothing more than the establishment of a joint committee.

Senator Flynn: Oh, no, no! No, no! Don't push!

Senator Perrault: In response to the Honourable Senator Riley's question, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister's letter to Mr. Broadbent does indeed constitute a commitment to support an amendment within the limits outlined by the Prime Minister in his letter. Again I suggested that yesterday, and I reiterate it today.

With reference to the questions concerning special joint committees, Senators Buckwold and Guay inquired about representations to be made before the special joint committee. That committee, of course, will be master of its own proceedings, as all of us are aware, subject to the rules that apply to committees in general and to the orders of reference establishing it, which give to it its specific mandate and reporting date. The committee will determine who it will call as its witnesses and who will be invited to make representations.

● (1420)

All honourable senators know, however, that, as is customary in committee proceedings, they are entitled by the rules and by tradition to participate in the committee proceedings, but they cannot, of course, vote or move amendments. Senators who are not members of the committee are invited to participate in the committee's activities to the extent that they have enjoyed those privileges in the past. Honourable senators may therefore feel assured on this point.

As for Senator Roblin's suggestion that the report stage be considered in Committee of the Whole, the Senate is master of its own procedure and the government would be willing to consider that possibility down the road.

I believe that most of the matters raised yesterday have been answered. I know that there will still be questions in the minds of certain senators, but I would urge them to accept the sincerity of the government that it welcomes a discussion of all aspects of this historic national initiative.

We hope that honourable senators will see the merit in referring this matter to a joint committee as quickly as possible. Their participation in the debate and dialogue is invited. We are engaged in an important initiative which has historical implications. It should evoke the best efforts of every member of this chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I came into this chamber this afternoon prepared to ask the Leader of the Government a question. He rose in his place to make a statement, in the course of which I felt he had answered my question—not to my satisfaction but at least to my understanding. Then, as he concluded his remarks, he purported to provide an answer to a question posed on another day by Senator McIlraith.

On that occasion, in reply to Senator McIlraith's question, he said that the resolution would not be sent to Westminster without the approval of both houses. My question was to be: Whereas the government has stated—and the Leader of the Government reiterated this this afternoon—that if the report of the joint committee looking into the constitutional resolution is in proper form, then the concurrence motion will constitute the Joint Address itself.

I understood the leader to say that that was the fact, that the only chance we were going to have to vote on the resolution was by voting concurrence in the report of the committee—

Senator Perrault: No, no. I am pleased to give the assurance that my reference in the statement I made earlier does not suggest that there is a procedure by which the Senate can effectively be circumvented. If, for example, the report from the committee suggests that there be no change in the Joint Address to Her Majesty, it does not mean that the Senate would not be able to debate the report or to suggest that certain changes or amendments be made. The Senate would have the power and the right to initiate action here and to have the report, with suggested changes, referred back to the joint committee for further consideration and action.

● (1425)

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government, but before I ask it I would like to say how much I appreciate the comprehensive explanation he has given concerning the questions that have troubled us.

My question—and I do not know if the leader would want to answer it at this time or bring back a reply later—is as follows. As I understand it, after the committee reports back to this house, then, if there is an amendment by the Senate, in order for it to be referred back to the joint committee, it is necessary for the joint committee to be revitalized and there must be concurrence by both houses. If it should be that there were no concurrence from both houses, and we did move an amendment, what would happen to that amendment?

Senator Perrault: Our rules of procedure require concurrence of the other house for the re-establishment of a joint committee for the purpose of considering Senate amendments. Should the other place find itself in a similar situation, in my opinion, in most circumstances the Senate would concur in the re-establishment of the joint committee. If, for example, there were an initiative on the part of members of the Commons to have serious concerns referred back to the joint committee, I think it can be said that the Senate would consent readily to having that joint committee re-established. I can think of no circumstances in which that committee would not be re-established for good reason as a result of a request to the Commons from the Senate and vice versa.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, in the light of what has just been said, I have a supplementary question. Does the Leader of the Government believe that concurrence by the Senate in a committee report concerning a proposed resolution can be taken, under parliamentary law or practice, as being equal to the direct passage of a resolution for a Joint Address?

I may say, before you get to your feet, that I am not asking for a legal opinion; I am asking to know the state of your mind.

Senator Murray: That will take a week of amendments.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it seems to me that there is a substantial amount of credibility in a procedural and legal action which would see the Joint Address to Her Majesty supported by majorities in both the Senate and the Commons. If the Address to Her Majesty is accorded majority support in the Senate and majority support in the other place, that would be a rather persuasive and convincing indication of the views of Parliament.

Senator Donahoe: A further supplementary, if I may. If I understand what the honourable leader is saying, he is telling us that the indirect process of discussing a document containing a resolution can suddenly become legally binding as an expression of the Senate's support for the resolution itself.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think we are getting into the area of disputation. I have presented my statement. I have suggested that another option existed, namely, the option of bringing in a motion for debate in the Senate and the other place and, by simple majority vote, passing it without an opportunity for committee study. The route the government has chosen is infinitely more democratic than the alternative.

Senator Donahoe: If that course of action should be followed, is the honourable gentleman undertaking that the members on his side of the chamber will vote in support of that procedure?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in a sense that is a reflection on the integrity of the members who support the government.

Senator Donahoe: Not in the least.

Senator Perrault: I would not want to dignify that suggestion with a long and laboured reply. Those who serve on this side of the house have demonstrated in the past their capacity, their ability and their respect for parliamentary traditions.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): In the event the government should intend to consider a vote on concurrence in the report as approval of the resolution itself, would the Leader of the Government undertake to tell us so before that vote is taken, and not interpret it as such afterwards?

● (1430)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: I should like to get a reply to my question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would not anticipate what the committee may wish to do.

Senator Flynn: You don't understand what I asked. I said that in the event the government intends to consider concurrence in the report as adoption of the resolution itself, would the government tell the Senate and the House of Commons in advance of concurrence in the report being considered that that is how it will be interpreted?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that is a hypothetical question.

Senator Flynn: Not at all.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Perrault: Yes, it is hypothetical. The Leader of the Opposition asked if the government would regard concurrence in the joint committee report as adoption of the resolution. The government has stated that the report would be reported back to the Senate and to the Commons for consideration, debate and a vote. The majority in Parliament would decide whether that report was adequate or that changes should be made. This is the way it is suggested that we proceed.

Senator Flynn: Tomorrow, once the Leader of the Government has had an opportunity to look at the record of what I have said, he may be able to understand my question and give an appropriate answer.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I listened to my honourable friend's statement of intention, and I am not entirely sure that I completely grasped it.

Senator Flynn: He himself did not.

Senator Roblin: I was encouraged when he started out by saying that the Joint Address would be treated no differently from regular legislation. That sounded fine. Then he went on to tell us that it would. I really do not know if he meant what he said in the first place or if he was not quite sure how he should express it.

Senator Flynn: He speaks out of both sides of his mouth.

Senator Roblin: My point is this: He has left me with the impression that it is possible for the committee to report its work in such a way to this house that it would not provide an opportunity for a clause-by-clause discussion of the items contained in the report in Committee of the Whole, a procedure that I have been advocating in this chamber. Do I understand that correctly? If I am wrong, will my honourable friend give me the assurance that no matter in what form the report comes here, we will have a chance, in a sense, to dissect it?

Senator Perrault: The opportunity to dissect this joint report will be available to the Senate. I believe that was part of my statement. I can conceive of no report issuing from the committee which would suggest that the House of Commons and the Senate shall not have the right to make any detailed critique or criticism of the report or the contents of the proposed Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen. To my mind, that would be an inconceivable circumstance.

I would expect members of the opposition to feel free to speak about the resolution and the Joint Address in some detail when we come to the third stage. I do not anticipate proposing any motion on behalf of the government to restrict the honourable senator's right to say as much about the Joint Address as he may wish to say.

Senator Roblin: I am sorry that I am so obtuse. I tried to make my point clear, and I tried to make the same point clear yesterday, but obviously without success. I know I will be able to talk about it, but my point is: Where will I be able to deal with amendments to specific portions of the resolution in the same way as is done in Committee of the Whole?

I should like to get an undertaking from my honourable friend that in whatever form the report appears on our desks, when there is one, we will have an opportunity to amend the resolution in the same style as we do in Committee of the Whole and in the same style as can be done in regular legislation as the minister said would be the case.

● (1435)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if there is a request by the honourable senator that there be a Committee of the Whole stage where clause by clause we can consider the Address to Her Majesty, which includes proposed constitutional amendments, I do not believe that at this time I can give assurances of formal Committee of the Whole consideration—but equivalent opportunities, I suggest, will be provided. In other words, if any honourable senator wishes to amend a certain section, that senator would have the right to rise in his place and make a motion to amend. The Senate then would have the right and the opportunity to debate such a motion and to discuss that proposal to change the Address to Her Majesty. The motion would be subject to voting procedures in the house. There would be no barrier to that kind of procedure. It would be the Senate acting, as it has in the past, as master of its own rules. If the senator wishes to launch that kind of endeavour, I want to assure him that he will enjoy the full co-operation of the government.

Senator Roblin: I am never very comfortable with the ad hoc procedures that are invented by my honourable friend on the spur of the moment, as I rather suspect he has been doing for the last little while. However, I guess I am not going to get much out of him today so I will have to be content with the observation that maybe he has moved a little way in my direction, so I appreciate that. I would like him, however, to deal a little more with the question of the revival of the committee. He has told us that he would regard it as a matter of courtesy that the other house would agree to a revival of the committee if it were recommended by this chamber. Would it be the policy of the government to advise the other house and this chamber to agree to a revival of the committee should either house request it? There is a difference between policy and my honourable friend's opinion.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice, but as I said earlier, I would regard it as a courtesy that this place would extend to the House of Commons should a similar circumstance occur over there.

Senator Roblin: I should hope so.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I direct a question to the Leader of the Government. He referred to the greater opportunity the public will have for input by having this matter referred to a committee. I received representations from one organization pointing out that in one respect the public will not be able to participate as much because the proceedings will not be televised as are the debates in the House of Commons. My question is: Is the government considering the possibility of televising the committee's proceedings? If the proceedings are not to be televised, will they at least be videotaped? This is a very historic occasion and there should be a videotape made of the proceedings.

Senator Perrault: Consideration is being given to the possibility of telecasting the proceedings in living colour.

MEETING OF CANADIAN CABINET MINISTERS WITH BRITISH PRIME MINISTER

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like to put a question to the government leader. When the two ministers of the federal government, Mr. Roberts and Mr. MacGuigan, went to London to meet with representatives of the British government, was there during the discussions a recommendation made by the British Prime Minister to the effect that the Address presented by the Parliament of Canada would be acceptable if the said Address did not contain a Charter of Rights?

● (1440)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice. As far as my understanding goes, I do not know whether that was discussed.

STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in this house a question in connection with the statement made last night by the Premier of Saskatchewan, in which he indicated several factors of concern to him in the present constitutional package, and on which he expressed an opinion that varied somewhat from the policy so far laid down. Is it the intention of the Government of Canada to respond publicly to Mr. Blakeney's initiatives in this respect.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That question will be taken as notice.

MEETING OF CANADIAN CABINET MINISTERS WITH BRITISH PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information that has just been handed to me with respect to the situation in the United Kingdom, at least in partial answer to Senator Asselin's previous question.

No United Kingdom minister has ever requested Canada to modify the substance of its constitutional package. It is inconceivable that the United Kingdom government, given its respect for the constitutional conventions between our two Parliaments, would do so. In fact, only yesterday Lord Hailsham, the Lord Chancellor, confirmed in the House of Lords that there is no change in the constitutional position of the United Kingdom government; that it would be in accordance with precedent for the United Kingdom government to introduce in the United Kingdom Parliament, and for Parliament to enact, legislation complying with a Canadian request to patriate.

Senator Asselin: Patriate? And amend?

Hon. G. I. Smith: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question which I suppose might be considered supplementary to that. I have in my hand what is purported to be a quotation from the Manchester Guardian of yesterday. I am sure the Leader of the Government will agree with me that that is one of the more respected newspapers in the United Kingdom. It reports a senior minister of the United Kingdom government as saying:

> —"that if the present discussions with Mr. Pierre Trudeau's Liberal Government failed to persuade the Canadians to withdraw their request for a Bill of Rights, there would be a major hold-up in legislation planned for the new parliamentary session."
> "It could wreck the whole thing," the minister is quoted as saying.

Senator Thompson: What is the name of the minister?

Senator Smith: I am just quoting what is in the report that I have before me. My question is simply whether or not this report has come to the attention of the government, and whether they believe there is anything valid in the alleged quotation.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps the Honourable Senator Smith would be willing to provide us with the name of the unnamed minister, if he has that information. We would be glad to know that as well.

Senator Smith: I would do so gladly if I had it. I was merely quoting what is alleged to have appeared in the Manchester Guardian. I would be glad to send it across to the Leader of the Government.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am aware of the article. The Guardian article was by an anonymous writer, purporting to have had a conversation with an anonymous minister, and I question the value of interviews of that quality. However, it can be said that no minister of the British Crown has ever asked this country to modify the substance of its constitutional package.

Senator Flynn: Not as yet.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like to point out to the Leader of the Government that perhaps we should also question the comments made by the CBC reporter in London who yesterday repeated the same story and the same facts, namely that ministers of the British government had indicated that if the resolution included a charter of rights that part of the resolution might be sent back and they would simply patriate the Constitution with or without amendment.

[English]

Senator Perrault: It may be helpful, honourable senators, if some of these reports were to quote the names of the ministers in question, and if, in fact, the ministers holding these views, say whether they are prepared to state them publicly. Nothing of that kind has been said in any conversations with Canadian officials or ministers. I think that all members of the Senate and of the other place, and Canadians generally, would resent very much an attempt by another Parliament to frustrate efforts by Canadians to patriate their Constitution.

THE BUDGET

ALLEGED STATEMENT ON NATURAL GAS EXPORT TAX BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development arising out of a statement attributed to him in Calgary the other day concerning tonight's budget. The newspaper report says:

> If an export tax on natural gas is contained in Tuesday's federal budget, it could be moderated in the future providing Alberta and Ottawa agree on an energy-pricing package, Senator Bud Olson says.

Then the direct quotation that is attributed to the minister is as follows:

> Whatever comes out of the budget, we'll leave the door wide open if the producing provinces want to come to the table and are willing to give a little. If any (pricing) agreement is reached some time in the future, we would adjust some things in the budget.

My question is this: Is it now the policy of the Government of Canada, and will it be the practice of Mr. MacEachen when introducing tax measures, simply to be launching trial balloons and chips for further negotiation with the provinces, the private sector or other players in the Canadian economy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, honourable senators, it is not, and that is an erroneous, or at least a misinterpretation—

Senator Murray: They have misquoted you again.

Senator Olson: No, it is not a misquote. I never complain about being misquoted.

Senator Roblin: Hardly ever.

Senator Olson: I know that I am very often misinterpreted, and by honourable gentlemen opposite—

Senator Roblin: Consistently.

Senator Olson: —who are making a profession out of that.

Senator Murray: Don't be so thin-skinned.

Senator Olson: I understand that, because I occupied an opposition seat in this chamber for some time. To get back to the substance of what is involved in what is raised by Senator Murray, I said also—and perhaps you should quote that too—that I regret that we have to be in the position of bringing in a federal budget in the absence of an energy agreement, especially a pricing agreement with respect to the producing provinces. Perhaps it is not even in the article, but I was there and I distinctly remember saying it at least four or five times in Alberta over the weekend.

Senator Murray: Unfortunately the Toronto Star did not think it worthy of quotation.

Senator Olson: The Toronto Star probably wasn't there. There are a few things that happen in this country outside of Toronto. What I want to point out is that the federal government today, and last Friday too, were in the business of having to prepare a budget in the absence of an agreement, where it hoped there would be an agreement, and we want it to be clearly stated that if and when the producing provinces and the federal government do come to a position of agreeing to a package involving energy prices and all that—and it is much more complicated than simply that; there is revenue-sharing and that sort of thing—then obviously if we agreed to it we would modify what we are now unfortunately in the position of having to bring in, namely, a budget without an agreement.

● (1450)

My honourable friend really ought to know about that, because that is where his friends found themselves on December 11 last year.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Does the minister not find himself in the position of criticizing as useless any government which would get involved in that sort of thing?

Senator Perrault: Order!

TRANSPORT

CHURCHILL—GRAIN SHIPMENTS

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, we would like Senator Argue to know that we have not forgotten him.

During this crop year, the Port of Churchill has shipped only 47 per cent of the amount shipped during 1979, and only 39 per cent of the budgeted amount for this year. May I first ask the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board to guarantee to this chamber, including the members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, that 30 million bushels of grain per year will be shipped through the Port of Churchill? As the minister knows, this will only cover the operating costs, and not the capital costs, of that port.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, in response to Senator Yuzyk's question, I can say that he is certainly correct when he says that the Port of Churchill had a lower volume of grain going through it this year than last year. That arose because of special circumstances, the main one being the drought. The effect of the drought resulted in farmers keeping stocks at home on their farms that they would have otherwise been able to sell. The Canadian Wheat Board, especially in the earlier part of the year, found it impossible to move grain to that port. At a later time, emergency steps were taken by the Canadian Wheat Board to at least provide a flow of grain through the Port of Churchill, and, as has been suggested, this came up to perhaps less than half of what had been shipped through the Port of Churchill last year.

I do not think that as the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board I am in a position to guarantee certain shipments through the Port of Churchill. I think it would be foolish if I were to go on the record that way, because no one is able to forecast the kinds of crops which might come forth next year, the kinds of grades that will be available in relation to the demand, what particular transactions may be made by the Canadian Wheat Board in the interest of the producers whom they serve, or what transactions could easily be shipped through the Port of Churchill.

However, I do wish to say to my honourable friend that, unlike others I have read about in the press in the past—and I won't mention names—I am a supporter of the Port of Churchill. I think it is valuable to Canada; I think it should be kept in operation. It is also fair to say that the only thing that keeps the Port of Churchill in operation is grants from the federal government to the National Harbours Board, other grants, as well as the business done by the Canadian Wheat Board through that port.

I think my honourable friend and I should both say to the Province of Manitoba, to the Province of Saskatchewan, in particular, and perhaps even to the Province of Alberta, that we should all look at Churchill to see what can be done to encourage the shipment of other goods through that port.

The Minister of Agriculture for Saskatchewan, the Honourable Gordon MacMurchy, says that he is greatly in favour of Churchill. He makes fine speeches in favour of the port, but there has been virtually no action taken. Saskatchewan, of course, is a major potash producer. That is a tremendous industry and it is growing rapidly. It would be nice if we could look at the possibility of using the Port of Churchill for the shipment of potash.

However, I cannot guarantee to my honourable friend that there will be 500,000 tonnes or 600,000 tonnes put through the Port of Churchill. I think everyone who has an interest in Churchill should do everything possible to see that the port is maintained, and that substantial shipments of grain are made through it.

Senator Yuzyk: Can the minister give assurances that next year's program will be met, or tell us what action he is contemplating to carry out a program whereby deliveries will be made through the Port of Churchill?

Senator Argue: I do not think I can say more than what I have said. Contracts will be made, I am sure, for shipments of grain through that port. However, they will depend upon the demand of the customers, the availability of ships coming into that port at a particular time of the year, the Canadian Wheat Board's being able to find the stocks, and the railways being able to ship them and put them in place at the Port of Churchill.

All I can say is that I will use whatever influence I have to support the Port of Churchill in a general and broad way.

However, to provide a certain guarantee, when there cannot be a guarantee, would be foolish on my part.

I should like to see the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board—who are, after all, the elected producers—take a look at the Port of Churchill. I would be happy to see grain going through that port even if it meant somewhat less income per bushel to the farmers, because over the years I think it would add to the farmers' income. I do not think we should be fair weather friends of Churchill, but that we should stand behind that port in good seasons and bad seasons. However, I cannot guarantee it in an absolute way.

Senator Yuzyk: Of course, we hope you will put your words into action.

Senator Perrault: He has already done so in the past.

Senator Olson: That is his record of performance.

Senator Yuzyk: I have one further question. The minister and all of us are aware that the Port of Churchill is icebound for a great part of the year. There is the possibility, of course, of opening the port earlier if icebreakers are used. Is the minister planning to make the port more serviceable and operational by making use of icebreakers or ships of that kind?

Senator Argue: Canada has, of course, the M.V. Arctic, a modern icebreaking ship. As I understand it, that ship is also capable of carrying cargo. The Minister of Transport, the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, has been most co-operative in doing everything he can to make that icebreaker available for use at that port to break ice, to bring in shipments, or to do whatever is needed. The use of an icebreaker at a given time is of no value unless there are ships that want to enter the port to pick up grain.

I can tell my honourable friend that if the Canadian Wheat Board says they can use the Port of Churchill at a given time only if the M.V. Arctic is there, then I believe the Minister of Transport would consider a request for icebreaking sympathetically. I would hope and expect that he would react favourably to such a request. I would be happy to give to Mr. Pepin at any given time the information that comes to me, and make a recommendation to that effect, and I would be optimistic as to the result.

VANCOUVER—SHIPMENT OF GRAIN FROM SOUTHERN ALBERTA

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, my question is also to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, and it pertains to the Port of Vancouver and the delivery of grain from southern Alberta. I am wondering whether the minister has anything further to report to us with respect to the movement of grain from southern Alberta to the Port of Vancouver after the meetings of union officers in Winnipeg on October 20, and the application before the Board of Industrial Relations, on October 23.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I have not heard the result of that inquiry. I do not know whether it has concluded or not. It had not concluded as of yesterday. Therefore, I am not able to answer my honourable friend's question with regard to the Port of Vancouver. I can say that emergency action has been taken by the CPR to ship from 300 to 500 cars weekly from that area to Thunder Bay.

• (1500)

With that labour situation, it is difficult, as I understand it, to get the cars to the west coast. As an alternative, a number of cars, which is just slightly less than the number required to meet the normal shipments to the west coast, are being moved to Thunder Bay. That emergency action is being taken, and it will be of major assistance.

INDUSTRY

CHRYSLER CORPORATION—NEWSPAPER REPORT OF PLANT CLOSINGS

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Yesterday's Wall Street Journal quotes Chrysler executives as saying that the company is considering closing 16 of its plants should it prove more profitable to purchase parts from outside sources.

Is the minister aware of any Canadian plants being included in these closings?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, I am not aware of that, but I shall bring an answer as soon as I can—possibly tomorrow.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STRIKE OF TRANSLATORS AND INTERPRETERS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and concerns the strike of translators, which is now in progress.

Can the minister tell us whether it is a fact that supervisors in the Translation Bureau are doing translation work for which they are being paid at freelance rates over and above their regular salaries?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Murray: I would ask the Leader of the Government, in making his reply to my first question, to also provide this chamber with a statement of facts concerning this dispute and what the position of the government is with respect to an early settlement of it.

Senator Perrault: Yes, I shall seek the requested information.

THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That ten Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;

That the Committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the Committee be twelve members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak at this time in support of the motion that is before the house. This, of course, is a particularly important time in Canada's history. Our nation has been going through some very severe strains as far as national unity is concerned. In fact, the very existence of this nation has been threatened. This year we as a country faced the referendum vote in the Province of Quebec. While that vote was the prerogative of the Canadians who live in that province, all of us, I am sure, took a very great interest in its outcome. As a Canadian who lives in another part of Canada, I was delighted to see such a large majority on the "No" side.

I am not an expert, certainly, nor do I purport to be, on constitutional questions; but that does not mean that I should not take part in this debate. I suppose there are not many really great experts on the Constitution in this chamber. I perceive some things that are needed for the survival of this country, and on that basis I am certainly prepared to participate in this debate.

I think we were fortunate to have as the Prime Minister of this country during that Quebec referendum the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau. His intervention in that campaign, in that plebiscite, had a very major effect on its outcome—and it was a positive outcome as far as the rest of the country is concerned.

Following that referendum, everybody said that Quebec was looking to the rest of Canada for some action on the Constitution, and I suppose that is correct. One of the proposals in this particular package that commends itself most favourably to me is that of placing language rights in the Constitution. That is important, not only for the English who live in the Province of Quebec, but for the French-speaking minorities who live in provinces other than Quebec. To my mind, that is a major provision in this proposal.

I believe that one should be able to support the whole question of placing certain rights in the Constitution. I was a member of the other place for many years, and certainly there were campaigns, session after session after session, for a Bill of Rights in the Constitution—something which received support from many leading Canadians and which had some success. It appeals to me that such things as fundamental freedoms and democratic rights, including language rights, mobility rights, legal rights and, yes, non-discrimination rights, should be placed in the Constitution.

I know there are those who take the opposite view. They feel that our trust should be placed in the legislators, in Parliament. But what they are really saying is that they are trusting the majority at any given point in time; that you can be sure that language rights are safe in the hands of whatever political party may occupy the position of a majority in Parliament or a legislature.

I think it is quite possible to have in a legislature of this country, and perhaps even in the Parliament of this country, a government with a very large majority that, at a given time, might not take kindly to protecting the rights of certain minorities. That has been part of the history of Canada. It is not a very proud chapter. I cite, for example, the denial of the rights of Japanese Canadians during World War II and the question in Saskatchewan at times of the rights of Hutterites.

Fundamental rights are fragile things, and it is possible, I think, in a legislature or in a House of Commons not to give the necessary attention to basic human rights and fundamental freedoms. For that reason, I am personally happy to see the provision for language rights in the measure that we are discussing.

The Premier of Saskatchewan, the Honourable Allan Blakeney, has taken an interesting position. He is basically opposed to that section in the resolution which provides against discrimination on the basis of race, language, sex, and so on. I believe he repeated that opposition yesterday. But he has been opposed to the inclusion of rights in the Constitution in opposition to his own party in the House of Commons, and certainly that party is greatly divided. I think that we are in good company when we travel along the road with such defenders over the years of rights of Canadians as the late J. S. Woodsworth, M. J. Coldwell, T. C. Douglas, who succeeded in getting a Statute of Rights into the Saskatchewan statute books, and the late Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker, who proposed and had implemented in statute form Canada's first Bill of Rights. As I say, I know there are arguments on both sides, but I think to entrench these rights in the Constitution is a commendable thing; it carries strong arguments in its favour.

• (1510)

The Premier of Saskatchewan says he would like to have equalization, or the provisions for equalization strengthened. Well, I hope and I imagine that the committee will be considering that very thing, and I think it is a good provision. One should say in a Constitution that Canadians in every province should be guaranteed a certain basic minimum standard of government services, and there should be payments from the federal government to provincial treasuries to make certain that the moneys are available to provide that kind of support for those services.

I think we have done pretty well so far in this country in providing equalization of opportunity in many ways to those provinces that have a lower per capita income. Saskatchewan has been a have-not province for many years, but it is coming into its own now. People on the prairies complain that Ottawa has forgotten them, that they are discriminated against, that Ontario and Quebec are running off with the revenues. And, one can make an argument, I suppose, on both sides of that question, but I think that a great deal has already been done to provide equalization and equality of opportunity in many respects for people in western Canada.

I had the opportunity the other day to help officiate at the opening of a seed cleaning plant at Cutknife, Saskatchewan. I had no intention of relating this story when I started to speak, but it was a great experience. Anyway, I was on the platform with the Honourable Gordon MacMurchy, the Minister of Agriculture for Saskatchewan. This is a very modern seed cleaning plant that was about ready to go into operation. Mr. MacMurchy's speech went something like this: "Saskatchewan, you know, is a unique province. In Saskatchewan we co-operate and we have co-operatives and we have a Department of Co-operatives and our agriculture representatives have helped put this plan into effect. This is a perfect example of why Saskatchewan is unique and how we all co-operate together." Then he added, "The government has provided $220,000 for this plant."

Well, I was following him. At most of these openings there are no representatives of the federal government. We have no members of the House of Commons, and that is not news.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, yes, we have.

Senator Argue: I meant on the government side. I apologize. Of course, we have members of the House of Commons, and very able ones, from two different parties. But there was nobody representing the government to tell what the people of Canada have invested in that plant. So I said, "Well, Saskatchewan believes in co-operation but, you know, that is really an attribute of all Canadians. We like to co-operate, the federal government with the provincial governments and municipal governments, and so on."

I pointed out that medicare is a shared program; that the farmers out there have many federal programs that are of assistance to them. I reminded them of the cash advances program. I told them that the federal government had provided 10,000 hopper cars, and the Canadian Wheat Board had provided 2,000. There were 1,000 coming in from Saskatchewan this year and 1,000 from Alberta, but of a total of 14,000 hopper cars, 10,000 were from the Government of Canada. I pointed out that there was sharing, assistance, leadership and help from the federal government.

I mentioned crop insurance—50 per cent comes from the federal government and 50 per cent from the farmers, as far as benefits and premiums are concerned. The provincial government administers crop insurance and gets 98 per cent of the credit for having instituted it because so many people do not know that there is a federal contribution.

I was out in Winnipeg the other day meeting with the Western Grain Stabilization group—

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, my learned friend whom I have listened to with interest in both houses over many years is, I think, at the moment confused as between the speech he made the other night and the motion that is before the house today.

Senator Argue: Perhaps I am going a little far afield, but I really don't think I am going too far afield. We are discussing placing equalization in the Constitution, and I am saying that there is a great deal of equalization in place already. I am saying it is there to assist the people of western Canada, and that we are not forgotten. We are part of this country and we obtain benefits by being part of this country. We receive benefits but we pay for the benefits that go to other parts of Canada—and what is wrong with that? So let us put it in the Constitution and make certain that it stays there. There is branch line rehabilitation costing $700 million—and I could go on and on.

I thought I would tell the story some day of a farmer who starts out to seed in the spring just to illustrate which government follows him along in his various operations, and to see where the equalization payments come from.

I concluded with my little speech up there in Neepawa by pointing out to Mr. MacMurchy and everybody there that $220,000 went into the plant, of which $110,000 came from the Government of Saskatchewan and $110,000 from the government at Ottawa. I say that if any provincial minister wants to assist national unity, let him state the facts as to where these payments come from. He should not try to take credit as though the money came from the provincial purse, when half of it comes from the federal purse.

Senator Roblin: I should like the honourable senator to get his facts straight. Neepawa is not in the province of Saskatchewan; it is in the province of Manitoba.

Senator Argue: I was speaking of the variety of wheat. The farmer seeds Neepawa in the spring. It is a variety of wheat bred and originated on the experimental farms of the Canada Department of Agriculture. I should have gone on to say that. I do not know where the name came from but I imagine it came from the town of Neepawa. But it is a great wheat and it is gaining in popularity all the time. This is an instance of the federal government helping the farmers in western Canada. When we pay our income tax we help everybody in Canada, and what is wrong with it going either way?

Then, honourable senators, coming along to some of the other learned things that have been put forward, you know there is a whole lot of humbug in this entire discussion. We should not get it all from one side of the house. Perhaps my friends opposite think that all the humbug comes from their side, that is why they are making all the noise.

Senator Frith: It comes from Humbug, Manitoba.

Senator Argue: Anyway, when the federal government embarked on a program to advertise Canada and some of the basic tenets of our country, it was interpreted as being propaganda from Ottawa. It might be important to keep the country together, but be sure not to send the facts out to anybody!

An Hon. Senator: A wild goose chase.

Senator Argue: Well, my honourable friend may know more about wild goose chases than anybody else. Anyway, out in Saskatchewan we get lots of flak. We are told the federal government should not advertise. But do you know why people say that? They say it because the federal government basically never has really advertised, and so it is a foreign element when they see a federal advertisement. They are used to provincial advertisements because they are in the newspapers every day, and they are in the weekly press. If you are a farmer in Saskatchewan you might not get a newspaper, but you do get all kinds of mail and miniature newspapers from the provincial government week after week after week, and so you have lots of advertising to read.

• (1520)

There is one thing about the Government of Saskatchewan—it doesn't put out its stuff on cheap newsprint. They use the best paper in the world. It is expensively done and it is well done; they do it with class. There are a lot of things they do out there with class, you know—I guess because it appeals to the little people when they are running elections. If they want a building after they are elected they don't build a ten-storey building; they build the tallest building in the city and they make it the most lavish. They feel that that is impressive.

Let me refer to some things that appeared in a paper the day the Prime Minister was out in Saskatchewan to help celebrate the 75th anniversary of the province. What I am referring to is a photostatic copy of what was put out as "their" answer to the Constitution. They refer to the "danger of a new national policy." They say that the proposed amendments threaten key policies in Saskatchewan and elsewhere. For example, this is what Ottawa is supposedly threatening: that the Saskatchewan law against non-resident ownership of farmland would not be allowed; that the dedication of Saskatchewan natural gas to Saskatchewan's needs might not be allowed; that—and this is a gem—the low-cost compulsory car insurance provided as a monopoly by Saskatchewan government insurance could be in jeopardy. Those are scare tactics used to inflame the public and make them afraid of something that is coming.

Of course, these are the people who spend large sums of money on advertising. I don't know how much they spend, but they spend large sums. But just let the federal government put out a single ad, and that is different. We ran into some of that on the Herd Maintenance Program. You are supposed to have a program, but you are not supposed to tell anybody you have it, because that is advertising. You are supposed to hide it away somewhere. Well, we did not hide it away. But that is out of order so I had better not continue on that line. At any rate, they have a lot of advertising out there and yet they say, if the federal government advertises, it is wrong.

I hope that this federal government, and any future federal government no matter of what political stripe, will spend sufficient money on advertising and information to enable the citizens of Canada to become aware of the basic programs provided by the federal government and the basic provisions of those programs. How will Canadians be able to decide in an intelligent way just what the government is spending money on, and in what proportions the expenditures are made, if they are not informed?

Therefore, I do not apologize for any information the federal government has put out. I hope that when the constitutional debate is concluded they will not be fainthearted or afraid to explain their position. I am not suggesting they should go overboard or be extravagant, but they should explain such basic facts as that crop insurance is really paid for by the federal government and the farmers, not by the provincial government, and that many homes for the aged are provided, basically, by a 75 per cent grant from the federal government, with 15 per cent coming from the provinces and 10 per cent from the municipalities.

In my opinion there is nothing wrong with putting out sufficient information so that citizens will know where the money has come from. Therefore, I think that is something that should go forward.

As I have said, there have been a lot of scare tactics. The matter of resources has been raised. It is an important question and I can understand the provinces being concerned that a federal government—this one or some other—might move in to take away their right to their resources, or, in a certain way, challenge the very title to those resources. But I do not think the government ever had that in mind. I don't think it has it in mind today.

Well, the west has certain resources and they say, "We should have full title to those resources," and I say "great" to that. They say, "We should not have an export tax on natural gas."

Senator Murray: What do you say to that?

Senator Argue: I will come to that, don't worry. I am just building up so I can get to it.

Then down in Newfoundland the government says, "Well, those territorial waters—we've got to get title to them. It is not enough that they belong to all of Canada. It is not enough that in the Constitution the authority over waters and fisheries rests in the federal government."

I say that a share of all of the resources of this country, the same as a share of all of the wealth generated in this country, in all parts of it, should flow—surely some of it, a portion of it—into the coffers of the federal government; otherwise there is no country. I say that as a westerner.

Senator Cook: Everybody agrees with that.

Senator Argue: All right. That's fine. Sometimes you would not think that Mr. Lougheed agrees with it. He does not want the federal government to gain any revenue from his oil and gas that I can see. Now, maybe he does, but I can't see it.

Senator Cook: I come from Newfoundland.

Senator Argue: Well, I am trying to look after everybody in the whole country. I think Saskatchewan has some points to make. It is pretty easy for the provinces to gang up today and say they want title to all the resources and all the income from the resources, and do not want any federal tax on the resources, but I really believe that the federal government went a reasonable distance in dealing with Newfoundland, for example. As I understand it, the federal government said that the revenue from oil discovered offshore would go entirely to the provincial government—entirely—until such time as the average income in Newfoundland began to exceed the average income of all Canadians in all parts of Canada, at which time a share, a minor share, would go to the federal government.

I do not think that is particularly bad. I think it is good that we should have a federal government with sufficient economic strength that this country can survive. The provinces have their rights. The provinces need to maintain their rights. But the federal government, on behalf of Canada, needs to maintain its rights as well.

Senator Tremblay: May I be permitted to ask the senator a question? I will try to ask my question in English. If he does not understand, I will try again in French.

Senator Argue: Please go ahead.

Senator Tremblay: Would the honourable senator tell me the kind of average he is speaking of in what he has just said? Is it the average which is now used in the equalization grant formula, which does not include a large part of the revenues of some provinces in terms of natural resources, particularly oil, or will it include all revenues of the provinces? I ask that because there is quite a difference.

Senator Argue: I am not really qualified to answer that question, but the inference I draw from the honourable senator's question is important, namely, that that kind of proposition, that there should be a sharing but that the province should have the right until its revenue exceeds a certain average is all right. It is a question of negotiating a reasonable and fair average. I would certainly like to agree with the honourable senator on that point.

[Senator Argue.]

When you go to western Canada, come to my province. Alberta complains and will continue to do its own complaining, obviously; but Saskatchewan for many years now has been paying a large export tax on heavy crude going out of the province into the United States. They may well have some legitimate complaint, I believe. But at least until now—and perhaps I shouldn't say this—there has been no threat to leave the country, or mention that separatism is just around the corner, or talk about a war or an attack. However, I think Saskatchewan has a case for asking that the whole question be looked at.

I made a speech in Regina on Friday last to the Chamber of Commerce, in which I pointed out that in 1980 the export tax on heavy crude going out of Canada is estimated to be some $620 million. Seventy per cent of that revenue comes from the tax on crude going from Saskatchewan. Saskatchewan's share of that tax is $435 million; Alberta's share is $185 million.

I believe the way for the federal government to go in dealing with all these questions is to be fair and reasonable, to endeavour to provide equitable treatment, to listen and accept amendments and change, and to come forward, in so far as possible, with something that has the general support of the Canadian people.

• (1530)

When the country is worried about an impending export tax, I went on to say, in this statement, that I felt that whatever was done in the economic field would be done from the standpoint of providing legislation that was reasonable and fair to all parts of Canada.

I do not want to see the federal government take the same position as the oil producing provinces—namely, that the price of oil should rapidly increase to the world price, because, as a producer and farmer, I do not think I would gain very much if I have to pay $3 for my gallon of diesel fuel instead of the $1, or the little more than $1, that I pay today.

I cannot see that it will help producers, farmers or the agriculture industry in general, to see those prices double and triple. I should think it would be good for the Canadian economy, and for our competitive position in the world, if energy costs, to be borne by our industries, were borne at less than the OPEC price. That would be good for the country and it is something that should be supported.

I should now like to take a few moments to speak about some of the perceptions of western Canada. In many parts of Canada, and in the press, the word is around that there is a growing separatist movement on the prairies, in western Canada; that it is going to break the country in half; that there are separatists out there just ready to go. Well, I have not found them; I have not seen them; I do not know who they are. Perhaps I should not say that. There are a couple in the Saskatchewan Legislature.

Senator Asselin: Wait until the end of the debate. You might see some soon.

Senator Argue: I do not think that tomorrow will be any different from today. There are a pair of so-called separatists in Saskatchewan. They are not full-fledged separatists. They want to separate one minute, and the next minute they want to join the United States. They call the name of their party "Unionest". If it were "Unionist" it might look like a labour union, so they put an "e" in it.

There are three by-elections coming up in Saskatchewan, and I say to my honourable friends in the Senate that I doubt if they could field a candidate in those by-elections, where they could be tested. There are three by-elections coming up in Saskatchewan in the next few weeks. I would suggest that they get into those by-elections, that they run their campaign, and see how many votes they get. If anything, it will kill separatism. It will be a fling at the electorate in Saskatchewan, who are Canadians. I am sure they will lose their deposits, their shirts and their money, and everything else that goes along with an election campaign.

Then we have some other well-known people in western Canada who seem to be great at making the news and they are given a lot of support. I refer to the Canada West Foundation and its leader, chairman or president—I am not sure which—Stanley Roberts. I have seen him on television. I do not have the quote, but he said that separatism is rampant in Alberta and in western Canada, that all it needs is a leader to light the spark. As they used to say in the old Methodist Church, of which I was a member, Stanley Roberts is preaching for a call, but I don't think anyone is calling him. If he decided to say, "I am the separatist leader" he would not have any following.

I am surprised that the Governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, and also some important business organizations in this country, are providing money to that organization, for which Stanley Roberts is the spokesman. I would say that he is taking a line that is anything but constructive. I do not believe for one moment that he speaks for those member organizations, or those governments, as he may claim to do. I don't know whether he does or not, but he should not be speaking if he doesn't.

He said that separatism is really rampant; that they are all set to go. He said it's in the board rooms of the oil companies in Calgary. Well, let them come out and name themselves. We would like to have a look at them, because I can state that I have not met a single person in Saskatchewan, Alberta or Manitoba—or British Columbia, for that matter, but I have not been out there very much—who has not said, "When I look at Canada and the provinces, I am a Canadian first and a Manitoban second," or "I am a Canadian first and an Albertan second." I believe that is the way most people in this country think and that is the way the country is going.

We should not pay too much attention to those self-styled separatists, or near-separatists. Let us smoke them out. Let them come out and stand as separatists, and not do what they are doing—that is, offering insinuation and innuendo, and causing trouble—because they really do not have much substance behind them or much of a following, and I would hope that good Canadians, who pay good money into the Canada West Foundation, would look at where the money is going to see if it is serving the purpose for which the foundation was established.

I thought I had the quote here, but perhaps I can paraphrase the purpose of the Canada West Foundation. It is to do everything possible, by research and publications, to promote a stronger western Canada within a stronger Canada. Senator Roblin would know whether or not that is a reasonable paraphrase. It is a laudable objective and the west needs spokesmen. We are not as large in population as other parts of Canada. However, if we deal with the situation with reason and forbearance, and keep to the facts, we will accomplish a great deal more than if we start from the premise that, "We are good guys and everyone else outside our province are bad guys who are trying to do us in."

There is talk about separation—not separatism, but separation. Every party goes through it every once in a while. I guess I should know. But who has been having trouble, in this great debate, by way of maintaining loyalty? Perhaps everyone. I read that there are one or two members of the House of Commons who might not follow the line taken by the Prime Minister and the Liberal Party. From what I have observed of the Liberal Party over the course of some years, it does not make the mistake of expelling a good Liberal because at a given moment he has different views. He might be the most loyal member a year from now, or even two years from now.

Senator Asselin: Wait, wait.

Senator Argue: Out in Alberta, 80 per cent or 90 per cent of the provincial legislators represent one party. But Mr. Sindlinger, the member for Calgary Buffalo, said that he would rather accept the federal position than the provincial position. Because of that he was expelled from his party's caucus.

Senator Asselin: Wait; you will see what they are going to do with Duclos.

Senator Argue: That's okay. I'll just wait; I will do what my honourable friend suggests.

In the Province of Saskatchewan, the premier takes a position and makes it firm. Since he has been making it firm, however, and since we have been getting into this important discussion, and as the discussion has heated up, I have noticed that one cabinet minister, the Honourable Eiling Kramer, a minister for 28 years, from the city of North Battleford, resigned as minister and resigned his seat. Just a couple of days ago—perhaps it was yesterday—the Honourable Jack Messer, a member of the legislature for 13 years and a member of the government for nine years as Minister of Mineral Resources, also resigned as a cabinet minister and resigned his seat. It is fair and correct to say that the statements they made as to why they resigned were not to the effect that they disagreed with the premier, but to me it is a strange time for the premier of any province to see his cabinet resigning when he is in this kind of a battle.

● (1540)

Senator Asselin: Give the reason, if you know it.

Senator Argue: What I believe is that in the Province of Saskatchewan there are a great many supporters of that government, and that party, who agree with the national leader of the party, and who have taken a federal position. I think that as time goes on it will be evident that more and more people are supporting that position.

The Prime Minister, on October 23, was reported as having made a statement at a news conference in Ottawa to the effect that the chances of western separatism are absolutely nil, and that he is not worried about western separatism. I agree with that statement. That statement was pooh-poohed by many people. There were editorials against it. I say, however, that the chances of western separatism are absolutely nil, and I conclude by saying that I have great confidence in this country—my country. I have great confidence that the government of today, and governments in the future, will deal with these many and difficult issues in a fair and reasonable manner. We will work our way through these difficulties and emerge a more united country than we have ever been in the past.

Hon. David Walker: Very, very entertaining! It is just like being back in the old House of Commons, where my friend's favourite song always was, "When Will the—", well, I will not name it. I think it would be out of order to do that. It has been very enjoyable, however, to hear him again, just as I used to enjoy hearing him out on the hustings too.

Honourable senators, now may I come back to today's subject. I have almost forgotten what it was, but I will try and get back to it. In the first place, I would say that if this proposed Joint Address gets as great a reception in the courts as the last one, it will be a pretty hopeless situation. The reception of Bill C-60 in the Supreme Court of Canada was awful. Bill C-60 was the means by which the Prime Minister, above everything else, suggested that the Senate be abolished, and that a House of the Federation take its place.

I do not know why the Supreme Court of Canada went to such trouble, but the words they used are words that can and may be again used in connection with the proposed legislation presently before the house.

I quote first from page 18 of the judgment of the Supreme Court, dated January 21, 1979. You will remember that they were going to eliminate the Senate and substitute a House of the Federation. The quotation is as follows:

> The continued existence of the Senate as a part of the federal legislative process is implied in the exceptions provided in s. 91.1. One exception to the power conferred by s. 91.1 to amend the Constitution of Canada is "as regards the requirement that there shall be a session of the Parliament of Canada at least once each year." "Parliament" under s. 17 is to consist of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. This exception contemplates that there shall continue to be sessions of the Senate and the House of Commons at least once each year.

I now turn to page 19 of the judgment where we find the following:

[Senator Asselin.]

> Section 91 confers the authority to legislate in respect of matters within that section upon the Queen, with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons.

Farther down the same page the judgment states:

> Section 91.1 confers a power of amendment subject to specified exceptions which, as we have already pointed out, contemplate the continued existence of both the Senate and the House of Commons.

Through all these 25 pages—and I can give you one instance after the other—I can find no way, no way whatever, under the British North America Act by which the Senate can be abolished. There is none. I will read the final reference at page 20.

> A provision of the kind contemplated—

That is, to abolish the Senate and substitute a House of the Federation.

Senator Frith: In a bill; not in a Joint Address.

Senator Walker: I appreciate that. I am coming to that.

> —would seriously impair the position of the Senate in the legislative process because it would permit legislation to be enacted under s. 91 without the consent of the Senate. For the reasons already given in respect of Question 1, it is our view that Parliament cannot under s. 91.1 impair the role of the Senate in that process.

I refer honourable senators to the marvellous speech made by the former leader of this house, Senator Connolly, on this subject, though I will not take the time to read it, or any part of it, at this moment. It is a magnificent dissection of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada to which I have been referring, and is to be found in Debates of the Senate, April 17, 1980, at page 60.

I am going to be brief, honourable senators, because I know that my friend took up quite a bit of time, and you do not want to have to listen to me take up a lot more time.

Senator Marshall: Take all the time you want.

Senator Walker: Over and over again attempts have been made, in different forays, to do the Senate harm. For some reason or other it seems to be fixed in the mind of the Prime Minister that he must get rid of the Senate. It may be, as he admitted, after he told how he was going to retire the first time, that he has in mind a presidential system of government, such as they have in France. That is what he compared it to, and in that case, of course, it would be very handy for him not to have a Senate. He can control the House of Commons—he does control—but he cannot always control the Senate.

Senator Frith: Is there not a Senate in France?

Senator Walker: What is it that my friend has to say? This will be interesting, I am sure.

Senator Frith: I was pointing out that there is a Senate in France.

Senator Walker: There is no Senate that is in any way related to the Senate that we have here. Here we have exactly the same rights as they have in the House of Commons, except with respect to the introduction of money bills. We can veto the money bills, but we cannot introduce them. That is a very good idea, and that, for my friend's information, is a very distinct difference between this Senate and that of France.

The proposed resolution now before us respecting the Constitution Act, 1980, tries again to knock out the Senate in a sort of a smart way, as a matter of fact. Whoever did this, at the instance of the Prime Minister, probably did a lot of thinking before coming up with the answer. It does not appear on the face of it, but that is what it is for. I shall read part of section 44 of the Constitution Act, 1980.

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation under subsection 41(1) or section 43 without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation—

● (1550)

That is very simple and very plain—it can be done. I continue:

> —if, within ninety days after the passage by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not passed such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of those ninety days, the House of Commons again passes the resolution—

If it is not passed in 90 days by the Senate, the House of Commons passes it again, then it becomes law. If section 44 becomes law, the Prime Minister or any government in power can wipe out the Senate.

Would my good friend, Senator Denis, be good enough to keep his voice down while I am in the course of speaking in this debate? I enjoyed hearing him when he was Postmaster General, but I wish that at the moment he would pay attention.

Senator Denis: My apologies.

Senator Walker: Under section 44 a resolution can be introduced which would knock out the Senate, which does not require that the Senate join in that resolution, and after 90 days the Senate is gone. This is what is suggested to me by this resolution. Nobody on the other side seems to be particularly worried, and I can only gather that perhaps in the final analysis they are going to have that part of the resolution struck out—I do not know. It is very important that we notice these things at the present time and that we do not get taken in by all the smart talk and the soft soap that we hear around here when, in fact, we may be destroying ourselves by giving any credence to section 44 of this resolution.

Senator Frith: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Walker: Of course.

Senator Frith: The honourable senator is not suggesting that under a combination of sections 44 and 41 the House of Commons alone can abolish the Senate?

Senator Walker: Section 44, as I pointed out to my friend is always, of course, subject to section 41 which states:

> (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by
>
> (a) resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons; and
>
> (b) resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least a majority of the provinces—

That includes the provinces as set out under the Victoria Charter.

Senator Frith: It takes both.

Senator Walker: That is true, but when the House of Commons and the Senate go that far, cannot one expect that the Senate will go the final step and do it? It is only another move. They are doing it in the first place, and they are being asked to do it in the second place.

Senator Frith: Who is doing it in the first place?

Senator Walker: In going as far as it has gone, it seems to me that the Senate would almost be obliged to support sections 41 and 44.

This new direction to the British Parliament contains many things such as enshrining the Bill of Rights. I do not know what the word "enshrining" means. I do know that we have a wonderful Bill of Rights in this country; it has become law, and it is respected all over Canada. If you attempt to include the Bill of Rights in this resolution to be sent over to England, with all the objections that are being made to this complicated charter, I would respectfully suggest that you would not be nearly as well off as you would be if you just left the Bill of Rights as it is. So far we have found no faults with it, and it has been accepted by the Supreme Court of Canada and many other bodies.

Finally, I should like to refer to section 50 which deals with the office of the Queen. Section 50 states:

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only in accordance with a procedure prescribed by section 41 or 42:
> (a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province—

An amendment to the Constitution concerning the office of the Queen can, under section 41, be made by an amendment to the Constitution of Canada. At any time after the Constitution is patriated that question could arise. By proclamation of the Governor General, with resolutions supported by the Senate and the House of Commons, you could depose Her Majesty the Queen or limit the powers of Her Majesty the Queen—almost anything. Do you want to go that far? What is the necessity for going that far? Strike out this part.

I should like to be brief since there are so many people who wish to speak on this subject.

In the name of Heaven, if you want to get this thing through—and we are all anxious that our Constitution should be patriated—why do we not have it patriated just as a simple amendment calling for the patriation of the Constitution adding, of course, an amending formula such as the Victoria

Charter? Then the British Parliament would have no problem with it. They are anxious that we should have our own Constitution patriated. We are anxious not to get it back without an amending formula of some kind, and it need only start out by being a simple one as is set out in subsection 41(2).

Why are we concerned about the business of enshrining a charter of rights and everything else that is so annoying to so many people? Why do we have to bring in, at this time, the question of referenda. I am reminded of the tremendous division that occurred in Canada in the conscription election of 1917. We have hardly gotten over that. That referendum cut the people down the middle. It is something that we never got over, and we, after all, are elected to govern. We have an extremely able House of Commons and an even better Senate. We can handle all the problems. We don't need to escape those problems by bringing in a provision that provides for a referendum.

• (1600)

Those are only some of the things. There are half a dozen others I could take up your time with, but if we want to get this thing through—and we are all anxious to get it through—let us go to the foot of the Throne and to the British Parliament with a simple patriation of the Constitution and with a simple amending formula and then we will get what we want.

I really do feel, since we have been on such good terms with the British for so long—they are such wonderful people and they dealt fairly with us all the way through—that it would be a pity to break up that friendship and good relationship that exists between us by sending them a proclamation included in which would be resolutions which are contentious, and in respect of which they would have to say, "We are sorry; there is too much objection to this. The provinces don't agree; people want to litigate this, that and the other thing." You can readily see how politely they would do it. They can say, "You Canadians are so able and you know what you want so well yourselves. We would feel we were imposing ourselves on you to do anything but what is necessary for patriating your Constitution with an amending formula."

Honourable senators, that is my respectful, sincere suggestion to you, that we should get what we want, which is patriation of our own Constitution without any fancy business that is going to create furore, and which is likely to bring about a refusal or result in litigation. Let's simplify the matter and bring the Constitution home.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I am very pleased to participate in this debate not as a supporter of the government—although I am a loyal supporter of the government in the Senate—not as an individual with any axe to grind, but as a representative of my region, the province of Saskatchewan, and as a voice to express in this chamber the positions and attitudes taken by the Government of Saskatchewan, and perhaps in due course to express some of my own personal opinions.

[Senator Walker.]

Saskatchewan, as we have heard from a previous speaker today, is a very interesting province. It was just a few months ago that we celebrated the seventy-fifth anniversary of our incorporation as a province instead of a territory. I am sure all of you, along with us, are delighted with the progress we have made.

Saskatchewan has been a province that has seen good times and bad times. I do not have to talk to you, I am sure, about the sufferings endured in the Dirty Thirties. I do not suppose there is any region in Canada that has ever had more than 50 per cent of its population on welfare—in those days they called it relief—and yet survived with a smile and the courage to keep going. Today the fates are much kinder to us. We have developed into a province rich in resources, which is beginning to have a good industrial base, which has a slightly growing population, and which feels that the future is very bright indeed. I also believe that Saskatchewan is a province that is proud to be part of Canada. I believe, along with Senator Argue, that Saskatchewan people put Canada first.

For this reason, I am pleased at this time to speak to you briefly about some of the concerns that have been expressed by the Government of Saskatchewan through its premier and through Mr. Romanow, the Deputy Premier, who has been acting as a co-chairman of the constitutional committee that has been considering constitutional change in Canada.

First of all, I must pay some tribute to these gentlemen, neither of whom I support politically, nor would I ever vote for, but nevertheless I believe they have fairly placed before the Government of Canada legitimate considerations of the proposals contained in the resolution before us. Of all the provinces of Canada, I believe Saskatchewan has acted the most responsibly and responsively to the needs of Canada, keeping in mind the particular aspirations and objectives of the region.

I did hear some criticism by Senator Argue of the stands taken by Saskatchewan politicians, and some of it may be justified, but on the other hand I believe that Premier Blakeney has gone out of his way to be as accommodating as possible within the self-interest that, obviously, he has to protect the province which he represents.

Let me tell you some of the concerns of the Province of Saskatchewan, which, by the way, has indicated basically that it agrees with most of the provisions that are contained in the resolution. I hasten to add that I personally agree with most of them. The province has indicated some of the following concerns: First of all, the federal proposal relating to the amending formula is the most odious aspect, they say, of the resolution because, first, it is a unilateral federal imposition, which hardly meets the objectives of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments and, second, it seems to put the federal government in a most advantageous position, in respect of both Part IV and Part V.

I suggest then, in answer to that particular criticism, that if and when the committee is set up it must be prepared to carefully look at the amending proposals contained in these sections to ensure equity and fairness in the relationships between both levels of government.

Honourable senators, section 42, as it now stands, would allow the federal government to call a referendum on a constitutional change without even consulting provincial governments, let alone trying to secure their agreement. As one provincial spokesman put it—and again I am presenting a Saskatchewan point of view, and I am quoting—"This loads the dice against the provinces, and is fundamentally incompatible with the federal system."

Resources again are a special concern of the west. Saskatchewan's mineral shipments have increased from $390 million in 1970 to $1,835 million in 1979—that is $1,835,000,000. For a province like Saskatchewan that is a lot of mineral production—a gain by almost five times in that period—with much, much more to come, so that resources do become a very real interest and concern to people in Saskatchewan. The west is contributing a great percentage of those funds to subsidize eastern energy costs. Senator Argue has very ably pointed out the significant contribution that is being made as a result of the present export tax on oil to help subsidize the equalization of oil costs across the country. I repeat the figure that he used. It may astound you to know that the present export tax on Saskatchewan oil alone contributes nearly $500 million a year to the federal government, and that is approximately $500 from every citizen of Saskatchewan that is going into the federal treasury. Indeed, the federal government takes more out of oil revenues in Saskatchewan than the province and the industry combined.

These are some of the concerns. You have not heard any complaints from the Province of Saskatchewan about that export tax. It has been there a long time; it has been growing steadily because of the formula, and it has a built-in structure. I am not trying in any way to negate the importance of an export tax. We may even hear more of it tonight. I am simply saying that Saskatchewan has learned a great deal, and as a result it is cognizant of the fact that energy revenue and energy resources are very important indeed to the economy and well-being of that province.

For that reason, all of Saskatchewan was delighted to learn of the agreement reached between Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Broadbent for the inclusion of a resource section in the resolution on the Constitution. Although that is not in our document, presumably it will be presented to the committee. Let me read a statement by the Honourable Allan Blakeney, which was issued on October 22, just a few days ago. He said:

> I want to comment on the agreement announced last night, between Mr. Broadbent and Mr. Trudeau, for the inclusion of a resources section in the federal resolution on the Constitution.
> The amendment has not yet been introduced and accordingly I have not had an opportunity to study the final text.

I don't think any of us have had that opportunity. He went on to say:

> I understand, however, that the Trudeau-Broadbent agreement would: (1) confirm provincial powers to manage resources; (2) permit provinces to levy both direct and indirect taxes on resource production, as long as the taxes were non-discriminatory in their impact; and (3) admit provinces to the field of inter-provincial trade in resources, with unqualified federal paramountcy in the event of conflicting legislation.
>
> Detailed comments will have to await careful scrutiny of the specific wording.
>
> The terms of the provision, if introduced in the form proposed, will go some way towards achieving the objectives we have sought in constitutional negotiations over the past few years.
> They do not, however, go all the way. Saskatchewan will attempt to obtain additional assurances with respect to resources, particularly in relation to international trade.

I will not go into the details of why Saskatchewan is particularly interested in international trade. That province has had some unfortunate experiences as a result of appeals to the Supreme Court on legislation that had been passed. As a result, it is very concerned about how international trade will be dominated by the federal government, and what the role and responsibility of the province will be.

Having said all that, I am delighted that Mr. Trudeau has seen fit to accommodate the needs of my province so that in this proposed Constitution, as outlined in the resolution, most of the needs of Saskatchewan have been acceded to, have been met. I think that this speaks very well indeed of the attitude of the Prime Minister in trying to accommodate the needs of the provinces, and I suggest this is a very good example of federal concern.

Insofar as the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is concerned, Saskatchewan is concerned about possible unintended effects of the provisions regarding non-discrimination. Premier Blakeney, for example, has raised some of the possible conflicts, such as mandatory retirement ages, a subject in which Senator Croll is very interested; age limits for the consumption of alcoholic beverages, or age limits for obtaining a driver's licence. The broad provisions require a great deal of study, albeit that in my personal opinion the objectives are commendable indeed.

With respect to language rights, Saskatchewan supports the provision and finds them generally acceptable.

On the equalization formula, our premier has suggested that:

> —direct reference be made to "equalization payments" as opposed to the vague reference to—

To quote the words of the resolution:

> —"taking such measures as are appropriate."

This word change, the premier says, would more clearly reflect the principle which the resolution seeks to enshrine.

Premier Blakeney also points out important items not in the proposal, and has said:

> In addition to what is contained in the proposed resolution, what is not in the document also requires a comment.
>
> The proposed resolution contains provisions by which Mr. Trudeau's own descriptions are designed to respond to concerns in Quebec.

And rightly so:

> It contains provisions of particular interest to Atlantic Canada and urged in part by their governments—the equalization principle.
>
> It contains mobility provisions, strongly urged by the Government of Ontario.
>
> Other than patriation itself, it contains nothing urged by the governments of the western provinces.
> My suggestion is that the resolution be amended so that some of the particular concerns of Canadians living in western Canada be acknowledged.

So, honourable senators, I feel that we have in the attitude expressed by Mr. Blakeney a very conciliatory response to this proposal. I believe that basically the citizens of Saskatchewan, whatever their political beliefs, would endorse the stands generally taken by the Premier of Saskatchewan. I only wish that premiers across the country would be as amenable to trying to put Canada first, and yet keep in mind the regional needs of their particular areas. That is the balance that we have to find.

We have to be concerned about the west. I am sorry that I do not quite agree with my friend and colleague Senator Argue, who pooh-poohed the concerns of some of us about western separatism. Certainly it is not at the moment a movement of any great consequence. People aren't going to go around waving the flag, marching on city hall and saying that they want to separate. But I want to say to the honourable members of this chamber that there is an embryo there, an embryo that, nurtured in the wrong way, could develop into a monster that we would soon regret in this country. There is a western disenchantment. It is a very real thing. When we look at the problems of energy, of the Constitution, of transportation and tariffs, there is a real dichotomy, there is a division between the west and the east. Somehow we have got to try to solve that. We have to try to solve it with goodwill.

I think we are finding the west flexing its muscles. I suppose I am speaking as a proud westerner when I say that if the twentieth century belongs to Canada, then I think certainly the twenty-first century will belong to western Canada. I think people recognize that, and somewhere that adjustment has to be made.

There is a struggle going on right now with the power of the east—I shouldn't say the east, but central Canada. Out west, Senator Walker, we always think of the east as being Toronto or Montreal. There is a struggle going on, and it is an historic struggle by an area that has been well established against the aspirations of a fledgling rival with new wealth which could possibly be a threat to its domination of the economy. This is something that goes on, I presume, around the world. I think one has to recognize that the west is very concerned about this.

● (1620)

I heard reference to the Canada West Foundation. I have to tell you—and I am proud of it—that I have been a member of that foundation since its inception many years ago, and until a few months ago I was a vice-chairman. I am sure that the Honourable Duff Roblin will not be critical of me for indicating that he, too, is a councillor of that particular foundation. Nor, I am sure, would Senator Manning be critical of me for indicating that he is a very active councillor of that foundation, along with other leading Canadians from that area.

This foundation is financed basically by the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. It comprises a group of citizens who are non-political and dedicated to improving the status of western Canada within the ambit of a strengthened Confederation.

I am the first to agree that I do not share the perhaps radical opinions expressed very often by Mr. Stan Roberts, the president of the foundation. I have written to the chairman of the foundation, Mr. Arthur Child, a great Canadian and also the President of Burns Foods of Calgary, with regard to some of my concerns. I think one has to accept, even if one does not agree, that there is more than a particle of truth in what he is saying.

In 1962 or 1963, when westerners were told of a separatist movement in Quebec, they said it was impossible. They asked how could Quebecers be that foolish and why would they want to leave this wonderful country. We could not believe that. I can say to you that right now this same type of feeling is developing in the west. People such as Senator Argue and others say there is nothing to it, and it is true that at the moment it certainly is not serious, but a spark could fan it. The makings are there. I believe that we have a responsibility as senators to make sure that we work to strive to eliminate the possibility of that, and that can be done by looking with favour at some minor changes to the resolution.

I do not think the resolution should be engraved in stone. There are things that can be improved. I hasten to add that, as far as the basic principles of the resolution are concerned, I support them. However, there are two things I am concerned about, one being the matter raised by Senator Walker, section 44. That worries me. I feel that the committee will have to look at that. I am not sure whether Senator Walker is reading into that something that was not in the minds of those who drafted it—perhaps it was.

Senator Flynn: Well, I am.

Senator Buckwold: In any case, in my personal opinion, it is a section that should be watched carefully and discussed by the committee in depth, with all its implications.

Secondly, I am concerned about the time limit outlined in the resolution. At one time I was ready to move an amendment that we change the time limit, but I realized that this is not the time nor the place to do that. I would ask the Leader of the Government to consider the implications of the committee having to report by December 9.

Honourable senators, this concerns me, because I would like, in the spirit of keeping this country together, to give Canadians an opportunity to feel that they were given a chance to make their presentations to the committee. I know it will be impossible for the committee to hear everyone. I can think of hundreds of organizations which would want to appear before the committee. The Leader of the Government has outlined some of them, and I could give you a list of another 50 organizations. I do not know how the committee could hear from all of them, read their briefs, or even give them time to prepare their briefs.

By the time the committee gets going, I suppose another week will have gone by. That puts us well into November, and leaves them just a little over a month to try to develop a consensus that would accept the changes that will affect the future of this country for possibly hundreds of years. I do not know if that can be done in 30-odd days. I know that the good Lord made the earth in six days and rested on the seventh, but he had some supernatural powers. I am not sure whether this committee will have the same kind of powers to enable it to come in with a report in about 30 days. Even for cosmetic reasons, it is important that that date be reviewed.

I hope that, just as the Prime Minister has indicated to the Premier of Saskatchewan he is prepared to make some changes in the resource situation, the government will give careful thought to increasing the time span. I am not suggesting the committee be left without a reporting date, because I agree it could go on endlessly, but I do suggest that another month or two should be added to the time limit to allow the committee to properly perform its functions and review the presentations.

I am also a little concerned about the business of subcommittees of the main committee. That means that a committee of 25 members might be divided into five subcommittees, with each hearing presentations. That might be the only practical way for it to do its work, but it seems to me that if I were presenting a brief which I felt was important I should like to present it to the main committee and not a subcommittee. I would feel that my presentation would not receive the kind of impact that I considered proper. I think that has to be considered with respect to the operation of the committee. I am not in any way saying that there should not be subcommittees. Probably there will have to be, but I think the main committee should be there to hear the presentations of major organizations from across the country.

Finally, I wish to put in a word for our native people of Canada who are also concerned about this. I am not sure how we are going to satisfy them, but as a senator from a province with a large percentage of its population of Indian and native descent—and I suppose I could also speak for the Inuit who are not part of our region—I wish to plead that the committee, when it is established, consider carefully the entrenchment of their rights within the law. This is going to take a fair amount of consideration. I hope the committee will hear from as many native organizations as possible, so that they will feel that they are being fairly dealt with, because just as western separatism is something people say is not a reality, so, in the eyes of many, Indian unrest is something one reads about in the paper. It is there too, and the goodwill of citizens has to be nurtured in order to accommodate to our Canadian scene the very real problems facing the native people and their descendants.

● (1630)

Honourable senators, I appreciate very much the opportunity I have had to express the views of Saskatchewan on this very important document. In closing, may I say that I think we are going to be able to meet the problems. Canada always has. We have gone through two major wars; we have had other significant pressures on federalism. I am satisfied that the goodwill of Canadians on this side of the house, on the other side of the house and in the provinces must, in the end, lead to a stronger and more united Canada.

Senator Smith: I wonder if Senator Buckwold would mind my asking him a question for purposes of clarification on only one point in what I think to be an excellent speech.

He partially answered my question, I think, by a comment he made himself. On more than one occasion he referred to a contest or conflict between the west and the east, and I just want to make absolutely sure that when he talks about the "east" in that context, he does not include the Atlantic provinces.

Senator Buckwold: I can assure the honourable senator that when we in the west speak of the west versus the east, it has nothing to do with the maritimes. The maritimers are our friends. They are the people who have shared the problems we have had with the domination of central Canada, which basically is Quebec and Ontario.

When we in the west talk about our conflicts with the east, I can assure you that it has nothing to do with any concern we have about, or any lack of appreciation, love or admiration for, our friends in the Atlantic provinces.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, it is with feelings of some anxiety that I enter this important constitutional debate today. Unlike at least one of my colleagues from Saskatchewan, who has preceded me today, it is my conviction that the Government of Canada has set itself upon a course of constitutional change which could, if carried to a conclusion in the manner the Prime Minister proposes, destroy this country of Canada as we know it.

At the outset, I wish to make my own position crystal clear. I do not consider myself to be primarily a western Canadian; I consider myself to be primarily a Canadian, with every right and freedom that that term implies. That is not to say that I would not vigorously oppose Prime Minister Trudeau on the question of constitutional reform, or Mr. MacEachen on his budget proposals, or Mr. Lalonde on his energy proposals, on the ground that they discriminate against the west. But I shall do so from within the system and according to the rules of the system.

However, in conversations which I have had over the past several months with individuals and groups in the west, who are anything but zealots and radicals, it has become clearly and painfully obvious to me that an undercurrent of anger and resentment is developing out there which could, if left unchecked, threaten the very existence of our country and its institutions. There is a growing perception that central Canada, specifically the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, are determined to dominate the west and are prepared to take whatever legislative steps are necessary, fiscal or otherwise, to achieve that end.

I do not say that that is necessarily the fact, but I do say that that is the perception. I implore honourable senators opposite to heed these words of warning. They are not uttered lightly; they are uttered sadly.

One need only examine the history of western Canada to appreciate that it has the capacity to undertake political protest movements that in the past have had profound impact upon this country of ours, and we would do well to heed and be responsive to the sense of outrage which is now growing out there day by day.

Turning now to the resolution before us, and to the proposed resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, I doubt that there is an honourable senator in this chamber who does not agree with the proposition that it is past time when the patriation of the Canadian Constitution should take place, and who would not accept the amending formula devised at the so-called Vancouver Conference of First Ministers held earlier this year.

Surely that is common ground. And if this debate were limited to that question alone, it would be quickly terminated and we would then be in a position to turn our attention to other matters of urgent and pressing necessity, such as the management of the Canadian economy, with all that that implies in this period of massive deficits and double-digit inflation.

Unfortunately, honourable senators, as the opposition leader in the Senate so eloquently pointed out yesterday, so straightforward a proposition is not what is before us. What the Government of Canada proposes in the proposed Address to Her Majesty, which is before us, is fatally flawed in at least two fundamental respects. The resolution, in short, contains a power which could destroy the federal system in Canada. I refer, of course, to section 42 of the proposed Constitution Act, 1980, which gives the Government of Canada the power to amend the Constitution by referendum over the heads of the governments of the provinces—a power which is totally at odds with the constitutional conventions and traditions of this country extending back over 113 years of its history.

There are men with political experience and background in this chamber far exceeding that of my own, and I suggest that they will not disagree when I identify the dangers inherent in constitutional change by referendum. We all recognize that public sentiment for this or for that is subject to swift and radical change over short periods of time. Surely a process of referendum is a totally inappropriate method by which to undertake change to so fundamental a document as the Constitution of a nation like ours.

[Senator Balfour.]

My concern in this connection is exacerbated by the process which we have all witnessed over the past few weeks of massive amounts of public funds being deployed by this government in a slick media advertising campaign intended to sell the government's position like a box of soap flakes, while at the same time failing totally to enlighten the citizenry with respect to the basic implications of what they are really about with this resolution.

Section 42 contains potential for abuse which would alarm civilized legislatures in any democratic state; but it contains a special threat to our own democratic institutions in this country. Section 42 would permit the federal government, with a manipulative majority in a referendum, to end the federal system.

The question it poses, honourable senators, is simply this: Should there be two parties to a constitutional decision, or just one—the federal Government of Canada?

In May 1980 the Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Trudeau, the Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition, Mr. Clark, and Mr. Claude Ryan, the Leader of the Liberal Party in Quebec, campaigned across that province, promising the people of Quebec a renewed federalism, and Quebecers responded to that message. Neither Mr. Ryan nor Mr. Clark have changed positions. They both still believe in the principle of federalism, adapted where necessary to the reality of today's Canada.

Mr. Trudeau, on the other hand, proposes to put in place a mechanism whereby our federal state can be converted unilaterally to a unitarian state. Rather than renewing our Canadian federalism, the central government may destroy it.

I turn now to the method by which the government proposes to achieve these far-reaching and fundamental changes to our Constitution. Are they to be debated in the Parliament of Canada, where members of Parliament and senators representative of all of our regions would have the opportunity to express their concerns and to propose amendments where necessary and to place on record the views of those constituencies and regions for which they have legislative responsibility? The answer, of course, is "No".

What the Government of Canada proposes to do by this document is to achieve fundamental constitutional change to this country through the agency of a foreign Parliament thousands of miles away by obtaining a law which they believe will not be subject to scrutiny by the Supreme Court of Canada. The Prime Minister of this country says in one breath that the time has come to end our colonial status, and then he proposes, in effect, to enhance our colonial status by going hat-in-hand to a foreign parliament seeking basic changes to our Constitution, and at the same time circumventing the parliamentary process of his own country.

Honourable senators, that is an outrageous and sad state of affairs. What the Prime Minister proposes to do in this respect may very well, in the technical sense, be legal, but in all other respects it is wrong, and I foresee a growing possibility that our parliamentary colleagues in London will also conclude that it is wrong.

The Leader of the Opposition in the Senate yesterday reminded honourable senators of the historic and traditional responsibility of the Parliament of Great Britain to ensure that constitutional amendments are not implemented by that institution where the result would be to ride roughshod over or encroach upon the existing constitutional prerogatives of our provincial governments; to function, in effect, as trustees for provincial rights in the face of unilateral constitutional initiatives taken by the central government.

We came into being as a federal state and we continue to exist as a federal state, with all that that implies. Our country is the product of a contractual relationship established 113 years ago, and it is fully implicit that one party to such a contract has no right unilaterally to alter its terms. Fundamental changes to be made to the Constitution of Canada should be made in Canada by Canadians, and not by the Parliament at Westminster in the course of patriation. These changes should be made when the Constitution has been returned to this country with an amending formula agreed to by both levels of government. We should discern among ourselves what the Constitution should contain, and we should implement those changes by due Canadian parliamentary process.

Honourable senators, the resolution before us is a bad law, unsound in respect to the proposed amending formula by referendum contained therein, and morally wrong with respect to the method proposed to implement those changes. One can only speculate at this stage as to why the Prime Minister is intent upon circumventing the Canadian Parliament in the course of obtaining his constitutional objectives, but there is a profound suspicion developing that his methods are dictated by a fear that what he seeks to achieve overseas would be, if passed by the Parliament of Canada, ultra vires legislation.

That suspicion, amounting in some quarters to a conviction, could very easily be refuted by the Prime Minister if he has the courage to do so. He could at this time, honourable senators, direct a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada on a very simple and straightforward question, namely: Would the proposed resolution to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, if implemented by the Parliament of Canada, be intra vires of that Parliament? That procedure could be initiated, argued and decided in a matter of days or, at most, weeks. I invite honourable senators opposite to give the suggestion serious consideration.

To repeat, honourable senators, we on our part are fully in favour of expeditiously patriating our Constitution, with an amending formula, and the formula we propose is the Vancouver formula which was raised at the last First Ministers' Conference and on which a consensus was obviously possible. But we vigorously oppose substantive changes to that Constitution being implemented outside the ambit of the Parliament of Canada by a parliamentary institution foreign to our country.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the honourable senator a question. He used the pronoun "we", but do I understand that the position of the official opposition is that they would accept the Victoria formula, and would accept patriation with an amending formula if it were the Victoria formula?

Senator Balfour: The Vancouver formula, yes.

Senator Frith: Oh, yes, the Vancouver formula.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I am pleased to take part in this important and historic debate on the patriation of the Constitution. I am in general agreement with the principles of the resolution, although I intend to criticize the government for not going far enough in some areas—the Charter of Rights, the absence of any reference to multiculturalism, a more concise definition of our native people and the inclusion of consumer protection.

There should be other provisions in this package as well, but I realize that this is only an initial step which will provide us with a framework for future amendments and additions, such as the preamble to the Constitution which I hope will contain a definition of the ethnic structure of Canadian society.

As a senator from Ontario I express the views of my province as I perceive them, and I am pleased to say that the constitutional package is also supported by the premier of that province, the Honourable William Davis, a man who heads a government whose political persuasion is different from that of the Prime Minister of Canada, which lends credibility to the amendments.

I also express the concerns of people voiced to me by representatives of ethno-cultural communities, not all of whom are from the province of Ontario, but also from outside the province, as well as the National Indian Brotherhood.

There can be little doubt as to the tremendous symbolic value to Canadians of patriating the Constitution, thus severing the final psychological colonial link. The existing situation has been a continual source of embarrassment to Canadians, and confusion to others. No other country is in this most ambiguous state, and it should not be surprising to learn that even many of our American neighbours, including those who play political or academic roles, have no clear understanding of the nature and functioning of the Canadian government. As recently as the weekend of October 18, when a number of distinguished Canadian and American politicians, bureaucrats and academics gathered for a two-day conference to compare the roles of the Canadian Prime Minister and the American President, a number of comments made by participants were captured and recorded by reporters as indicating an impression of Canada as a vaguely monarchical and semi-autonomous state.

The significance of these comments is obvious. For Canada to be perceived by outside observers and, more importantly, by all its citizens as a unique and independent entity, it is therefore imperative that the last vestiges of colonial rule be eliminated. But in addition to the general benefit of promoting a sense of national identity and patriotism, patriation may also have a positive effect on relations between the various ethnic groups which comprise our population. From a practical perspective, patriation will also allow Canadian governments to deal internally with constitutional issues rather than obliging them to follow the complicated and lengthy procedures necessary to receive approval for changes in Britain. Moreover patriation will, of course, remove an onerous and embarrassing task from the jurisdiction of the British Parliament, an event which they have long awaited.

● (1650)

If I may digress for a moment, I recall attending a dinner in the Confederation Room some four years ago on the occasion of the visit of the then Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Callaghan, who in the course of his remarks said, "You will not get an argument from us when you decide to patriate the Constitution. I only hope that we will be able to find it, when you send for it."

On the whole, the legislation which the federal government has prepared in order to accomplish the patriation of our Constitution is admirable and deserving of praise. The Constitution Act, 1980, as it is proposed, is a clear and concise piece of legislation which will also incorporate two critical elements into the new Canadian Constitution—a Charter of Rights and an amending formula. The narrow, judicial interpretation of the 1960 Bill of Rights, which moreover applies only at the federal level, and the constitutional deadlock of the past 20 years over an amending formula, indicate the practical necessity of including those provisions in the statute.

It is not a foreign government that is amending our Constitution. We are amending it here. These are Canadian amendments. We are asking the Parliament of Great Britain to include in the package only the provisions approved by the Parliament of Canada.

In addition, it can be argued that the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights in the Canadian Constitution is a necessary moral affirmation of certain democratic and humane principles with which we wish to imbue our society.

While it has often been pointed out that the American Constitution contains such a charter, and that in the Napoleonic Code everything is codified, it should also be noted that the British Parliament, to which our system has often been compared by opponents of the charter, is presently in the process of discussing a proposal for a Bill of Rights. Obviously, such a charter is considered neither unnecessary nor incompatible with the parliamentary system by our British counterparts. Moreover, this charter, applying as it does to both the federal and the provincial levels of government, in addition to formally guaranteeing basic civil rights and fundamental freedoms, will go some way towards eliminating a number of inequalities in the protection of these and other rights which many Canadians currently experience.

[Senator Bosa.]

For example, the specific inclusion of mobility rights will, I hope, work towards the elimination of many current situations in which Canadians in the various sections of the country receive different levels of legislative protection on a range of issues. Currently, the B.N.A. Act does not specifically guarantee the freedom of movement of persons in Canada; only the movement of goods between provinces is protected. Section 121 precludes the imposition of custom duties in the interprovincial circulation of goods.

Although the free movement of persons is presently hindered in certain fields, legislation which expressly requires or favours residential qualifications for employment within the province is a relatively new phenomenon. The Petroleum Resources Act of Nova Scotia and the Petroleum and Natural Gas Act of Newfoundland, both require that preference be given to residents of those respective provinces in hiring practices in the fields of exploration and exploitation of petroleum resources. Nova Scotia has also enacted a provincial residency requirement in its Civil Service Act. Quebec, too, for awarding government construction contracts and, generally, in the hiring of construction labour, has stipulated by way of regulation that preference be given to local manpower. Qualification and certification requirements for professionals and tradespeople vary between provinces to further hinder mobility.

Furthermore, in the field of consumer protection, and more specifically relating to the services of travel agents in Canada, we find that only three provinces, namely, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, have enacted statutes that protect travellers against financial loss in the event of bankruptcy by licensed travel agents. But what is more serious, if not unacceptable, is that the British Columbia legislation, contrary to the other two statutes, restricts the protection offered to residents of British Columbia. In other words, while the Quebec and Ontario consumer protection acts, as they relate to travel agents, are designed to protect all Canadians, the British Columbia act is parochial in its scope in that it limits its protection to residents of that province only, or, in the case of non-residents, to those who have contracted travel services that are wholly located in that province.

I have written to Mr. Bennett, the Premier of British Columbia about a specific case involving the Famée Furlane, a member of the Federation of Fogolars Furlans of Canada, a travel agency in Vancouver, and the Travel Assurance Board. Because of the restrictions of the British Columbia statute there are hundreds of Canadians who have suffered substantial financial losses recently.

Let me read a letter I received in connection with this case. It is addressed to the Honourable Peter Bosa, the Senate of Canada, Parliament Buildings, Ottawa, Ontario, and reads:

> Dear Senator Bosa:
> The Premier, the Honourable W. R. Bennett, has forwarded to me his recent correspondence with you concerning the Famee Furlane and the Travel Assurance Board.

In my earlier letter of April 9th to you, I explained the terms of the Travel Agents Act that limited the eligibility of non-residents of British Columbia to claim on the Travel Assurance Fund. It would be inappropriate to consider ex gratia payments to people who were not eligible to benefit from this legislation, as such an action would circumvent the intent of the legislation and could be seen as a precedent for all future claims which may be dismissed by the Board.

I have noted your views on British Columbia's legislation in comparison to similar travel legislation in Ontario and Quebec.

Yours sincerely—

And it is signed by James A. Nielsen, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The examples that I have mentioned are limited to matters expressly provided for by legislation. That says nothing of current practices or even existing administrative directives, which are, as well, guided by narrow protectionism. While some people see such measures as legitimate means of favouring the local interests of the provinces and their residents, those measures inevitably promote the balkanization of our country and directly offend the essential rights inherent in citizenship. Such provincialism is most unfortunate at a time in Canada's history, when national unity and a transcending spirit of co-operation and generosity are of the utmost importance. If such provincialism is not halted, there will soon exist in Canada, to borrow Mr. Chrétien's words, not one Canadian citizenship but ten provincial ones.

Not all of the inequalities in the enjoyment of rights that have just been pointed out will be eliminated under the constitutional charter, when it comes into force. It is, however, reassuring to note that the new charter will ensure that all Canadians will be able to enjoy, irrespective of province of residence, fundamental rights and freedoms, mobility rights regarding residence and the earning of a livelihood, and, finally, minority language educational rights. With respect to other fields, especially those which affect Canadians directly as individuals, such as consumer protection, it is hoped that the beneficial effect of the new charter will spur on all provinces to abandon their provincialism and to embrace a much wider view that will, it is submitted, constitute a major step in closing, in a real way, the gaps that are growing among the regions of Canada.

Finally, I come to an omission in the proposed legislation which is particularly distressing. I refer to the lack of any reference whatsoever to the multicultural nature of Canada. In 1978, a number of government spokesmen, notably Mr. Lalonde and Mr. Cafik, made promises regarding the inclusion of the concept of multiculturalism in any future revision of the Canadian Constitution. In A Time for Action, the chapter headed "The Principles of Renewal" contains the following statement on government policy regarding the enhancement of the cultural mosaic:

• (1700)

The renewal of the Federation must lead to respect for cultural diversity and for the right of every citizen regardless of ethnic origin, to equal opportunity. Every cultural community should be able to rely on the goodwill of governments in preserving its own cultural heritage and in discovering and appreciating those of other communities.

For more than a century, people of other ethnic origins have come to Canada and settled beside those of British and French ancestry. A large number of them have joined the English-speaking majority and others the French-speaking majority, without in the process losing their individuality.

With the sheer weight of their numbers, it is natural that the French and British cultures occupy a major place in Canada. But there is no question of having only one or two official cultures. Canadian society must promote cultural diversity, clearly and explicitly.

This diversity will only be protected if we ensure that Canadians of all ethnic origins have equal opportunities and full protection against discrimination.

There is no question that a number of basic rights and freedoms are guaranteed to persons of all ethnic groups in their own right as individuals under the proposed charter. However, something more was, and still is, envisaged by Canada's various ethnic groups and immigrants, many of whom no doubt feel particularly disappointed by the omission of any positive reference to the promotion of a multicultural society.

A Time for Action also states:

The renewed Constitution should contain a Statement of Aims which would reflect the understanding of what Canada means to all of us—native peoples, members of our two great linguistic communities, and people of many lands and cultures who have chosen to make Canada their home. The government will be putting forward a Statement in the hope that it may assist the search, by the people and by governments, for those ideal words which will best express what is in our hearts.

The constitutional legislation which followed Bill C-60 did not, in effect, do this, and the legislation currently before Parliament, while not complete, does even less in this regard.

In 1963 the federal government established the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism with the mandate of conducting a broad and comprehensive inquiry into bilingualism and biculturalism. Book IV of the royal commission's report stated:

Many of the non-British, non-French groups accept bilingualism but categorically reject biculturalism. They concede Canada to be a country with two official languages, but argue that it is fundamentally multicultural.

In October 1971, the Prime Minister tabled in the House of Commons the Policy of Multiculturalism which was a direct response to the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. This policy reflects the pluralistic composition of our society within a bilingual framework. The unanimous support given by the opposition parties was an endorsement of a national reality.

Undoubtedly, the preamble to the Constitution will contain a clear definition of Canadian society as it is, and as it should be, recognized for its pluralistic nature. But a reference to the preamble is not sufficient to guarantee the rights to all Canadians to maintain and foster their respective cultures.

I firmly believe that cultural diversity is the very essence of Canadian identity. Each individual in this country has the right to preserve and develop his own culture and values within the Canadian context. The fact that we have two official languages does not make a particular culture more official than another. It is precisely for this reason that I recommend to the joint committee that the wording in section 22 of the proposed Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms be amended by inserting the words "and culture" after the word "language." It would then read as follows:

> Nothing in section 16 to 20 abrogates or derogates from any legal or customary right or privilege acquired or enjoyed either before or after the coming into force of this Charter with respect to any language and culture that is not English or French.

I would urge the committee to consider amending section 24 by making it refer specifically to Indian people and by adding another sentence at the end, which would read as follows:

> Nor should it be construed as denying the positive actions which the federal government has already taken and will continue to take with regard to its policy of promoting multiculturalism, in order to ensure a vigorous environment for the many origins, creeds and cultures which comprise the Canadian society.

Senator Frith: How would the whole section read?

Senator Bosa: At the end of section 24 we add another sentence. Perhaps I should repeat it.

Senator Frith: Read the whole section.

Senator Bosa: Section 24 reads:

> The guarantee in this Charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed as denying the existence of any other rights or freedoms that exist in Canada, including any rights or freedoms that pertain to the native peoples of Canada.

The National Indian Brotherhood has objected to the description "native peoples", because it believes it may be confused with the Métis people. It wants specific reference to Indian people. I would recommend that we add to this section the following sentence:

> Nor should it be construed as denying the positive actions which the federal government has already taken and will continue to take with regard to its policy of promoting multiculturalism, in order to ensure a vigorous environment for the many origins, creeds and cultures which comprise the Canadian society.

If those amendments could be incorporated in this constitutional package, it will go a long way toward reassuring the ethno-cultural communities that this government is not just paying lip service to them. I hope that those honourable senators who will be members of the joint committee to consider the constitutional package in detail will take note of these proposed amendments, and make vigorous representations for their adoption.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED RESOLUTION FOR A JOINT ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada", tabled in the Senate on 6th October, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like this order to stand. Since it deals with the subject of the motion we are now debating, I would suggest that it be allowed to expire. However, I will make that suggestion tomorrow. I would prefer to make my remarks relating to the subject matter of that inquiry when I participate in the debate on the motion. For the present, I ask that this order stand.

Senator Flynn: We will consider that.

Senator Frith: Another honourable senator may wish to speak to this order, in which case I will yield.

Order stands.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—HISTORICAL FACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA REFERENCE CASE—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry by the Honourable Senator Smith:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores which distinguish that claim from the British Columbia claim as dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights (the British Columbia Reference case), (1967) Supreme Court Reports, 792, and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, and submit that the said decision does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I ask that this inquiry stand, for the reason I mentioned when I made a similar request yesterday and last week—not because I am not prepared.

Inquiry stands.

The Senate adjourned until 2 p.m. tomorrow.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 29, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—COMMONS MEMBERS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that I have received a message from the House of Commons in the following words:

Tuesday, October 28, 1980

Ordered,—That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that Messrs. Beatty, Bockstael, Miss Campbell (South West Nova), Messrs. Corbin, Crombie, Epp, Fraser, Henderson, Irwin, Joyal, Knowles, Lapierre, Mackasey, McGrath and Nystrom have been appointed to serve on the part of this House on the Special Joint Committee to consider a proposed Address to Her Majesty the Queen concerning the Constitution of Canada.

Attest

C. B. Koester
The Clerk of the House of Commons

Ordered, that the message do lie on the Table.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, on a question of privilege, I would point out that it was less than 48 hours ago that we received the message from the House of Commons requesting the Senate to unite with that house in the appointment of a special joint committee, and already we have received the list of members from the House of Commons who will serve on that committee. I consider this to be a rather unusual procedure in that members are appointed to a committee which does not yet exist—although it may be in existence at the end of this week.

• (1405)

I consider this to be a direction to this chamber to get on with adopting the resolution and appointing members to the committee. It imposes an unnecessary deadline on us, and it is an infringement of the privilege of this chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I have an opportunity to reply to this point of privilege? Part of the motion adopted by the House of Commons called for the naming of 15 members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days "after the adoption of the motion." The members named in the message from the other place will serve on the joint committee only after there has been Senate approval for the establishment of the joint committee. The terms of the motion approved in the other place have been met, but, of course, there will be no joint committee unless honourable senators decide that such a joint committee shall come into existence.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, concerning this question of privilege, I suggest that the argument put forward by the Leader of the Government is completely out of order.

The fact of the matter is that they are now setting up a special joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons. This resolution was adopted by the other place. Before this joint committee could be set up, they have decided to propose the names of people who are to sit on this committee, people who may never be in fact called upon to sit on this joint committee. Should the Senate decide not to join the House of Commons, this committee might never exist.

I suggest, therefore, that the decision to appoint immediately members of the other place to sit on this committee, a committee which does not exist yet, is another example of the contempt in which the other place holds the Senate.

[English]

Senator Perrault: I would suggest that some senators are being unduly sensitive in the views which they hold with respect to the action by members of the other place. It seems to me that the House of Commons has been unusually forthcoming in providing so quickly the names of the people they would have serve on this joint committee. Indeed, it may assist us in our debate.

• (1410)

Senator Flynn: To vote against.

Senator Perrault: Knowing the names of those who are apparently going to serve on this joint committee, should we vote in favour of this motion, gives us greater background to the debate as to whether or not we want the committee to be brought into existence.

Senator Flynn: Do you suggest that it is an argument for or against? Possibly, Mr. Speaker, you could on some occasion discuss this matter with Madam Speaker of the other place and suggest that she wait and send messages of this kind after we have made up our minds.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, technically speaking, it could be so, since the committee has not yet officially been formed. However, I do not think that constitutes a bias against the Senate or honourable senators. The worst that can happen, of course, is that the committee never be formed and then those people would have been appointed for nothing. But for now, I do not think that constitutes a bias against the Senate or against honourable senators.

I am willing to discuss it with the Speaker in the other place. However at this point, it does not strike me as being a basic issue.

[English]

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I do not wish to enter into an argument with His Honour the Speaker, but if the translation of what he said was correct I believe he said that the worst that could happen would be that the Senate would not unite with the Commons in this joint committee. I would like to say that that would be the best that could happen.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if we want to be really objective I think that if anyone should raise a question of privilege in this regard it would have to be the members of the other place, because they are the ones who appointed people to a non-existent committee.

[English]

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Department of External Affairs for the year ended December 31, 1979, pursuant to section 6 of the Department of External Affairs Act, Chapter E-20, R.S.C., 1970.

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1980-2914, dated October 28, 1980, establishing that the inquiry into certain activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police shall report to the Governor in Council not later than March 31, 1981.

Budget papers, dated October 28, 1980, being Notices of Ways and Means Motions (1) to amend the Income Tax Act, (2) to amend the Excise Tax Act, (3) to amend the Excise Tax Act (1), (4) to amend the Excise Act, (5) with respect to the Taxation of Petroleum and Gas Net Revenues, (6) to amend the Petroleum Administration Act, (7) to amend the Customs Tariff No. 3, together with supplementary information on the Budget; and related documents issued by the Minister of Finance, as follows:

"The Fiscal Projections—Notes and Additional Tables";

"The Medium-Term Prospects for the Canadian Economy 1980-1985"; and

"The National Energy Program 1980".

THE BUDGET—POLICY RESPECTING CANADIAN OWNERSHIP OF OIL COMPANIES

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, that was quite a budget speech last night.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Since the Leader of the Government has initiated that round of applause, I have a comment using the words of La Fontaine:

Ce bloc enfariné ne me dit rien qui vaille!

I want to put a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. I am very curious about the policy with regard to Canadian ownership of petroleum companies and the imposition of the so-called Canadian ownership charge that would be triggered by a decision on the part of Petro-Canada's board of directors to acquire an existing petroleum company. In his speech, Mr. MacEachen stated:

• (1415)

Revenue for the Account will be provided by a Canadian Ownership Charge imposed on all oil and gas consumption in Canada which will come into operation as the acquisition program . . . Petro-Canada will be charged initially with the task of acquiring the Canadian operations of one or more multinational oil companies.

My question to the minister is whether there is any budgetary precedent in Canadian history for a crown corporation being accorded the privilege of imposing taxes upon the population of Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not believe there is such a precedent, and I do not believe that Petro-Canada or any other crown corporation will be imposing taxes on the Canadian people under this proposal. What will happen, of course, is that the amount of levy that would be required to make that a self-sustaining effort would be imposed by authority of Parliament first, and then by the executive acting on authority from Parliament. It may be that Petro-Canada would be one of the instruments used for that purpose, but the honourable senator should read the rest of the papers that were attached, because there may also be some acquisition of gas and oil energy resources owned by foreign companies now, even multinational ones, that would be acquired with financial support from the government and not only through the instrument of Petro-Canada.

Senator Flynn: Otherwise, that is true. More than one company might trigger the imposition of the tax.

Senator Olson: It may be that the government would require that tax revenue for the acquisition of some foreign-owned energy resource in Canada, but what is also clear is that Petro-Canada is not necessarily going to be the only crown corporation confined to conducting this kind of business.

Senator Flynn: You suggest another crown corporation?

Senator Olson: It may be another crown corporation. Certainly, it would be a crown corporation or a holding company set up in the form of a crown corporation which would own the assets in Canada of some of the multinational oil companies, if and when that happens.

I should also point out that there is clearly some distinct competitive advantage to privately owned Canadian companies to acquire, explore and develop, thereby adding to Canada's resources—that is, the percentage of ownership in Canadian hands.

Hon. Lowell Murray: I have a supplementary question for the minister with regard to this particular tax. For the purpose of clarification, will the minister confirm that what the government is asking Parliament to do is to authorize a certain tax to be imposed, the rate of which and incidence of which will be determined in due course by the cabinet in its wisdom. What has become of certainty of taxation?

● (1420)

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I think my honourable friend should read it more carefully. The government has several acts pursuant to which there are adjustable fees from time to time for certain activities.

Senator Murray: This is not a fee; this is a tax.

Senator Olson: What is clearly indicated is that it will be used when it is necessary to finance the acquisition of these Canadian resources by Canadians, including the Canadian government through the instrument of Petro-Canada.

Senator Flynn: In any event, there is no precedent for it.

POST OFFICE

THE BUDGET—REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In last evening's budget speech, the Minister of Finance spoke of the proposed conversion of the Post Office into a crown corporation. At page 14 of the speech, the minister said:

> The new crown corporation will be expected, however, to cover its costs. For the purposes of my fiscal projections I have, therefore, assumed that postal revenues will rise until they equal postal expenditures.

In his projections, the minister did not account for the expected half billion dollar deficit in the Post Office over the next fiscal year. To raise the amount of money necessary to make postal revenues equal postal expenditures, they are going to have to raise that half billion.

[Senator Flynn.]

Will the Leader of the Government indicate if this announced increase in postal rates will come into effect before the Christmas mailing?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. There is no intention at the present time to introduce massive increases in postal rates before the Christmas period, to my knowledge.

Senator Asselin: How do you know that?

ENERGY

STATUS OF APPLICATION BY Q & M PIPE LINES TO CONSTRUCT A PIPELINE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. On January 12 last, in Halifax, Mr. Trudeau promised that the Q & M pipeline would be built immediately. This spring the application of Q & M Pipe Lines to build that pipeline was rejected, and it was rejected primarily—and I quote from Senator Olson's response to me of October 15 last—"on the basis of unsatisfactory information about environmental concerns."

In that same reply, Senator Olson told us, further, that information had been put before the National Energy Board and that as soon as a decision was forthcoming he would be most pleased to inform honourable senators.

My question is this: Does last night's statement by the Minister of Finance that, as a matter of national priority, the government will ensure—and I underline the word "ensure"—that the natural gas pipeline is extended beyond Montreal to Quebec City and the maritimes constitute an announcement of a decision by the National Energy Board, or is it an indication only what their decision will be, or—another alternative—is it an indication that there is a directive being given to the National Energy Board that they approve this extension?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, what those passages in the budget speech of last evening indicate is a firm reaffirmation, if I may put it that way, of the government's stated policy and its determination to have a gas line in place, thereby making natural gas available to as much of the country as possible, including a gas line all the way to the east coast, together with the laterals that are involved. It does not constitute an announcement on behalf of the National Energy Board. However, it does indicate—

Senator Flynn: Does it replace it?

Senator Olson: —the government's determination that that line be built and completed, for purposes that were stated some time ago.

Senator Asselin: When?

Senator Olson: I am sure my honourable friend would be the first one to criticize if we did not allow these kinds of applications to go through the regulatory boards that have been set up in respect of such things as environmental considerations, and the other reasons why there has to be a fairly complete indication of intentions, locations, and so on, prior to construction. There is no change in that respect, and the National Energy Board, hopefully, will take into consideration those matters that caused it to reject the application in respect of that portion of the line at the time of the first application by Q & M Pipe Lines. We make no apology for being in favour of it all being built.

• (1425)

Senator Donahoe: May I ask a supplementary question? When the minister replied to my question on a previous occasion he told me that the decision not to proceed with the line from Quebec into Nova Scotia was a decision of the National Energy Board. He said that the government was in favour of its proceeding, but that the National Energy Board had found reasons why it did not think it should be built.

That decision of the National Energy Board was thwarting the decision announced in Halifax by the Prime Minister that the line would be built. Now we have a statement by the Minister of Finance that it will be built, and I really want to know if there has been a change in the relationship between the government and the National Energy Board and whether the National Energy Board still has the authority to make of its own volition, a negative decision, as it did on the previous occasion.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there seems to be some unfortunate lack of understanding of the functions of Parliament and of the National Energy Board, and, indeed, of the government's intention. In case my honourable friend does not understand, the government is obliged to obey the laws passed by Parliament in this country. Parliament in its wisdom has given to the National Energy Board certain authority to make decisions respecting applications, locations and all the other considerations that go in before a permit is issued under the National Energy Board Act and requirements. The board did receive an application, heard the evidence and came to a decision. The decision was to issue a permit to build that line as far as Quebec, plus some laterals, but they needed some clarification on environmental considerations to go the rest of the distance. So they have asked for additional information to satisfy their concerns about environment.

I am led to believe that some or all of that additional clarification respecting environmental concerns has been filed with the National Energy Board. But that certainly does not change the government's stated objective, and that is to get the line built as soon as possible. That was restated last night. So that is no news to my honourable friend. He has heard that on many occasions. He has heard me say it in the chamber and he now quotes the Prime Minister as having said it. It is the government's opinion that the entire line to Halifax and the east coast ought to be built.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, may I ask a further supplementary question? It will be my last. I take it that I am to understand from what the minister has just said that when the Minister of Finance used the words, "the government will ensure the building of the pipeline," that was in effect mere puffery because he could not, in light of what we have just been told by Senator Olson, give direction to the National Energy Board, but could only apply to the National Energy Board and abide by its decision.

Senator Olson: I do not want to go over again what I have just explained in detail, but I want to say to my honourable friend that I completely disagree with his interpretation.

GAS TRANSMISSION COSTS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. What would it cost to transmit 1,000 cubic feet of natural gas from Calgary to the Halifax gate?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I do not have that information.

Senator Flynn: Was it not on the order paper?

Senator Olson: Although I usually anticipate questions such as that and have the answers ready, I do not happen to have that one, but I will take the question as notice.

APPLICATION BY Q & M PIPE LINES—OBJECTION BY GOVERNMENT OF NEW BRUNSWICK—NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD DECISION

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a supplementary to Senator Donahoe's questions to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

I suggest that the minister has been most gracious in not drawing this to the attention of the house, but is it not a fact that the National Energy Board's decision with respect to the Q & M pipeline was based in large measure on the strong objections to the extension of that line from Quebec east by the Conservative government of New Brunswick? That government made the strongest possible representations.

Senator Asselin: When? When, Charlie, when?

Senator McElman: When you have the floor I will not interrupt you.

Senator Asselin: When?

Senator McElman: Give me the same courtesy and just keep your peace.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator McElman: When the hearings of the National Energy Board were held in Halifax prior to a decision that was made. If you want the date, I can look it up for you and give it to you at a later time.

The Conservative government of the Province of New Brunswick opposed it, but I will not go into the reasons why it opposed it, which I am well aware of, as most of us New Brunswickers are. In any event, is it not a fact that that was one of the basic reasons, and haven't the conditions now changed, in that within the last week the Government of New Brunswick, through its principal spokesman, has withdrawn its objections to the extension of that pipeline and has thereby changed the whole status of the kind of approach for the construction of that pipeline for consideration by the National Energy Board?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, yes, that is my information.

Senator Flynn: You should thank the honourable senator.

Senator Olson: Yes, I do thank Senator McElman for the question.

Senator Flynn: For the information!

Senator Olson: Well, I had the information before, but, as Senator McElman has so graciously and properly pointed out—

Senator Flynn: That's quite right.

Senator Olson: —these objections by the Province of New Brunswick were known and cited by the National Energy Board when the board made its decision to withhold approval of this section east of Quebec. It is also a fact that there have been indications, although I do not believe they have been put formally to the National Energy Board in a hearing, that they have modified their position since.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to this line of questioning. Am I to understand that the allegation made by Senator McElman, now agreed to by the minister, is that the National Energy Board made its negative decision about the pipeline, not on the merits of the objections raised by the Province of New Brunswick but simply because it was the Government of New Brunswick that raised them? Now, the government having withdrawn them, if what he says is correct, the National Energy Board is not considering them any more. Is that the way the board operates?

Senator Olson: No, that is not it at all. What I said was that the National Energy Board cited that objection as part of its reasons, I believe, in withholding a permit to build that pipeline east of Quebec. But I do not believe that the Province of New Brunswick has since been able to appear formally before the National Energy Board to change its position, although I have heard that it has changed its position somewhat. That, I think, is useful information, and no doubt it will be filing it. It may already have written a letter or conveyed that information to the National Energy Board, but I do not know that it has in a formal way.

● (1435)

Senator Smith: I thank the minister for his comment, but—

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, on a question of privilege, I would not want my comment to be misinterpreted. On a question of privilege one has the right to explain when his comments have been misinterpreted, and I am sure that the Honourable Senator Smith would not do it intentionally.

I stated that one of the basic, principal, reasons why the National Energy Board made its decision was because of the representation of the Government of New Brunswick. That is a matter of record, and the National Energy Board has so stated.

I went further to say that the conditions on which the National Energy Board considers such matters have now changed in view of the change of attitude, or the representation, of the Government of New Brunswick—which is quite different from the interpretation put upon it by the Honourable Senator Smith.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I would not have much to say about the question of privilege, but I do say that I am still left with the impression, as a result of the comments of both Senator McElman and the minister, that in their view the board made its decision, in part at least, based upon the fact that the Government of New Brunswick made certain objections—not necessarily upon the merits of those objections, but because the Government of New Brunswick made them.

If that is the way the National Energy Board makes its decisions, I would be very surprised, but that is the impression I got from what has been said. Now that it seems that the Government of New Brunswick may no longer be making those objections, regardless again of the merits, it is likely that the National Energy Board will go ahead and make a new decision to a different effect.

That seems to me to be an assertion that the National Energy Board has not been dealing with this matter on the question of the merits raised for and against, but merely because a government has raised objections. I do not believe—that is too strong a phrase; I would be very surprised if the National Energy Board operates on that method. I have always been confident that the National Energy Board dealt with the merits of the situation and that it was a free and independent agency.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith: However, from what has been said by the participants in this discussion, I have serious doubt as to whether that belief, which I have held for many years—and I have had some experience relating to it—is wrong.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think the easiest way for Senator Smith to satisfy the interpretation is for him to read the decision of the National Energy Board—

Senator Smith: I have read it and re-read it.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator says he has re-read it, and therefore he does not have to ask me about the reasons of the National Energy Board. He knows them. So I do not really understand why he is trying to get me to interpret the reasons why the National Energy Board does this, that, or the other thing. He already knows, if he has read it carefully.

Senator Smith: I was not asking the honourable gentleman to interpret anything. I am not sure that he is capable of it, in view of the facts that he now seems to have revealed, with the co-operation of Senator McElman.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, all I can say is that Senator Smith's interpretation of my interpretation of the National Energy Board's reasons is also erroneous.

Senator Smith: That puts us pretty even, doesn't it?

QUEBEC & MARITIMES PIPELINE—EASTERN TERMINUS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary on the Q & M pipeline. Could the minister responsible for economic development tell us what the eastern terminus is of the Q & M pipeline?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Not at the moment, but that information is easily available. It is contained in great detail in the application made by the sponsoring company to the National Energy Board. If the honourable senator does not already have a copy in his office, I will be glad to provide him with one, but I think by making a brief phone call he could have it sent to him immediately.

Senator Phillips: I was not referring to the application before the National Energy Board, but to the statement made in last night's budget. In other words, the federal government must have some terminal in mind, if they are going to make sure that the pipeline goes to the maritimes, and therefore I expect a member of the government to be able to tell us what terminal they have in mind. Is it Saint John? Halifax? Sydney?

● (1440)

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, it would certainly go as far east as is necessary, and there would then be laterals off that main line to all those areas that can be served within the realm of economic feasibility.

Senator Phillips: Does the honourable minister consider that taking natural gas into Cape Breton, to compete with the revived coal industry there, is a matter of good economic development?

Senator Olson: We would think that natural gas, which appears to be a lower cost fuel for a number of purposes, should be available to any and all communities in Canada that can demonstrate economic feasibility and express a desire to have it.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I would like to follow up Senator Phillips' question. I was intrigued a few moments ago, as I think anybody who understands the geography and politics of the area would have been, by the minister's statement that the pipeline would be extended from Montreal and Quebec to Halifax and beyond Halifax. The minister is not unaware that one of the candidates for the terminus is in the area of the Strait of Canso. I wonder whether he is giving us advance notice that the decision has been made in this respect?

Senator Olson: No, honourable senators, the minister is not giving advance notice of that.

THE BUDGET—EFFECT OF OIL PRICING POLICY

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, certainly it is my hope that the National Energy Board is not only listening to representations made by the Government of New Brunswick, but to other representations as well, for the extension of the Q and M pipeline for the good of eastern Canada and, in fact, the whole country. However, I have a question that I would like to direct to the Honourable Senator Olson.

In increasing energy taxes, the government has obviously rejected the companion pieces contained in the last budget that is, the Conservative budget. This budget raises for the federal government half a billion dollars more than the previous budget—the Crosbie budget—did, yet it provides no compensation to low- and middle-income earners who will have to bear the new taxes. Why has the government not introduced an equivalent to the energy tax credit which would have returned $220 a year to each family with an income under $21,000?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Well, what honourable senators will know, if they want to draw us into this budget, is that there is one very significant proposal in the previous budget that is not in this one, and that is the excise tax of 18 cents per gallon. Of course, the simple answer to this question is that if you do not take something away in the first place, you do not need a program to give it back.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question is also for the Minister of Economic Development, and it has to do with one of the interesting basic principles in the national energy program. I am referring particularly to the principle of fairness of the pricing and revenue-sharing regime, which recognizes the needs and rights of all Canadians.

I would like to ask the minister how the burden of the energy taxes that are imposed by last night's budget is going to be borne by people on low incomes, and pensioners, without any sort of relief similar to that which was introduced in the last Conservative budget?

Senator Olson: I answered that question just a minute ago. The excise tax of 18 cents per gallon that was introduced in the last budget is, of course, not in this budget.

Senator Flynn: We are speaking of your own taxes.

Senator Olson: Indeed, the amount of the increase in natural gas prices across Canada, as well as the totality of crude oil prices across Canada, will be less than the amount that would have wound up in the consumer stream.

Senator Flynn: How much?

Senator Olson: The logic is very simple. If you do not take it away, as the Conservatives were going to do, then you do not need a scheme to give it back.

Senator Flynn: How much?

Senator Olson: Substantial.

Senator Flynn: I am speaking of cents. One cent less? Two cents less?

Senator Asselin: Face the truth.

Senator Olson: The first thing we have to understand is that the difference between 7 cents per gallon, as I believe it is, and 25 cents a gallon—which is what the Conservatives proposed on gasoline, diesel fuel and that sort of thing—is 18 cents per gallon. That is not being imposed this time, so on that count the difference is 18 cents a gallon.

Senator Flynn: And on the other counts?

Senator Olson: On the other counts it will be less.

Senator Flynn: How much?

Senator Olson: Substantially less.

Senator Asselin: How much?

Senator Smith: Do you not know how much?

Senator Asselin: How much?

Senator Olson: I can find out how much.

Senator Charbonneau: Why make the statement if you do not know?

Senator Olson: All I know is that it is less.

Senator Perrault: Just be patient.

Senator Olson: But the significance of that amount is really not very large in relation to the 18 cents, which was a very large amount.

Senator Marshall: The minister keeps referring to the 18 cents increase, but he fails to say that there was relief for the low income earner and the pensioner by means of an energy tax credit of $80 per adult. How can he reconcile that with the increases in the price of fuel oil, which has nothing to do with natural gas or anything else? Poor people on welfare and the pensioners can't cope with the price of fuel oil, let alone buy enough food to eat. There is no mention made in the budget about relief for these people. How does the minister reconcile that with this basic principle of fairness and opportunity for all Canadians?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator knows very well that the cost of fuel, for all purposes, in Canada is less than anywhere else in the world.

Senator Flynn: The question that Senator Marshall was trying to put to you, and which you refuse to answer is that last year, with regard to the 18 cents, there was some compensation. With regard to the new taxes announced last night by Mr. MacEachen, is there any compensation? The answer is no. So just say that.

Senator Olson: The answer is somewhat different, and it seems to be very difficult for the Leader of the Opposition to understand.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Olson: Yet I know he is a very intelligent person. It is pretty simple. If you do not take it away in the first place, you do not need to give it back.

[Senator Flynn.]

Hon. G. I. Smith: But you are taking it out of the pocketbooks of the person who buys fuel oil for heating his house. I do not see how you can deny that. That is a perfectly straightforward assertion, backed up by what the Minister of Finance said last night. There is no compensation to the people least able to pay the increased tax.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators seem to have forgotten that there is an oil import compensation credit that is given to lower the price of all types of fuel, including oil, for all Canadians.

Senator Asselin: Who does it go to?

Senator Olson: The totality of whatever it happens to be is probably the lowest price for fuel anywhere in the world.

Senator Perrault: Why don't you use your own hot air for fuel?

Senator Smith: If I had a match I could light a fire by holding it close to the honourable gentleman.

An Hon. Senator: You have forgotten!

• (1450)

Senator Smith: I haven't forgotten anything, at least not along the line of which the honourable gentleman is speaking. I do not think he has forgotten anything either, but he is taking great care not to mention that the budget last night substantially increases the cost per gallon or per litre of fuel oil to every person in this country who burns fuel oil to heat his living quarters—and substantially increases it by several hundred dollars a year. Whatever the honourable gentleman may say about the price of fuel oil in Canada relative to the price of fuel oil in other countries, he cannot deny that the action of the government last night placed this extra burden that I have just referred to on the pocketbooks of the people of Canada, and they are not relieved of that by any compensation whatsoever in the budget.

Senator Olson: What is clear, however you add it up, honourable senators, is that the increases last night are less than my honourable friend's colleagues in the other place proposed last year.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith: I think my honourable friend has to do a taxing exercise to come to that conclusion.

Senator Perrault: That is a foolish remark.

Senator Smith: That is an honest remark and a correct remark, and you can go and do the figuring yourself.

Senator Flynn: They have forgotten how to do that.

Senator Phillips: You had better get some advice from your deputy again.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Since we cannot get any answers under the national energy strategy, let us try the economic strategy. The minister stated last night that the government would sustain social and economic assistance to those most in need.

Since it is determined by the experts we hear on television, and by others that it is going to cost each individual in Canada $500 more for fuel, in one form or another, is the minister able to reconcile that figure with the government's aim to effect some relief for the people most in need?

Senator Olson: It seems very difficult for honourable senators opposite to understand a few things. What the Minister of Finance said is that the government will sustain its determination to help those who find it difficult to correct their own situations. Then my honourable friend opposite starts adding up all the wrong figures. He is talking about $500, but that is probably over a four-year period.

Senator Asselin: No, no.

Senator Olson: However you add it all up, whether it is one year or four years, it will be less.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Flynn: You are repeating the lies of the last campaign.

THE BUDGET—EFFECT ON ENERGY INDUSTRY IN WESTERN CANADA

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development, and I am sure he will be delighted to answer it. I assume, in arriving at the budget decisions last night, that some thought was given to the impact of the several new taxes on the western Canada energy industry. Did the government make any calculations as to the amount of energy industry investment which could be expected to leave Canada as a result of the imposition of the petroleum compensation charge and the new uniform tax on all natural gas production?

Has there been a calculation of the amount of unemployment which will be created as a result of energy companies quitting Canada for more profitable investments elsewhere? If so, what is the result of those calculations?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The precise calculations the honourable senator is asking for, of course, are really very hypothetical because on the other side of the energy package that was announced are some very significant incentives to Canadian industry if they undertake exploration and development so that there is a gradual transfer of more ownership of those energy resources to Canadian individuals and firms. A significant portion of the revenue coming from those taxes will be redirected back into the industry to enhance Canadian ownership, and we think that is a desirable end result. However, as a result of those grants and incentives of several kinds, we think that there is a very real prospect that those Canadian firms will, in fact, enhance their activity in Canada.

Senator Balfour: I am delighted to hear that estimates have been made of the type described, and I understand why these may not be precise, but they can be, of course, approximate. Would the minister be prepared to table in this chamber these calculations or estimates which, I understand, would be ballpark figures but which would, nevertheless, give the public of Canada and the members of the Senate some insight into what the likely net result will be on the Canadian energy industry?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and find out whether the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has done any projections of that nature.

Senator Balfour: As a further supplementary, did I misunderstand the honourable gentleman when he informed me in his first response that calculations had been made?

Senator Olson: Yes, you did. I did not say positively that I knew that calculations had been made on all those points; I said that they may have been made. I will now make inquiries, and if they have been made, and if I can get the figures, I will bring them to this chamber.

QUEBEC & MARITIMES PIPELINE—EFFECT ON COAL MINING INDUSTRY IN EASTERN CANADA

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development and relates to the question posed by my colleague, Senator Phillips. In regard to the proposed gas pipeline to the east coast, it would be interesting to know if it is the intention of the government, the National Energy Board, or whoever—because of the questions today it is difficult to know who has the final say—that the pipeline should stop at Halifax or the Strait of Canso which is in the riding of the Minister of Finance. I might add that that would be a good area for the pipeline to terminate since feeder lines could then supply other parts of the island.

Has a study been made by the National Energy Board as to what effect the provision of natural gas to the east coast would have on the coal industry with regard to the production of British thermal units?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will look into that matter, honourable senators. I do not know if a study has been made on that exact reference.

Senator Muir: As a supplementary, the minister knows progress is being made in the development of new coal mines, and we have reason to believe that coal is coming back as a fuel because of the difficulties in the Middle East. Does the minister feel, or does the government feel, that the operation of coal mines on the east coast will be reduced because natural gas will be more economical and, therefore, mines would close rather than open? This is not a good situation so far as employment is concerned. I should like to get all the information I possibly can on this matter.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we would like all Canadians, no matter where they live in Canada, to have access to gas because of the ease of distribution, and it is a particularly clean fuel for many heating purposes. There is a very good prospect of that gas pipeline being filled from Sable Island and the surrounding areas. It seems to me that there may come a day when that is possible.

I will try and find out whether the terminus is going to be in Halifax, Sydney, or some other place, but I would expect that the laterals that will be built into the main line, wherever the terminus of the line is, will be installed wherever it is economically feasible to serve Canadians.

Senator Muir: May I point out to the honourable gentleman that there are two lines of thought? Natural gas may be a wonderful thing for the east coast, but it is difficult to know. By the same token it may cause difficulties for the coal industry that is now there, particularly with respect to electricity-generating plants and other coal consuming industries, and that is why we would like to have all the information on it that we can get.

● (1500)

Senator Olson: That information would be useful and I will try to get it for my friend.

THE BUDGET—CONSTRUCTION OF NATURAL GAS PIPELINE TO VANCOUVER ISLAND

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. It follows from the question Senator Muir was asking but it affects my own province of British Columbia. I note with pleasure that the budget provides financial assistance by the Government of Canada for the construction of a natural gas pipeline to Vancouver Island. Can the government leader indicate whether the Province of British Columbia has responded affirmatively to this proposal for assistance to the communities and industries of Vancouver Island?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I am very pleased to confirm to the Honourable Senator Austin that the Government of Canada would like to enter into active negotiations with the Province of British Columbia to extend natural gas to Vancouver Island. In the past there has been some question as to the feasibility of the line. At times the provincial government has expressed support for the proposal, and at other times it can be construed that it has felt the time was not appropriate for the construction of such a line. We would like to enter into discussions with the Government of British Columbia to bring natural gas to Vancouver Island, and if the line is not constructed, an alternative program will be put in place to help those residents of Vancouver Island who must depend on oil heating and are not able to achieve the economies that can be realized by the use of natural gas.

Senator Austin: May I ask the government leader, bearing in mind that there are two applications—one from Westcoast Transmission and one from British Columbia Hydro, which are outstanding for the construction of this line—if it is the position of the Government of Canada that the choice will be left to the Public Utilities Commission of British Columbia, or the provincial government, or will there be some other means of making a decision as to which is the most economically feasible route?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand that that decision has yet to be made; however, the construction of a natural gas pipeline to Vancouver Island could be part of the national government's $550 million program for energy initiatives in British Columbia.

QUEBEC & MARITIMES PIPELINE—REVERSE TRANSMISSION CAPABILITY

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, could I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development to return for a moment to the subject of the Q and M pipeline? I was very encouraged to hear what I thought I heard him say a moment ago in answer to one of my colleagues, that the question of gas in Nova Scotia and the consumption thereof stood a good chance of being affected by gas from Sable Island.

I was also encouraged to hear him refer to a reversible pipeline, if I heard him correctly. Is that line, which the government announced last night is to be built to some place in Nova Scotia, to be a reversible one?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I think so, but there is nothing new in the announcement that was made last night. The sponsors of the previous application for the so-called Quebec and Maritime pipeline had indicated that they would put it in in such a way that it could be reversible.

Senator Smith: I am not quite sure what you mean. Do you mean that it would not be reversible in the first instance but that it would be constructed so that it could be converted readily?

Senator Olson: It can't be both forward and reverse at the same time. It has to be one or the other at any given time.

Senator Murray: Unlike the government.

Senator Olson: Only minor modifications in the valves and plumbing around the pumping stations are needed in order to pump gas east or west. If, in the first instance, the line is designed to be reversible, it is a very simple process to reverse the flow.

Senator Smith: Is the minister aware whether any calculations have been made by the government to compare the cost of making the pipeline easily reversible in the way the minister has just described as against making it a one-way telescope pipeline now and later doing whatever is necessary to transmit the gas westward from the east coast?

Senator Olson: I am not sure, but I think that that information was also in the application that was made for the entire Q and M some time ago.

THE BUDGET—LOWER NELSON RIVER—POLICY RESPECTING HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I address a question to the Leader of the Government in connection with last night's budget? I noted with some pleasure the government's decision to assist in the development of the Lower Churchill River in the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador, and I wonder whether the government would consider extending the same policy to the development of the Lower Nelson River in the province of Manitoba?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

THE BUDGET—EFFECT ON AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I had a question for Senator Argue but in his absence I will direct it to Senator Olson. The agriculture industry is perhaps the largest consumer of energy in Canada. The previous budget suggested, in raising energy prices, a rebate of 10 cents a gallon on energy consumed for agricultural purposes. Would Senator Olson be good enough to indicate why farmers have not been offered a similar rebate by present government in the present budget?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, honourable senators, I would be glad to. It is the same reason that I gave a few minutes ago. They are not going to take it away in the first place; therefore, they don't need to give it back.

Senator Asselin: That's a false principle.

OIL IMPORTED FROM MEXICO—COST OF CONVERSION

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development. It relates back to a question I asked him on May 1 with respect to oil imported from Mexico. I asked the minister whether those who had negotiated the Mexican oil deal had taken into consideration the quality of oil we were getting from the Mexicans, and the minister replied that surely negotiators were well aware of the fact that there could be different qualities in the oil.

I notice that the minister didn't say that the 50,000 barrels being imported was of poor quality, and I asked at the time whether the government had taken into consideration the additional costs of conversion, and the minister said yes. I understand that some newspapers now report that we were outfoxed—not to use other terms—and I would like the minister to comment on exactly what has been happening with respect to the Mexican oil imports?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there are many implications in that question. One is whether it was anticipated that the imported oil is of low quality and therefore would require more expensive refining. I am sure that that is so. Another implication is whether or not the extra refining is provided for in the Oil Import Compensation Program to bring the cost down to the average cost, and so on.

• (1510)

So that I may give you a complete answer, and get you accurate information, I think the best thing I can do is take the question as notice and refer it to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Senator Charbonneau: I received the same answer in May of this year. I was told then that my question would be taken as notice. However, I still don't know who is going to pay the additional cost. Are the refiners going to pay the additional cost? Is the government going to pay the additional cost through subsidies? Have we been out-foxed, not to use other terms?

Senator Olson: We had better find out whether or not there is something in this deal that was not anticipated, and find out what those costs are. Once we have established that there are additional costs, we will then try to trace who is paying for them. I will see that my officials get an answer to that question.

Senator Charbonneau: It seems to me that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources admitted that the quality of the oil was poor. I am quoting what he said. Therefore, it was obvious that additional costs would be incurred. I do not understand why the minister or the negotiators, as I warned them back in May, just let it go at that without negotiating properly. I am sure the minister will give me an answer to that question.

THE ECONOMY

THE BUDGET—EFFECT ON NUMBER OF BANKRUPTCIES

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Last Wednesday my deskmate, Senator Nurgitz, asked the minister to tell us precisely what the government was proposing to do to cut down on the excessively high rate of bankruptcies taking place in Canada today. At that time the minister said:

> —I would expect that within the next few days, when the budget comes in . . . the honourable senator will hear a number of encouraging ideas for dealing with these kinds of problems.

Would the minister summarize for me the encouraging ideas for solving the problems of bankruptcy which were listed in last evening's budget, because I failed to hear any of them.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I am sorry to hear that. There appears to be something malfunctioning with my honourable friend's hearing when he says that, because had he listened carefully to the speech he would have heard that there are a number of new, or, at least, enhanced, programs in it with respect to such things as research and development and an industrial strategy. Indeed, the minister announced that there would be a 22 per cent increase in the economic development envelope, and so forth. Of course, all these things add up to the government doing things that are going to promote economic activity in Canada, and I am sure that my honourable friend agrees that promotion of economic development and activity in Canada will have some positive effect on the number of bankruptcies.

So, as I said, I am sorry he was unable to hear that, but I will send him a copy of the budget speech with those points underlined so that he will not miss them this time.

Senator Flynn: That's the best offer we have had today. I would appreciate that. I'll be expecting it.

Senator Olson: If the Leader of the Opposition would like to have a copy with underlining, I will send him one. He will not then miss those points when he reads it. I shall be glad to do that for him too.

Senator Flynn: With personal underlining.

Senator Perrault: Send him an autographed copy.

Senator Walker: Then he will know he is not being outfoxed.

Senator Charbonneau: I appreciate the minister's offer. I will gladly take him up on it. I should say that I heard a lot of rhetoric last night about research and development. I have heard these things for years, and in several budgets, without anything concrete being done. What I am really concerned about is that many Canadians who have to meet payrolls at the end of a week, or at the end of a month, are having a hell of a time meeting them. That is what I am talking about. I am not talking about research and development down the road five or ten years from now. I am all for that. That is a good principle, but right now we are in a bad way. The number of bankruptcies is increasing in this country, and there is nothing in the budget which will do anything about it.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, on a point of order. It seems to me that the honourable gentleman wants to begin the budget debate during Question Period. He is now stating a lot of opinion, which he should do only in a debate. I do not want to read what Beauchesne says should take place during Question Period, but one of the underlying principles of any Question Period is that it is to seek information, and not to give opinions.

Senator Asselin: You are in trouble now.

Senator Flynn: That is what you were doing last year, Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: I was observing the rules scrupulously.

Senator Murray: I recall very well Senator Frith's attempting to cross-examine the Attorney General of Canada at length on a matter that the Attorney General had under advisement in his quasi-judicial capacity.

Senator Frith: I was only seeking information. If you read the record, you will understand that I was asking for information as to what took place at a meeting. That is seeking information.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator was seeking information that he had no right to, and that no one else had any right to, at that particular time when the Attorney General had the matter under advisement.

Senator Frith: That is another matter. The point is that it was not a speech. It sought information in Question Period.

Senator Murray: In any case, there are many authorities in support of what I have just said.

[Senator Olson.]

THE BUDGET—INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development in the same spirit of seeking information. Of course, he will understand if I preface my question with a very brief attendu que.

In view of the fact that the general budgetary policies of the government are to passively accept the drift of the country into almost unprecedented economic stagnation, when may we expect that the long-heralded industrial strategy will be forthcoming, or is it still a matter of the minister's wrestling Herb Gray to the ground?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, honourable senators, the minister has not been attempting to wrestle Herb Gray or anybody else to the ground. But it is amazing how many honourable friends opposite, who claim they listened to the budget speech, seem to have completely forgotten that they heard the Minister of Finance tell them that there is going to be an increased emphasis on a number of things in research and development, in industrial adjustment, and that sort of thing.

I do not want to repeat the entire budget speech, although I have it here, but it seems to me that we on this side of the house have to assume that honourable gentlemen opposite are intelligent enough to have listened to the budget speech last night, and to have read it since then. Obviously they are not, and it seems to me that I will have to go through that speech, pick out all these things, and re-read them to my honourable friends, because they are clearly there.

Senator Perrault: There are none so blind as those who will not see.

Senator Smith: It won't take you long to list them.

Senator Murray: May we take it, then, that as a result of last night's budget speech, the Canadian government's industrial strategy is now in place?

● (1520)

Senator Olson: No, that is the beginning of it and a reaffirmation that it is going to be done.

THE BUDGET—MEASURES TO FIGHT INFLATION

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, my question is for the minister responsible for economic development. I feel quite sure that I will also be asked to study the budget more thoroughly. In anticipation of that, I assure the honourable minister that I did watch the presentation last evening and I did read the budget papers this morning, but obviously not as carefully as some.

While the minister is compiling the lists he has promised my colleagues, I would ask him to make an additional one, that being a list of those specific measures which the government is going to take to fight inflation.

I think of this particularly in view of the fact that it was announced recently by StatsCan that the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar in relation to what it was in 1971 is now 46 cents. When one applies that to the fixed income group—those on pensions and welfare, and so on—that is really a tremendous burden to ask them to carry. I would like very much to be shown the specific measures which the government intends taking to battle on their behalf.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot do any more now than to repeat what the Minister of Finance said in terms of his determination to come to grips with inflation and hold it down as much as possible through the number of measures he proposed.

Senator Asselin: Which ones?

Senator Olson: It becomes a matter of argument and debate in terms of whether or not my honourable friends opposite accept those measures. I would expect the normal procedure to follow—that is, the more effective the arguments put by the Minister of Finance, the more vociferously they would be objected to by my honourable friends opposite.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I really have no intention of debating the measures that the honourable minister mentions. All I ask him to do is identify the measures that will be taken.

When these fixed income people, the poor and the disadvantaged in Canada, get their increased fuel bills this winter, I think it might be nice if we can enclose information on some effective measures that we are going to take to try to ease the burden of inflation.

Senator Olson: Now my honourable friend is changing the content of his question. He was wondering about the measures that were introduced to try to hold inflation down, and now he is talking about supplementary payments off on the side.

In any event, I shall bring a long list, gleaned from the budget, in response to all of the questions my honourable friends have asked—perhaps by tomorrow. Because it is such a long list, it may take a little longer than that, but certainly I will have it here within the next day or so.

THE BUDGET—JOB CREATION PROGRAMS

Hon. C. William Doody: I would also ask the honourable minister, when he compiles those various lists, to include a list of the job creation programs that are going to be put in place.

I have no doubt I will be told that somewhere in the budget there are measures to help alleviate the heavy unemployment that is anticipated for this winter, and perhaps the honourable minister could give us that list at the same time.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I shall be glad to.

ENERGY

THE BUDGET—LOWER CHURCHILL RIVER—POLICY RESPECTING HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I would also ask the minister to include in his list of items the intentions of the government in respect of federal equity to support hydro development in the Lower Churchill River in Labrador.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, I shall include that.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

COVERAGE OF BUDGET SPEECH

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. Reference has been made to hearing the budget speech last evening—

An Hon. Senator: Don't leave, Bud. We have more.

Senator Perrault: He has an important commitment.

Senator Godfrey: I tuned in the CBC last evening to hear Mr. MacEachen's speech and I was greeted with a short summary of what was in the budget speech that Mr. MacEachen was going to deliver to the House of Commons later. For 20 minutes, we did not hear a word from Mr. MacEachen. All we got were comments from various commentators and reporters. We were then allowed to hear 10 minutes of Mr. MacEachen, at which point the program switched to a pub in Sydney, Cape Breton, to hear the comments of a couple of coal miners—and they were a lot smarter than the CBC producers, because they said, "How can we comment now when we have not heard all of the budget?"

We then heard a few minutes of Mr. MacEachen, following which the program switched to an auto assembly line to hear comments from some auto workers, and then we heard a little more from Mr. MacEachen. We were then switched to Alberta and we heard from a minister of the Alberta government and then from other commentators, all the time getting just a few snatches of the minister.

My question for the Leader of the Government is: Isn't there something we can do to persuade the CBC to allow the general public, on these occasions, to hear from the Minister of Finance instead of its commentators?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a number of similar reports have been received from other parliamentarians. I can only say that the question will be taken as notice and information brought before the Senate as quickly as possible. Certainly there have been a number of serious complaints.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, by way of a supplementary to the question asked by the Honourable Senator Godfrey, I would request the Leader of the Government to point out to the CBC that they forgot the courtesy of including the remarks of the Honourable John Crosbie, the opposition finance critic. I am, of course, referring to his remarks during the debate in the house.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the loyal opposition, as a matter of practice, is given an opportunity to respond to the budget address by the Minister of Finance, and quite properly so. Information will certainly be sought on that point as well.

THE ECONOMY

THE BUDGET—REDUCTION OF OIL EXPORT TAX—BENEFITS TO SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, after the barrage of questions to the Minister of State for Economic Development—

An Hon. Senator: He ran away.

Senator Buckwold: —I have a friendly question for him. Unfortunately, he is not here, so I shall put my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Yesterday Senator Argue and I both pointed out the very heavy burden on the Province of Saskatchewan which has been imposed as a result of the export tax on oil. Saskatchewan, because it is a major exporter of oil, paid out about $500 million last year by way of that export tax. I have to tell you how delighted I was, as a Saskatchewan citizen, to note that that will be reduced by 50 per cent.

My question to the government leader—and perhaps he will have to take it as notice—is: Could I have from him the actual dollar amount of the benefits which will accrue to the Provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta as a result of this 50 per cent reduction in the export tax on oil?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the existing oil export charge will be maintained as far as Saskatchewan is concerned. The Government of Canada, however, is prepared to share with Saskatchewan 50 per cent of the export charge revenues on crude oil exports. This commitment will be reviewed in 1985, when it is expected oil exports will have been phased out.

Under the provisions of the National Energy Program, Saskatchewan's revenues from oil and gas production will total an estimated $3.2 billion from 1980 to 1983. New federal energy initiatives, research, conservation, industry incentives, et cetera, under the new energy program in Saskatchewan, including reserve expenditures, will total more than $490 million over the next four years, or $500 per capita.

There is a great deal of good news for the Province of Saskatchewan in last night's announcement.

Senator Buckwold: That all sounds very good, but I wonder whether we could get it on an annual basis so that those of us who are proud of this action can go home and tell our eager citizens about it.

How much will the federal government rebate to the Province of Saskatchewan next year?

Senator Charbonneau: Ask Mr. Broadbent. Mr. Broadbent will know.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I can say that it will be in the billions of dollars.

[Senator Perrault.]

ENERGY

SASKATCHEWAN—EXPORTS OF CRUDE OIL—DEPARTMENTAL ESTIMATES

Hon. R. James Balfour: Supplementary to Senator Buckwold's question, might I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, when providing that information, to include estimates from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources with respect to the level of exports of crude oil, calculated in barrels, from the province of Saskatchewan over the four- or five-year time frame that he mentioned?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, additional information will be sought. As well, I shall attempt to bring to the chamber further details about the new incentive price for heavy oil production. The federal government, as honourable senators from Saskatchewan may know, will participate in the funding of a heavy oil upgrading plant in the province of Saskatchewan. The cost of such a plant is expected to be in excess of $1 billion. Hopefully, at some point, further details about this new advance for Saskatchewan will be brought as well.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—WITNESSES

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It arises out of my question of privilege earlier concerning the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

The members mentioned in the message from the House of Commons received earlier today have now received a request from the honourable member for High Park to appear before that committee as a witness. I would point out, honourable senators, that the honourable member for High Park had an opportunity to speak in the debate—something the majority of the Progressive Conservative members in that house did not have. This creates a most peculiar circumstance.

Will the Leader of the Government assure us that the committee will not be stacked with Liberal members of the House of Commons, who are to appear as witnesses, when the Senate has not approved the resolution.

• (1530)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Well, honourable senators, that question is a reflection upon the integrity and the quality of all members of the Senate, wherever they sit. The members who will be named to that joint committee, if the Senate approves of the resolution, I am sure will uphold the highest parliamentary traditions and standards.

As far as the report about witnesses being called by the committee is concerned, in my view it would be improper to issue invitations for witnesses to appear before a committee that has not yet been established. I would appreciate any information which the honourable senator may be able to provide.

Senator Phillips: I will be happy to provide the leader with information. I did not reflect on the integrity of the Senate. However, I am not surprised that the honourable senator should use that word, because he has a different interpretation of it from what I have.

THE BUDGET

PREPARATION—CONSULTATION WITH LABOUR AND INDUSTRY ORGANIZATIONS

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate relating to the budget and consultations with certain groups before the budget was finalized. Was the Canadian Labour Congress consulted as to its views prior to the completion of the budget, especially with regard to unemployment insurance premiums, and was the organization representing small business in this country consulted on the same matter or any other matter?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can answer in general terms that the budget was prepared over a substantial period of time in a most painstaking way, after consultation with a number of groups in the country. I must take as notice the specific part of the honourable senator's question as to whether the groups he mentions, the Canadian Labour Congress and the group representing small business, were consulted at some level. I do not have that specific information with me at this time.

Senator Smith: I understand that. I appreciate what I take to be the offer of the honourable gentleman to inquire and produce an answer.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, our colleague, the Minister of State for Economic Development, has been called out of the house by certain ministerial responsibilities. However, he has asked me to provide a reply to Senator Murray's question of October 22 regarding the status of proposed subsidiary agreements between the Government of Canada and New Brunswick for forestry development and industrial development.

I expect both of these items will be under review and discussion by cabinet in the near future and, pending cabinet decisions, announcements will be made by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

I might add that officials in the Ministry of State for Economic Development met with officials from the New Brunswick government following the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to clear up any possible misconceptions New Brunswick officials may have regarding erroneous assumptions that the ministry has a mandate to approve such agreements.

FISHERIES

EASTERN CANADA REGIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable Senator Marshall on October 23 asked a question seeking clarification of Eastern Canada fishing regions.

As was stated earlier, the boundaries will be drafted shortly. It is, therefore, impossible at this point to provide the honourable senator with precise information concerning the delineation of the boundaries.

It might be pointed out that Mr. Len Cowley, who is in charge of organizing the Newfoundland region, suffered a major heart attack shortly after he was appointed, causing a delay in the proceedings.

I would like to assure the honourable senator that there definitely will be a consultation process with the fishermen in the Gulf region although it has not yet been decided as to what form it will take, and this consultation will take place before the final drafting of the boundaries takes place.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to the question asked by Senator Roblin on October 28 regarding the government's response to Premier Blakeney's concerns about the constitutional package.

The Right Honourable the Prime Minister will be speaking in Regina this evening and meeting personally with Premier Blakeney tomorrow. He will respond to Mr. Blakeney's concerns at that time.

PROCEDURE RESPECTING REPORT OF PROPOSED SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to the question asked by Senator Flynn on October 28, concerning sending a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen.

The government will indicate before debate on the third stage what its view is as to whether the committee report is adequate to be sent to Her Majesty the Queen as the final resolution for a Joint Address.

Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to the question asked by Senator Roblin on October 28, concerning a possible Committee of the Whole stage in the Senate.

The government is open-minded on this issue, but the honourable senator should bear in mind that we can't have a clause by clause study actually amending the motion because each amendment would have to have the approval of the other place before it could be sent back to the committee.

May I add, however, that, as I stated yesterday, it is possible for suggestions for changes or the proposed amendments to be brought forward in the Senate, and, if the Senate approves, there is the possibility of referring the report back to a reconstituted committee.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STRIKE OF TRANSLATORS AND INTERPRETERS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I realize it was only yesterday that I put my question to the minister concerning the translators' strike. While ordinarily one day's interval would not be very long, I would like to point out that the matters I raised in connection with that strike are of some urgency, and I would make representations to the minister now that he should try to obtain answers to the questions I raised as soon as possible.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the honourable senator's concern. The reply was not available this afternoon at 2 o'clock. A further inquiry will go forward today.

TRANSPORT

AIR CANADA—INCREASES IN AIR FARES

Question No. 30 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

Give in detail, increases in air fares by Air Canada over the last ten years for the following destinations:

(a) Ottawa to Toronto,

(b) Ottawa to Montreal,

(c) Ottawa to Stephenville, Newfoundland, and

(d) Ottawa to St. John's, Newfoundland.

Reply by the Minister of Transport:

The management of Air Canada advises that the following information is based on the regular economy fare:

THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That ten Members of the Senate, to be designated at a latter date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;

That the Committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the Committee be twelve members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, at the beginning of a speech on the Constitution, there is one basic position I would like to establish. Speaking for myself—and, I have no doubt, speaking for all the members of this chamber, and indeed, for all the men and women who live in this land—I say that we are Canadians. Everyone has regional loyalties. Sometimes they are strong. We in the Senate, I believe, have regional responsibilities, and they are important. But beyond all else, we are Canadians, we love our country and we seek its unity and its welfare.

How melancholy it is, then, to report that on an occasion when we approach the patriation of the Constitution—that last faint impediment to national fulfilment and independence—an occasion which ought to gladden the heart of any patriot, those who sit in the seats of the mighty have led us into this trough of debate and discord.

I do not wish to exacerbate hard feelings in what I say. I do not want to deny credit where credit is due, or make confusion worse confounded. But I do want to submit for the examination of honourable senators one man's analysis of our problem, that I hope may in some way illuminate the causes of our discontent and perhaps point the way to a better course of action whereby we may respond in a responsible manner to the evident needs of the day and keep all Canadians within the circle of national unity.

As I set about analyzing the course of events that have led up to this moment, and the attitude of mind and the concepts of statesmanship that have brought us to our present situation, I could not overlook that secret document—leaked, no doubt, by some troubled member of the public service—that outlined a policy proposal to the federal ministers; a proposal as to how they should conduct their negotiations with the Canadian provinces over this past summer and autumn; an outline of the course of action that should be taken when the expected failure was declared; a document that cast a shadow on the proceedings; and a document which, I think, was worthy of that cynical statesman himself when it closed with a quotation from Machiavelli.

I shall not repeat that quotation here. Suffice it to say that it made the point that in dealing with the constitution of a state, we are engaged in a formidable and daunting exercise—and that is so. But the author of that leaked document could, I maintain, have served his masters better had he gone beyond Machiavelli to point out and assert that success in constitution-making for any great nation must rely on two main principles of political science on which successful and lasting constitutions have always been based. Those are the principles of legitimacy and of consensus. It might not have occurred to Machiavelli to have stressed this point, and obviously it did not occur to the writer of the document, but the record of constitutions throughout the ages make it clear that this is so.

For my part, this afternoon, it is against this concept of legitimacy and consensus that I intend to measure what we are being asked to do. The double test of legitimacy and consensus—the two pillars on which constitutional progress must stand—are the tests which, I suggest, should be examined here today.

The measure before us, this resolution, can be divided into three great subjects: first, the patriation of our Constitution; secondly, an amending formula that should be attached to that action; and, thirdly, the grave and substantive amendments that are proposed to the present Constitution of Canada itself. I will deal with those subjects in their reverse order.

With regard to the constitutional amendments that are included in the government's proposal, there are substantial shifts in the balance of Confederation. There is a call for the enhancement of federal powers with respect to their position against the provinces. It permits a direct encroachment by unilateral federal action on what has previously been acknowledged to be fields entirely within the provincial jurisdiction. I do not believe that this description of the propositions to amend the Canadian Constitution, enclosed in this motion, can be successfully contradicted. Furthermore, we are asked to do these things by abandoning the existing constitutional conventions which have been so painfully arrived at. We are to ask the Parliament of another sovereign state, not our own, to legitimize these unilateral and unprecedented acts.

In what sense, then, can these proposed constitutional amendments be described as legitimate? Well, one may say that there are at least two definitions of the concept of legitimacy. First, there is the narrow legal sense: legitimacy within the law. Secondly, there is the more important definition, I suggest—namely, the wider concept of legitimacy in its constitutional, moral and political applications.

Let us take a look for a moment at the concept of legal legitimacy. To test that against the motion before us, I submit that one consideration for examination is the terms of section 44 as they concern the Canadian Senate.

I want to make it clear that I have selected that example not out of any concern for this body, or of any self-serving interests that might be involved, because some honourable senators know that I very much approve of substantial reform of the Senate. If I had my way, it would be an elected Senate, not appointed.

But that is beside the point. We are dealing here with what the Government of Canada is proposing. Under section 44, provision is made to alter the fundamental character of this institution. Section 44 alters the powers of the Senate respecting the Constitution of Canada by importing into our rules the 90-day provision whereby if the Senate does not approve of what the Parliament and others are doing with respect to the Constitution, they may go ahead without the consent of the Senate. That is being done by unilateral action, based on the sole authority of this Parliament.

Now this is not a new issue, honourable senators. The question of the Senate and the Senate's powers was a central feature of Bill C-60, which we discussed some two years ago. Under Bill C-60, the government proposed an alteration of the characteristics of the Senate on the sole authority of Parliament, relying on section 91.1 of the British North America Act.

I remember so well the vigorous defence that the ministers of the Crown made in committee as to the perfect legality of what they proposed to do. I recall well how they produced the high authority of the law officers of the Crown to justify the statements that they were making to us; that no further discussion of the appropriateness, or the constitutionality, or the legality of this measure contained in Bill C-60 was necessary in the public interest. But it so happened that the joint parliamentary committee that was dealing with the matter thought otherwise. As we all know, they referred to the Supreme Court the question of the power of Parliament to act in that way with respect to the Senate. We know also that the committee made its findings, to make the reference to the Supreme Court, with the support of the Senate members of that committee from both sides of the house. On that occasion the Senate honourably fulfilled its role to represent regional interests, to secure a sober second thought, and to settle what was a reasonable constitutional doubt. As honourable senators know, the matter was referred to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court rendered its verdict, which contradicted all the fine assurances that we had previously received from the government side and from the spokesmen of the executive branch that they really knew the law.

I do not intend to read to this chamber the full decision of the Supreme Court, although I have it here in front of me. Suffice it to say that on the general proposition, the Supreme Court ruled without any doubt, and by unanimous decision, that the Government of Canada did not have the power that they claimed, and that they could not proceed against the Senate in the manner in which they proposed. But I will read to you a particular section of that decision which bears directly on the point at issue in section 44, and which is on all fours with the action that is being proposed now. In part 2 of the question put to the Supreme Court they were asked:

● (1550)

> 2. Is it within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada to enact legislation altering, or providing a replacement for, the Upper House of Parliament, so as to effect any or all of the following . . .

And under that rubric we have item (f), as follows:

> (f) to provide that Bills approved by the House of Commons could be given assent and the force of law after the passage of a certain period of time notwithstanding that the Upper House has not approved them?

I suggest to you that this is the same issue on which the power of Parliament to move unilaterally is in question when it seeks to change the character of the Senate. Today we are being offered the same easy assurance, and the same confident expression of opinion, that there is no constitutional point involved here today, and that we may proceed on our way without consideration with regard to that particular matter. There is the same refusal to consult the courts of this country. Yet this is the same government that was so cocksure on Bill C-60, and was wrong.

By means of section 44 of this measure that is before us now, they seek to do indirectly, under the aegis of the British Parliament, what they were forbidden to do directly under the aegis of the Canadian Parliament.

I say to you that if the people of this country want the Senate to go, or want it changed, then changed it will be and go it will. But let change be made in Canada by Canadians and in accordance with Canadian law.

With respect to the measure that is before us now, referring to section 44, and indeed to other portions of this particular piece of legislation, let the Senate do its duty, as it did with Bill C-60, and let us test the legitimacy of this law that is before us now. I say to you that the government's proposal fails the narrow test of legal legitimacy until the courts of this country rule otherwise.

Let us look, however, at this concept of legitimacy in a wider context, by which I mean the constitutional propriety, or, indeed, the pressing public interest and necesssity, which might attract the cachet of legitimacy.

We have been told in the course of this debate that it is time to end this 53-year old squabble in which we have been engaged about the Constitution. I may say in passing that if I recall correctly, with regard to that period of 53 years, the Leader of the Government—I may be doing him an injustice; it may have been someone else on the other side—the ante was raised to 57 years, the other day. In any event, it is true that the Constitution of Canada has been on the agenda for a long time. I think most of us will recognize, however, that for most of those 53 years almost nobody felt that it was a primary issue. If the Constitution had been a burning issue over that period of time it would have been settled long before now; but the plain fact is that for most of the period it was pretty nearly the last item on anyone's agenda for urgent action, and in terms of national importance, rightly so. Very few Canadians felt oppressed by the constitutional question.

I hear you say to me, though, "It is a burning issue now. Quebec has made it a burning issue. After the Quebec referendum there is a moral duty on all of us to proceed with constitutional renewal. Surely that lends legitimacy to the task."

So one would think. But it all depends on what kind of constitutional renewal you have in mind. It is now quite clear that the Province of Quebec, as represented by all the significant quarters of political opinion, or provincial parties, in that province, had something else in mind when talking about constitutional renewal than what we are being offered to proceed with now. I suggest that to advance the government motion as something that is required, in order to respond to Quebec, is a hard proposition to sustain. What we are doing here, if we proceed, has little or nothing to do with the problems that we will find in that province.

I suggest that every shred of political legitimacy depending on the situation in the province of Quebec is left twisting in the breeze—in the breeze of the statements and the speeches of Mr. Claude Ryan, the leader of the Liberal Party in that province.

I do not know that the principle of legitimacy should be extended so far as to deal with the government's timetable for this measure, but perhaps it deserves a comment. When Senator Manning spoke, he explained to us, I think, in careful terms, that the timetable that was espoused was not one calculated to lead to a successful conclusion. The government this spring, having withdrawn its 1979 propositions and having produced another set that were considerably less attractive from a provincial point of view, made it quite clear that this curtailed 1980 proposal was going to be agreed to, and in my opinion, on their terms, by September, or else.

Instead of concentrating on the essentials of today's constitutional dilemma, it loaded that agenda with the accumulated issues, perhaps, of those 53 years, and then demanded action by a date certain.

This is almost a guarantee of failure, and failure is what they got. If the government had been anxious to succeed in the constitutional issue, they might have been expected, I would suggest, to have zeroed in on the basic propositions which are before us, namely, those of patriation and an amending formula; but that was not to be the case. It was all or nothing at all.

The second timetable that was imposed by the government was on the House of Commons, and I think that deserves a word of comment, too, because in that house they spoke for 26 hours and 40 minutes in connection with the Constitution. The official opposition spoke for 11 hours and 55 minutes. The house devoted 10 sitting days to the question. This was considered, if not too much, certainly enough, and on that line of reasoning the guillotine of closure was brought in.

After the Prime Minister had held up the illusion that all would be heard who wanted to be heard, I regard this as an unnecessary and early use of closure and, in my opinion, an illegitimate and arbitrary use of power.

The third timetable is the worst, because it affects the people of Canada. The third timetable has made it clear that the only course that the people of this country have, if they want to be heard on the Constitution, is to appear before the joint committee we are now being asked to establish, and that will be all closed up by December 9. Only those Canadians, as far as I can tell, who can make it to Ottawa, and only those Canadians who can get their wits together and prepare their briefs in time will be heard, if there is time to hear them. I think there is nothing legitimate in the parliamentary or constitutional sense in abbreviating public representations on the question of the Constitution in this way.

My goodness, in the Manitoba legislature, as Senator Molgat sitting over there will understand and remember, we never closed a committee of that house on the most trivial matters until all who had something to say had had their chance to come and say it. Why on earth can we not adopt a more generous attitude with respect to public hearings in this particular debate?

I put this to you. After all that is over, and after the shade has fallen on December 9, and we have reported back, and all the affirmative votes have approved or been asked to approve of what is going on, can we be assured that a second closure will not happen in the House of Commons? They will not say.

I will not attempt any detailed analysis of the legitimacy of the entrenchment feature, but it would be interesting, I think, to reflect on some of what we have been told in respect of that matter.

The Honourable Senator Argue, in his interesting and eloquent speech yesterday, spent some of his time talking about the equalization principle, and what a good thing it was that that was going to be incorporated in the Constitution of Canada. Of course, I think that is a good idea, too, because I am a very strong supporter of the theory of equalization, but he gave me the impression that the equalization principle depended on its being introduced into the Constitution. Leaving aside all the weak and feeble wording of section 31, which deals with equalization in the proposed Constitution, equalization came about in Canada long before the Bill of Rights was ever heard of. It came about because there was a consensus among the people of this country and agreement among the people of this country about equalization and that, surely, is the best guarantee of any policy that I know.

• (1600)

I thought Senator Argue destroyed his whole argument about the necessity of entrenching the equalization principle when he recited all those many measures of equalization which have already been developed and put in our statutes, and which are working without such a thing as a Bill of Rights or an entrenchment of this particular item in the Constitution. I think that if equalization is to persist in the future, it will be no thanks to entrenchment, but will be because of its inherent merits with the people of this country.

I should like you to consider the question of legitimacy with respect to the principle of unilateral action which is included in this measure before us—unilateral action, I might say, that gives the Parliament of Canada the right to amend provincial rights, certainly as outlined in section 29, among others, and assuredly it does this. I ask myself: Where is the mandate for this particular government to overturn what has been a settled principle of our Constitution ever since it was established, and that is that there could not be unilateral trespass by the federal government on the sphere of provincial activity—where is the mandate? We have recently had two elections, one in 1979 and one in 1980, and I am perfectly certain that the present government received no mandate for unilateral constitutional action in 1979. I am equally certain that it received no mandate for unilateral action trespassing on the provincial sphere arising from the election of 1980. I cannot help but think that if in the minds of our present rulers this was such an important feature that it had to become the star element of their program for this very first session of Parliament, they might at least have asked the electorate of Canada in a clear and positive manner to give them the authority and the jurisdiction they sought.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I do not know why a mandate was not sought. I know no mandate exists. If Ottawa proceeds unilaterally on the Constitution, amending provincial rights and shifting the balance of Confederation without a mandate, what claim can it make for the political legitimacy of its actions?

I suggest to the members of this chamber that the situation is not improved when they consider that there are 143 Liberals in the present House of Commons: 86 per cent from central Canada, that is the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; 20 from all the other provinces; and only two from west of Ontario. I suggest that this regional distribution is far too limited a base to support a claim of constitutional legitimacy by the use of the government majority in these chambers.

However, honourable senators, if there is one aspect of legitimacy that subsumes all the rest, it is this: After all of our talk about Canadian sovereignty and the independence of this nation of ours, how can we go to the British Parliament and ask them to amend our Constitution when there is no reason why we cannot do the job ourselves?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: We ask Britain to do this one last time—put through the amendments to the Constitution that our present Prime Minister asks for in this peculiar way, and after that we will make all the other new amendments to our Constitution ourselves. Talk about your double standards; talk about your colonialism; talk about your Canadian independence. In a phrase that I learned from Senator Tremblay—"C'est à rire"; it is a joke and a very bad joke at that.

I look at those billboard ads on the Constitution. Did you see them? I am sure you must have. "Make it right," they say; "Make it work," they say; "Make it our own," they say, and what are we being offered? We are being offered a plan to let Britain do it for us. We are being offered a plan to arrange an end run around the federal system as we have known it, and we are being offered a plan to do indirectly what the Supreme Court has forbidden us to do directly. I would suggest that this reference to the British Parliament with respect to the amendment to our Constitution is the most illegitimate act of all. There is no political or constitutional legitimacy in this; there is no principle here; it is Machiavellian all the way, and we should stop it.

The leaked document discloses, of course, one of the key reasons why we are going to Britain with the constitutional amendments—because it makes it clear that this has the delightful advantage of avoiding the effective jurisdiction of the Canadian courts. If the illegitimacy of the proposition ever requires further exposure, I suggest that we will find it in that leaked document's comments.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Roblin: I should like now to turn to section 42, which deals with amendment by referendum. That sounds fine. Here we have a device calculated to break the log jam which we find so irritating and which allows us to make a direct appeal to the Canadian people. I think that in truth what appears to be unobjectionable at first glance contains grave problems for the Canadian system. It is true that it sets aside the provincial legislatures' role as we know it now; it is true that it goes against the development of our federation over the past 113 years; and it is also true that the referendum questions—and I put the word in the plural, questions—will be dictated exclusively by the federal government. They will be held under rules laid down by the federal government, and they will be held at times and under such circumstances as the federal government will decree, supported, I have not the least doubt, by that federal manipulation of public opinion which a multimillion-dollar advertising budget makes so conveniently possible.

Do not tell me it will not happen, because I tell you that if it is in this resolution it can happen and it will happen. General de Gaulle, a great statesman, used a referendum to gain his semi-dictatorial mandate from the people of France. In a horrible conjunction of events, Hitler secured his ultimate hold on the German people by means of a referendum. This is not an easy constitutional process to approve. The referendum is a dangerous weapon, I suggest, to embed in a constitution. Some strong man can come along to use it. It is all the more ironic that we have within our grasp, as I will suggest in a few minutes, an acceptable amending formula without a referendum which can deal with our problems. If that is so, what log jam remains, and what justification is there for this feature of a referendum?

Senator Frith: Would the honourable senator accept a question on this very point?

Senator Roblin: No, I will not. Later on I will be pleased to answer you.

It is permanent; it is fixed; and it is available to any or all federal office holders in the future. In terms of a Canadian federalism with a deliberate and intended division of powers and balance of authority, the referendum, in my opinion, is scandalously illegitimate.

Section 42 reflects, indeed, the understandable frustration and the not-so-understandable impatience on the part of our federal authorities. To entrench it in our Constitution is a dangerous concession to confrontation politics. If one legislative level of government can so threaten the other legislative levels, what becomes of the very idea of federalism? Without federalism as we have known it, where would our country be?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: This amending procedure looks ideally democratic and yet, in reality, it threatens the provinces with a process which the federal government has yet to discuss in detail with them. It alters the federal-provincial equilibrium by unilateral action. I suggest it is clearly illegitimate in a political and in a constitutional sense.

Honourable senators, having dealt with what I think to be the shortcomings of the proposition we are being asked to endorse, it is a bit of a pleasure to be able to turn to some of its merits because, believe me, it has merits. There are points in the government proposal which, in my opinion, do have consensus and do have legitimacy and ought to be favourably considered by this chamber.

• (1610)

It is entirely legitimate, I think, that we should seek to repeal section 7 of the Statute of Westminster. This is the section, as members know, that was put into the statute at our request in 1931, indeed, at the unanimous request of the provinces of Canada at that time, as the Debates clearly indicate. This is the section that has withheld from Canadians the right to make their own constitutional amendments.

In 1949 we patriated part of our constitutional rights. In an explanation that I found brilliant, the other day the leader of my party made it clear to me, at any rate, that when we adopted section 91.1 of the British North America Act we repatriated the powers of amendment dealing with the federal side of our Constitution, and left in Westminster only the powers of amending the provincial section of our Constitution.

Now, I think it is right that we should move to the patriation of the whole of our constitutional situation and bring over the provincial portion of our Constitution as well. I say that because I am convinced that all the provinces of this country—and I say all—agree in principle with this concept of patriation. I say that even though to some the position of the province of Quebec may be ambiguous. But I believe that this measure will receive support. Basically, the patriation of the Constitution clearly levels up to any test of legitimacy and consensus.

Intimately associated with patriation is, of course, the need for a workable amending formula. That is an essential element of patriation, a reasonable amending formula, and I suggest there are two essential features that one should look for in designing such a formula. First, it must permit changes under reasonable conditions and, second, it must provide a sense of security to the provinces over the rights which are now theirs. Of all the possibilities that have been reviewed over these many years—there are a good many—two, I think, have received the widest support. The first that I will mention is the Victoria amending formula, which is to be found in section 41 of the particular measure we are discussing. The second is the Vancouver formula which was developed some time later. In my own opinion the Vancouver formula best fits the criteria that I have suggested. This formula makes change relatively easy. Seven provinces and 50 per cent of the population can move and yet it allows any single province a limited opting-out provision. I want to make a comment on that because the principle of "change modified by the right of opting out" is no new concept to the Canadian body politic. It has been used in our affairs many times in the past. It has been used mainly to accommodate the province of Quebec. But it has proved workable and acceptable in the past to both the federal and provincial governments. Opting out is not ideal, according to some constitutional experts, but it is, I think, when included in the Vancouver formula, something that will receive the acceptance of all the provinces of Canada. They will be dealing with the process with which they are familiar. The concept of opting out is no new concept invented on the spur of the moment. It is something that is part of our normal procedure in regulating the relations between the two levels of the country for many a long day. The great merit of the Vancouver formula, I must admit, is its present wide acceptability. I am convinced that the provinces will accept it now, and I suggest the federal government should show that it is willing to accept it also.

If we can have patriation, and if we can have our amending formula, this is where we should stop. The consequence of exceeding these prudent limits must give us pause. Instead of a Constitution based on legitimacy and consensus that is respected and accepted, we may have one that is widely resisted and resented.

In this connection I must say a word on the subject that was raised yesterday in respect of western separatism. I am one of those who believe that it will be wrong for us to exaggerate the impact of western separatism on the political structure of this country. I am inclined to believe with the Honourable Senator Argue that if there was a vote for separatist candidates in the three by-elections coming in the province of Saskatchewan they would not do very well. They probably wouldn't get any more votes than the Liberal candidates are going to get in those by-elections. But I would have no objection to putting it to the test. We will not see western separatism as a destructive force in this country. But what we will see, and what we are seeing, is western alienation. There is a profound difference between separation and alienation. Separation, if it comes about, is sudden death; alienation is a wasting disease but one which poisons the relationships which ought to exist in harmony in a common citizenship in this land.

I was alarmed, though, when listening to Senator Argue put down separatism. He left me with the impression that that was the end of the matter. I am alarmed when the Prime Minister says there is nothing to separatism and leaves it as if that was the end of the matter. Senator Buckwold, I think, was right and did a service to this house in telling us yesterday that that is not the end of the battle. The Prime Minister, should I say with his arid intellect—I don't wish to sound—

Senator Walker: Arrogant.

Senator Roblin: No. I don't want to sound—

An Hon. Senator: Brilliant.

Senator Roblin: Brilliant is a very good word. The Prime Minister with his brilliant intellect has admitted to all of us that he really doesn't understand the west and he is reported to have said that if the west has to be saved somebody else will have to do it. I would hope that those of his supporters on the front bench, none of whom are here today to get this sound advice, would take the message to him and tell him that there is a problem in western Canada. Who is informing the executive branch of this government as to the depth of that problem there, and who is informing them that it cannot be dismissed in the cavalier way that seems to be adopted these days? I forgive the Prime Minister. He understands parts of Canada far better than I do. I forgive him if the west is somewhat of a problem, but I cannot forgive the wilful blindness of those close to him who refuse to see the problem and to tell him what the country is about to face. There is no one, I am sad to say, in the government executive bench that warns this unheeding government of the risks they are running and the unnecessary problems that are at hand. I certainly hope that the words of men like Senator Buckwold and others from the west would be given their due weight in the counsel of the government and recognized for what they are, namely, an authentic representation of the state of feeling in their part of the country.

I put it to this house that the constitutional risks which are involved in separatism and alienation can be reduced almost to nothing if we proceed on patriation with an amending formula attached. That we can all support. But to go further in constitutional change using the British Parliament as a stalking horse is an unwise and foolhardy enterprise, bereft of consensus and legitimacy.

I have to admit that this government is strong. It is hard to know if there is anything or anyone that can prevent them from doing what they want. But they can stop themselves. If they persist in their present policy, it can only deepen alienation among Canadians and weaken the feelings of solidarity that are fundamental to our nationhood. I suggest a very simple course, the course of generosity and the course of compromise. These are not signs of weakness, particularly if they are displayed by a government as strong as this one or a Prime Minister as strong as this one. They are signs of strength because generosity and compromise are stamped indelibly on the work of the Fathers of Confederation in 1867. They were the part of wisdom then; they are part of the wisdom now. Wisdom and statesmanship combine to suggest that in this constitutional initiative we deal only with those essential things that we need to achieve our purpose.

Let us patriate this Constitution. Let us have an amending formula. It is quite clear to me if Ottawa wills it, these two essentials are within our grasp. Let's withdraw the constitutional changes we propose to make under the aegis of the British Parliament. Let us deal with them ourselves, at home in Canada, and in accordance with the Canadian Constitution. I submit to this house that such a move would electrify the country. It would bring all the regions and all the provinces within the circle of Canadian unity. Good faith would be re-established, and we would have clearly taken unto ourselves the national perspective. Then the vitality of the west, which is now manifested in alienation, will find a new expression as a positive force for the building of Canada. The spirit of harmony would have a chance; consensus would replace force majeure, and the legitimacy of our acts would be self-evident. Then, honourable senators, I think we can recover our vision of our country. We would know then that things that bind will overcome the things that divide. In my opinion, such an act of statesmanship and of reason on the part of the present government, would guarantee their place in Canadian history.

• (1620)

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, may I have the permission of the house to answer a question raised by Senator Frith during the constitutional debate yesterday. I shall be very brief. Have I your consent?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Walker: Yesterday Senator Frith asked this question:

> The honourable senator is not suggesting that under a combination of sections 44 and 41 the House of Commons alone can abolish the Senate?

My final answer was:

> In going as far as it has gone, it seems to me that the Senate would almost be obliged to support sections 41 and 44.

Senator Frith, what is meant by that is this: section 44 is an amendment to section 41(1). There is no question about that. Under section 41(1) a resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons is required. That is absolutely necessary to make any amendment to the Constitution as proposed. Section 44 changes all of that. This is very important. I will be brief with the relevant part. Section 44 states that the Constitution of Canada may be changed by proclamation under section 41(1), the one I just referred to, or section 43, which deals with a referendum.

Senator Frith: No, section 42.

Senator Walker: Exactly. Section 43 deals with the provinces. However, section 44 states:

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation . . . without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within ninety days—

We have gone into all of that.

So my answer to you is that if there is a resolution of the House of Commons under section 44 to amend the Constitution by abolishing the Senate, then under section 44 there will be no opportunity for the Senate to reply to that or to join in the resolution. We will then go back to section 41(1) and find out that we are blocked in any effort to do so.

To make sure I was correct in that I submitted the matter to Mr. Raymond du Plessis, Q.C., Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel to the Senate, and he quite readily agreed. I would be happy to have you read his letter, because I am sure you would want to know that. That is what I have been saying all along. It is so important, so important to you, and so important to me, that I thought I should do that today.

In pouring over this thing last evening, I found that there is another section, section 50, which is very strange, too. That is a contradiction of section 44. Section 50 states:

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only in accordance with a procedure prescribed by section 41 or 42:

In other words, you have to have a joint resolution from the House of Commons and from the Senate. And, lo and behold, subsection (d) is "the powers of the Senate". So there is a contradiction. There are so many contradictions in this completely phony—and that is a terrible thing to say—resolution which is supposed to be submitted to Her Majesty the Queen, and so many fantastic suggestions and requests, that I beg of my friends on the opposite side of the house to exercise their good judgment in this and to exercise their good judgment when we have a vote.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I have leave to have equal time to comment on that?

Senator Walker: You may have all the time you want.

Senator Frith: I think the question I asked was misunderstood. I thought that my honourable and learned friend and I had agreed that the question I was asking him was whether he was contending that, because of the application of section 44 to section 41(1), the House of Commons acting alone could abolish the Senate. I thought he and I agreed a week ago that his answer to that was no, that the House of Commons could do its part of it with the suspensive veto expiring, but it would also require action under section 41(1)(b), which states:

> (b) resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least a majority of the provinces that includes . . .

So I think we understand each other now. I never suggested that section 44 does not apply to the first part of section 41(1). Of course it does. It explicitly applies to the first part. In other words, insofar as the federal Parliament is concerned, amendments under section 41(1) are effected by the federal Parliament, plus a combination of provincial legislatures. That is how it is done. It says "and", so it requires both. There are two parts. If my friend is contending that, as far as part one is concerned, the House of Commons can eventually act without the consent of the Senate, he is absolutely right. But that does not mean that the abolition of the Senate—which is what he was talking about—would thereby take place, because it requires the other part, namely, the application of section 41(1)(b), the resolutions by the legislatures.

Senator Asselin: Not after two years.

Senator Frith: I beg your pardon?

Senator Asselin: Not after two years.

Senator Frith: Oh yes. Of course, the question of the first and second phase is another whole question.

As for the inconsistency between sections 50 and 44, I do not think there is any inconsistency. I think they read well together, because section 44 applies to an amendment under section 41 or section 43, section 41 being what we can call the Victoria formula, and section 43 being an amendment of the Constitution in relation to one or more but not all of the provinces.

So the suspensive veto in section 44 applies only to sections 41 and 43, the two methods of amendment, the general amendment and one applying to one or more but not all of the provinces.

With reference to those particular matters in section 50, namely, the office of the Queen, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, equalization, the powers of the Senate—which my friend drew attention to—the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate, the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons, and the principles of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons—with respect to all of those matters the amending formula that must apply are those set out in section 41, which we just talked about, or section 42.

• (1630)

What we should understand in discussing this, with respect, is that the suspensive veto in section 44 does not apply to section 42. In other words, the referendum that is referred to in section 42 cannot take place without the consent of the Senate, and there is no suspensive veto in effect there.

That was the question I wanted to ask Senator Roblin, who left during the comments of Senator Walker. Perhaps Senator Flynn, or another who knows Senator Roblin's feeling on this, can answer the question. It is really a matter of clarification.

From my note, I thought he had said that one of the things that alarmed him in section 42 was that the government or one man—and he cited the example of Hitler—could amend the Constitution. But no one government—government I am speaking of now—can operate that section. The federal Parliament must operate section 42.

So to the extent that Senator Roblin was making the point that section 42 overrides the provinces, he is quite correct; but section 42 does not override the Senate, and cannot override the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Not before it is abolished.

Senator Frith: Quite right.

Senator Flynn: But we have here the case of a one-man government in Parliament.

Senator Frith: An interesting legal point is whether an amendment abolishing the Senate under section 41 could be effective without also amending section 42. Of course, the minute you did abolish the Senate under section 41, section 42 could not operate, because it requires the assent of the Senate, which would have disappeared.

Senator Walker: My friend and I are in agreement. At last my friend agrees with me. Section 41(1)(a)—

Senator Frith: I have been in court with you before.

Senator Walker: Of course you have, and I have heard you indulge in that kind of subterfuge before. If we were left with section 41(1), there would be no problem. I would not be raising the matter, because it requires the resolutions of both the House of Commons and the Senate to abolish the Senate. But my friend also agrees with me that section 44 intervenes and that under section 44 the requirement of section 41 involving the Senate's concurrence in the resolution is no longer necessary.

Senator Frith: Section 41(1)(a).

Senator Walker: Exactly, section 41(1)(a) is no longer necessary, in which case a resolution to Her Majesty under section 44, along with the proclamation, abolishing the Senate would be very readily carried out.

Senator Frith: Providing the provinces pass their respective parts, too.

Senator Walker: Of course. That is in all the way through. We know that. We have always admitted that. So don't go off on a tangent. Thank you for agreeing with everything I have said.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, after the addresses we have heard in this chamber by some of our ablest and best informed colleagues, I am really very hesitant to add any comments whatsoever. But after all the pleasant part of life, I think you have to have a little of the bitter, so I shall take a chance on bothering you for a few minutes. Also, I might add that during my years here quite often I had the extraordinarily bad fortune to follow in debate some of our greatest orators. I can think of at least three occasions on which I followed Grattan O'Leary after he had been in full flight, and I think this will be the second or third time I have followed Senator Roblin, who today, in my humble opinion, gave us a real tour de force. He made a really excellent speech.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molson: I have another problem in speaking in this debate, and that is in the fact that I have decidedly mixed feelings on this resolution. While I am very much in favour of bringing the Constitution home, I am unhappy with the package that has been developed to wrap it up for its trans-Atlantic voyage. Also, I am as unclear as everyone in this chamber appears to be as to whether we are speaking on the resolution for an Address to the Queen or on the motion which proposes that a joint committee to consider the matter be established. Everybody seems to be speaking, basically, on the subject matter of the resolution, so I intend to follow that precedent. But I am happy to tell you that I will be rather brief in doing so.

I believe that the people of this country are fed up with the endless bickering over a matter which they consider to be secondary to our very serious economic problems. I firmly believe they would like the Constitution safely home and in bed.

After quite a great deal of thought, I have tried to rationalize my own position, and I believe it is my duty to express my views on the resolution as one representative of Quebec. In saying that I represent Quebec, I have to qualify that by pointing out that I represent a minority in Quebec, specifically the English minority. So, I have the difficult task of trying to steer a responsible course between sometimes conflicting points of view.

[Senator Walker.]

In this case, the majority of my province seems to be definitely opposed to the procedure outlined by the government. Yet, some features would have an appeal to those in the minority. The minority cannot help but be resentful of the fact that they are not permitted to use their own language as freely as they wish, nor to continue to have the choice of language for the education of their children. This is Bill 101 in Quebec.

Section 23 of the proposed resolution would relieve that restriction and would therefore be favoured by the one-fifth of the population of the province of Quebec that comprises the minority.

When I speak of the free use of language, I think of the small businessman or tradesman whose language may be English, or Greek or Italian, or any other minority language. Doesn't it sound rather like a totalitarian regime when such a person is prohibited from hanging out a sign in his own language saying, for his own customers, and perhaps only for his own people, that he is a tailor, a baker, a plumber, or that he is engaged in some other trade? But that is the situation at the moment in the province of Quebec. Such a sign would be illegal.

A typical example among thousands of this sort of pressure on people is that of a reputable Jewish proprietor of a hardware store whom I know. His clientele is mostly English-speaking. This individual had a sign over his store—and I am changing the name of the street—which said "Wellington Street Hardware." By law that sign over the front of his store had to be torn down and replaced by a sign saying "Quincaillerie Wellington." What is the value of that sort of law?

In this regard, I cannot help but favour a measure which would improve the language problems to a large degree, not only in my province, but in other provinces where my francophone co-citizens are not given equal treatment.

The discussion on the Constitution, as repeated ad nauseam, has been almost endless, and it is doubtless now high time that some action be taken.

● (1640)

I would agree with senators who spoke previously emphasizing that we have the role of provincial or regional representatives, and that we have been much criticized for not fulfilling it. I go further and remind you that we have been the subject of abolition for quite some time, and the Prime Minister just a short time ago favoured Bill C-60 which would have done away with the Senate. That was an honest proposal to reduce Parliament to a unicameral system.

But now we find in this legislation clause 44 which is obviously directly aimed at removing the Senate. It is a devious ploy disguised in this request to send home our Constitution. I think it could be described as sneaky, and is included to accomplish indirectly a purpose that would not fly on its own. This whole matter, at its present stage, the disagreements, so universally expressed between federal and provincial governments, has too much the element of a power struggle to be very reassuring reading or hearing. I cannot help but feel all the time I hear the provincial positions and the federal position stated that underlying it all is the common curse of this age, the struggle for power. Everybody wants it. Big business wants it. Unions want it. Government wants it. Everybody is looking for power and I am afraid there is too much of that element in this disagreement between the federal and provincial governments. There is so much that suggests the importance of relative power is given too much emphasis.

With regard to the role of the Senate in its provincial or regional representation, I cannot miss this opportunity of repeating what I said here about a year ago that if the Senate is not carrying out its proper role in our parliamentary system, it must be because its membership lacks the necessary qualities. I do not agree with that. I do not agree with that at all. But if it were true, then I must repeat that the fault can only be laid on the head of the Prime Minister. Regardless of pressure and influence, he alone names the representatives of the provinces to this chamber. If in choosing them he has not assured the provinces of proper representation he should certainly not lay the blame on the Senate. The blame is his.

Now we have a chance to dispel this criticism of our representative role. By all means let us dispel it. Let us make sure at this moment that whatever we decide, the Senate fully reflects the wishes of the provinces. This does not conflict with our overall loyalty to Canada. As I understand it now, six provinces are resolutely opposed to this resolution, two support it and two have not yet clearly defined their position. Consequently, if we are supporting the provincial view, we should oppose the measure as it now stands.

Secondly, and quite distinctly, in going to the British Parliament we are asking them to amend their legislation in order to give us control of our Constitution. This is perfectly proper. But do we dare ask the United Kingdom Parliament to act while there is substantial disagreement between the Government of Canada and the governments of the majority of the provinces? I suggest to you that apart from any legal aspect, which I am quite unqualified to comment on, this is something we simply cannot do. We can't ship our dirty laundry over to London. I would also hazard a wild guess that, as the Privy Council in the United Kingdom has so often rendered judgment over the years in favour of the provinces against the federal government, there might be considerable sympathy and concern over there for the point of view of the provinces.

In addition to what I have said, I feel keenly that when, as and if we are developing our own Constitution at home, there must be a place of real importance and real significance for our native people. Like many of you, honourable senators, I feel that they have had a rough deal over the years and, if change is to come, now is the time to make sure that proper consideration is given to the rights of these, our first citizens.

Finally, I must add that I agree with my colleagues who have observed that the timetable is impossible. It is simply out of all reason to ask that all these steps should be taken and the whole report completed by December 9. I think it is simply not on.

In summary, I would like to point out with some humility, because I am very weak on any legal implications, that I favour the patriation—and I think that is a terrible word; I have looked up three dictionaries and I cannot find it, but I suppose it does exist—I favour the patriation of the Constitution without any further delay. Secondly, I would like to see it contain a workable amending formula. Thirdly, this should be only the first step in the process. After we have the Constitution home we can amend it ourselves. We can then take up the question of rights and freedoms and other matters which the government is trying to incorporate in the present proposed Constitution. Consequently, I would vote for an amendment, if one were to be moved, which reduced the scope of the resolution as I have suggested. I cannot support the resolution in its present form.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I hope I will not detain you too long because, considering the hour and having listened to such eloquent speeches as those I have heard, it becomes rather difficult for me to take the floor.

Still I intend to contribute to this debate. I want to say that when this debate was launched, in my case the occasion was the referendum of May 20 when the people of Quebec were asked to take a position on the separation of that province from the rest of Canada, the president of the national No committee, Claude Ryan, appointed me president of that same committee for the riding of Mercier, primarily because of my activities in my early years in that riding. Besides, a wide area of that riding falls within the geographical limits of the federal riding of Laurier which I have had the honour of representing for over 15 years.

During the referendum campaign I crisscrossed the riding, held numerous meetings and met as many people as possible. Our organization had to work extra hard because in 1976 that riding had elected a member of the Parti Québécois, thus defeating the Honourable Robert Bourassa who was provincial premier at the time. I urged the people of Mercier to vote No, promising a major reform of Canadian federalism with a view to finding a solution to the legitimate demands of all Quebecers and of those of Mercier in particular. Our combined efforts led to success since the No side in that riding posted a narrow but indeed encouraging victory, 52 per cent against, 48 per cent for.

After this victory in Mercier, which was surprising for many people but unequivocal for the province as a whole, we had to act, and that is exactly the approach taken by the Canadian government. Unfortunately, because of the famous principle of unanimity, there was no way to reach an agreement and the great summit conference failed.

All Canadians expressed disappointment at this setback. Once again it was the responsibility of the Canadian government to take the lead. It did just that when it introduced before Parliament a resolution entitled "Proposed Resolution for Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen Respecting the Constitution of Canada".

Why should the Canadian government be in such a hurry to fulfill its commitments? For a number of reasons which we all know, and also and above all because certain provinces had already begun to close the door on goods and capital from other provinces; because certain provinces believed and still believe they are threatened by the growing power of the French culture and language; because certain provinces were and are still putting up barriers between themselves, thwarting the free movement of people through the country.

Is this action as unilateral as the opposition would have it? If we consider that most Canadians are in favour of patriating the Constitution; that Canadian opposition parties also endorse patriation, as Senator Molson pointed out earlier; that the Right Honourable Leader of the Opposition says he supports patriation; that the NDP leader agrees. It seems, then, that "unilateral" is too strong a term, since the objection appears to be to the means of patriation, not to the end which is being sought. Therefore, if we are really dealing with a unilateral concept, it has to do, not with the principle of repatriation but rather with the contents of the resolution, such as the repatriation procedure, or resolutions aiming at writing into it a charter of rights and freedoms, or the principle of equalization, or an amendment formula to get us out of the deadlock resulting from the unanimity requirement.

I feel I ought to emphasize, honourable senators, at this turning point of the history of our country, that the 1867 Constitution has served us well. It has enabled the Canadian Confederation to flourish in peace, harmony and freedom. It has made possible population growth as well as social and cultural development in all parts of the country. But it no longer meets our present aspirations and needs. It must be altered, reconsidered and written afresh to embody a new reality, although it contains many good points which are still valid and could be updated and combined with new elements to form a truly Canadian document in keeping with our time.

Honourable senators must make the swift decision to accept to join a joint committee made up of 15 members from the House of Commons, whose names were released today and 10 senators, for exhaustive study of the 59 sections of the Constitution Act, 1980. Such senators who are well versed on constitutional matters, who will be part of that committee, will be able, with their acknowledged expertise, to put forward the pros and cons of such sections they are particularly interested in.

Personally, and like many honourable senators who spoke before me, I am concerned with Part I, dealing with Minority Language Educational Rights, and more specifically subsections 23(1) and 23(2), and also with the part under the heading Procedure for amending Constitution of Canada, chiefly section 44.

● (1650)

Section 23 is very controversial, especially in Quebec. Senator Rizzuto delivered a very interesting speech dealing with that problem. I carefully studied the different interpretations given to that section. I discussed it with the Honourable Jean Chrétien, who is taking care of this matter in the House of Commons and he said, I think I am quoting his very words: "Fernand if you can find a better proposal I will be very interested to hear it." I did not find any. Moreover, the leader of the government in the Senate, the Honourable Senator Perrault, commenting on this section in his speech in the Senate on October 14th, 1980, clearly replied to the three questions raised by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, namely: matters concerning linguistic rights at the provincial level; matters dealing with talks between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Ontario; the matter of enshrining minority language educational rights. It is to be hoped that the honourable senators who will take part in the committee will study this question and will be able to find a new and better proposition than what is now being proposed by the Canadian government.

During this same speech, the honourable government leader also mentioned section 44 which many honourable senators have severely and repeatedly criticized. In my opinion, this section is mainly a first step towards the reform of the Senate since its veto power is reduced to 90 days. Besides, in the report of the Senate and the House of Commons Joint Committee on the Canadian Constitution, in 1972, the Senate had already approved the following recommendation:

> The veto power of the Senate on legislative proposals should be reduced to a 6-month suspensive veto.

Therefore, honourable senators might agree to bring in an amendment on the number of days indicated in section 44 in order to implement the recommendation passed by the Senate. Honourable senators might at least consider this possibility or another one which would be to take section 44 out of the proposed resolution. There might be a third alternative that is an amendment to section 44 in order to relate it to section 50 by adding just before section 44, the words: "subject to section 50". The main argument which could be put forward is the fact that this section advocates an embryonic Senate reform. As all honourable senators are aware, the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs sat throughout the summer in order to prepare what I consider a clear, precise and complete report including a recommendation for a complete reform of the Senate. I certainly cannot at this time reveal the content of this report which will no doubt make history in Canada.

Since the committee is going to sit in camera tomorrow at 11 o'clock I hope that we shall be in a position to agree on the final version so that it may be submitted to the Senate in the near future. Since it deals with a substantial reform which requires amendments to the Constitution, to some existing legislation, to the Rules of the Senate, as well as changes in attitude and procedure, I think that it would be beneficial at this point for the Government of Canada and for the honourable senators to read this report, after it has been discussed and concurred in by the Senate, before any attempt is made in the resolution before us to begin a reform of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Do you mean that we should wait for the report to be published?

Senator Leblanc: Yes, I said that it should be read, as soon as possible, in view of the fact that at the present time it is being considered by the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Flynn: The subcommittee on the Constitution? Are we going to vote on the resolution?

Senator Leblanc: We are considering the resolution, as soon as possible.

Senator Flynn: Before the vote is taken?

Senator Leblanc: Well this is a procedural matter.

Senator Flynn: No, but I want to say that this is a matter of time. What you are suggesting is significant because you think that we should wait for the report before deciding what to do with the resolution especially because of the information given in the report.

Senator Leblanc: I think, Senator Flynn, that it is important that the report should be submitted to the Senate, made known to the public and to the government and that the joint committee should be able to read it also, in view of the amendments which could be moved in committee but not during this debate, the purpose of which is to approve the setting up of the joint committee and to appoint the 10 senators who will sit on it.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but if the report suggests for the Senate a different role which would encourage the Senate to vote against the resolution, it might be better not to know ahead of time.

Senator Leblanc: But I am talking about section 44 and not about the whole resolution which contains 59 sections.

Senator Flynn: It deals only with the reform of the Senate?

Senator Leblanc: Yes, but section 44 could be amended, not while it is being discussed here, but in the joint committee. At that time, if the committee brings in its report in the shortest time possible, it will be before the joint committee and following its consideration of the report that committee could then reconsider section 44. Perhaps I didn't make myself quite clear in the beginning but this is what I wanted to say.

Senator Flynn: In that case why not adjourn the debate until the report is tabled?

Senator Leblanc: Thank you for your interjection, Senator Flynn.

As honourable senators know, I took an interest in this question. I dealt with this issue in my maiden speech in this house, on April 24 last. There is no doubt in my mind that honourable senators will dwell especially on sections 23 and 44 and that in their proverbial wisdom, they will manage to find the best solutions which they will impart to all the other parliamentarians appointed to that committee.

I hope that we shall adopt the motion now before us without delay, so that the committee members may start their work as soon as possible, keeping in mind the following statement of Senator Perrault, as reported on page 855 of the Debates of the Senate for October 14, 1980:

> But let us understand that it is not the intent of the government to abolish the second chamber in our parliamentary system. There could be some government in the future, perhaps, with that kind of intent, but I foresee no possibility of the abolition of a second chamber here in the foreseeable future.

Thank you.

[English]

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, in making this intervention in what I consider to be an historic and fundamental debate on our country's position, I do not think it is putting it too strongly to say that it is also a debate on our country's future. I want to say that I am no different from anyone else in this chamber, or in the other place, in that I have gone through life acquiring a certain amount of baggage or prejudices based on my education, my background, my training, the environment I have lived in and the experiences of my life. I want to begin by freely acknowledging mine.

I am a westerner, and as such I have worried that my political, economic and cultural aspirations are not well represented in a federation dominated to the extent that the power of the central provinces has customarily dominated Canada, as I think was well expressed yesterday by Senator Buckwold. Whether this is true in fact or not I do not think is important. The perception of people in the province that I come from is that we have lived under that kind of domination.

As a Manitoban I accepted my summons to serve in this institution in the knowledge that I had a duty to articulate as best I could a regional Manitoba viewpoint, and to express the interests and concerns of my province and my region. The expression of such regional concerns is nowhere more essential, I suggest to you, than in the context of the present constitutional debate, nor is there, in historical terms, any better place to express them than this chamber, which was meant by the Fathers of Confederation to be the protector of regional interests.

In terms of my profession I have naturally come to recognize the traditional role of the judiciary—the great tradition we have established in this country—and understand fully that the judiciary determines whether a statute is compatible with other parliamentary legislation, whether it is within the powers of the particular legislating authority, and things of that nature. But I have certainly always believed that Parliament and the various legislatures, and not the courts, must have the ultimate responsibility for defining our fundamental rights.

I would like to start off by telling you that I am distinctly biased in favour of the British model, which I believe has served us well throughout our considerable history. Therefore, that particular part of the resolution before us dealing with the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms causes me certain considerable difficulties, and I propose to outline them to you this afternoon.

First, honourable senators, I would like to say a few words about the motives of the government, or the motives of the Prime Minister, as I see them, in moving as decisively as he has at this time. I believe that three qualities of leadership are surely essential in order to guide the country from one Constitution to another, and all the more so if the transition takes us from one sort of fundamental constitutional structure, that has served this country well, to another kind, that perhaps, in varying degrees, has served other countries well—I do not argue with that. I think these qualities are what one might call courage, public support, and, most important, statesmanship. I believe these are essential.

Some may argue, and I would argue, that courage is not the word to describe the Prime Minister's actions in placing the present resolution before the other place, and ultimately here; but I think that we ought to concede that in terms of timing, and in the determination to move on the question of patriation, after so many fruitless constitutional discussions, the Prime Minister has displayed, indeed, some considerable political courage.

• (1710)

The Prime Minister can also point to support, in the technical sense that his party holds a majority in both houses of Parliament. Beyond that I am sure he can point as well to opinion polls which demonstrate support among the population, but on a question so utterly fundamental as building a new Constitution I submit that success depends not simply upon support in the central institutions of the country, nor on opinion polls based on national standards, but rather, I suggest, honourable senators, on widespread goodwill for the endeavour and general support in every region of the country, whether that region be small or large.

This kind of genuine grass roots feeling clearly does not exist in several regions of the country. I suggest that it does not exist in several governmental circles. In terms of regional unhappiness, I want to cover one example illustrating the kind of regional apprehension that I suggest is ongoing. About a week and a half ago in the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, I heard a question put by the honourable senator from the Yukon seeking assurances from the Minister of State for Economic Development, who was a witness at that committee meeting, that the government's proposed charter of rights would not negate the provisions under the Northern Pipeline Act for hiring Yukoners to work on the pipeline. The minister was unable to give that assurance. That points to another little noticed but unhappy chapter in the government's handling of this whole constitutional debate. This is not a main national issue because the Yukon has a small population and has relatively little clout, but what the senator from the Yukon was doing, in a polite way, was echoing the very real concerns of Yukoners and of the Government of the Yukon about the way constitutional change will affect Yukoners and their territory. I saw a statement issued by the leader of the Yukon government, Mr. Pearson, expressing concern on this very point.

Section 6 of the Charter of Rights will, in fact, negate preferential hiring and training provisions under the terms and conditions of the Northern Pipeline Act. Section 6 of the Charter is, of course, that section stating that every citizen throughout the country has the right to pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any province or territory.

The difficulty, or the rub, comes with section 26 of the terms and conditions of the Northern Pipeline Act which provides that the contractor shall provide training and employment opportunities to Yukon residents and that, in fact, preference shall be given to permanent Yukon residents and other northern residents before outsiders. What the senator from the Yukon did say was that the people from his territory have been waiting a long time for this. This is the kind of development and the kind of undertaking that will give, I suppose, that region of the country the sort of economic boost it needs.

The issue of concern to me is not necessarily the legal disposition—it is not whether the Northern Pipeline Act will supersede the Charter, or vice versa—the concern I have is that the Yukon government has not been consulted on a matter as essential and important as this. What is germane today is that reasonable doubt and concern exists in the minds of Yukoners. What is more, they are a small group numbering only 20,000 or 30,000—a minority group—yet those Canadians have systematically been held at arm's length by this government throughout the entire constitutional process to date. The same can be said equally of the Northwest Territories.

Constitutions are supposed to be particularly protective of the rights of minorities, and there is no doubt that the residents of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories are small minorities within the framework of Confederation. Yet, in the process of planning for the action which is now before us, the federal government has not seen fit to consult those residents through their political leaders in any way more meaningful than an invitation to come to Ottawa to watch the First Ministers' Conference in September—not to vote; not to speak; not to answer any questions about their regions; but to observe in silence only.

In a speech in Winnipeg, the elected leader of the Yukon government told us that he had tried, since last May 28, to sit in on the discussions and to have some meaningful discussions with government officials, all to no avail. The manner of his exclusion is almost as important as the exclusion itself. Between the end of May and the September conference there is a chronicle of unanswered telephone calls, telexes and letters. Why? Apparently because it is below the dignity of ministers—whether it be the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or the Minister of Justice—to talk to someone as lowly as the head of a regional government. One has to guess as well, honourable senators—and it bothers me to say this because one can get a little too cynical—that perhaps if the Leader of the Government had a different political stripe, the calls might have been answered.

What I am really saying is that this is no way to build the unity of this country. This is no way to go about drafting a new Constitution. This is no way, for that matter, to win support for the policies of the government among people in diverse regions of the federation. Rather, it is the mark of a strong central government taking advantage of the weak. It is placing the authority of the bureaucrat over that of the democratic expression of the grass roots. It is narrow, honourable senators, and, I suggest to you, it is mean. It is that narrow, mean and rather small partisanship that so disturbs us about this whole constitutional venture. It is not a reflection, I suggest, honourable senators, of magnanimity. Surely these people can be consulted and spoken to. It could be said that the workings of the organization of the Constitution are of little men; it ought not to be so. The Prime Minister, for all his electoral success, will leave office as a little man in spirit if he persists in the blind pursuit of a narrow partisan course while treating dissenters as he has treated the residents of the Yukon.

That, honourable senators, is not statesmanship. Statesmanship calls for perceptive and far-sighted management of the nation's business. Our Constitution must last a long time and, in order to do so, it must enjoy the freely-given support of the people. The debates here and in the other place during recent days—indeed the debates in the press and in the country at large—have removed any doubt that the warning signals have been hoisted in several parts of the land. Senator Manning spoke about alienation; Senator Roblin spoke about it today, and Senator Buckwold did yesterday. These are little red flags that are being put up all over the place. My appeal to the government and to the Prime Minister is this: Do not ignore the honestly and deeply felt reservations which have been expressed about many aspects of the entire proposal including, I might say, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. You may be discouraged or dismayed by these contrary viewpoints, but it is a fact that they exist, and no amount of advertising or speaking tours by cabinet ministers is going to change that fact.

I was reading an essay the other day by the historian, Barbara W. Tuchman, author of several scholarly works, and a paragraph that came to mind as an appropriate thought about the present constitutional impasse was the following:

> Wooden-headedness is a factor that plays a remarkably large role in government. Wooden-headedness consists of assessing a situation in terms of preconceived fixed notions while ignoring or rejecting any contrary signs. It is acting according to wish while not allowing oneself to be confused by the facts.

Honourable senators, I have, over the past many months, read just about every word written and spoken on the question of the Constitution and related matters such as resource ownership, the charter of rights and the many aspects of reform. I might say that I have been impressed with many of the arguments. I agree with the Leader of the Government in the Senate that many words have been spoken that, to say the least, have been divisive. On that score I do not excuse members of the party to which I belong, and at the same time I do not excuse members of other parties. It is unfortunate that when these issues become so emotional, logic and reason seem to leave us.

I do want to say, however, that notwithstanding the lack of logic or reason and the very high emotional pitch of some of the arguments, and notwithstanding the fact that some of them, I confess to you, are words that ought not to have been said, it seems to me that every one of those people, men and women, have at least spoken with some sincerity. What it proves to me is that they are all Canadians and not one of them loves their country more or less than the other, and I think we ought to recognize that.

Honourable senators, the other day my deputy leader and colleague from Manitoba, Senator Roblin, referred to a pamphlet being distributed to Canadians by our government dealing with the constitutional package. This gave me the idea to review not just speeches and press material that have come out with respect to the Constitution, but this beautifully produced "Speaker's Kit" about our Constitution, which I am sure you all found on your desks. This handy little guide, in both the official languages, I take it, is meant to assist people like myself with not a great deal of background to speak to other Canadians about the Constitution.

I would like to quickly review what my government has given to me in this handy little packet. The first thing it asks me to do, I assume, is to raise before any gathering of Canadians the question: What good is a constitution to the average citizen? Honourable senators, I trust you have read the answer, which is:

> A constitution is a valuable, unique document, reflecting the aspirations of the people living in a country. Far from being abstract, a constitution consists of the basic rules that the citizens have chosen to regulate their society.
> To be of value, a constitution must meet the needs of the citizens. It must provide for a reasonable degree of stability but it should be flexible enough to accomodate changing circumstances to allow for changes as needs arise.

And the last lines are:

> A society is made up of a group of people working toward common goals.

I wonder, if honourable senators can tell me what that has to do with the Constitution. Yes, I agree with those last lines notwithstanding the fact that I have a hard time knowing what they have to do with the Constitution.

As to the aspirations of Canadians, honourable senators, where I come from people deal with their aspirations in terms of economic things—in terms of quality of life, in terms of family and things. I have never met anyone who said to me that they felt that it would be better for them that the sun would shine brighter, that some good would come if somehow or other they had a constitution tucked under their pillow. I have never had that told me. This indicates that a constitution consists of basic rules that citizens have chosen to regulate their society. Does this infer that until we pass this resolution with a written charter of rights we have been living without basic rules in an unregulated and unjust society? I mean, what does it say? What have we been until now? As I said, the last lines are:

> A society is made up of a group of people working toward common goals.

I agree. I don't want to argue with that.

Dealing with the question of a constitution meeting people's needs, what are those needs in a constitutional sense? Who tells us what those needs are? How do we determine what they are today and what they will be tomorrow? In terms of flexibility, constitutional amendments are difficult. We have been arguing about section 42 and section 44 and there will be amendments, and we need the consent of six provinces. Go to the cities of Detroit, Cleveland, Los Angeles or Chicago, as we all do from time to time, and ask good citizens there about how easy it is to amend their Constitution. Two hundred and a few years ago they put into their Constitution the provision that every citizen shall have the right to bear arms, and in those days that made good sense. One would have been a fool not to bear arms. Today, when there are murders by the thousands, ask them what value that is in their Constitution. Ask them the efforts that have been made to change it. I mean, it is difficult. No matter how we finish off with this one, it will be most difficult. We tried to change the Constitution. I heard the Prime Minister say for 53 years we have been at it, and found it impossible. I think the Americans have been at the gun law question for longer than that.

It seems to me, not just from my day-to-day experiences but certainly from my training as a common law lawyer, that we have established through a long series of precedents an outstanding system to govern the behaviour of our citizens without the necessity of entrenching or committing to writing a system of guidelines.

The last point on this particular little card is:

> Our Constitution determines, for example, which order or orders of government pay pension benefits, family allowances, unemployment benefits and so on.

I mean, it really sounds wonderful except I read the resolution again after I read that, and it does not say anything about unemployment benefits, pension benefits, family allowances and all those other good things.

The next little card—I am sure you all had these—is headed: "The right and the responsibility of sharing." I want to talk about that. It says:

> The builders of our country came from various parts of the world. As they spread out across this vast land, they built a country on sheer stamina and the spirit of solidarity that inspired them.

Honourable senators, if the builders of our country did so well on sheer stamina and a spirit of solidarity, why are we meddling with this system that worked so successfully for so many years? There is no evidence that meddling will produce a better result. What this little card says to me is that by precedent and good sense and by people of goodwill we have established a system that works as well or better than any in the world—and I will tell you later about someone else who said that.

The second thing that this little card says on "The right and the responsibility of sharing," is:

> The tradition of sharing was established in our country from the beginning. In our political system, we have reflected this tradition in a variety of programs and policies designed to reduce regional disparities and to maintain for all of Canada a stable and well-balanced economy.

Well, I want to talk to you about that. I want to tell you about a policy of a government that says that and does something else.

In my home province of Manitoba there developed from 1938 through the sixties an airplane industry. You will remember the company was called TransCanada Airlines. In 1938 they established their base of operations at Winnipeg, I assume—because I was not then old enough to understand—because it was in the centre of the country. That made good sense to some silly people then. The industry, as I said, started in 1938. To relate a small piece of historical trivia, I might say that in the year 1948 the Honourable C. D. Howe said that 95 per cent of TransCanada Airline's activities would remain centered in Winnipeg.

Well, of assurances there were plenty. In 1963 the government of the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson confirmed that the Winnipeg facilities would be used. Not only was that so, but an assurance was given that no change would be made for 10 years—from 1963 onward. In 1967 Air Canada announced that they were going to close the Winnipeg base and to transfer all overhaul facilities to Dorval.

Not trivial, but certainly more current, was a statement made on May 23, 1968—and I remember the date well—by the very dear friend of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. I admit it was made in the heat of an election, but his words were:

> You may be assured that the present government will honour the commitment made by my predecessor and that in addition we will vigorously search out alternatives aimed at maintaining a viable aircraft support industry in Manitoba.

• (1730)

In the year 1969, there were no further or other overhaul or maintenance facilities left in Winnipeg, all having been moved by Air Canada to Dorval.

Honourable senators, we do not want good words. What we need in this country are good deeds. I am not impressed by the words. I can tell you that my province was dealt a terrible economic blow.

I should now like to talk about the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, because that is of more concern to me. The card contained in the kit the government gave to me states:

> A Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the Constitution—why do we need it?

It further states, under the heading "Protection," the following:

> When it comes to rights and freedoms such as the right to say, believe, print or broadcast anything we want, the right to meet and worship freely, the right to choose one's own government and to stand for election, Canadians are among the most fortunate people in the world.

Well, if they are, what are we doing with them? It goes on to say:

> The Canadian Constitution contains, however, very few guarantees that we can go on enjoying our rights and freedoms forever.

Doesn't that scare you about who is in government.

Let me say, honourable senators, that I support unequivocally the protection of human rights. I have had a long involvement with civil liberties groups in my home province; I have been involved with this kind of thing with the Canadian Bar Association and with the Manitoba Bar Association. I was born to parents who escaped Soviet tyranny, who came here as adults looking for a new home and a safe place to live. They found that here. I had instilled in me at a very early age a deep sense of commitment to that cause.

My recollection of the argument presented at the premiers' conference—and I stand to be corrected on this—is that Senator Buckwold's premier, Premier Blakeney, said during the course of discussions that there was certainly an onus on those who advocate change from our present system to demonstrate that the change is both needed and beneficial.

At this point I want to say there is a matter of deep concern to me, and it is also terribly bothersome to me. It is both deceptive and, I suggest, deceitful, for those in favour of entrenched rights to suggest, as some do, that opponents of entrenchment are against human rights.

Honourable senators, I know that every senator in this house, every member of the other place, every member of every legislature in every quarter of this country, in every decent place in this country, has a deep commitment and desire to provide the necessary protection of human rights. The question really is how one does it most effectively. In all of my readings, I fail to find how basic rights would be better protected by a charter.

Infringements of what might be considered basic rights have fortunately been rare in our history. I suppose the most obvious and often cited example is the treatment of Japanese Canadians in this country during the years 1940 to 1946. I suggest that we can all hang our heads in shame, because that is a black mark in terms of civil rights in this country.

I know advocates of an entrenched charter say it would prevent or mitigate abuses of this kind. Well, it did not stop the Japanese Americans in the United States from suffering the same indignities in a country that had human rights well entrenched.

Perhaps the best argument against entrenched rights is what Senator Manning said last week—"If you want to see the best charter of entrenched human rights, it is in the Soviet Union." I suppose it is possible to find one out of a few hundred million who can tell you about those rights and how well they are exercised.

You will remember the big cuffuffle in India during the late forties—I think that was the time, but perhaps someone will have to correct me. India enshrined a Charter of Rights in its Constitution. Why don't we ask the people Mrs. Ghandi put in jail how well those people were protected.

The premier of my province clearly indicated that he, as well as other premiers, was opposed to the concept on grounds quite apart from the historical ones—that is, the ones that say, "For 113 years, fellows, you have done all right." An entrenched Charter of Rights, I am suggesting, would remove the supremacy of Parliament and legislatures.

Surely we all believe that Parliament is the cornerstone of our history precisely because it leaves determination and protection of rights in the hands of elected and accountable representatives of the people. It has been said time and time again that Parliament is accountable and answerable to the people and is, therefore, better equipped to resolve social issues than are judges who, by the very nature of their work, are out of the mainstream of life. From my experience—and in my home province I know them all and I like them all—and I do not want Senator Molgat reporting me because I have to practise in front of them—I know they are not equipped to deal with the social issues. Speak to them. You will see how they become removed. That is a good thing, because it shows their independence. I assume, as well, that an entrenched Charter of Rights would involve the courts in political matters, as is recognized by many jurists, including, I suggest, former Supreme Court Justice Pigeon, who recently pointed out that entrenching a Charter of Rights grants to the courts an important part of the legislative powers now vested in Parliament.

Honourable senators, an entrenchment of rights would involve a loss of judicial impartiality and judicial independance, two cornerstones of our judicial system. The Master of the Rolls—and those who practice law will appreciate whom I am speaking of—Lord Denning, who has been an innovative kind of judge, said in a speech in the House of Lords that if the judges were given power to overthrow acts of Parliament they would become politicized; their appointments would be based on political grounds and their reputations would suffer accordingly. In deciding whether or not any federal or provincial statute is constitutional, judges do have the power to overthrow it. Lord Denning went on to state:

> One has only to see in the great Constitutions of the United States of America and of India the conflicts which arise from time to time between the judges and the legislatures.

Surely that is a system we do not have and one we can do well without.

Statute law, because it can more easily be amended, permits more flexible response to social and other changes so as to better protect the rights of citizens. As well, an entrenched charter would encourage large volumes of litigation with respect to legislation, and introduces what I suggest to you is a dangerous and, what is more important than that, delaying kind of tactic, and one of uncertainty into the processes of government.

Excuse me, honourable senators—

Senator Roblin: Don't interrupt their conversation.

Senator Frith: That is how stimulating we find your speech.

Senator Nurgitz: I appreciate that.

An entrenched charter, by its inflexibility, would inhibit the development and acknowledgement of new rights, such as the rights of handicapped people, or rights to privacy, or rights that we are not aware of today that will be important 10, 20 or 30 years hence.

Honourable senators, the real protection of rights lies in the commitment of people of goodwill and of governments of goodwill to see that human rights are protected and enhanced, as they have been protected and enhanced in Canada through our parliamentary form of government.

We have not even passed this resolution, we do not even have a charter, yet at this very moment, after very careful study by the people who prepared the Constitution Act, 1980, people are complaining about the wording. I have heard from a delegation of Jewish people keenly concerned with the further prosecution of Nazi war criminals who believe that section 11(e) forever closes the door on their efforts.

● (1740)

Section 11(e) states that a person cannot be prosecuted for any act that was not a crime at the moment he committed that act. The explanatory note on the left-hand side of the page states that this is drawn from the United Nations Covenant. Well, honourable senators, if one takes a look at the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 1966, to which our country is a party, one will notice that there is a subsection added to that which states:

> Nothing in this article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of Nations.

We do not have that.

Last week I found on my desk, as I am sure all honourable senators did, a letter from the Chairman of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. I am sure all honourable senators have read that letter with interest. I assume, bearing in mind the author of that letter, we cannot say that that letter is partisan. Yet, the opening paragraph states, and I quote:

> The CACSW is gravely concerned that the draft Charter of Rights and Freedoms proposed for entrenchment by the federal government does not adequately protect women.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

That tells you something about the problems of a system of attempting to entrench everything, to cover everything. A journalist wrote in a Toronto newspaper yesterday:

> What the pussycat for women's rights fails to understand is that entrenched rights have never been a guarantee for any rights—loopholes are built in, large enough to drive a Mack truck through them.

Senator Roblin: Who is the pussycat?

Senator Nurgitz: The pussycat she was referring to, I guess, was the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the minister from my province.

Senator Roblin: Oh, that pussycat.

Senator Lamontagne: I thought it was you, Senator Roblin.

Senator Nurgitz: He has been a tiger today, senator.

It seems to me that before the Charter of Rights has been put into effect, and indeed before it has affected people, either individually or in groups, one is already encountering difficulties. What difficulties lie out there for groups who have not yet been heard in federal-provincial conferences? Indeed, will they be heard by the parliamentary committee? Senator Buckwold has said he knows of 50 groups, and he doubts that they can be heard, the timetable is so rigid. What is going to happen to their rights?

It is interesting to note that two of Canada's leading advocates of civil liberties have reviewed this entire question of the proposed Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms. Those of you from Ontario, I am sure, will be familiar with their names. Alan Borovoy, chief counsel to the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, fears entrenchment. He has said:

> I fail to see why entrenching the same language about rights in the Constitution will make any difference.

Clayton Ruby, a foremost Toronto lawyer and someone well known for his interest in civil rights matters, said the other day in the Toronto press:

> . . . the present Bill of Rights is practically useless—

That is the one we have, the statute. He continued:

> —the Trudeau Bill of Rights is designed to be completely useless.

Senator Olson: You would be the first one to advocate it if it were not in there.

Senator Nurgitz: I am sorry, I did not hear you, Senator Olson.

Senator Lamontagne: Why are you against it?

Senator Nurgitz: Why am I against the entrenchment of rights?

Senator Lamontagne: If it is useless, why are you against it?

Senator Roblin: You have not been listening.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senator, I am against all things that are useless.

Senator Perrault: You don't want your party abolished.

Senator Nurgitz: I did not hear that, Senator Perrault. That may have been your best speech of the day, but I did not hear it.

Senator Perrault: You are making a good speech; carry on.

Senator Nurgitz: I appreciate that you are taking in the last minute or two of it.

Senator Phillips: You finally woke him up.

Senator Nurgitz: I don't think he has been awake for years.

Honourable senators, I am convinced beyond all reasonable doubt that not only has the onus not been discharged in terms of showing that a changed system is a better system, but that our present system provides better protection for Canadians.

There is one last card that I want to bring to your attention. It is entitled: "Why do we want to bring the Constitution home?" This I recommend to all honourable senators. I have sent it to many good Canadians. It reads:

> As citizens of a mature and independent country, many Canadians believe it is time we brought our Constitution home to Canada from Britain, so we no longer will have to turn to a parliament in another country to amend it.

Well, I want to say that there is probably not a member in this chamber or in the other place who would disagree with that statement. Since the government has printed this thing, I think it ought to do what it says. I think the public relations people hired by the government are people who know, and this is what they agree on—that we ought to bring it home and amend it. I am pleased that Senator Olson applauds that. That is something that I and my party stand for.

Senator Flynn: He did not know what he was applauding.

Senator Olson: You don't want to be in a straightjacket, either.

Senator Phillips: That might be appropriate.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, if you will give me another 30 seconds, I will conclude, and then you fellows can continue.

The proposal of premiers, of opposition members, of independents like our own colleague Senator Manning, is, "Let's bring the Constitution home and let's amend it here." The present course embarked on by the government runs exactly counter to the proposition set out on this little card.

Not only are we asking the British Parliament to amend our Constitution, we are asking them to do a massive re-write. The second paragraph covers with some pride the history of how the British North America Act united New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec into the Canadian federation. It goes on to state:

> Its resolutions were drawn up by Canadian delegates, without representation from the British government.

Well, who were the Canadian delegates? They were the representatives of the provinces. They represented the partners in what was to become known as Canada. Why can't we continue to have a partnership with the provinces?

Honourable senators, I hope that I have in some small way attempted to demonstrate the difficulty I am having in accepting the Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms and the difficulty that concerns me in scrapping a Constitution that has worked as well as the Canadian Constitution has, as well as some of the institutions. I am not necessarily hung up on the Constitution itself. I do believe we ought to have the Constitution in Canada, and I think we are mature enough. I am more concerned with the systems and the institutions.

Before he became Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau wrote the following:

> For the last 100 years . . . this country and this Constitution have allowed men to live in a state of freedom and prosperity which, though perhaps imperfect, has nevertheless rarely been matched in the world.

At a time when the pressures of the office did not bear down upon him, Mr. Trudeau himself was capable of a generous assessment of our present Constitution's value.

I took that quotation from the Prime Minister's book Federalism and the French Canadians. In the same essay, Mr. Trudeau also wrote:

> History teaches us that diversity rather than uniformity is the general rule in this Land . . . with the exception of a certain number of basic principles that must be safeguarded such as liberty and democracy, the rest ought to be adapted to the circumstances of history, to traditions, to geography, to cultures, and to civilizations.

It is the Prime Minister rather than those of us who are disturbed by his initiative who has become converted in his older age, who has become seized with an urgency and an indecent haste, dictating deadlines for which there is no conceivable demand or necessity.

Even in Quebec, which was the Prime Minister's excuse for his determined initiative—I want to be polite; it was the Prime Minister's reason for his determination. Even in Quebec, all of the major parties, including the provincial Liberal Party, are solidly opposed to this action.

We have a Constitution that has served us well. The Prime Minister believes he has a better one. The burden is on the Prime Minister and the government to convince the vast majority of the population, in every region, including the small ones, that his is a proposal which will stand the test of time and serve this country as equitably and as honourably as the institutions and the Constitution which he would scrap.

• (1750)

Senator Bosa: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Molgat: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Nurgitz: If you ask them one at a time. Senator Molgat?

Senator Molgat: I have just a very quick question which is not germane to the main theme of your speech, but you did bring the matter up. I am referring to Trans-Canada Airlines in Winnipeg, and in view of the fact that you had injected the names of the previous Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, and the present Prime Minister, I would ask you if you are not aware that the decision to close those operations and transfer them to Montreal was taken by the then Prime Minister, Mr. John Diefenbaker, that the Minister of Transport of the day was the Honourable Leon Balcer and that the Premier of Manitoba was none other than our colleague, the Honourable Senator Roblin.

Senator Nurgitz: I am sure you are aware, Senator Molgat, that Senator Roblin is the last person in the world I shall have to defend.

Senator Olson: Try giving a straight answer like I do.

Senator Nurgitz: If I tried to give a straight answer, you would not recognize it. What I want to say is that there were some decisions, and I confess that. What I am saying, however, is that in 1967 John Diefenbaker was not the Prime Minister of this country, and in 1969 John Diefenbaker was not the Prime Minister and Leon Balcer was not the Minister of Transport. There were many, many other decisions. I well agree that there were some decisions taken during the time of the Diefenbaker government that were not helpful.

Senator Perrault: You should have told us about those.

Senator Nurgitz: Well, I did not tell you about every government. I could keep going. There were several other statements by Prime Minister Trudeau that I did not inject into that portion of it as well.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators—

Senator Bosa: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I draw your attention to the fact that it is 6 o'clock, and according to the rules of the Senate I should leave the Chair until 8 o'clock. Honourable senators may wish to follow a certain procedure, but until they do I must respect the rule.

Senator van Roggen: I rose for the sole purpose of moving the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Bosa: There are still 30 seconds to go before it is 6 o'clock, so I wonder if I can ask a question of the honourable senator who has just finished speaking. The honourable senator alluded to the fact that if we entrenched the rights it would delegate to the courts—

Senator van Roggen: I rise on a point of order. There is a motion before the house.

Senator Bosa: But I rose before you.

Senator Flynn: Ask it tomorrow.

On motion of Senator van Roggen, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, October 30, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Quinquennial actuarial report on the Canadian Forces Superannuation Account in the Consolidated Revenue Fund as at December 31, 1975, pursuant to section 27 of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, Chapter C-9, R.S.C., 1970.

Report on the Quinquennial Actuarial Examination on the state of the Superannuation Account in the Consolidated Revenue Fund as at December 31, 1977, pursuant to section 35 of the Public Service Superannuation Act, Chapter P-36, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Canada Post Office for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 80(2) of the Post Office Act, Chapter P-14, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the honourable Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a) that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, October 31, 1980, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, and that rule 7(1) be suspended in relation thereto. That requires leave.

An Hon. Senator: No leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Leave is not granted.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would the Deputy Leader of the Government go over the rules that he wants to suspend? I would be interested in knowing them, although I rather suspect that I will not agree to his motion.

Senator Frith: In connection with that motion, it is rule 7(1).

Senator Flynn: Perhaps, if we knew exactly why—

Senator Frith: Perhaps we can revive it after I move the next motion.

Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Friday, October 31, 1980, I will move "that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday November 1, 1980, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon and that rules 7.(1) and 13 be suspended in relation thereto."

Honourable senators, by way of explanation,—

• (1405)

An Hon. Senator: Make it good.

Senator Smith: Would the deputy leader mind mentioning those rules again? I looked at rule 71—

Senator Frith: Rule 7.(1) and rule 13.

Honourable senators, at the beginning of this week when we received the message from the other place with reference to the motion setting up a joint committee to study the proposed resolution on the Constitution, I discussed with the Leader of the Opposition a schedule for dealing with this matter. As I recall it, I suggested that if possible we should sit Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings as well as in the afternoons, and do our best to deal with the matter as quickly as possible. He replied that he did not think it was necessary for us to sit extended hours into the evenings, that he felt it might even appear a little unseemly to do so. He said that in his view it would be much more desirable for us to sit regular hours, from 2 o'clock to 6 o'clock on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, and on Thursday evening—

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Frith: —depending on how—

Senator Flynn: That's better.

Senator Frith: —how things stood on Thursday. He thought we could sit on Friday also, if necessary, and that we could finish the matter by the end of the week. I said, "I think that is very reasonable, and therefore I agree that we will not sit Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday evenings. We will see how things stand on Thursday and sit Thursday evening if we have a sufficiently long list of speakers on both sides, and Friday, if necessary, and finish it up by the end of the week.

Now I understand that the Leader of the Opposition would prefer not to finish by the end of this week but to continue, more or less along the lines I have just discussed, until tomorrow, and to have the vote on Monday. I may have made a mistake by saying to the supporters of the government in this place and elsewhere—

Senator Flynn: Especially elsewhere.

Senator Frith: No, not especially. Where I made the remarks are more likely to be known to me than to anyone else, and I say no, not especially but, in addition, in other places. The first place I made the report was to the leader and to the whip, and then I reported it to our caucus. What I said was that Senator Flynn had made what I thought was a very reasonable suggestion for dealing with this matter—

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: —and therefore I felt that we should deal with the matter in that way, namely, to sit Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons, and Thursday afternoon and Thursday evening, if there seemed to be a long enough list, and again on Friday if there still seemed to be a long list, and to have the question put and the vote taken by the end of the week.

I want to make it very clear in giving this notice of motion for Saturday, which is the end of the week, I am not putting it on the footing of any reneging on the part of the Leader of the Opposition, or that I feel he has let me down in an agreement. I do feel that we had an agreement, but that is open to misunderstanding as any verbal understanding is.

• (1410)

I think the footing upon which I am putting forward my proposal is reasonable. We should continue to debate this afternoon, this evening, and tomorrow morning, for which I have asked leave. On that my honourable friends opposite have said that they would reserve leave until at least I have given some explanation. That does not mean that they are now going to give leave, but it is reasonable for them to wait for an explanation. If leave is given we will sit this afternoon, this evening, tomorrow morning—which I would prefer—and if necessary, tomorrow afternoon and tomorrow evening, with a vote tomorrow evening, or, if necessary, on Saturday.

I am sorry if I am going to be inconveniencing my honourable friends because of my understanding of the agreement I had with the Leader of the Opposition. I believe, however, that the best footing upon which to put that schedule is that it is consistent with the suggestion made by Senator Flynn, which I thought was a reasonable one, and on which I have proceeded because I thought, and still think, that it is a reasonable way of proceeding. That is the reason I have given notice of the motion which I will put tomorrow. I believe the suggestion that Senator Flynn made on Monday for dealing with this item was reasonable then, and is still reasonable.

Senator Flynn: You said Monday?

Senator Frith: I was referring to the conversation you and I had on Monday. I thought at the time that you made a reasonable suggestion, and I still think it is a reasonable program. I am suggesting we proceed with the Flynn formula, because I think it is a reasonable one.

Senator Perrault: The Flynn plan. Flim flam.

Senator Flynn: The foghorn from the west is blowing again. That's the only thing you can do—make loud noises in this place.

Senator Molgat: What was that you said?

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Flynn: I said to Senator Perrault that the only thing he can do in this place is make noises.

Senator Molgat: Did you say something about the west?

Senator Flynn: I said, "The foghorn from the west." Do I have to draw you a picture, Senator Molgat?

Senator Molgat: I thought your comment had something to do with—

Senator Flynn: You were wrong, as usual.

Honourable senators, with reference to the statement just made by Senator Frith, I discussed this matter with him at the beginning of the week. I told him we should start the way we did. It then seemed quite possible that we could complete the debate on Friday. I gave no undertaking. I told him again yesterday that I would let him know today what our position would be. I was expecting that we would sit all day today and this evening until 12 o'clock, if the Senate so wished, and again tomorrow in the regular way, from 2 to 6 and from 8 to 12 if such were the desire of Senator Frith.

What we were proposing—and I discussed it with him yesterday—was that we should have a convenient time for the vote on this motion. I thought that Friday was not an appropriate time, and Saturday would be even less appropriate. I said that Monday or Tuesday next would be better, and that if there was an agreement we should say that the vote would be taken at a given time on a certain day, so that it would provide all honourable senators with the opportunity to be here if they wanted to vote.

Senator Marshall: They should be here.

Senator Flynn: That was my reasoning. Senator Frith says that I let him down. I did not let him down.

• (1415)

Senator Frith: No, I did not say that.

Senator Flynn: In any event, I still think the proposal I put to the deputy leader is a valid one. If he does not like it, then there is no deal. It is that simple. We told him there would be no deal.

I consider that the motion he intends to put tomorrow is entirely out of order since it requires two days' notice. There are no provisions in the rules for sitting on Saturday. It is not simply a matter of suspending the rules. You have to provide for the sitting on that day, and there is no provision in the rules. It is not a sitting day. In any event, I can make that objection in due course.

I would suggest to him that if he were reasonable he would accommodate the people on his side. I would ask him: What difference does it make whether the Senate sits on Saturday afternoon or Monday evening? I am not saying that, depending on the circumstances and if there are some changes in the position of the government, we may not be able to conclude the debate tomorrow. I did not say that.

However, I suggest that the reasonable thing to have done would have been to have a vote on a given date. They do that in the House of Commons. Very seldom will they have a vote on a Friday in the House of Commons. They set the date so as to accommodate as many members as is possible. I made that suggestion to the deputy leader, but he did not agree with it. He has received his orders from elsewhere. That is fine. If he can explain the difference for the government between a decision of the Senate made on Saturday or Monday, then I will again discuss the matter with him.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have little to add to what I said on the question of why we wish to proceed on the basis of finishing this item this week. That was the program we launched and whether there was a misunderstanding or not is irrelevant. I think it is a reasonable program.

The committee has to start its work as soon as possible. That view is apparently not shared by others. Places like this exist because we do not agree on everything. It is the government's position that the committee should start its work as soon as possible, and "as soon as possible" means, in this context, as soon as reasonable.

Senator Flynn: Tuesday.

Senator Frith: If we finish the debate this week, then the committee can start its work on Monday.

I cannot show by some decree on tables of stone that Monday is the only desirable day. I can only say that that is the program we started with last Monday—I thought on the basis of agreement. If my friend says there was no agreement, then I do not quarrel with him on that, but I still feel that that is a good program and one we should continue with.

As far as notice is concerned, I think it is clearly in order because certain types of motion require two days' notice requiring an intervening sitting day. This is not one of them. I will make a submission to the Chair for a ruling, if the matter is raised as a point of order tomorrow, that the notice required here is one day's notice, which means the next sitting day, namely, Friday, which is a sitting day. However, we can debate that tomorrow.

That is my explanation as to why I am asking that the Senate be prepared to sit, if necessary, on Saturday. Of course, we can rescind that if it turns out that we have our vote before then. The key to the whole program, not the agreement—let us forget about that—

Senator Flynn: Stubborn as the Prime Minister!

Senator Frith: I certainly don't mind being associated with or compared to the Prime Minister in any way. I am flattered.

That was the program we started with and it is the program we should continue with. We may have to sit on Saturday, and that is why I have given notice. The motion will be put tomorrow. If there is a question of order we can debate it then.

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER IN REGINA

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Radio reports this morning indicated that in his remarks in Regina last evening the Prime Minister showed a willingness to amend that aspect of the constitutional package now before us which deals with the referendum. Would the Leader of the Government tell us if such is the case?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have the text of the remarks made by the Prime Minister last evening in Regina. However, I do understand that the speech was received exceptionally well in the prairie provinces.

Of course, the Prime Minister has always been forthcoming in his position regarding consideration of amendments. He has said from the outset that he wants to be flexible, and that he will await with interest the deliberations of the committee. Representations made by certain individuals and organizations suggest that the referenda sections require, perhaps, greater clarification.

Senator Flynn: Clarification?

REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADIAN CIVIL LIBERTIES ASSOCIATION

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is it correct that the Canadian Civil Liberties Association yesterday expressed strong reservations regarding the inclusion in the Constitution of the proposed amendments relating to civil and human rights? They suggested that, in their opinion, the government's package would not strengthen the rights of individuals.

Is it also true that the association called upon the government to delay beyond December 9 the consideration of the committee as it deals with the resolution so that more Canadians could be heard? If that is true, has the government responded to those representations made by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, and, if so, what is that response?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not received any documentation from the Canadian Civil Liberties Association. However, may I suggest that this is one of the great values in having this proposed resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen dealt with as quickly as possible. If that is the case, organizations of this kind may be able to bring their views, thoughts and suggested amendments to the attention of parliamentarians. The faster we undertake the process of passing this motion the better off the people of Canada will be. Organizations of this kind and others will then be able to state their views.

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not know whether Senator Smith is quoting from a news report or some official document, but if he has an official document I would be glad to have a copy of it. I must take as notice the end of his remarks as to whether the government has responded in any way.

Senator Smith: I have no official document. Consequently, although I would be otherwise glad to do so, I cannot furnish a copy thereof to the Leader of the Government.

ENERGY

THE BUDGET—EXPORT TAX ON NATURAL GAS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a couple of questions on the energy matter which I should like to address to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

At page 8 of the budget speech it is indicated that the government is abandoning its plan for an export tax on natural gas. Does that mean there will be no export tax, that there will be no tax on natural gas that is exported?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, what is clear is that there is not going to be a tax only on exported gas. After a 90-day period from November 1, there will be a tax applied on the throughput of all gas in Canada, including the export portion.

● (1425)

Senator Roblin: Does that mean that while the government is abandoning the gas export tax, it will still tax gas that is being exported?

Senator Olson: It means that all gas will be taxed on a throughput basis. Export volumes will not be singled out for any tax treatment different from that applied to any other gas sold in Canada.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think that is as neat an exhibition of double talk as we are likely to hear for a long, long while.

Senator Olson: But it is absolutely accurate.

THE BUDGET—OIL EXPLORATION—PARTICIPATION OF PETRO-CANADA ON CROWN LANDS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have a further question for the minister in connection with the energy situation. As I understand what was stated by the Minister of Finance the other day, Petro-Canada, and perhaps some other petroleum emanation of the government, will have the right to back into wells that are drilled on Crown lands in Canada to the extent of 25 per cent. I am wondering whether this new rule is to apply to all activity on Crown lands—that is, the activities of both Canadian petroleum companies and international petroleum companies.

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there is an essence of accuracy in the comment of my honourable friend with respect to Petro-Canada or some other entity in the public domain acquiring a 25 per cent interest in such a well. Insofar as the totality is concerned in terms of the other activity that my honourable friend referred to, I shall try to get him a very detailed reply. I do not have that information with me now.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his reply. I emphasize that I am trying to find out whether the same treatment will be accorded to all companies involved in that area or whether there will be a difference in the treatment of companies depending on their status.

I would also ask the minister to inform the Senate as to the extent to which Petro-Canada, or such other company, will buy into these situations.

One can understand that up to the point of actual discovery there are usually considerable expenditures involved by those doing the prospecting, and I am interested in knowing whether Petro-Canada, when it buys in to the extent of 25 per cent, makes any retroactive contribution to the expenditures made up to the point that it buys in. I should also like to know the extent to which it will share in expenditures after buying in.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, again, I think I should take that question as notice and provide my honourable friend with an accurate and technical reply. I am sure my honourable friend knows that a good deal of exploration has gone on where the cost of that exploration has already been accommodated in the taxation calculations for a number of companies, and, indeed, to some extent, is already written off if it is a non-revenue producing exploration cost. I suspect that it is only in the category where there is production or potential production revenue that this would apply—that is, when some delivery system is placed between the site and the market. In any event, I shall get a more detailed answer to that.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for that. I would ask him to advise us, at the same time, as to the situation both before and after the budget. I understand his point that some part of development costs up to the point where Petro-Canada may come in may have been written off in the past. I want to know whether any distinction is made between that portion of expenditures which has been written off and that portion which is still regarded as an asset by the company concerned.

But even of more interest to me would be the situation from here on in, because one of the features of the energy budget is a change in those expenditures that might be written off against the bottom line on the tax statement—a very substantial change. I would like to know just what recognition is to be given to the new situation when Petro-Canada buys in, perhaps two or three years down the road, after these expenditures have been made under the new tax regime.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend will know that what was stated in the budget was really a statement of policy and principle, and in many cases there will follow, obviously, the exercise of making the regulations to give administrative capability to these policies. I am not sure they have all been written in the greatest detail for administrative capability.

• (1430)

My friend will also realize that a number of bills will follow in the houses of Parliament after the budget debate, and at that stage, of course, there will be an opportunity to get greater explanations. But even at that stage it is not always possible to reply in detail as to what the technical regulations may be, because in many cases they are not even written by that stage.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate what my honourable friend is telling me. I urge him to make the best haste he can because, as he probably knows, there is going to be a considerable milling around in the petroleum industry with respect to investment until some of these matters are clarified. But I would ask him to give the Senate an assurance that when these regulations are being drafted people who have a legitimate right or interest to be consulted will have an opportunity to comment on them. One has seen the report of the Canada Council and others strongly recommending some input from the victims, if I may use that shorthand expression, of regulations that have been drafted in conformity with bills, and I would appreciate an assurance from him, particularly in this case, that these people will be able to make some input into regulation-writing before the die is cast.

Senator Olson: I do not want to accept some of the terminology that my friend has used such as "victims" and that sort of thing, but this government has a long and favourable history of consultation with the people affected by such regulations and has tried to make them administratively reasonable.

Senator Roblin: Would the honourable minister give some consideration to ensuring that the long and reasonable record would be extended to the people who are affected by the regulations we are discussing?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I was trying to point out that the pattern is so well established that I think my honourable friend can expect that.

Senator Roblin: I take that, honourable senators, as an assurance.

THE ECONOMY

THE BUDGET—STATEMENTS BY FORMER MINISTER OF FINANCE AND THE PREMIER OF SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I wish to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Last night a former finance minister, Mr. Turner, condemned the government's energy policy as an unwarranted attack on the oil and gas industry, and he further claimed that the budget had done little to bring the large federal deficit under control. Is the former finance minister correct in these assertions?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I suppose it is not the best thing to do to try answering a question by asking another, but I really am curious as to whether the preamble to the question is based on my honourable friend's interpretation, or if it is some speculation in the press as to what the former Minister of Finance said. Of course, for me to give a reply on that basis would be absolutely and completely against the rules of this chamber. But if my honourable friend would like to rephrase the question and clarify whether this is his interpretation of what he thinks he saw or someone else's interpretation of some remarks that were made in Regina, it would be a little helpful, because the conclusion he comes to after he has gone through this transfer of interpretations may be a long way from the truth.

Senator Doody: I am not sure if that was an answer or a question or a new rendition of an Eisenhower press release. But in the interests of the tortured syntax, the likes of which we have never seen before, I would like to assure the honourable gentleman that most of my questions are interpretations of material that I have. In this particular case it is the interpretation of a statement that was made by the former minister of finance last evening. To make the whole thing very short, would the honourable minister care to answer my question or not?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what I would like to do is to see the text of the speech that was made. I am not even sure that it is within the rules for me to comment on that, because obviously Mr. Turner has the right to make any comments that he likes, but that does not necessarily initiate a debate in this chamber, whether we agree with him or disagree with him.

But it is also possible, because it has happened to me a number of times, that one or two sentences have been taken out of context and this can give a somewhat different meaning than what was intended by the author or the speaker in this case. So I think it would be helpful if I had a look at the whole speech, and if my honourable friend has it he could save me the trouble of having to obtain it by sending it over to me.

Senator Doody: I shall certainly get a copy of the speech for the honourable senator. I had to quote out of context because it would be an imposition on the time of the Senate if I were to read the entire speech. But if that is the way the rule is interpreted, then I shall certainly try to do so in the future. But my question really is not as to whether the former finance minister had the right to condemn the unwarranted attack on the oil and gas industry; my question is: Was he correct? Perhaps it was a warranted attack; I don't know. I am simply asking the representative of the government to help. However, we can wait until the minister has had an opportunity to read the document. I shall try to get him a copy of Premier Blakeney's comments of last evening too.

Premier Blakeney was quoted as saying that he preferred the Crosbie budget to the more recent budget because it was less onerous on the low-income earners in the country, which is a point that I made in the Question Period yesterday. He also warned the government that Saskatchewan would launch a court challenge if the federal government tried to impose the new 8 per cent tax on the net revenues of oil and gas producers.

These two matters are also taken out of context because I do not have the entire statement of Premier Blakeney. I can try to get it. Would the minister responsible for economic development tell us if Premier Blakeney was correct in describing this budget as being more onerous on low-income earners than the previous budget.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, no. I would completely and diametrically disagree with that assertion purported to have been made by Premier Blakeney. I could give a number of reasons why this budget is not in fact doing what he said. To support my view on that I can say that the people of Canada were asked what they thought of that last budget and they turned it down.

Senator Perrault: And how!

Senator Flynn: Give them an opportunity to judge yours.

Senator Doody: Well, honourable senators, I guess we should really take up a moment or two to allow that penetrating insight into the obvious to gel. In the meantime there seems to be some inconsistency with regard to the diametrical opposition of the minister to Premier Blakeney's statement and the proposed increase in the price of home heating oil, and these huge cuts in the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar. I wonder if the honourable minister could explain what appears to me to be a rather major contradiction.

Senator Olson: Well, it is so simple that I thought it would be self-evident to the honourable senator that if you add up the totality of the December 11 budget of the previous government, and the impact of that on the Canadian consumer, in the purchase of fuel supplies, and then take the totality of those parts of the budget dealing with energy in the budget that came down earlier this week, it is completely obvious that the consumer will not have the increases contained in the earlier budget. It is so clear that it is obvious.

• (1440)

Senator Doody: Would the minister provide me with a copy of what he refers to as "the totality of these increases," and I will try to obtain—I dislike using these words, but one has to—the totality of the new modality of the—

Senator Olson: The totality of the calculations.

Senator Doody: The minister means the total, does he not? If I can, I will get the total from the Crosbie budget—

Senator Olson: Your leader has already accepted the challenge, and will have that done.

Senator Doody: Since I have been so co-operative in offering to get copies of Mr. Turner's speech and Mr. Blakeney's statement, perhaps the minister might get me a copy of the totality of the increases in the budget.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that will not be a large job, because I understand that in the other place there was a challenge thrown down by the Minister of Finance to the Leader of the Opposition to show him—I only know what I saw on television—that the discussion we have just had is, in fact, just so and so. It is really up to the leader of the Conservative Party in the other place. He accepted that challenge, so I suppose he is going to do all those calculations and come back with them. But I predict that he will find that he is wrong, or that he is trying to count apples and oranges, which are not necessarily the same thing.

Senator Flynn: He will not do the same thing that you do.

Senator Doody: As I have said, I have no hesitation in getting that material.

Senator Olson: It is already being done.

Senator Doody: As the minister has stated, it is already in the process of being prepared.

The other part of my question concerns the Saskatchewan Premier's statement that he intends to launch a court challenge if the federal government tries to impose an 8 per cent tax on net revenues of oil and gas producers. Is the Government of Canada prepared to accept that challenge in court?

Senator Olson: I do not believe there is any question of whether or not the Canadian government is prepared to accept the challenge. If the Government of Saskatchewan decides to launch a court action, I do not believe they would need to seek the permission of the federal government to do so. The former Minister of Justice would know that very well. In some cases they would need to seek permission to launch a court action, but in this case I do not think they would need our permission.

ENERGY

STATUS OF APPLICATION BY Q & M PIPE LINES TO CONSTRUCT A PIPELINE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It arises as a consequence of the several questions which were addressed to him yesterday on the Q & M pipeline. I trust that I may be excused from giving what may appear to be fairly lengthy quotations from two sources, but I assure honourable senators that those quotations are necessary because they constitute the essence of my question.

I refer the minister to his comments on October 15, to be found at page 869 of Debates of the Senate, as follows:

> I should add that I indicated yesterday—and I want to clear this up although it was not entirely erroneous—

Apparently it was partially erroneous but not entirely:

> —that perhaps no further action could be taken until a new application came before the National Energy Board. I want to correct that by the answer I gave today, that new information is being given to the National Energy Board respecting a previous application, or the application which was dealt with before.

I had great difficulty understanding that when I heard it first, and I have even greater difficulty understanding it when I read it again. On the other hand, it is put before its author, so I am sure he understood it if no one else did.

I should now like to quote two paragraphs from the last two pages of the National Energy Board decision on the application of Q & M Pipe Lines. They are as follows:

> The Board believes that the timing of the availability of the reserves of oil and gas will be more determinable upon completion of drilling—now under way or planned. This will have a bearing on the design's feasibility of a gas pipeline serving markets east of Lévis and Lauzon, and Q & M may wish to make a new application.

That is the first paragraph. The final paragraph of that decision reads:

> Having regard to the foregoing considerations, findings and conclusions, and having taken into account all matters that appear to it to be relevant, the Board denies Q & M's application.

My first question to the minister is: Given that both these quotations of the National Energy Board decision would suggest that the application is dead, is the minister absolutely certain—I hope he is following me very carefully—of the validity of his response of October 15, that a further application is not necessary and that Q & M need do nothing more than submit to the board further details of clarification, thereby necessitating no further public hearings?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The honourable senator has given a great deal of credence to the replies that I gave some time ago. I said—and the reply was off the top of my head—

Senator Donahoe: That's dangerous.

Senator Olson: —that the application was probably denied, and therefore—it was not completely denied because certainly the section from Montreal to Quebec was approved, but beyond there it was denied. I said that. I then had officials in my department check that out. They came back with the information that there was new information being supplied by the applicant which would meet the conditions which were the basis of the refusal by the National Energy Board. Some of them were environmental. Some were contained in the paragraph that the honourable senator quoted, but he did not quote enough, because while I was listening to him I was not sure whether that drilling activity was related only to the potential gas supply off the east coast, or whether that was to add to the total reserves in Canada of drilling that was under way. That happens to be important, because the National Energy Board is now receiving submissions to reassess the totality of the reserves in Canada.

That was not in question—as to the volumes that were required for the entire Q & M pipeline. In other words, there were reserves already established, before this latest set of hearings, to supply that line, in any event. So I believe they were referring to the potential that can possibly go into a distribution system from the area involved, namely, off the east coast.

I had better take my honourable friend's question and obtain a reply from the National Energy Board, and others who are involved in this whole exercise, taking into account what has happened, not only in terms of the original application, but also the terms and conditions, if there are any, under which it was partly accepted and partly denied, and what the NEB has said. I should also undertake to get at least an expression from the National Energy Board as to whether a new application is required, or whether additional information on the two aspects of it can indeed revive that section from Quebec to the east coast.

My honourable friend should give us a couple of days in which to put all that information together. I understand that sort of question, but I do not think it is useful to go back over some things that I said when I did not have any background information. I admitted that I wanted to clear it up, even at that time.

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question. I take it, from what the minister has just said, that there is a strong possibility that the application may, in fact, as I have suggested, be dead. It may very well be that there is some possibility that new material can be put before the board and revive the application insofar as it denied the extension of the pipeline into the maritime region beyond Quebec.

● (1450)

If, in fact, it proves, when my honourable friend brings back the answer that he has time to provide, that the application is dead and that it must be renewed, if there is to be an approval now given for the extension of the pipeline to Nova Scotia and through the maritimes, in the light of the possibility can the minister tell us how the government, as was stated in the course of the budget speech, can possibly, on its own responsibility, ensure completion of the Q & M line?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the honourable senator should accept that it is a firm commitment on the part of the government that we want that pipeline built so that gas will be available from one coast of this country to the other. Insofar as the mechanics of doing it are concerned, perhaps we need a few days to look into the question that was asked a few minutes ago. It may be that there is some other additional undertaking necessary by the government to make certain that it does go ahead, and that is what we were talking about in this firm policy of the government that that ought to be in there. As to the mechanics, I hope my honourable friend will give me a couple of days to find the exact answers to those technical questions, whether or not the application is no longer valid and we have to start over again and that sort of thing, but I give him an undertaking that I will bring him that information in a few days.

Senator Donahoe: I accept with gratitude the minister's undertaking and certainly will give him all the time that he would reasonably require to supply me with that information, but while he is in the course of securing that information, I would hope that he would be able to come back to this house with some assurance that the commitment about which he speaks, that we are told will ensure completion of the line, will be a commitment in the terms of the original commitment, namely, that the line will be completed according to the original construction schedule with gas flowing through the line by summer's end in 1983. If it should prove that he is unable to give that commitment, perhaps he would be good enough to indicate to what further date that commitment has been advanced.

Senator Olson: I should refer my honourable friend to page 4211 of House of Commons Debates because a similar set of questions was asked of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is directly responsible for that. I am not going to read it all, but what the minister does say, in essence, is that:

> —the National Energy Board has indicated that it is willing to deal expeditiously with a new application. In the view of the board, there would be fewer delays and fewer legal problems in dealing with a new application and less time would be wasted than if it were to hear an appeal.

That is one answer. Further down that same page, he goes on to say:

> —if necessary, a bill will be introduced in this House to achieve that purpose.

That, of course, is to get the approval for it, so I think if my honourable friend will look at page 4211 of Commons Hansard he will find the exact answers to what he was trying to seek, and I thank my honourable friend for bringing it forward.

Senator Donahoe: I thank the minister for that information and I will peruse that portion of Hansard with great interest, and I am delighted to find that what he is telling me is that the government proposes to ride roughshod over the National Energy Board's decision in the event that it should be adverse to the extension of the line.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend can make that interpretation if he likes, but words such as "roughshod" and all of that are not appropriate, as far as I am concerned, with regard to what the government is going to do.

Senator Donahoe: Perhaps he will do it in a smooth, sly way.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

THE BUDGET—ALLOCATIONS FOR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Yesterday, Senator Olson took pride in the additional sums that would be allocated to research and development—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Nurgitz: I thought that would draw a round of applause. The budget, however, provides only a very familiar assurance that sufficient funds—and I am now quoting because there were some admonitions to members on this side for not having read the budget—"have been allocated to the economic development envelope" to strengthen existing programs and launch new initiatives in support of research and development, industrial expansion and export development. So that those concerned about Canada's future ability to compete in the high technology market place can be assured that this commitment is something different from previous commitments like this contained in other Liberal budgets, will the Minister of Economic Development give us now the details of the specific increased allocations to research and development?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, my friend should look at pages 30, 31 and 32 and he will find the broad outline of that. Obviously, the government and, indeed, the Economic Development Committee, will have to look at the specific proposals as to how much for this type of R & D and that. That is a perfectly normal action to take, and I can assure my friend that when the specific research and development programs, either new initiatives or enriching of the ones that are already there, are brought to the Economic Development Committee, the ministers responsible for them, whether they are in agriculture or industry, trade and commerce or fisheries or wherever, will make those announcements. But in case my honourable friend misses those announcements by those ministers, I will try to see that they are brought to the house so he will have first-hand knowledge of them.

Senator Nurgitz: I will anxiously await those announcements. Thank you, Mr. Minister.

THE BUDGET—WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I should like to quote from page 11 of the budget.

> We have, therefore, allocated $4 billion to a Western Development Fund, of which we expect to spend $2 billion over the next three years.

Could the minister indicate to us in what specific years in the future the remaining $2 billion for the Western Development Fund will be spent?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I cannot at this time. Obviously, there may be some projects to be undertaken for the sum of $2 billion that may require larger amounts, so that there would be some downstream costs involved and that sort of thing. There may be some further new initiatives but what is important is that this rather significant amount of money is dedicated to that economic development program.

Senator Nurgitz: If I can ask the honourable senator then really there is $2 billion committed now—

Senator Olson: Two billion dollars, or more than that for subsequent years.

Senator Nurgitz: You are not saying which of those years would be the subsequent years.

Senator Olson: I would expect it would be the years immediately following the ones that have already been specified.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

CONFLICT BETWEEN NORTHERN PIPELINE ACT AND PROPOSED CONSTITUTION ACT, 1980

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: I have one final question of which I am sure the minister in his capacity as the minister responsible for the Northern Pipeline has had ample notice. Honourable senators, I referred to it yesterday in my remarks. Some weeks ago during the Northern Pipeline committee some concern was expressed by the senator from the Yukon, Senator Lucier, concerning aspirations of the Yukoners. Very briefly, could the minister responsible for the Northern Pipeline tell us if he has resolved the conflict between section 6 of the proposed Constitution Act, 1980 and section 26 in the Northern Pipeline Act, one providing for mobility of Canadians with respect to employment anywhere in Canada, and the other giving preferential treatment to Yukoners?

● (1500)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I tried to answer that the other day, but I obviously have not satisfied my friend that there may be some restrictions because of residence requirements. What I tried to tell him the other day—and I thought he understood—was that there were certain things going to be done, such as the introduction of training in certain skills, to enhance the position of Yukoners with regard to taking on those jobs. If he wants to relate the matter directly to something in the constitutional package removing those restrictions that are simply based on residential requirements, inside or outside of provincial or territorial borders within this country, I am not sure that there was as much of a conflict as my honourable friend is trying to make out. However, I will have a look at that and see if there is some more expanded and detailed answer that I can bring to him.

Senator Nurgitz: Before I leave the question, I should say that I do have a misunderstanding—or a non-understanding.

One section that I referred the honourable the minister to says that everyone, everywhere, gets a right to a job. Is that not what section 6 of the proposed Constitution Act, 1980 says? If we are all clear on that I then would like to know what happens when you fly in the face of section 26 of the Northern Pipeline Act, which gives preferential treatment to Yukoners? Are you trying to suggest to me that there is no conflict? Well, if the minister has undertaken to give us a response, I accept that.

Senator Olson: I am going to do that, but my honourable friend must know that there are expressions in there like, "wherever practical", and "wherever possible", and so on.

Senator Nurgitz: From my conversations with people from the Yukon, I gather they do not think it is a matter of "wherever practicable" and "wherever possible". They think they have a commitment.

ENERGY

THE BUDGET—POLICY RESPECTING CANADIAN OWNERSHIP OF OIL COMPANIES

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I want to follow up my question of yesterday to the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning the Canadian ownership account.

This, as I said yesterday, is a situation where Parliament is being asked to approve the imposition of a tax, the rate of which will be set by the cabinet. This seems analogous, as far as I am concerned, to asking Parliament to approve the imposition of an income tax of somewhere between zero and 50 per cent. As a layman I am puzzled by this procedure.

Will the minister ascertain whether the government have satisfied themselves specifically as to the legality of proceeding in this way? I had always been led to believe that it was the exclusive prerogative of Parliament to set the rates of taxation. I know that I cannot ask the minister for a legal opinion—indeed, he is not permitted to give one—nor can I ask him to lay on the table, I suppose, the opinion that the government has received with regard to the legality or otherwise of this matter. I would like to know, however, if the government have satisfied themselves specifically as to the legality of this.

Secondly, I would ask him if he can to inform us, in due course, what precedents exist for applying a tax of such general application in this way.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I believe I gave the honourable senator an undertaking to seek a fuller explanation of that yesterday; but if there are new elements in the information he is seeking, I will also take them as notice.

Senator Murray: With great respect, the minister gave me no such undertaking at all. What the minister told me yesterday was that I had not read the provision in question, and attempted to justify it by saying that the government can have recourse to several acts pursuant to which fees for certain activities are adjusted from time to time. I suppose this is analogous to provincial hunting licences, and that sort of thing.

What we are talking about here is a tax of very general application that Parliament is being asked to authorize, in such a way that the government, up to a certain ceiling, would be permitted to set the rates in due course. I think this is an unusual procedure and I am asking the minister to let us know what the precedents are for this kind of thing.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take that as notice and try to get the honourable senator a detailed and complete explanation of all the matters he has raised.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

THE BUDGET—PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Government Leader in the Senate. It has to do with the omission of any reference in the budget to the veterans of this country.

Prior to the resumption of this session the government passed Bill C-28, which provided relief in connection with the qualification period for receipt by widows and pensioners of a certain rate of disability pension. Unfortunately, most of those widows will have to wait six-and-a-half years before they qualify. In view of that long period, and the increase in inflation that will take place over the period of six-and-a-half years, I wonder if the government leader could inquire to see if any relief could be forthcoming by introducing an amendment to the Canada Pension Act, and all those other acts referred to, with the object of relieving that pressure and reducing the period of six-and-a-half years.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice, honourable senators.

Senator Marshall: Another matter in connection with veterans has to do with the basic rate of pension, which has not been revised for some years. Again, through inflation, there is a long period of catch-up. The veterans have to wait to come in line with a reasonable rate of disability pension. I wonder if the minister, while he is inquiring on the other matter, would make a further inquiry as to whether or not the government is considering revising the basic rate of pension to bring those pensioners up to a decent standard of living.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators are aware that this government has had a very creditable record with respect to veterans and their dependents, and their concerns are under constant and continuing review to make certain that within the financial ability of the Canadian taxpayers, continuing improvements can be made, and programs for them introduced.

INDUSTRY

CHRYSLER CORPORATION—NEWSPAPER REPORT OF PLANT CLOSINGS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to respond to a question asked by Senator Charbonneau on October 28 regarding a possible consideration of Canadian plant closures by the Chrysler Corporation.

The honourable senator may recall that when my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, announced on May 10 of this year the details of the agreement between the Government of Canada and the Chrysler Corporation for financial assistance to Chrysler Canada Ltd., he indicated a key component of that agreement regarding plant closings. Mr. Gray emphasized that the Government of Canada insisted on a conditon that none of the facilities of Chrysler Canada can be closed without obtaining his approval.

In addition, it is my understanding that the plants Chrysler may be considering for closure are located in the United States. I might add that the United States government did not obtain the guarantee we insisted upon to protect Canadians working in Chrysler Canada plants.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STRIKE OF TRANSLATORS AND INTERPRETERS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Murray regarding translation work done by supervisors during the current negotiations between translators and the Treasury Board.

The answer is that there is no work presently being done by supervisors in the translation bureau. There was contract work done earlier in response to the extra work load put on translators by parliamentary committees during the summer. I must emphasize that this had nothing whatsoever to do with the strike.

I have a lengthy answer to give on the status of negotiations with the translators, including a document which provides a chronology of events which have occurred since the outset of bargaining, a list of pay offers by category, a section on maternity benefits, paid leave and leave without pay, maternity, paternity and adoption leave. I would be pleased to read the answer. However, if Senator Murray is agreeable, I will have it placed on the record and perhaps he could ask questions on it tomorrow.

• (1510)

Senator Murray: That would be satisfactory.

(The answer follows:)

Negotiations for a renewed collective agreement commenced on September 18, 1979, six months after the agreement expiry date of March 18, 1979. This delay was occasioned by the inability of the Canadian Union of Professional and Technical Employees (CUPTE) to meet before that date due to the negotiators' vacation leave plans and its preoccupation with another group's negotiations (Aircraft Operations). As no substantive progress was being made after negotiations finally commenced and also in order to expedite a settlement, the Employer requested the aid of a conciliation officer and subsequently on November 13, 1979 applied to the Public Service Staff Relations Board (PSSRB) for a Conciliation Board.

On February 25, 1980, the Conciliation Board hearings commenced. Although the Conciliation Board Report could have been handed down as early as March 10, 1980, the major delay was due to the fact that the Conciliation Board Chairman, through several requests to the PSSRB, had to have extended the due date for the report to June 13, 1980 as the Board Report from June 13th to the date on which it was released, August 15, 1980, was caused by the hospitalization of the Employer's nominee on the Conciliation Board.

It is to be noted that the Conciliation Board Report was indeed not a unanimous one but, in fact, three separate reports.

After the Conciliation Board Report was received, the parties met on August 21, September 17, 18, 19 and October 10 and 14 without a resolution to the dispute. On October 14, with the objective of breaking the impasse in negotiations, the Employer applied to the PSSRB for a mediation officer. Negotiations, through the mediator, continued that night until 6:00 a.m. of the morning of October 15 and recommenced at 2:00 p.m. that afternoon. This negotiation session finished at 5:30 p.m. that day as the Union had another meeting to attend. At this juncture, there was some optimism that a settlement could be reached. However, on October 16, the Employer was surprised to learn, through the news media, that the Union had informed the press that mediation efforts had broken down. Nevertheless, from that date to the present, the mediator has kept in continual contact with both parties.

On October 17, the Employer, through the mediator, made the following proposal to the Union:

(a) Pay—10.75 per cent first 15 months

—10.5 per cent second 15 months

Duration—30 months

It is to be noted that this pay offer to the Union was based on the Employer's policy in collective bargaining, that is to say, that federal public servants should be paid, on the average, rates of pay which are being paid to employees in similar occupations in the private sector. The Employer's pay offer would raise the average salary for the Translation Group from $21,473 as of the expiry date of the last collective agreement (March 18, 1979) to $26,279 effective June 19, 1980. This pay offer would also provide retroactive increases in salary at the most populous levels in the group as follows:

Translator 2—$5,407

Translator 3—$6,429

(b) Leave & Benefits Related to Family Responsibilities Package

This package is similar to the provisions recently granted to the Clerical & Regulatory Group whose collective agreement was signed on Friday, October 17, 1980.

The package, which includes a new maternity benefit, will affect both paid leave and leave without pay entitlements and provisions for various family-related needs, including maternity, paternity, adoption, care of children, illness and other family responsibilities, as well as situations where an employee's spouse is relocated. For your information, I have attached a copy of a Fact Sheet which outlines the principles of these benefits in greater detail.

The mediation officer met with the chief negotiators for both parties on October 23, 1980. This meeting was of an exploratory nature only. The mediation officer still remains seized of the dispute and the Employer is hopeful that a settlement which will be equitable both to the Translation Group and the Canadian taxpayer will soon be reached.

FACT SHEET—LEAVE AND BENEFITS RELATED TO FAMILY RESPONSIBILITIES

The package, which includes a new maternity benefit, will affect both paid leave and leave without pay entitlements and provisions for various family-related needs, including maternity, paternity, adoption, care of children, illness and other family responsibilities, as well as situations where an employee's spouse is relocated.

Maternity Benefit

This new benefit would provide female public servants on maternity leave with income for the two weeks which they now have to wait before receiving unemployment insurance benefits. This benefit would provide up to 60 per cent of insured earnings to a maximum of $174 per week, for a two-week period. The amount is the same as that paid under unemployment insurance and would be revised according to changes in unemployment insurance benefits.

The combination of the maternity benefit and unemployment insurance would provide female public servants with 17 weeks of paid maternity leave at 60 per cent of insured earnings, to a current maximum of $174 per week.

Paid Leave

Special leave with pay, to a maximum of five days in any fiscal year, may be provided to cover the following situations:

—up to two consecutive days for the temporary care of a sick member of the family

—one day for needs relating to the adoption of a child

—one day for male employees for needs relating to the birth of his child —up to half a day to take a dependent family member for medical or dental appointments or appointments with school authorities or adoption agencies

Leave Without Pay

Periods of leave without pay, with varying provisions for job security and continuation of benefits, to be granted to employees to cover the following situations:

—up to three months on a non-renewable basis, for personal needs, subject to operational requirements. The employee's position would be protected and the employer would continue to pay its share of pension and benefit plans —more than three months but not exceeding one year, on a non-renewable basis, for personal needs, subject to operational requirements. Employees would retain priority for appointment status and would be able to maintain contributor status to pension and insurance plans by paying both the employee and the employer's share in such plans

—up to a total of five years for the care and nurturing of pre-school age children with retention of the right to compete for positions limited to Public Service employees. To maintain contributor status, employees would pay the employer and employee share of pension and benefits plans —up to five years, with priority status for appointment, to accompany a spouse who is moved to a new location on a temporary basis, or up to one year with priority status for appointment at the new location, when a relocation is permanent. During such leave, employees would pay the employer and employee share of pension and insurance plans to maintain their contributor status.

Maternity, Paternity and Adoption Leave

Employees not wishing to take an extended maternity leave are no longer to be required to provide medical certificates of health.

Paternity leave without pay of up to 26 weeks to be available to male employees following the birth of his child, provided that the combined total of post-delivery and paternity leave granted to an employee-couple for the birth of their child not exceed 26 weeks.

Adoption leave without pay for a period of up to 26 weeks to be available to employees following adoption of a child, provided that the combined total leave used by an employee-couple in connection with the adoption of a child not exceed 26 weeks.

During maternity, paternity and adoption leave, the employee's position will be protected and the employer will continue to pay its share of pension and benefit plans.

IRISH MOSS

QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, in the realm and under the heading of delayed answers, perhaps I might direct the attention of the Leader of the Government to a written question on Irish moss which I placed on the order paper on May 16. The temperature being what it is today, we all realize that May is a long way in the past.

Would the Leader of the Government ask some of his colleagues to have their officials weigh some of the Irish moss so that I may have the figures before next season's operations begin.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I hope the honourable senator is not suggesting the question is so old that it is growing moss. I want to assure him that my failure to respond has not been deliberate. The information has not been provided to me as yet. I want to thank the honourable senator for reminding me of my obligation.

[Senator Murray.]

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN MERCHANT SERVICE GUILD—SECOND READING

Hon. Charles McElman moved the second reading of Bill S-12, respecting the Canadian Merchant Service Guild.

He said: Honourable senators, the petitioners for this bill are Mr. Robert F. Cook and Mr. Maury R. Sjoquist both of the city of Ottawa and respectively the president and secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Merchant Service Guild. The purpose of the bill is to repeal and replace the existing act of incorporation being chapter 99 of the Statutes of Canada, 1919.

The Guild was created in that year essentially to unite, fraternally, Canadian seamen and also to provide those seamen, as well as their dependents, with a measure of insurance protection in accordance with the provisions, limitations and requirements of the 1917 Insurance Act relating to fraternal benefit societies as provided by section 2 of the existing act of incorporation.

The Guild does, indeed, unite fraternally. However, its membership has, for a long time, been restricted to licensed seamen and marine pilots. The Guild's initial aim to provide its members with insurance protection has been abandoned for over 50 years.

The Guild now has some 4,693 members throughout Canada. The membership is mainly classified under four categories: Masters, 1,197; mates, 1,900; engineers, 1,200; and pilots 396. The Guild permanently employs 22 persons.

The assets of the Guild as of September 30, 1979 amounted to $344,000. At that time its annual revenues were established at $1.193 million and its expenses at $1.146 million—about $40,000 of a clearance in the black.

Throughout the years its structure has been greatly modified, become more complex, and no longer corresponds to its description as enacted in its original act of incorporation. The national by-laws now reflect this situation.

The Guild's membership is divided into two branches, namely, the eastern and the western.

Two associations are affiliated with the Guild: The National Association of Canadian Marine Pilots, and the Association of Masters and Chief Engineers. The membership of these two affiliates is restricted to licensed pilots and masters or chief engineers irrespective of the branch to which they belong. The National Association of Canadian Marine Pilots is managed by its own executive committee and it also holds periodic meetings of its members. The association acts as a representative body of pilots. The Canadian Association of Masters and Chief Engineers is structured in a fashion similar to that of the branches of the Guild.

Honourable senators, there are no provisions in the 1919 act which specifically permit the affiliation of professional associations to the Guild. Currently those associations bear a great importance in the pursuit of the Guild's objectives as much as they contribute to promote the interests of a specific category of members. The Guild is itself affiliated with numerous organizations pursuing similar goals, namely, the Canadian Labour Congress, the International Transport Workers' Federation, the International Maritime Pilots' Association, and the Officers Merchant Navy Federation. The 1919 act of incorporation does not specifically permit the affiliation of the Guild with any of the above-mentioned associations nor with organizations of a similar nature.

The Guild has become a collective agreement bargaining agent for the benefit of its members and presently holds title to 45 bargaining certificates. It also represents its members for the bargaining of contracts for the lease and hire of service. In fact, the Guild is a professional association.

In addition it is often called upon to contribute to numerous advisory bodies, some of which are governmental associations such as the National Joint Council, the R & D Transport Committee, the National Maritime Safety Advisory Committee, and the National Marine Advisory Board.

The 1919 act of incorporation does not allow, specifically, any of the above-mentioned activities. Moreover, its powers to make by-laws were drafted in vague terms and refer to objects of the said act which have long since become obsolete.

Honourable senators, the need has arisen to provide the Guild with an act of incorporation which reflects its evolution and which would further allow for its future growth. By reason of the Guild's accrued expansion its powers and those of its branches must be broadened.

Although section 2 of the 1919 act appears to confer two definitive categories of objects, namely, that of acting as a fraternal union and that of acting as a fraternal benefit society, its appearance will not withstand thorough examination. Section 2, as a whole, describes more or less the former status of a fraternal benefit society in accordance with and subject to the provisions of the 1917 Insurance Act relating to fraternal benefit societies. The 1919 act has remained unchanged to this day. However, other laws pertaining, inter alia, to fraternal benefit societies have been implemented since 1919 and it is believed that these laws may have substantially affected the viability of the 1919 act as well as that of the Guild as a corporate entity.

The adoption of a new act of incorporation will not only serve to describe purposes and objects which reflect the reality of the Guild's activity but will also ratify those acts accomplished by the Guild during the time that the viability of its act of incorporation was in doubt.

The Guild now requires a new act of incorporation for multiple reasons. It needs an act granting it the powers, purposes and objects which are closely related to the activities which it has, in fact, exercised for many years and which it seeks to pursue in the future. In addition, this new act of incorporation would ratify those acts that the Guild has accomplished in the past and eliminate any uncertainty about its legal existence.

Finally, honourable senators, the Guild requires legislation that is flexible and will allow its development and widening of its field of action so that it may preserve and serve the interests of its members.

Just as a footnote, honourable senators, there is a measure of urgency on the part of the Guild in obtaining approval by Parliament of this proposed legislation. The Guild holds its national convention every three years and the next such meeting is scheduled for February of next year. Since the new by-laws must be approved in convention, such approval must be achieved at the February meeting in order to avoid the extraordinary expense of calling a further national convention for that single purpose or waiting a further few years.

I commend this bill for your favourable consideration on second reading in order that it may be referred for detailed study and hearing of testimony by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

• (1520)

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure that we are all grateful to Senator McElman for his detailed explanation of this bill. I have no objection to giving this bill second reading and referring it to committee. However, a few things occurred to me while reading this bill that I think should be answered when the matter is before the committee. Clause 4 of the bill sets out the objects of the Guild as follows:

> The objects of the Guild are to promote the social, economic, cultural, educational and material interests of ships' masters, chief engineers, officers and pilots and of other persons whose employment is directly related to maritime operations.

In the explanation given by Senator McElman, I heard that the only ones who now belong to the Guild are masters, mates, engineers and pilots.

Another thing that struck me is that I understand there are only 4,693 members, yet they hold 45 bargaining certificates. Are they bargaining for other units, apart from those that are members?

I also noticed that under clause 5 there are powers, other than those under the Canada Corporations Act, to:

> —advise, assist and represent, to the extent provided in the by-laws, any of its members in negotiations or arbitration proceedings relating to a collective agreement or other contract of lease and hire of service.

Should not that authority be given as one of the aims and objects of the Guild, since apparently that is what they are doing? I think that, perhaps, it would be better drafting if they were given that authority under clause 4 of the bill.

Again, there does not seem to be any authority to give any of the branches authority to negotiate wage agreements or matters of that kind. That also should be brought to the attention of the officials of the Guild.

I notice, too, that there is a great deal of authority given in the by-laws. It says that conventions may make by-laws. The bill outlines 12 different objectives for which they may make by-laws. Paragraph 9(1)(a) of the bill states:

> A convention may make by-laws (a) defining the terms and conditions of membership in the Guild, or any branch, the powers of suspension and expulsion of members, the rights, duties and privileges of all classes of members and the membership dues and other assessments—

That is a very wide authority, and I am wondering whether the Guild itself has the power to expel a member of a branch without the branch's agreement. The authority seems to be pretty wide, as I said.

Paragraph 9(1)(h) states:

> providing for the election, appointment, resignation, suspension, functions, duties and remuneration of officers and employees of the Guild or of any branch;

Again, this seems to give the national office, if we can call it that, a great deal of authority over the individual branches. I think that should be looked at.

I do not know if the honourable sponsor mentioned how many branches the Guild has at the present time, but perhaps we should know that. At the committee hearing I think the location of the branches should be given, as well as the number of members there are in each branch. Two classifications, eastern and western, have been mentioned. I should like to know where the division line is. How far east does it go, for example? I have never heard of one down my way, and I am from a seaport area, so I would be interested in having answers to these questions.

Honourable senators, having made these remarks, I have no objection to the bill receiving second reading and being referred to committee.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I understand that if I speak now, I will close the debate on second reading.

With your permission, honourable senators, I do thank Senator John Macdonald for his suggestions and his questions. The petitioners, officers and counsel are prepared and anxious to appear before the committee that will consider this bill. I shall ensure that when they appear before that committee, which has to be about a week hence under our rules, they bring with them answers to the questions which have been raised by Senator Macdonald. To my knowledge, there is at least one affiliate of the Guild operating in the harbour area of Saint John, New Brunswick, but I am sure there must be other branches or affiliates in the Atlantic region, although, like Senator Macdonald, I have not heard too much about them.

I suppose that is all one can say at this point. I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. The petitioners, with their counsel, will attend the committee meeting to give all the answers required at that time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Macdonald.]

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator McElman moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault:

> That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;
>
> That ten Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;
>
> That the Committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;
>
> That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;
>
> That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;
>
> That the Committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;
>
> That the quorum of the Committee be twelve members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, like other members of this chamber who have preceded me, I consider it a singular honour to be able to participate in this very important debate in the Parliament of Canada. There is no question that it is one of the primary matters to come before Parliament in this generation.

The reason I rise to support the motion to refer this resolution to a Joint Committee, and to support the resolution in principle, subject to some observations I shall make later relative to what I think are desirable amendments, is in part a result of my having watched on television in Vancouver the last dominion-provincial constitutional conference for what must have been 20 or more hours. To be quite frank, I was appalled by the general attitude I detected on the part of the provincial premiers. Several of them, some by very direct statements, seem to have the general attitude that Canada consists of a collection of 10 principalities, of which they are the bosses, and that the federal government is nothing more than an agency or creature of the provinces. That is not my view of our Federation and it is certainly not the view that would be supported by a reading of history or by a simple review of the present Constitution, the BNA Act. I refer specifically to the distribution of powers in that act—that is, the senior powers being given to the federal government, as opposed to powers more logically exercised by a junior government being given to the provinces, to say nothing of the overriding powers, including the power of disallowance, being given to the federal government.

A couple of provinces did not get together and create an agency to help them run each other; some colonies got together and said, "Let's stop being colonies and form a nation." So, I reject the expressed view of two or three premiers that the federal Government of Canada is some sort of an agency of the provinces.

I became convinced, by the end of that conference, that if the logjam of the past many years were to be broken, it would be necessary for the federal government to take unilateral action; and subsequent to that federal-provincial conference I supported decisions that such action be taken by the federal government. Of course, one can then come to the argument as to what unilateral action should be taken and how much unilateral action. I shall endeavour to deal with those points in a moment.

What I find extraordinary is the view expressed by many people—and I do not attribute such shrill terms specifically to members of the opposition in this chamber, but certainly it has been said by some members of the opposition in the other place and by certain newspaper writers across this country—that if this present resolution is adopted, it will mean, and I quote from one newspaper writer, "the end of Canada"; that this will destroy our country.

Senator Flynn: It is just the beginning of the end.

Senator van Roggen: Let us try to analyze whether or not what we are being asked to do is indeed to arrange the end of Canada. Senator Balfour, in his speech in this debate a couple of days ago, said—and because he said he was speaking "on behalf of us" I believe he was speaking on behalf of members of the opposition, and I believe he was quoting the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the other place, Mr. Clark—that if this were a simple patriation with an amending formula, there would be no objection and we would all agree. I think most people would agree that we could not have patriation without an amending formula, because to bring it over here with the rule of unanimity still applying would put us in a worse position than we are in today, and I do not think we want that. So, if we are going to have simple patriation, we need an amending formula to go with it.

It is the position of the opposition that the amending formula to be included should be the Vancouver formula, whereas it is the position of the government in the resolution before us that it should be the Victoria formula, subject to some very imaginative and effective provisions, I would submit, for a resolution later on, in concert with the provinces, as to which of the two formulas, or which modifications or compromises between those two formulas, could be arrived at over a two-year period during which the federal government may make no alterations and during which the rule of unanimity would continue to apply. In the unlikely event that we could not arrive at an amending formula, let alone deal with any other parts of the package, in that period of time, then a logjam breaking mechanism, which seems eminently fair in the event of a continued impasse, would come into play. That is to say, the federal government would put before the people either the Victoria Charter, or such variation thereof as it feels would be most appropriate as a result of the negotiations of the intervening two years. In turn, the provinces, agreeing upon and putting forward their formula, with the public of Canada, through a referendum, would select the one they feel to be the best.

There are arguments to be made for the Vancouver Charter. As a British Columbian, I would prefer the Vancouver Charter to the Victoria Charter, as it does not leave the veto endlessly in Quebec and Ontario. However, I have some concern with the opting out provisions in it. I would like to see them developed in much greater detail before I would be willing to embrace it.

The point was made by Senator Balfour that the Vancouver Charter should be in this resolution because it was one agreed to by all of the provinces at the last conference. Well, here again I come back to my objection to the concept that simply because the provinces agree on something, it becomes the duty of the federal government to tug its forelock and say, "Aye, aye, sir."

The Vancouver Charter was not agreed to by the federal government. What we are being asked to choose between is a formula which was agreed to by all of the provinces and the federal government—although admittedly some years ago—and then later rejected by one of the provinces, and an amending formula adopted recently by all of the provinces, or agreed to by all of them, but not by the federal government.

On a simple weigh scale, I do not think it reasonable to say that we are going to end Canada by opting for one or the other of those two formulas, especially in light of the procedures available in the two-year period following, plus the referendum logjam breaking mechanism. For that reason, I would submit that the patriation of the Constitution, in the form proposed in the resolution, is not something that could mean the end of Canada. On that point, it seems to me that the opposition and the government are in agreement, or almost so. Therefore, we must find something else in this resolution that is going to destroy Canada, if the people who say that that is what the resolution is going to do are correct.

We will go now to the next item, which seems to be of great concern to many people. This is not the one-time, one-shot logjam breaking mechanism formula at the end of two years, but the ongoing provision for referenda to be introduced by the federal government and to be put to the people of Canada for a vote. A "Yes" vote on such a referendum would require, first, an overall majority in the country, as well as a majority in each of the regions—in other words, a similar majority from the electorate as the government would need from the provincial legislatures under section 41.

I take the position that those provisions should be amended in two respects. The first respect is that words should be found to make it clear that it is a last resort mechanism. I suspect that very rarely would anyone be put to the trouble and bother of using it for ordinary amendments. We now have this extraordinary situation of wanting to get our Constitution patriated after all of these years. Once we go down the road where amendment becomes possible on an orderly basis, we would not have to try to trade off whole packages as we have done in recent years. We could deal with one amendment at a time, as they do in the United States.

It is unlikely that agreement with at least six or seven of the provinces under the amending formula, whichever is settled on eventually, will not be capable of being found, or that situations will arise where the remaining provinces which cannot find agreement are being so badly injured that a federal government would feel that the referendum must be employed. But I would like to see words to the effect that the ordinary negotiations under section 41 have had a fair chance to be exhausted before this extraordinary mechanism could be used. I think time periods could be easily inserted to arrive at some sort of a fair formula on that—that any constitutional amendment proposed by either side would need notice to the other side, a minimum of so many months prior to an oncoming dominion-provincial conference, that if there was no agreement at that conference that no referendum could be held on a question not agreed upon at that conference until a year of further conferences had tried to resolve the issue or whatever it might be.

The second amendment I would like to see in that particular section is one to provide symmetry for the provinces. I believe that the referendum mechanism, if it is to be available for the federal government, should equally be available to a group of provinces which, for the sake of my remarks today, could be the same group of provinces which are required under section 41 to approve a constitutional amendment. So if the group of provinces so qualifying had a question that they wished to put, they could require the federal government to have a referendum at their initiative in the same way that the federal government can have a referendum at its own initiative. And so, subject to those amendments, I hardly see that this terrible bogeyman of a referendum is tantamount to destroying democracy in Canada, destroying the parliamentary system or bringing an end to the country, as many speakers and writers insist.

Australia has a pretty well functioning democracy inherited from the same mother of parliaments as ours and has had referendum provisions for years. Somebody told me the other day that he thought that they had something like 23 referenda in Australia over the years, and the public had only voted in favour of three of them. That shows that the public normally has much more sense than governments, and that in a democracy you can well rely on the good sense of the voters. That is why democracy works, and that is why referenda properly regulated do not terrify me to the point that I will accept the argument that this is going to destroy the country.

Senator Flynn: It could.

Senator van Roggen: If the majority of the public in Canada wished to vote to destroy the country, I do not know what one can do about it. I simply say they are not likely to. Therefore I do not accept—and here I am arguing for myself and not for somebody else—the argument that that provision is tantamount to meaning the destruction or the end of Canada, and so there must be something else here I am to look for that involves the end or the destruction of Canada. For that reason I shall go to the next major area, which is the Charter of Rights.

I heard the most extraordinary, impassioned speeches by some of the provincial premiers—I remember Premier Lyons in particular and Premier Blakeney, who rather surprised me—on this dreadful thing of having any entrenched rights. We were going to give over the Government of Canada to the judges; we were no longer going to have supremacy of Parliament; that citizens should look to the legislatures, their elected representatives, for their protection. I will be quite frank, honourable senators. I do not want to look to my legislature in British Columbia, or any other province for that matter, for my protection. I do not want to be protected by the legislature; I want to be protected from the legislature, and I can give you a few hundred examples as to why I need such protection. I shall not bore you with them all now, but I shall refer in a few moments to a speech I gave in this chamber seven years ago on the subject.

I think it was one of the framers of the American Constitution, although I cannot say that for sure, who made the beautiful statement that when the legislature sits, no man lies safe in his bed at night. I suppose that same thing could be said of parliaments, except for the fact that in Canada we are blessed with a bicameral system at the federal level.

Senator Flynn: That is why they want to get rid of us.

Senator van Roggen: I know, and I shall be coming to that. So we have what is called by many people, or referred to by writers in Canada, a double standard of legislative morality in this country. You can go through the provincial statutes with their unicameral legislatures and find bill after bill after bill that denies peoples' civil rights, denies their property rights, very often in the case of minute minorities, minorities of one, or a group of a dozen or so, or the shareholders of one company—whatever it may be, bills that were slipped into those legislatures in the last day or so before adjournment at the end of a session, cleverly hidden sections that are passed in a hurry allowing no recourse, and our courts cannot deal with them.

Senator Flynn: I have seen that here too.

Senator van Roggen: Here if we do not catch it, you can get the same thing because these civil service draftsmen try to put things of that sort in if they think they will get away with it. The same writers who mention the double standard of legislative morality in Canada on the one side say the higher standard is at the federal level. I argue that that is for two reasons: first, the federal Parliament has a much stronger searchlight on it because of the national press and because it is dealing with national legislation. Secondly, and not insignificantly, is the fact that that legislation gets some scrutiny down at this end of the hall, and they are a little more inhibited in what they send down than a provincial premier is in jamming something through a provincial legislature that he controls.

So the question of a Charter of Rights, I argue, is something that we need and that citizens need for their protection. I am aware that you can find many lawyers—and we had an excellent speech yesterday afternoon from Senator Nurgitz—on the other side of the question, and you can quote eminent jurists who feel that entrenching rights can lead to abuses. Examples can be found in the United States, and so on, but their system has always had a much more politicized judiciary than ours. On the other hand you can find an equal number of jurists and lawyers who will argue exactly the opposite. It is not an argument that we will resolve here this afternoon. I simply want to put it clearly on the record that there are many, many people who feel very strongly that to put a curb on the legislative power of some of these provincial governments, to say nothing of the federal Parliament, is something that indeed brings a degree and level of protection to the citizen that a Canadian citizen deserves, and which many Canadian citizens, including myself, would wish and want in the light of history and experience.

● (1550)

On June 27, 1973, as it appears in Senate Hansard, I spoke at some length on a closely related matter. I will not bore the house by re-reading the speech, as it comprises about ten pages. It was on the use of the power of disallowance by the federal government. The government of my province of British Columbia had passed a piece of legislation, one section of which referred to a number of government leases—a block of them, not one. They were leases of real property on which buildings, stores and other things had been constructed. I am not speaking of some mining leases—and mortgages were on those leases that had been given. The legislation simply provided:

> Any of these leases that were not renegotiated within the next two years would be deemed to be null and void.

That was just straight theft, or threatened theft. I spoke at length saying that it was the duty of the federal government to disallow that legislation. Senator Forsey gave me a measure of support, but my honourable friend, Senator Goldenberg, argued against it, saying that the proper place for redress to that type of thing was in the province at the next election.

I simply say that when a minority of one or a small number are discriminated against by legislation, to say that three years later they can obtain redress through a general election, where the issues are entirely different, is simply not in the realm of reality. I believe they are entitled to entrenched protection.

I might say that my plea, that the government employ the power of disallowance, was not heeded by the government. The power of disallowance was not used. I knew that when I gave my speech, that had it been used that there would have been a terrible outcry from the provincial governments. I was aware of the fact that the use of the power of disallowance had fallen into desuetude in Canada, and I am also aware of the fact that provincial governments at the dominion-provincial conferences all say that the power of disallowance should be abandoned by the federal government.

I simply say that the federal government must not abandon, give away or give up the power of disallowance unless we have in its place a Charter of Rights in this country.

Mr. Justice Halloran of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, in a paper he did on the subject, said, after reviewing Magna Charta at the time of King John:

> Few succeeding kings failed to try in some way to place themselves above the law. Complacent Parliaments not infrequently encourage them to do so.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Senator van Roggen: Mr. Justice Halloran quoted Coke, who said:

> Magna Charta is such a fellow that he will have "no sovereign."

I ask those who use the expression, "The supremacy of Parliament" as an excuse for the argument that Parliament can do anything it wishes, including taking my head off—

Senator Flynn: You are supporting something that is illegal at present. That does not worry you?

Senator van Roggen: My argument is that wiser heads than mine—and I am never ashamed to quote a man like Coke—have focused their minds on the fact that simply leaving the rights of the citizen to Parliament and legislatures alone is not sufficient. So I argue on the opposite side of Senator Nurgitz that on balance—there will be anomalies; there are anomalies now—I would rather have my rights protected where I can go to a court and get redress, than rely on an election some years later, if the rights that are being taken from me are being taken from a small minority, of which I am a member, who have no say in the next election.

If the legislature is the place where rights can be properly protected, then it is perfect democracy and rule of law, I suppose, that 51 per cent of the population can vote to decapitate the other 49 per cent. But that is not a concept I support.

Again, whether my argument to persuade honourable senators is as successful as that of the arguments of honourable senators on the other side, I am merely saying that there are two balanced and forceful arguments on this subject and therefore to entrench rights, I would argue, is no more likely to mean the end of Canada than not to entrench them.

Senator Flynn: That was never said.

Senator van Roggen: No, but that is being said by this editorial writer to whom I have been referring. I am not relating it to anything that the Leader of the Opposition has said. It is said that this package is likely to mean the end of Canada. I have been going through it, and I am wondering if part of it is going to mean the end of Canada. I have not found anything to indicate that, and I have gone through the main elements in my remarks.

I shall not bother with the entrenchment of the equalization grants. Apparently all the provinces agreed on that at the conference. I come from one of the "have" provinces and not one of the "have nots." I am happy to have that included if it pleases everyone to have it.

I have gone through what I understand to be the main elements of the resolution, without finding such reference—at least to my satisfaction. Other people may find something by adding all these things together and saying that the sum of the whole is more than its parts. I am explaining why I support this Joint Address in principle, subject to reasonable amendments being made in committee, which I am sure they will be. I am supporting it because I cannot find in it those elements that really will mean the end of this country, or such a drastic change in our whole modus operandi that we will no longer be able to recognize Canada for what it has been.

I now come to one or two amendments that I should like to see made. In my remarks I mentioned the amendments to section 42. I would certainly hope to place before the committee, in whatever forum is open to me, to the members of this house who will be the members of that committee, a strong plea that property rights should be included with civil rights in the charter. They are not there at the moment.

I noticed that they were in Bill C-60 of two years ago. I can only assume that they have been taken out on this occasion because someone was probably afraid that it would appear to be too much of an impingement on the powers of the provinces to include property rights. Frankly, I would just as soon impose people's property rights on the provinces as I would language rights. I will certainly see that representations are made to that end. If I do not win that argument, I will certainly continue during my lifetime to have property rights included at a later date when the matter comes up for amendment at dominion-provincial conferences, because I think it would vastly improve the situation to have that included.

I have mentioned the amendments to section 42 that I consider to be important to give it symmetry and to ensure that it is demonstrably a last resort, a logjam-breaking mechanism. That brings me to section 44, which in my opinion should be amended in three respects.

The first thing that gives me trouble is that under ordinary amending procedures, not the referendum, under section 41, the method by which the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures would start dealing with something, as they wouldn't invent it out of whole cloth, would probably be by way of a matter that would come up at a dominion-provincial conference. The premiers, or some of them, and the federal government would agree that the Constitution should be changed in a certain respect, and they would then go back to their parliaments and legislatures to get the change approved.

• (1600)

Well, if the federal government acted quickly and brought in the necessary amending bill in the House of Commons, it is conceivable and possible, under the method drafted here, that it could come to the Senate, that we could deal with it in the chamber and committees in, say, six weeks, and then in another six weeks, if we haven't passed it, the suspensive veto would apply and the Parliament of Canada would have ruled on that at that point. Then it conceivably could be that not one of the provincial legislatures would have dealt with it, and not even one of the provincial legislatures would have entered into debate on the subject. We as a body, which should be reflecting regional interests and provincial concerns, would not have had the advantage of listening to, watching and considering the debates in our respective legislatures on that particular subject before we were already subject to the suspensive veto. I think care should be given to finding a formula that would provide a solution to that particular, and what I consider to be a rather grave, anomaly.

Somebody will argue: How can the provincial legislatures deal with it if the federal parliament has not spoken on it. I do not know that that is a valid argument. It seems to me this is a joint process where, not unlike the United States—although there the federal people do deal with it first but then it goes around state by state over a number of years being approved by the various legislatures—the legislatures could be considering this in conjunction with the Parliament of Canada, and consideration should be given to enabling the members of the Senate to consider the debates in their legislatures.

The next item in that section that should be changed is the three-month period and for two reasons. First, I have always been in support of substantive reform of this chamber, such as Senator Roblin referred to yesterday, including a suspensive veto certainly on normal legislation, but I do not perceive the "sober, second thought" of this chamber being something that should only be addressed to the House of Commons. I believe that sufficient time has to be allowed following our deliberations. Let us say for the sake of argument that a contentious matter is debated for two weeks in the chamber, and is in committee for a month, and then we propose certain amendments or reject the matter in its entirety. It is not good enough that it just go back to the House of Commons which can then pass it over our heads in another few weeks with the whips on, making no different arguments than they had made before,—although they may pay some attention to our arguments. My concept of a suspensive veto requires a sufficient length of time for the public to take a second look, and bring their opinion through the media to bear on members of Parliament, to bring pressure on them to consider the valid objections we may have had if they had been valid. I do not see how that process can be done adequately in three months.

If we have provisions in our own suggestions for reform of this chamber, I would hope the suspensive veto would be for six months. It would be anomalous for us to have the most important suspensive veto, namely, on constitutional matters, a shorter suspensive veto than that on ordinary bills. I think that should be extended to six months and I feel quite strongly about that.

The remaining thing is that it is important to note that the suspensive veto is not applied to any amendment to the Constitution brought by the referendum under section 42. There is a good reason for that, and that is that a referendum cannot be initiated by the federal government without the consent of the provinces, and we are here as a regional body to give protection to the provinces or the regions, and, therefore, the consent of the Senate as well as the House of Commons must be obtained before you even have the referendum. I think that is impeccable logic and I applaud the government for that. But as Senator Flynn says that is only if the Senate is still here.

I support the principle, as all western democracies that I know of have bicameral parliaments at the senior level in one form or another, that we should in Canada maintain the bicameral system at this level of government. I believe in checks and balances and I believe that an exception should be included in section 44 so that constitutional change by suspensive veto would not apply to this house. In this way the provinces will continue to have the protection of this chamber against change of their Constitution by referenda by the House of Commons alone.

Those are the amendments that I would hope that the members of this chamber in the committee, among other amendments undoubtedly, would strenuously pursue, and subject to seeing what progress the committee is able to make on some or all of those amendments, I will reserve my support of the total package to the final stage of voting, but in this particular instance, I will be voting to send this matter to committee.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I listened with great respect to the remarks made by our colleague, Senator van Roggen. I congratulate him for the openmindedness he has shown in his interpretation of the proposed resolution we have before us. I commend him for saying ahead of time that he is prepared to agree to study certain amendments which he would endorse. When you are on the government side it is not easy to wander away from rigid party lines and to voice one's own personal principles from time to time, as Senator van Roggen did this afternoon.

It is my turn now, honourable senators, to address the house and give my impressions, my opinion, on the measure before us. I do so with a firm conviction because I believe that this legislative measure may transform the political structure of our country.

Honourable senators, as the guardian of the rights and privileges of regions and minorities, our institution must for once speak very loudly, as the current saying goes in Quebec, to safeguard the rights and freedoms which, to my mind, this resolution would restrict or limit. So far some provincial governments have raised objections to this proposed resolution, and of course I would like you to keep that in mind because they represent 50 per cent of Canada's population.

Senator Flynn: Maybe more.

Senator Asselin: Senator Flynn says maybe more.

Senator Flynn: Fifty-three per cent.

Senator Asselin: Fifty-three per cent. We will not fight over 3 per cent. So let us say that over 50 per cent represent the objections made by the people. Those objections are either juridical or political. The danger facing the present Liberal government is that it must meet its objectives. To do that it sets aside the basic rules of law and attempts to follow the easy and attractive path of the action it wants to take by announcing its firm intention to go to England to seek a document which belongs to Canadians.

It is of course the easy way to explain to Canadians that they should endorse this undertaking. But that undertaking would never be challenged if it were carried out within the bounds of legality and with full respect for constitutional conventions which cement this country into a federation. That is why I say that if they want to ignore the juridical basis of our federative system, in my opinion they want to build a new and very fragile system which will sap forever whatever unity is left in this country.

If we want to debate seriously this proposed resolution, we should first of all examine all aspects of its legality. There is no need to do a lot of research into the Privy Council precedents to recognize that the Canadian Federation is either a pact, an agreement, a union, or a contract which provides obligations for both parties. One of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada whom we have always respected in Quebec—he was my professor in constitutional law, and perhaps also the professor of Senator Lamontagne and Senator Flynn, as well as many others who went to Laval University—published in the Quebec Bar Review of 1943 a very interesting essay on the whole matter of federal-provincial relations in which he quoted rulings of the Privy Council, especially the ruling in the case of A.G. for Queensland (Australia) v. Colonial Sugar Refining Co., in which the court said, in speaking about the Canadian Constitution:

[English]

> —it . . . must be accepted as a treaty of union among the then provinces.

[Translation]

He also referred to this union in the case of Bonanza Creek Gold Mining v. The King, on page 579, and in the Labour Conventions. This phrase is also used in the following:

> —the interprovincial compact to which the British North America Act gives effect.

Furthermore:

[English]

> The scheme of the act passed in 1867 was thus, not to weld the provinces into one, nor to subordinate provincial governments to a central authority, but to establish a central government in which these provinces should be represented, entrusted with exclusive authority only in affairs in which they had a common interest. Subject to this, each province was to retain its independence and autonomy and to be directly under the Crown as its head.

[Translation]

In fact, honourable senators, the Privy Council has always aimed at maintaining intact the basic principle of the Quebec resolutions, which is to create, not a central government with unlimited powers, but rather a federal union in which the provinces remain autonomous within their own jurisdiction. This is why the claim of the federal government that it is the sole direct representative of the King has always been rejected.

If we read carefully the notes of Mr. Justice Louis-Philippe Pigeon, we must conclude that the Canadian Federation is clearly a contract binding the federal and provincial governments. If such is the case, I wonder by what right the federal government can act alone without the consent of the provinces? If it has been legally established that the Canadian Federation is based on a contract among its various components, how can this federal government legally justify its decision to patriate unilaterally the Canadian Constitution?

Since the beginning of this debate at no time have we heard those who advocate this unilateral action, raise the legal question. On the contrary, it has been said that it was only a political decision. It is an easier argument to support. They all relied on a simplistic argument to the effect that because of the lack of consensus between the provinces during the provincial-federal conferences, the federal government was justified to act in this way because there seemed to be a consensus of opinion among the Canadian people with regard to such unilateral action. It was said that the Canadian people were in favour of bringing back our Constitution from Britain. Obviously this is an easier argument, a more simplistic one to put forward. That is why the government uses it to support its political decision.

For those who carefully followed the discussion between the federal government and the provinces last summer and during the month of September at the First Ministers' Conference, it was easy to see the scenario planned by the federal government so that the meetings and discussions between the federal government and the provinces would end up in failure. Besides, as Senator Flynn said the other day in his speech, the leaks from some Privy Council memorandum revealed a total lack of responsibility on the part of the federal government which planned ahead of time that these consultations between the two levels of government were doomed to failure. On that basis it was easier for the central government, later on, to come up with the argument for unilateral patriation. It was said in the other place, and my honourable colleagues have also mentioned it here, that basically our party does not object to the patriation of the Canadian Constitution. I believe that the majority of the Canadian provinces would not have objected to it if the Prime Minister had asked them first to patriate the Canadian Constitution and then later to discuss with them an amending formula to the Constitution. This procedure would have been faster and would not have raised any major objection.

In politics as in other areas, some standards of morality should be observed. Furthermore in political matters as in others, you cannot do indirectly what you are forbidden to do directly. This is a rule of law which is often applied in the courts.

But, having failed to come to an agreement with the provinces on the terms of an amending formula, the central government takes a unilateral action to have the government of another country agree to what it was unable to get an agreement upon here in this country. This means that the Prime Minister of Canada, to win his point, will set aside the opinion of governments representing 50 per cent of the Canadian people in order to satisfy his personal ambition and to make his mark in history as the one responsible for the patriation of our Constitution. Never was a better plan put forward to destroy the unity of this country than the one we are considering now. By unilaterally patriating our Constitution with an amending formula already opposed by the majority of the provinces, the central government denies the very basis of the constitutional agreement concerning the necessary participation of the provinces to bring about an amendment in the Constitution dealing with federative matters.

• (1620)

One will remember that in 1965, Mr. Guy Favreau, then Minister of Justice of Canada, published a white paper entitled "Amendment of the Constitution of Canada." I am convinced that Senator Lamontagne contributed to that report.

Senator Lamontagne: You are giving me a lot of credit.

Senator Asselin: This book acknowledges that there are some conventions dealing with constitutional amendment.

> The Parliament of Canada does not bring in an amendment to the Constitution directly dealing with federative relations without having previously taken the advice of the provinces and obtain their consent.

It is on the basis among others of the white paper and that statement on constitutional conventions, that the Supreme Court denied last year, as we know, to the federal Parliament the power to amend the nature of the Senate without the consent of provinces because in so doing it would interfere with federative relations and go beyond its restricted competence to amend the Constitution.

Like the federal government and the Supreme Court of Canada, several authors have acknowledged the existence of such a constitutional convention which requires the agreement of the provinces to alter federative relations.

Among them, there is Mr. Lederman, who is very well known, as a constitutional expert who with reference to the white paper recognized that those conventions make up the Canadian constitutional law on the amendment. In his opinion, we can challenge the validity of the constitutional conventions, if we refer to the Westminster Statute which in its preamble always refers us to the Imperial conferences. Some other authors agree and say that the consent of the provinces is necessary for any constitutional amendment requiring British legislation.

Honourable senators, the authors, as we note, have almost unanimously acknowledged the existence of that convention to which I have just referred. Evidently, some have reservations about its compulsory nature. Some authors are reluctant to recognize the constitutional convention as a rule of law. However, let us point out again that the Supreme Court referred to the constitutional convention when it delivered its judgement on the Senate and that most authors acknowledge its existence.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the government should refuse, before submitting its patriation formula to the British government, to seek the opinion of the Supreme Court on the legitimacy of its action. The Leader of the Official Opposition in the Senate emphasized this in his remarks last Monday. If the government does not doubt the legitimacy of its action, it should act just as it did in the case of the Senate and refer the whole issue to the Supreme Court for an opinion; in case of a positive reply, it could then take the steps it is now contemplating.

But the government side is so anxious to carry out this piece of daring that it is willing to disregard all basic principles of right and justice. It is ready to behave like a colonized government, to overlook such institutions as the Supreme Court of Canada, to go directly to the British Parliament and ask for new legislations which do not reflect the will and desire of many provinces, and therefore of a great many Canadians. To act in this way, the federal government must have decided to build a Canada with a single voice, change the political and institutional framework of this country, change the meaning of the Canadian Federation, and replace this Canadian Federation with a unitary state in which the federal government will slowly and gradually take over the powers of the provinces and establish itself as the supreme state. This is precisely where I come to the argument of Senator van Roggen, and answer it. He asked how it could be said that it would mean the end of Canada, the end of our federation. If the federal government is allowed to act in that way, to go ahead without the consent or assent of the provincces, we will create a new institution in this country. It will no longer be a federation; Canada will simply become a unitary state. That is the danger Senator van Roggen overlooked in his intervention.

Furthermore, the centralizing tendency of the federal government has been obvious for a very long time. The claims and requests of the provinces have always annoyed the federal government. The provinces, according to the federal government, should become mere administrative agencies, acting simply as regional offices, and implementing the instructions of the central government. Now, honourable senators, the provinces, and especially Quebec, are not ready to renounce their obligations, especially those the present Constitution recognizes, without waging a fierce battle.

That is why we are shocked to see the attitude of a large number of Liberal members who sit in the other place and give silent approval to their government and the people of Quebec being thus humiliated publicly by the decisions of the central power. If only, in the last election, the present government and the Liberal members from Quebec had received from the people of that province the specific and clear mandate to act that way, their attitude could hardly be questioned. But, never, in the course of the last election campaign, did the Prime Minister of Canada, the ministers or the Liberal members from Quebec dare bring up the issue of the Constitution. They never revealed to the people of Quebec their intention to act unilaterally with regard to the patriation of the Constitution and its amending formula.

You will therefore understand, honourable senators, that the argument of the government cannot be accepted according to which the mandate they did not seek during the last election campaign last February, was given to them as a result of the referendum held in Quebec in May 1980. Now, even though the Right Hon. Mr. Trudeau told the Quebecers, during the referendum campaign in Quebec, that voting "No" to the referendum would mean that changes would be made in the Canadian Constitution, he never did reveal his intentions concerning the changes he had in mind for the Constitution to satisfy the people of Quebec. I remember that during the referendum campaign I asked the government leader repeatedly to get the government to commit to paper what constitutional changes the Prime Minister of Canada and the ministers had in mind when they told Quebecers, Vote "No," we promise there will be changes. Never, during the referendum campaign, was there any mention of the types of changes that would be made after the referendum to satisfy the aspirations of Quebec. During the campaign, the Prime Minister of Canada also asked the premiers of other provinces to promise Quebecers that they would accept major constitutional changes if Quebecers voted no. But never during the campaign did the Prime Minister of Canada or the provincial premiers say to Quebec that the central government would unilaterally patriate the Constitution should Quebecers vote "No" in the referendum. As I said, not to use unparliamentary language, honourable senators, Quebecers were misled and really fooled.

That is why, given this situation, the Government of Quebec, as well as all the political parties representing Quebecers, indicated their disagreement with and their objection to the central government's approach. Now, if only the Quebec government objected, several senators might be justified in saying: "We will not bother with those objections, they come from a separatist government." But the provincial liberal leader, Mr. Ryan, also vigorously opposed the unilateral patriation of the Constitution. He has no qualms about saying publicly that the central government's action is unacceptable to the Quebec liberals that he represents. Mr. Ryan, the Leader of the Liberal Party, has just realized that he too was had during the referendum campaign when he asked the Prime Minister's support, he too was fooled because Mr. Trudeau spoke to him of changes but Mr. Ryan expected much broader and deeper changes than those Mr. Trudeau had in mind during the referendum campaign. By acting in this fashion, the Prime Minister of Canada not only misled the Quebec government but he also misled one of his allies in the referendum campaign, Mr. Ryan, the Leader of the Quebec Liberals. It is not surprising today that Quebecers are annoyed at the unilateral patriation proposal. The people of Quebec will take to the streets to show their dissatisfaction, their disapproval of the action that the federal government intends to take.

If we give such an importance to the Quebec referendum, most Quebecers will feel that they have been betrayed by the federal government. Several members have stated it since especially and—I am not inventing anything—Mr. Reed Scowen and Mrs. Chaput-Roland from the Liberal Party who went across Canada with Mr. Pepin to ask Canadians what they thought of constitutional changes. Of course, these people have realized that the promises made have not been kept.

By distorting so obviously the meaning of the referendum outcome to impose an even narrower constitutional frame citizens are being abused. The credibility of people involved in political life and that of the democratic process is being ruined. This behaviour is not only politically but it is also socially dangerous.

● (1630)

Honourable senators, the adding or entrenchment of individual rights and freedoms into the Canadian Constitution is likely to give it a character of immutability in an evolutive sense by preventing it from undergoing a political interpretation since it will be up to the courts to define its scope. We are aware that in other countries, the fact that these rights have been raised before the courts has often contributed to serious troubles and has placed civil authorities in a state where they were unable to repress abuses.

Last night I watched on television the debate between President Carter and Ronald Reagan. There was precisely an exchange over the issue of the entrenchment of the Equal Rights Amendment, namely the entrenchment of women's rights into the Constitution. Mr. Reagan explained why he objected as a matter of principle to this entrenchment for as soon as these laws are included and entrenched into a Constitution they are frozen when it comes to giving them a political interpretation. One has to refer to the courts afterwards to interpret the meaning and the scope of these rights entrenched or included in such a manner.

Let us underline that all provincial assemblies are sovereign in their respective jurisdiction according to the present Constitution. They pass laws in these areas and these laws are subject to the interpretation given by our courts.

[Senator Asselin.]

It would no longer be the case in the future. There would be a general law called the Canadian charter of rights passed unilaterally by the federal Parliament and it would overrule all laws passed by provincial assemblies. All that has been done up to now and all that will be done in the future would have to be in conformity with this act of the federal Parliament as interpreted by the Supreme Court. There we, the people from Quebec, are always in a minority position when it comes to bringing a case to it because we do not have the number of judges we should have to represent us.

You will understand above all that in the case of Quebec, it is an unacceptable proposition and that such a limitation cannot be imposed on the National Assembly of Quebec without its consent.

All the more so because it is difficult to appreciate the full impact of the consequences of those limitations since they depend on future court rulings. A first glance at current legislation in Quebec leads us to believe that many of them might be said to be unconstitutional. For instance, the electoral legislation provides that any citizen must have resided in Quebec for one full year before being eligible to vote. To my mind, that provision just might be contrary to section 3 of the future Charter of Rights. As well, several provisions of the legislation governing the financing of political parties in Quebec might be deemed to go against section 2 of the charter.

Similar uncertainty covers the regulation on placing in the construction industry, a regulation which stemmed from the recommendations of the Cliche commission and which restored a bit of order in that industry. Even in fields within Quebec's jurisdiction, the National Assembly could find itself without full powers or even without any certainty it has every authority to enact legislation reflecting the wishes of the people. The provincial legislators would always have to act within the limits unilaterally set by the federal Parliament or with that sword of Damocles hanging over their heads. It is the perspective of a tragic loss of autonomy for the people of Quebec.

Quebecers of course just will not accept that. The Premier of Quebec expressed the same feeling over the TVA network on October 5, 1980.

But what in my opinion is a serious attack against the cultural security of Quebecers is the inclusion in the charter of linguistic rights of a provision concerning the language of education. Indeed, section 25 of the proposed Constitution Act, 1980 concerning the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms states, I quote:

> Any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of this charter is . . . inoperative and of no force or effect.

Thus, the moment this charter takes effect, any legislation or regulation in force in Quebec and governing fields to which they quite properly apply will become inapplicable inasmuch as they contradict any one of these new constitutional provisions.

As regards the language of education, the charter of the French language states that instructions shall be given in French in all kindergartens, public primary and secondary schools, and those under private institutions which have been declared of public interest or qualified for receiving grants. That is section 72.

Section 73 allows for exceptions to that rule. Notwithstanding section 72, the following may be taught in English, at the request of the father and the mother;

> First, any child whose father or mother attended English primary school in Quebec.
>
> Second, any child whose father or mother who, on August 26, 1977, was a resident of Quebec and attended English primary school outside Quebec.
> Third, any child who, in his or her last year of school in Quebec before August 26, 1977, was legally attending an English public kindergarten or a primary or secondary school.
> Fourth: The younger brothers and sisters referred to in par. c

This list of exceptions can be extended by the government, pursuant to sect. 86, sub-par. 1 which I quote:

> The government can enact regulations to extend the application of sect. 73 to persons who can avail themselves of the reciprocal agreement concluded between Quebec and a province.

Now, Quebec cannot be denied such an important decisional power in matters pertaining to language, more particularly in the field of the language of instruction.

In his comments on this proposal, the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau has suggested that the only result this bill would have would be to substitute the Canadian Clause for what is called the Quebec Clause. This is totally wrong. The effect would be much more pervading. In fact, the regime provided for by section 2 of the charter is such that it would practically give all immigrant children an unrestricted opportunity to attend English schools. Such a system would be so difficult to control and would breed such injustices among immigrant children that it would have to give way to the freedom of choice. We would be back to free choice and the dire conflicts that we have known in Quebec under the now defunct Bills 63 and 22.

It is no surprise that, the other day, Senator Rizzuto voiced major objections to the way immigrants will be treated under the new Charter of Rights.

● (1640)

I emphasize, honourable senators, that Quebec would never have accepted to join Confederation if it had not been given the guarantee that it would retain exclusive jurisdiction over language and more specifically the language of education. Those are essential powers for our cultural security. Let them now try to take those rights away from us. The majority of Quebecers will never stand it, they will strongly react to what is regarded in Quebec as arm twisting by the central government.

Most Quebec newspapers have condemned what they consider as federal trickery, as far as language rights in the Constitution are concerned. They said:

> The great fraud of linguistic rights should be denounced. Hiding behind the Official Languages Act, Mr. Pierre Elliott Trudeau enumerates the great principles and dictates his will.

He has virtue on his side, of course, since he appears to defend minority rights.

But there is a snag, honourable senators, a huge snag. In fact, the federal government struggles to defend the English-speaking people of Quebec. They do not fight for the French-speaking people of Quebec. They do not fight for the French-speaking people from the other provinces. Their proposed Charter of Rights will damage Bill 101, but would change nothing in the other provinces. It would change nothing in the other provinces, honourable senators. This charter would make sordid concessions to Ontario concerning the status of French in that province, and it requires no change, which is worse. As a matter of fact, Ontario which has supported and still supports systematically the federal government all along in the constitutional round would not be affected by the Charter of Rights. Quebec is then confronted with the power of the Ottawa-Toronto axis.

Let us take a closer look at this, honourable senators, to see what it is all about. In the area of linguistic policy, the federal documents propose two changes to begin with. There are no changes in the other provinces other than those proposed or agreed to by their governments. We know the reluctance of Ontario which once again recently denied parents of the Ottawa area their own school board. Yet in the largely francophone Ottawa area, God knows the numbers warrant it.

I read in a paper this morning that Francophones of a part of Saskatchewan, who believed their rights would be further jeopardized by this clause that would be included in the charter of rights by the federal government, have asked that representations be made so that the charter does not apply the way it is drafted.

Let us note that in Quebec Bill 101 does not contain any clause saying "where numbers warrant". The rights of Anglophones apply everywhere in Quebec, and never has a minority been better treated than the English minority in Quebec.

A second change: the British North America Act section 133, which makes bilingualism manadatory only for the Parliaments of Ottawa and Quebec, and now for Manitoba as a result of the Supreme Court decision, would not apply to New Brunswick or Ontario.

You will recall that during the September federal-provincial conference, when the Prime Minister asked Ontario to agree to the provisions of section 133, Mr. Davis coldly replied that he would never let section 133 concern Ontario.

What did the federal Prime Minister say in his closing remarks at the constitutional conference? I guess he gave in on section 133 just to make Ontario agree with the constitutional changes he was getting ready to propose.

I think that the people of Quebec are not going to accept this either, because the Francophones in Ontario will pay too high a price for these constitutional changes.

The Machiavellian plan of the federal government to buy the conscience of the New Democratic Party is not acceptable either. No one realized that everything had been planned in advance, that Mr. Trudeau was making a statement on television, and immediately afterwards Mr. Broadbent endorsed in principle the changes proposed by the federal Prime Minister. In return, of course, the New Democratic Party asked for concessions in the natural resources field and particularly for non-renewable resources as a condition for its support of the government party. And we learned last week how the leader of the New Democratic Party has been had since he accepted from the federal government an offer which was only what now exists in the Constitution, the recognition of provincial ownership of natural resources. However, the federal government did not renounce his veto when it was required in the interest of Canadians. How many Canadians were laughing when Mr. Broadbent appeared before the Canadian public to celebrate his victory upon receiving that confirmation from the federal government and expressed the support of his party to the constitutional changes proposed by the present government.

So, we have now in the House of Commons a new political party that might be called the Democratic Liberal Party and we know that a considerable number of Liberals are feeling perfectly comfortable sleeping in the same bed with the socialists.

Honourable senators, Canada must make important constitutional changes. A constitutional renewal is essential to ensure the survival of Canada.

In 1972, when we were sitting on the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution, Pierre De Bané, who is now Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and I signed a minority report in which we emphasized the urgency for English Canada to understand the aspirations of Quebec and the importance of giving the Quebec government, which represents in North America the majority of Francophones, the economic, political and cultural instruments needed to encourage the development and self-fulfillment of that Francophone majority in Canada.

The sharing of powers between the federal government and the provinces was an essential element of that constitutional renewal. We said among other things:

> Our third recommendation relates to the distribution of jurisdictions between Ottawa and Quebec.
> In most areas, jurisdictions are ill-defined to the extent where they are more and more intermingled. That is the situation prevailing in Canada as well as in other federated countries in the world. It is unavoidable. Indeed, it may have been possible during the last century, when States had relatively simple and few activities, to define clearly the sharing of jurisdictions, this situation is purely intellectual today and cannot in any way correspond to reality.

[Senator Asselin.]

> Modern governments are principals in civilized societies. This trend will increase steadily. From now on, in Canada, the public service represents a third of the gross national product;—and that was in 1977—in 20 years, it will amount to half the GNP. In addition, there is an interdependence and close relationship not only between the policies of the various levels of government but as well within the same level of government, not to mention continental, international and future world policies.
> Finally, even if it was possible to conceive a clear division between numerous and complex powers, it would soon be outdated. For all those reasons, rather than trying to enumerate the responsibilities of each level of government——and that was our proposal—

> —we would like to put forward a basic principle which is almost always found in all federal constitutions: The central government is empowered to act only in those areas which fall under its jurisdiction. It is the opposite in the present situation. This level of government will essentially have to specialize in balancing of the whole matter. Of course, nothing would prevent the provinces which so desire from delegating some of their powers to the central government.
> If this recommendation is rejected, we fear that the Quebec-Ottawa bipolarity will get worse and that conflictual relationship between those two levels of government will decrease the tax return and result in a complete deadlock. That is the essential of our thinking.

That is what we said in 1972. I mentioned these remarks, honourable senators, to tell you that the majority of Quebecers who are against the unilateral patriation of the Constitution are not opposed to a true renewal but they do not want to see their Constitution turn towards such a highly centralizing direction. On the contrary, they want to have a say as regards the essential tools of their economic and cultural development.

• (1650)

Why, for instance, would Ontario own natural resources located under its territory in the Great Lakes and would Quebec be deprived of those which are located under our part of the Gulf of St. Lawrence or Hudson Bay? Why should we lose control over the export of our electricity, now that we have made alone huge efforts and big sacrifices to develop our hydro-electric resources? Why can we not get back our control over the vital sector of communications even though all provinces agree on this point?

I simply want to tell you that all political parties in Quebec agree that we should increase and not decrease the political powers of Quebec and other provinces. The cultural and the economic development of every Quebecer is at stake. We cannot develop Quebec and ensure the welfare of its people if we lack the necessary political tools. It is in this sense that the constitutional matter becomes a bread-and-butter issue, and it is important to realize it.

This constitutional renewal advocated by the vast majority of the Quebec people perhaps does meet the objectives this government has set for itself. This was felt during the discussions at the constitutional conference last September. There were two very clear visions of Canada: one, that of the federal government which considered the matter only from the point of view of the whole of Canada and wanted to establish not a renewed federal system which would have allowed the people of Quebec and of the other provinces to feel comfortable in it, but on the contrary a system more and more centralized and unitarian. Against such inflexible and unreal purpose, those who hold different views are up against difficulties the first one of which of course being any wish by the Quebec people to ascertain the fundamental dual realities of this country.

Honourable senators, I should like to ask you to join me, as a Quebecer, in turning down the proposed resolution under consideration. We must object to it because the purposes advocated by the federal government are not acceptable. It is not the wish of Ottawa to allow the provinces to get more powers. Ottawa rejects the concept by which there are two equal levels of government in Canada: on the one hand, the federal government and on the other hand, the provincial governments. For Ottawa, Quebec is not a separate entity much less the Quebec people, and the central government should hold all the significant levels of economic and political power.

Honourable senators, such a concept is not acceptable in 1980. Because the purpose and the objectives of the Fathers of the Confederation in establishing the Upper House, the Senate, was to protect regional interests and minority interests, I do not think there will be a better opportunity during this historic debate to demonstrate that the senators who sit in this house want to assume their full role. The Senate might still have to make decisions in a last-minute effort to bring the provinces and the federal government together so that they might agree on the fundamental principle of this patriation.

This is the reason why, honourable senators, as a result of the discussions which are taking place here at this time, I should like to table before the Senate an amendment. Its purpose is particularly to make it possible for senators to vote on the important role the Senate should continue to play as the protector of the regions, the protector of the minorities and therefore of the provinces. I now move, seconded by Senator Flynn:

> That further debate on this motion be postponed until the Prime Minister of Canada has met with his provincial counterparts to find out if they would agree to a joint resolution providing only for the patriation of the Constitution and an amending formula similar in principle to those known as the Vancouver or Victoria Formulae.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we are faced with an amendment. Of course there is a main resolution which is for a referral to the committee but although the amendment has just been read, I shall read it again:

> It is moved by Senator Asselin, seconded by Senator Flynn, that further debate on this motion be postponed until the Prime Minister of Canada has met with his provincial counterparts to find out if they would agree to a joint resolution providing only for the patriation of the Constitution and an amending formula similar in principle to those known as the Vancouver or Victoria formulae.

• (1700)

[English]

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Asselin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Then honourable senators it is a motion to adjourn the debate. I shall have to ask for the opinion of honourable senators. Those who are in favour—

Senator Flynn: No, no, this motion is debatable.

Senator Guay: No, it is a motion to adjourn.

[English]

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, there has been an indication from the translator that the comment of the Leader of the Opposition a moment ago was inaudible and the translation could not be delivered in English. Could the Leader of the Opposition repeat it?

Senator Flynn: I said that this motion is debatable.

Senator Frith: The motion to adjourn is not.

Senator Flynn: It is not a motion to adjourn the debate. It is a reasoned motion to adjourn the debate to a specific time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, obviously we have some dispute on a matter of order. The motion is that further debate on this motion be postponed, which is a motion to adjourn the debate and we just vote on it. It is not debatable.

Senator Flynn: Where is your authority?

Senator Frith: It is your motion. Let us hear yours.

Senator Flynn: You are objecting to my motion. You are saying it is not debatable.

Senator Frith: I am not objecting to the Leader of the Opposition's motion. I am saying it is a motion to adjourn the debate, and such a motion is voted on immediately.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Guay: Question.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, there certainly are differences of opinion among honourable senators with respect to the thrust of the amendment, as to whether that is an amendment or not. If it is an amendment, it certainly is not debatable. If it is not an amendment, there could be a debate. In relation to this, Bourinot states on page 353:

[English]

> —that a motion for the adjournment of the debate is not debatable, nor can it be amended. Obviously, however, such a motion, once moved and recorded is votable and must be put to the Senate.

That is what I have been given to understand.

If honourable senators wish me to look into the problem in greater depth, I will ask that the sitting be suspended and that we reconvene at 8 o'clock, in order that I can render a decision on this matter.

All honourable senators can express their views. I know that some honourable senators are experts in procedure, and therefore I can take their opinions into consideration. According to the advice I have received, this is a motion of adjournment and it should be voted on.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: My feeling is, Mr. Speaker, that we should make a distinction. What you have just quoted from Bourinot refers merely to a motion to adjourn the debate.

[English]

You will note that section 36 makes a distinction between a motion to postpone a debate and a motion to adjourn a debate. This motion is to postpone the debate, and contains a reasoning behind it. The motion is not to adjourn the debate purely and simply, but to postpone the debate until something is done. There is a reason. It is not merely an adjournment per se. We submit to the house that we should discuss whether the reasons behind the motion are valid reasons for postponing the debate. That is the point. The mere motion to adjourn is something that is not debatable; but the motion to postpone, for a given reason, is something that is debatable. It has always been debatable, and I am quite sure that His Honour the Speaker will not be able to find a decision supporting the viewpoint held on the other side.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, a copy of the motion which I have received says that it is seconded by Senator Roblin. If I heard correctly, Senator Asselin said that his motion was seconded by Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: Senator Roblin was not here.

Senator Guay: I know that, but my copy says that it is seconded by Senator Roblin. The second point that I would like to bring to the attention of honourable senators is that the French part says—and I do not have any degree in French:

> Que cette motion soit ajournée.

I would submit that it does not have the same meaning in French.

Senator Flynn: Yes, it does.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, perhaps we could follow the suggestion made by His Honour the Speaker. He indicated that he wanted time to make his ruling. If he does require time to make his ruling, presumably at 8 p.m., perhaps it would be convenient if we continued the debate until 6 p.m. and return at 8 p.m. and at that point the ruling could be given. In that way, we would not lose any time and we would be able to grant His Honour the courtesy which he seeks in order to consider the reasons for his ruling. It seems to me that that is the practice that has been followed in the past.

Senator Flynn: That depends very much on His Honour the Speaker. If His Honour would rather suspend the sitting at this time, I have no objection. If he wishes to continue and to reserve his decision for later, that is up to him.

Senator McIlraith: My point is that I would not wish to see time lost for a debate on this subject. I believe all honourable senators would agree that there is some desire to dispose of this matter in a reasonable time. Surely we could use the next hour to continue our debate while His Honour the Speaker is considering the reasons for his ruling.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I take it that even the Leader of the Opposition agrees that if this were a motion to adjourn the debate, it would be put immediately and voted upon.

Senator Flynn: Purely and simply.

Senator Hicks: Rule 36(2), on page 10 of our rule book, says:

> A motion to adjourn a debate shall be deemed to be a motion to postpone that debate to the day specified—

And it is specified:

> —in the motion, or, if no day is so specified, to the next sitting day.

Surely that is evidence that a motion to adjourn is a motion to postpone, and the Leader of the Opposition—as much as I honour his views and his parliamentary expertise—is trying to make a distinction where none exists.

Senator Flynn: If it were merely the postponement to a given day, I would say that I would wish to adjourn the debate until tomorrow or until next week, without any argument attached to it, and it would be supported.

Senator Asselin: It is not debatable.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there are two observations that I would like to make. First, with regard to the suggestion of Senator McIlraith, the difficulty in continuing the debate is that there is, to a dangerous degree, in my opinion, an implication that this is not a motion to adjourn.

● (1710)

If it is a motion to adjourn, you don't go on with the debate; you put the motion, and I urge the Speaker to make a ruling now on a very clear question. If there is any doubt, after what Senator Hicks has said, as to what this motion's intent is, and what has to be decided, look at the French version. As Senator Guay has said, it is: "Que cette motion soit ajournée." That is the word. If there is any dispute as to what the words mean, that's the word. It says, "ajournée."

Senator Guay: You give me the translation of the word "postponement."

Senator Frith: If we continue with the debate we are implying that for some reason this is not a motion to adjourn. I think it is clearly a motion to adjourn and should be put now, and I ask His Honour the Speaker to so rule.

Senator McIlraith: May I make a correction here? The Speaker made his ruling. He requested an opportunity to give reasons for his ruling.

Senator Frith: I understand that, but I am suggesting that there are good reasons for him to rule right now.

Senator McIlraith: He did.

Senator Frith: No, he did not. He asked for time to make the ruling. I am suggesting that there is perfectly clear evidence for him to give his ruling now, and I ask him to do so.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: Are you giving orders to the Speaker now?

Senator Frith: What is asked is not an order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order.

Senator McIlraith: —in view of the fact that the Chair was kind enough to recognize me, I wish the other senators would extend the same courtesy. I would draw the Speaker's attention to rule 36(1) which states:

> —a motion shall not be received unless it is a motion to amend the question—

And certainly, honourable senators, the amendment meets those specifications. It amends the question before the chamber and, therefore, I submit with the greatest of respect that it is in order under rule 36(1).

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, may I make a very brief comment on this matter? It seems to me that this is not the equivalent of a motion to adjourn at all. Its nearest relative in parliamentary procedures is a motion to hoist consideration to a future date. That is a debatable motion, and has been debated on many occasions at great length. This is certainly not a motion to adjourn, I submit, but a motion to take into consideration at a future date, just as a six months' hoist motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am not the one who drafted this resolution but the words have to mean something in French and even in English; "Je propose, secondé par . . . ., que le débat de cette motion soit ajourné"—that the debate on this motion be postponed, adjourned.

[Translation]

Is the debate adjourned to a specific date? It is adjourned to some hypothetical events which the opposition feels might happen in the future. Now, a motion for adjournment should either specify a date or imply that the debate is adjourned to the next sitting. Provided it is a motion for adjournment. Naturally, if it is not, then we are confronted with another type of problem.

Senator Flynn: If the Deputy Leader of the Government cannot discuss what is in the motion, then, of course, I understand. But clearly, if Your Honour puts the question, then the Senate must decide whether it agrees with the reasons given. I suggest, Your Honour, that the question be taken under advisement until 8 o'clock. In the meantime, the debate can continue. And perhaps the motion can be changed to meet the objections formulated by the Deputy Leader of the Government.

[English]

Senator Frith: Does that mean that you are withdrawing this motion?

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: Well, then let us have a ruling as to whether it is to adjourn and vote on it, and you can bring some other motions at 8 o'clock if you wish.

Senator Flynn: I suggest that His Honour the Speaker can take it under advisement. Do you not agree that he can do that?

Senator Frith: Yes, he can as long as we all understand clearly that that is entirely without prejudice to his possible decision that it is a motion to adjourn and, therefore, must be put immediately. The difficulty with this procedural question is that, according to the rules, if it is a motion to adjourn it ought to be put immediately. If we continue with the debate, I want to be sure there is no question that that does not mean it is in any way with prejudice to his final decision on it.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, how can my honourable friend say that, if His Honour takes the matter under advisement, it is without prejudice to whatever decision he makes? That is either a self-evident fact or an insult to the Chair. I don't know which, but I prefer to think it is a self-evident fact.

His Honour the Speaker has the right to take it under advisement and naturally when he does so he is free to make any decision he likes, and the question of prejudice does not arise. I would suggest, with all humility, that, if His Honour so decides, he can very well take it under advisement, and when that happens we usually proceed to the next item of business on the order paper. That would save any embarrassment or any problem arising from his decision later on. It has been the custom in every legislative assembly I have been in for the Speaker to take the question under advisement, and when he does we proceed to the next item of business.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I contend that Senator Roblin is completely out of joint with parliamentary procedure.

I suggest, Your Honour, that you have two choices. Either you make a ruling and we vote on it, or, if you decide that you need time, then the sitting has to be postponed until you make your ruling because we cannot go on debating the main motion—the motion that is before the Senate now—as long as a decision has not been made on the amendment. I suggest, Your Honour, that you have two choices—either you put the amendment to a vote now, or you suspend the sitting until you are prepared to make a ruling.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I address the Chair for the following reason: the way you expressed yourself earlier, Mr. Speaker, you seemed to attach some significance to the expression used in the French translation. Indeed, I believe there is an error in the translation. Just in case this discrepancy might have some influence when you take the matter under advisement, may I point out that were we to be overly strict when we find in our texts differences or discrepancies between the English and the French versions we could not even discuss the proposed resolution before us because I noted several discrepancies, not only bad translations but bad translations which alter the substance of things.

So, if I may, I would say simply that the word "reporté" should have been used in French as the equivalent of the English word "postponed". I would also suggest that we refrain from dwelling over this slight difference in the first version of the two versions of the resolution, that we adopt the same understanding attitude which we are wont to take when we spot similar discrepancies between the French and English versions, even in the bills that come before us.

Senator Asselin: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I am the sponsor of the amendment which is now before the house and it is quite possible that I made an error in translation when I used the word "ajourné". So, if honourable senators agree, I will amend it by saying that the debate on this motion is "reporté" instead of "ajourné". That is if I have the consent of the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: That would require unanimous consent of the House.

Senator Asselin: Yes, I am seeking consent.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to amend the resolution?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: So it cannot be amended.

Honourable senators, if this were a routine debate I would make an immediate ruling. But, given the importance of this debate, I would prefer that in future this incident not be recalled as having been an excuse or a way to shift the debate or again to steer it in a direction which normally no one would want it to have.

So I will call it six o'clock and render a full ruling this evening at eight o'clock at the opening of the sitting.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

[English]

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

[Senator Thériault.]

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—SPEAKER'S RULING ON POINT OF ORDER

The Hon. the Speaker: I thank the honourable senators who have given me a chance to look into the problem which was posed to me.

When the sitting was suspended at 6 o'clock I endeavoured to deliberate on the motion in amendment moved by Senator Asselin and on the point of order raised thereon. The arguments that were put forward had to do with whether the motion is a motion to adjourn the debate, which is not a debatable motion, or whether it is a reasoned amendment. I thank honourable senators for the views that they expressed.

The motion in amendment by Senator Asselin reads as follows:

> I move, seconded by Senator Flynn, that further debate on this motion be postponed until the Prime Minister of Canada has met with his provincial counterparts to find out if they would agree to a joint resolution providing only for the patriation of the Constitution and an amending formula, similar in principle to those known as the Vancouver or Victoria formulae.

The proposition contained in the amendment is that the Prime Minister of Canada meet with his provincial counterparts to find out if they would agree to a joint resolution providing only for the patriation of the Constitution and an amending formula. After giving considerable study to the matter I have come to the conclusion that the proposed amendment is out of order for the following reason: It is not an amendment but a brand new proposal which is a substantive motion that requires one day's notice pursuant to rule 45(1)(h). In fact it is foreign to the proposition contained in the main motion. Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fifth Edition, citation 437, at page 155, reads as follows:

> 437. (1) An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.
> (2) An amendment may not raise a new question which can only be considered as a distinct motion after proper notice.

The Honourable Senator Flynn argued that the proposed amendment is a reasoned amendment. The proposed amendment is not a reasoned amendment because a reasoned amendment is used to postpone the putting of the question on the second or third reading of a bill exclusively. When a reasoned amendment is moved to postpone the putting of a question on the second reading of a bill it must be to oppose the principle of a bill. This proposed amendment cannot be used to oppose the principle of the bill because no bill is concerned in the debate. Beauchesne, Fifth Edition, citation 434(2) page 154, reads as follows:

> 434. (2) reasoned amendments may only be applied against readings of bills.

Therefore, honourable senators, I declare the motion out of order, and now the debate can be resumed on the main motion.

Senator Flynn: Your Honour, I do not intend to discuss your decision but I think that normally your conclusion should have been that it is a simple motion to adjourn the debate and if that were the case the motion would be put without debate. However, if this is not the case I would respectfully appeal your ruling.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable senator is appealing the ruling?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Call in the senators.

• (2030)

Honourable senators, the question now is: Shall the Speaker's ruling be sustained?

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators—

Senator Frith: On a point of order, I think the honourable senator has already spoken on the motion.

Senator Asselin: I have not. Are you raising a point of order?

Senator Frith: Yes. You made a motion, which was either for an amendment or for an adjournment. According to my reading of the rules you cannot speak again.

Senator Flynn: But he has not finished his speech.

Senator Frith: He made a motion and sat down. He clearly finished his speech.

The Hon. the Speaker: If his motion had been accepted he could not have spoken to it, but it has been defeated.

• (2040)

Senator Frith: When do we determine that he has finished his speech?

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: There is no motion.

[English]

Senator Frith: I will accept that ruling.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, when the Speaker adjourned the debate, I was explaining to the Senate what role we should play to avoid the disintegration of Canadian unity if we accepted the resolution before us as drafted. I added that I joined in the remarks that my honourable friend Senator van Roggen made before me that if through this proposed resolution we want to prevent the government from acting alone to change the present structures of the country—

[English]

Senator van Roggen: On a point of order, we are not getting any translation.

Senator Flynn: Well, we could adjourn until tomorrow.

Senator Asselin: We are getting a translation now.

[Translation]

I was saying that I share the concern of Senator van Roggen about the possibility that some clauses of the proposed resolution could endanger Canadian unity. Senator van Roggen said that this could not be. However, Senator van Roggen referred to section 42 of the proposed resolution, which will allow the federal government, under certain circumstances and certain conditions, to go directly to the people to get a mandate on a constitutional issue by going over the head of the provinces, and I say that Senator van Roggen should realize that, by acting in this way, the federal government will change the existing political structure of our country.

I fully agree with Senator van Roggen that at the committee stage, the Senate representatives will have to be able to propose amendments to rectify this situation, which I believe would be extremely dangerous as this provision now stands.

I also have the impression that all the senators recognize that the Senate has played in the past, and still plays in my opinion, an important role in the Canadian political structure. If I follow the reasoning of Senator van Roggen, I must say that he is quite right to wonder about the wording of section 44.

Some might say that there is no danger because this section will never be used. The Canadian government cannot possibly use it to change the structures of the Senate or to abolish the Senate. However, I believe that if we accept that the wording of section 44 be included in our statutes, in my opinion, and many others interpret it in this way, the Canadian government would be able, under the provisions of section 44, to propose amendments to the Canadian Constitution with the unanimous consent of the House of Commons if the suspensive veto of the Senate has expired, which would mean that the House of Commons could accept constitutional changes, and if the Senate, after 90 days, has not kept its suspensive veto and does not support the consensus expressed by the House of Commons, the House of Commons would then be able to pass this amendment or this bill, and it would have the force of law in the country and the proposals made by the Senate would be rejected.

The Senate has played an important role in the history of our country. I had the opportunity recently to talk with secondary school students of my area. I was telling them that the Senate has had committees on poverty, the age of retirement, sciences and child at risk. I was showing to these young people that the Senate had a role to play concerning the minorities. These studies on poverty, the age of retirement or the child at risk were aimed at these minority groups. The Senate has examined the lot of these groups to find solutions to their problems.

I take this opportunity to congratulate Senator McGrand on the excellent work accomplished by the committee entitled "Child at risk". I have read the report of Senator McGrand. I must say that the young people and the mothers of Canada are extremely grateful for this in-depth study.

Honourable senators, what role should we play in this debate? I have the impression that we must agree to put aside any spirit of political partisanry. I believe that we must try together to find the means that will allow all the parties involved to meet and talk to each other.

I have the impression that in spite of the efforts made by certain provincial premiers—and I am not laying the blame only on the Prime Minister of Canada—I think that the provincial premiers must also share part of the blame for a number of decisions which affect federal-provincial relations. But, in my opinion, the Senate as such can be expected to play a leading role in the current discussions.

We represent regions. We represent minorities. Recently I had an opportunity to read the speeches made by the Fathers of Confederation when they decided to create this institution. Even if it has been said that the Senate was not created to look after the interests of the provinces, the Fathers of Confederation had divided the country into senatorial divisions and, of course, these divisions included the provinces. I would suggest that we had thus received from the Fathers of Confederation the mandate to speak for provincial interests. Now then, just what are those provincial interests? What are the interests of the country? With a view to avoiding everything that has been said about Canadian unity I think we should make every effort to urge the Prime Minister of Canada and the provincial premiers, before we adopt the proposed resolution we have under consideration, to meet again to find a modus vivendi.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

During the past month and to this day the parties have said everything they had to say about federal-provincial relations. At times the Prime Minister was very hard. For their part the provincial premiers answered right back and we know what they said in the circumstances. My impression is that we should have a moratorium and that is what I suggest to you this evening. I think that is the objective we must seek during the few hours we have remaining to debate this resolution. For that reason, not wanting to annoy the government but wanting to ask you to help us define the role and the work of the Senate during the few hours we have left to discuss this project, I therefore move the following amendment:

> I move, seconded by Senator Roblin, that the motion be amended as follows:
>
> Strike all the words after Senate in the first line up to the last paragraph exclusively and replace them by the following:
> "will unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report upon the document entitled: "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980 after the Prime Minister of Canada has met with his provincial counterparts to find out if they would agree to a Joint Address providing only the patriation of the Constitution and an amending formula similar in principle to those known as the Vancouver or Victoria formulae."

> "will unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report upon the document entitled: "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980 after the Prime Minister of Canada has met with his provincial counterparts to find out if they would agree to a joint Address providing only the patriation of the Constitution and an amending formula similar in principle to those known as the Vancouver or Victoria formulae."

Honourable senators, it is not to embarrass the government that I introduce this motion. It is simply to ask you whether you might have a better solution to bring back the parties to the conference table. I feel that it is our duty to do so. It is in a non-partisan spirit that I move this motion.

Senator Molgat: Would the honourable senator allow a question?

Senator Asselin: Yes.

Senator Molgat: In his very eloquent speech, the honourable senator alluded to the responsibility of the Senate towards the provinces. However is it the opinion of the honourable senator that this responsibility should be towards the governments of those provinces or rather towards the people of those provinces?

Senator Flynn: Towards the Constitution of those provinces.

Senator Asselin: There is no mention of people in the constitution. It is the provincial governments which have been appointed to represent the people of the provinces. Of course, if I want to get in touch with the people of Quebec I will go to their duly elected government because it is this government which represents the people of Quebec. The same goes for the province of Ontario.

There are several groups among the people of course, such as the minorities, which should be helped. I said earlier that it is the responsibility of the Senate to help the minorities which are found in the provinces. But if I wanted to get in touch with a province, I would first go to its duly elected government.

Senator Molgat: I have another question. Therefore, my honourable colleague feels that he is the representative of the Quebec provincial government and not of the Quebec people. This is your position, isn't it?

Senator Asselin: I have never said that. I said that every senator who sits here, represents the Canadian Parliament since the Senate is a branch of that Parliament. But that does not stop us from trying to achieve the objectives set for us by the Fathers of Confederation in making us the Upper House, which were to protect and preserve the rights of the minorities in the provinces and in the regions.

Senator Molgat: Yes, but once more I want to ask you if you consider yourself as a representative of the Quebec government or the Quebec people?

Senator Flynn: Of the Quebec legislature, unanimously.

Senator Molgat: Very well, you are a representative of the Quebec legislature. That is very good. We understand your position because this is your position.

Senator Asselin: We never said that. That is not the answer I gave.

Senator Molgat: You said so.

Senator Flynn: If I said so, you understood nothing.

[English]

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a question to address to the last speaker, if he will accept one other question. I will not comment on the subject of my feeling about representing British Columbia. That does not mean I take my instructions from the Government of British Columbia. I do not.

During your remarks, senator, in the early part of your address as I wrote them down, you said, "How can the government justify its decision to patriate the Constitution unilaterally?" As I understand the position of your party, its objection to this resolution is that it has gone too far; that it should not have included the Charter of Rights and the referendum provision. But you do support the unilateral patriation of the Constitution with an amending formula.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Murray: No. Read the amendment he just moved.

Senator van Roggen: I am not talking about his amendment. I am wondering if he is supporting his own party's position or not. That is my question.

Senator Flynn: That is your interpretation, and you can keep it, if you want.

Senator van Roggen: Well, it was what Senator Balfour, only two days ago in this chamber, said your position was.

An Hon. Senator: We didn't say that.

Senator Flynn: We did not say we should go against the wishes of the province.

Senator van Roggen: Well, the word "unilateral" is the word I am addressing myself to, and my understanding of your party's position is that you would agree to the unilateral patriation of the Constitution with an amending formula.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator van Roggen: Is that not correct?

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator van Roggen: Well, I am glad to hear that, because, certainly, the newspapers must have been misquoting your leader.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I would say this to my honourable friend, Senator van Roggen, when I started my speech this afternoon, I explained to him that legally, as its authors decided, which no one contradicts, the Canadian federation is a contract between the federal government and the provinces, and a contract entails obligations. I was discussing the matter from a legal point of view this afternoon. I said that because obligations are involved, obligations on the part of the federal government as well as that of the provinces, the federal government must assume its obligations towards the provinces and vice versa.

I said that the federal government, in acting unilaterally, without the consent of the provinces, would commit a breach of the contract between the two parties. The federal government would not be respecting its obligations. That is why, from a legal point of view, I was opposing a unilateral patriation.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on a point of order. In my respectful submission, the amendment we are looking at is clearly not a motion to adjourn, as the previous one was, or as I thought it was, but—

Senator Murray: His Honour the Speaker perceived that.

Senator Frith: —the motion is precisely an amendment of the type that was ruled on by His Honour as being out of order under citation 437, at page 155 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fifth Edition. I suppose this could be called a reasoned amendment, but, in any event, it is exactly what His Honour ruled was out of order, when we reassembled at eight o'clock, namely:

> An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

That is citation 437.(1), and if that were not enough, citation 437.(2) says:

> An amendment may not raise a new question which can only be considered as a distinct motion after proper notice.

In my respectful submission, therefore, this motion has, in effect, already been ruled out of order, and my authority for that is the ruling His Honour the Speaker gave when we reassembled at eight o'clock.

Senator Flynn: I don't know if the reason given by Senator Frith is valid, but it is quite obvious that he does not understand what His Honour's ruling was, because what His Honour said had nothing to do with that. It was a motion to adjourn and His Honour said we should have given one day's notice. At any rate, I do not agree with that ruling.

• (2100)

In this case the proposal is to join now with the House of Commons, and we say we will join with them later on when a certain event will have taken place, and that a message be sent to that house to that effect. I cannot see that there is anything irregular there. It is obvious that the Deputy Leader of the Government, stubborn as a mule, has decided—

Senator McIlraith: Order. Order.

Senator Flynn: I said "stubborn as a mule." You do not think so? What expression would you suggest?

Senator McIlraith: I do not like language attacking an honourable senator personally when arguing a proposition of law and procedure in the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Asselin.]

Senator Flynn: I grant you I may have allowed myself to get a little carried away. There goes the clapping machine on the other side. When we see continuous objections on questions of procedure to avoid having a proper debate of the motion before the house, it's no surprise one gets a little over-excited. However, I will withdraw my remark.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Guay: I compliment the honourable senator—

Senator Flynn: I would invite Senator Guay not to get into the fray.

Senator Guay: I was complimenting you for withdrawing your remark.

Senator Flynn: With all due respect, I must say that I am always afraid when Senator Guay compliments me.

There is no common measure between this amendment and the previous one. This amendment is to the motion which is before us. The other house invites us to join with them, and we say, "We will join with you when a certain event has taken place." That is all there is to it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have nothing to add. Those are the two points of view. We should have a ruling.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, perhaps I may be allowed to offer a comment on the point of order raised before His Honour the Speaker takes the matter under consideration. I should like to deal with the substance of the objection raised by the Deputy Leader of the Government. He read the section on which he relies, which is section 437.(1):

> An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

So I suppose the issue is whether the words that have been used in the amendment are "foreign to the main motion."

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that they are not. They are clearly consonant with the main motion, but they involve a condition; and surely if amendments cannot be moved which offer to support a main motion under conditions, then I do not know what amendments can be used for.

It seems to me a very elementary question of parliamentary procedure that the amendment that has been moved is indeed correct. It does not contradict the main motion; it does not negative the main motion; it is not a new question in that it subsumes the main motion in any way. It is relevant to the main motion; it is a condition attached to the main motion; and it satisfies every rule I know of with respect to the propriety of an amendment to a motion such as the one we are considering here.

So I hope, sir, that you might take those observations under consideration when you rule on the matter.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, may I volunteer a brief opinion. Senator Roblin addressed himself to an entirely different matter. There is a rule of the Senate, namely, rule 28, which deals directly with the matter under discussion. That rule reads as follows:

> A senator shall not speak more than once to any question or other matter before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of his speech in which he may have been misunderstood, and then he shall not introduce new matter.

I suggest, honourable senators, that Senator Asselin has introduced new matter in this particular instance.

Senator Asselin: No, no.

[Translation]

With your leave, Your Honour.

Senator Lamontagne: Two amendments in the same speech.

Senator Asselin: I will ask you my honourable colleague, Senator Bosa, to notice that I spoke only once and that it was the continuation of my speech; perhaps he was not here this afternoon.

Senator Guay: I was.

Senator Asselin: You were not here when His Honour the Speaker adjourned the debate. But when he adjourned the debate I still had the floor.

Senator Lamontagne: Do you have a third amendment to present for the third part of your speech?

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, in my view, this issue has been decided before.

• (2110)

The motion in amendment made before 6 o'clock was declared out of order and as a result Senator Asselin had the right to complete his speech on the main motion, and this is what he did. On your point that Senator Asselin had introduced new matter, this has to be decided in the light of his new motion in amendment.

Insofar as the second motion in amendment is concerned, I reject it for the same reason given when the first motion in amendment was declared unacceptable. In the present motion in amendment the proposition is that the main motion be restricted to patriation and the amending formula. That means that you are trying to achieve what you were attempting to accomplish in the first motion in amendment.

My first ruling applies exactly in the same way to the present motion in amendment. Therefore, I declare this motion in amendment out of order.

If any honourable senator wishes to appeal, he is free to do so.

Senator Flynn: We certainly will appeal, with all due respect, Your Honour, because there is a distinct difference between the two motions. I mean, if you don't see the difference—

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes, I see the difference very well.

Senator Flynn: Yet you say it was the same?

The Hon. the Speaker: I see now you are adding the House of Commons to the procedure.

Senator Flynn: Not at all.

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes, and the Prime Minister will meet with the provinces, but I tell you that it is a motion of the same nature as the first one even if it is different. It is of the same nature and I have to say that it is not in order.

Senator Flynn: With great respect, we will have to appeal because your ruling means that we cannot make any amendments to the motion.

Senator Frith: Question.

Senator Flynn: Appeal.

The Hon. the Speaker: Are you appealing?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Call in the senators.

Senator Frith: We don't need to call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Call in the senators.

Senator Frith: Let's have the question. What do we need to call the senators in for?

Honourable senators, just so it is clear, because, of course, the only record we have is what is said, we can have a vote on this now if we wish. We saw how long it took—

Senator Flynn: It will take longer this time.

Senator Frith: —for the senators on the other side to come and, as the leader said, he proposes to see that it takes longer this time. I just want to be sure that it is on the record that we are ready to have a vote on the appeal now and that he is not, and we can let the record show—

Senator Flynn: Order.

Senator Frith: —how long it took him—

Senator Flynn: Order.

Senator Frith: —to get his side back.

Senator Flynn: Order.

The Hon. the Speaker: A point of order is raised.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: You stubborn mule.

Senator Frith: Who is talking about being stubborn?

The Hon. the Speaker: It is my decision that is appealed, and because my decision is appealed I call in the senators.

Honourable senators, the question now is: Shall the Speaker's last ruling be sustained?

The ruling of His Honour the Speaker was sustained on the following division:

[English]

The Senate resumed the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault:

> That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report upon the document entitled: "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;
>
> That ten Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;
>
> That the Committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;
>
> That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;
>
> That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;
>
> That the Committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;
> That the quorum of the Committee be twelve members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and that a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.—(Honourable Senator van Roggen).

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, there is not one of us who is not affected emotionally by these impending decisions now before us. Each of us wants to see them settled; hopefully, procedures are the only points remaining to ease this ominous apprehension.

Honourable senators, this morning I received this letter from Christina Pringi, my 10-year-old granddaughter. It is dated October 24 and in part it says:

> —I heard on the radio today that in the House of Commons there was such an uproar that it almost ended in a fist fight. I really don't think that all this should happen just because of the Constitution. Quebec, and four other provinces want to go to court, too. I think that the only province really in for the Constitution is Ontario. Actually, I really don't even know what a Constitution is.

Do I have some obligation other than as a soothing grandmother, who is talking to the grandchildren of today, assuring them that there will be peace in the valley and that they will inherit the land? Are we the greatest communicators or the worst? I would like to be able to promise all the youth of Canada that its Senate will work to enshrine their acquired rights, as we represent the people from every part of our great nation.

May self-serving interest be negotiated and not imposed. May political partisanship have its opportunities for expression. May regional interest be expressed and, hopefully, in the context that the whole must be larger than its parts—otherwise, these regions will ultimately become countries where self-serving interest will most certainly prevail, as it sometimes does now in this crucial debate.

His Honour and I are both native Quebecers. We both attended school there, and there the similarity ends insofar as our respective versions of history were learnt. The political leaders of our country have never come to grips with the self-serving interest of our institutions which, for one reason or another, have and still are working diligently to keep us on a collision course.

The great "example" is the 500-year disparity in the settlement dates by the Europeans as was taught in our day. This difference is of little consequence to Newfoundlanders, as either version favours their province as the first site explored. Let us never forget that living Father of Confederation, Joey Smallwood, and all his workers, who swung the referendum in favour of being a constituent part of Canada, be it either 500 or 1,000 years after they were recorded in modern history.

● (2230)

In any event, and history notwithstanding, we all saw the first human set foot on the moon, but it will be many years before geography books show the moon as part of the United States.

I submit that Canada and its history belong to present-day Canadians, as our forefathers are not now the least bit interested. Is it not then someone's responsibility to adjust the packaging, since that need has been so effectively enunciated in the mid-twentieth century, as it was in the mid-nineteenth and mid-eighteenth?

The Treaty of Paris was signed by France, England, Spain and Portugal. Canadians were not consulted and should therefore not dwell on events of the Plains of Abraham. In spite of its ending the Seven Years' War in Europe, the acquisition of Canada by Britain would have been meaningless, since the American colonists had plans of their own, as proven some ten years later when Ben Franklin occupied Montreal. The reaction and attitude of the Canadian colonists of that time, I feel, can best be summarized by a quotation of Alfred DeCelles when he described the remarkable feat of Joseph Papineau the elder, who would carry dispatches to Governor Carleton, from Montreal to Quebec, when the country on both sides of the St. Lawrence was swarming with bands of Americans, his dispatches hidden in the hollow of his walking stick, travelling by night, the trip occupying ten days.

In 1775, the people of Canada made a choice. They opted to defend their rights obtained under the Quebec Act of 1774 (the Magna Charta of French Canadian people). As a consequence, Canada became a separate entity in British North America. This entity continues to grow, adding statutes and rights, giving more, but removing nothing, and this, honourable senators, is the spirit of entrenchment. It was won for all of us in the mid-eighteenth century on behalf of a people and not a region. Incidentally, the vote in Westminster in 1774 was 105 to 26.

Again, in the War of 1812, Canadians of Lower Canada expressed their gratitude, loyalty and courage.

By the mid-nineteenth century, Canada was being populated by peoples of many lands, the vast majority of whom came to build a new life just as present day arrivals do and certainly included in these are my own parents. It was then possible to speak in terms of English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians, who united in a common cause which was against the Family Compact and its abuses of colonial rule. History indeed has shown many joint ventures, but teachers and manipulators of history use such events to divide what should never be set asunder, namely, our common history.

We read in a letter dated December 7, 1829, by Alexander Mackenzie to John Nelson, a member of the Lower Canada Assembly, of his proposals for a union, warning that disunity among ourselves will end up only in making us conquered states. That was 150 years ago. In this same letter he refers to "Cabotia" as the name of this proposed federation. So, to my Roman senators, Bosa and Rizzuto, I say there is still hope for us.

It took about ten years of debate between Reformists and Tories before all hell broke loose in 1837. There, elements of Upper and Lower Canada decided to fight the "Coercion Bill", and we had our Boston Tea Party, subsequently whitewashed in history as a riot by a bunch of drunks from Montgomery's Tavern on Yonge Street, and Les Patriotes were just traitors from Lower Canada led by Louis Joseph Papineau.

This war of independence was vicious and short lived. Mackenzie and Papineau were the fathers of a new constitutional Canada. The reformists had obtained the Act of Union of 1841 and Responsible Government in 1847. Lord Elgin was stoned for enacting it.

The cost of this freedom in terms of lives, deprivation and human sufferings, when you relate it to the total population of that time, around one million, were staggering—32 dead on the scaffold, hundreds in battle, more hundreds exiled, and 1,700 charged with treason.

We never hear of a mother of Confederation, but I will submit the name of Elizabeth Lount, the widow of Samuel Lount, who was hanged with Peter Matthews on April 2, 1838. She is quoted as saying, "Canada will do justice to his memory. Canadians cannot remain long in bondage. They will be free."

● (2240)

It is recorded in that period that 325 bills passed in the lower house were rejected by the upper house. Yet elections continued to be held as a façade of self-rule. The debate continued in the Imperial Parliament and I quote Glenelg, a colonial minister:

> In the administration of Canadian affairs, a sufficient practical responsibility already existed without the introduction of any hazardous schemes.

That was Mackenzie's declaration of independence.

Our history, in its attempts to downplay our struggles for independence, taught French-speaking Quebecers that it was a struggle against the English people, while English-speaking Quebecers were reminded of seditious acts and general law breaking. What a dreadful pity—while both premises are self-serving, they are nevertheless deliberately false. French and English Canadian reformers were fighting together, sometimes from the same outposts. Both wanted responsible government, and they succeeded in obtaining it for us. This is also entrenchment. Papineau campaigned vigorously in Upper Canada as did Mackenzie in Lower Canada. We can still do it together.

Our new Constitution has to be people- not government-oriented, and certainly not railway-oriented as our territorial sovereignty is now internationally established. While we may change our political jurisdictions and boundaries by the means established, no one part of our great country can be peddled or bartered under the guise of autonomy in self-serving attempts to make any one part stronger than the whole.

The two cornerstones of our constitutional history, in my view, are the Quebec Act of 1774 and the Responsible Government Act of 1847. All other proclamations, great as they were, had to be built on these two. Confederation was an update adding some legislatures and their territories, while making provisions for others. It was also an update progressing with statutes of the day.

Insofar as tomorrow was concerned, provisions were made to meet our petition in Westminster. Confederation also served to institute and legalize expanding roles of government. Greater symbolism was later added by the Statutes of Westminster in 1931—another progressive compromise, or was it? As I understand it, a topic of the post-World War I Conference of 1921 was to reorganize the Empire. A plan was drafted in 1926; became a British statute in 1930; and received dominion ratification within seven years. It is an empire Constitution. It served to repudiate the Colonial Validity Act of 1865, which the B.N.A. Act must have overlooked. This little known act, when adopted, extended colonial freedom by making any colonial law a valid one, unless British legislation overruled it. An unfortunate oversight in the statute is that in disclaiming sovereignty over Canada, it failed to supply a means of our own for amending our Constitution as was enjoyed by Australia at that time. We can only amend our Constitution by reverting to the Colonial Laws Validity Act of 1865.

Honourable senators, a lot of air, water and verbiage has passed us since that time, but let us admit for a moment that we are on square one. In the meantime, we must recognize with respect and gratitude the people of Westminster, both yesterday's and today's. I could think of a lot worse places for Canadians to constantly delay their adolescence. We have profited in many ways from our associations and linkages. The traditions will remain. They gave us either a walking ticket or sovereignty in 1931, and we cannot seem to get used to belonging to ourselves.

There is a wrangle among provincial legislatures and, in some cases, between some legislatures and Parliament itself. The urgency is due to the potential for calamity as some of the ever-growing provincial bureaucracies speak with ominous overtones. We must urge Canadians to compromise on their polarized feelings on language rights in the Constitution. Organizations which will oppose and obstruct this entrenchment are usually a self-serving, chauvinistic minority interest. Let us again remind ourselves of our common history which is our, already entrenched, common heritage.

[Senator Wood.]

• (2250)

All federal political parties adopted the Official Languages Act, and while it may be illegal by Quebec Statutes, that will change. While only one province at this time has language legislation mitigating against the use of English, other provinces could enact similar legislation mitigating against the use of French. Only entrenchment can avert this, because I need not remind you, honourable senators, that it would be game over.

On the other hand, we may find encouragement by reading the resolution of the 220,000-strong Canadian Teachers Federation, who urge and advocate entrenching guarantees for official language rights. Also, and close to my heart, they endorse the concept of parental right to choose the language of education. This document is dated October 14, 1980. It reminded me of my more radical and energetic days when I placarded and picketed for the teaching of French in early school years. In this respect, I feel that we should opt for freedom of choice in the language of education.

Restrictive legislation among provinces does, and will continue to, create hardships for Canadians, and only the Parliament of this country should intervene and mediate. Mobility of labour and capital must be reinstituted and entrenched.

Honourable senators, in the mid-19th century, the Canadian initiative was in the British Parliament. While they received representations from Alexander Mackenzie and Bonaventure Viger, and favourably reacted accordingly, they were also thwarted by the Upper House and the Family Compact in the Canadas. The people, nevertheless, paid the price. Let us now, in this Upper House, make the people a non-partisan approach to laying and cementing our third cornerstone. We all come from provinces, and most grew up under some municipal form of government—let us get them into the act, because, as so often is the case, towns and industries with their peoples are the sidelined victims of procrastination, which is the thief of time.

By a technicality of 1931, we became a sovereign state. We were not seeking independence as such; we were just told to get lost. Perhaps we should also concern ourselves with a sense of dignity.

It is even ludicrous, after 200 years of progressive statutes written in eloquence, blood, misunderstanding and present day turmoil, that we remain today, as ever, the only sovereign nation which has to ask another nation for permission to amend its laws and raison d'être. This is not dignity, either at home or abroad.

The irony of our situation is that several provinces wish to maintain this state of indignity, not because they are loyal to Westminster, but because they do not wish to compromise their pseudo-sovereignty with Canada.

We cannot remain a nation with split citizenship. While it is quite normal to be Montrealers, Torontonians, Trifluvians, Vancouverites, Gaspesians or even Bluenosers and Islanders, there need not be any other qualifier to our citizenship. Citizenship has to mean more than a permit to travel abroad; more than a perforation in a passport. Internally, the concept of citizenship is becoming more and more meaningless: mobility is restricted; property rights hampered; preferential employment practices restrict more Canadians daily; concept of a single citizenship is now meaningless.

We must, therefore, together support entrenchment of laws that would assure that all Canadians be guaranteed the right to buy a home, a farm or form a business anywhere in Canada and raise and educate their families in the language of their choice. These elements, which we took for granted, must now be enshrined so that the rights of people of Canada may never be used as pawns in bargaining for provincial powers.

We now have every human right available in the world, that is until we need them. Let us entrench them and carve them in our pre-Cambrian shield.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Perrault: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Senator Donahoe, seconded by Senator Sherwood, that the debate on the motion be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved and seconded that the debate on the motion be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: I regret, Your Honour. The motion was to adjourn the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes. To adjourn the debate until the next sitting of the Senate. I thought I read it correctly.

Senator Flynn: I am sorry. I thought you said that the motion was that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those in favour of the motion please rise?

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion defeated. The debate is resumed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, unless I misunderstand, I think that with the defeat of the adjournment motion the honourable senator loses his turn. However, since it is Senator Donahoe, and because we are all anxious to hear the distinguished former Attorney General of Nova Scotia, I withdraw that.

Senator Olson: Out of generosity.

Senator Perrault: We are a little more generous on this side.

Senator Roblin: Mr. Speaker, I am a stickler for propriety. Is it suggested that the honourable senator needs leave to speak?

Senator Perrault: Yes he does.

Senator Roblin: Section 304(2), which may be the section my friend is thinking of, does not seem to me to involve the question of order that my honourable friend opposite raised. If, having moved the amendment, one had been precluded from speaking—whether it carried or fell—what would happen to debate in this house? I myself moved the adjournment of this debate the other day and that didn't prevent me from speaking on it when it came before us. The question of losing the vote has nothing to do with it, in my opinion. There is no statement in this section about losing or winning a vote. In any case, the question referred to is obviously the adjournment question; not the question of the debate.

I do not think leave is required. I should like my honourable friend to go ahead.

Senator Asselin: Do you want to use closure?

Senator Flynn: There is no decision yet, I hope. If he withdraws his objection, I would not want the Speaker to say, "With leave." We do not want leave. We want simply to do what we have a right to do.

Senator Olson: In this situation you require leave.

Senator Flynn: No, we don't.

Senator Perrault: Yes, you do.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, when I returned to my apartment yesterday I turned on the radio—

An Hon. Senator: You may never get back again.

Senator Donahoe: —and I heard that the Prime Minister of this country was out addressing western Canadians.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Donahoe: He was saying to them, "Don't you dare bring emotion to bear on your consideration of the Constitution of this country. The Constitution of this country must be considered in cold, relentless logic. You may not bring sentiment to it". I thought to myself, what kind of a cold fish could get up to discuss the Constitution of this country in the circumstances that exist before us here this evening and not be moved, not feel emotion, not express himself in emotional terms. Because a man expresses himself in emotional terms, it does not in any way follow that he cannot bring to the consideration of the subject at hand—

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Is the honourable senator quoting verbatim what the Prime Minister said in Saskatchewan?

Senator Flynn: That is not a point of order.

Senator Thériault: It is if he is quoting something.

Senator Asselin: No, it is not. Go ahead, Senator Donahoe.

Senator Donahoe: I thought it was perfectly clear that what I was saying was what I heard—

Senator Olson: Senator Thériault has a perfect right to ask the source of what the honourable senator is saying. He has the right to ask if it is a direct quotation, or if it is the senator's opinion.

Senator Flynn: He should have listened. Senator Donahoe said that he heard him on television last night.

An Hon. Senator: On radio.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I need no lesson from the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. I rose on a point of order and I stated my point of order. I am concerned when an honourable senator presumably quotes wrongly what the Prime Minister of this country has said.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Asselin: That is your opinion.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, if the honourable senator is concerned about knowing my source, I can tell him that my source was a radio broadcast.

Senator Olson: He wanted to know if it was a quote.

Senator Donahoe: I did not say I was quoting verbatim the words used by the Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Donahoe: I do say that I was quoting with great exactitude the thought being expressed by the Prime Minister. There is no question about what he meant. He said that sentiment had no place in the consideration of the Constitution, but that it should be guided by pure logic.

Senator Thériault: That is not right.

Senator Olson: That is your interpretation of what he said.

Senator Roblin: He is entitled to it.

Senator Asselin: Yes, he is.

Senator Olson: He should not state it as a fact.

Senator Donahoe: Well, it may be my interpretation, but that is exactly what the words used by the Prime Minister conveyed to my mind.

Senator Flynn: I heard them myself.

Senator Thériault: He said—

Senator Walker: Quiet, sonny boy.

Senator Donahoe: I say, as I said before, that it occurred to me that it would have to be a pretty cold fish that would approach the matter in that way.

● (0020)

I said further—and I repeat—that being emotional and bringing emotion to the consideration of these great problems does not in any way detract from the fact that you may also bring logic, reason and intelligence to your consideration in arriving at your decisions as to what is right and what is wrong.

We listened this evening to some addresses in respect of the motion before us. I have always thought that the people of Upper Canada, if I may use that phrase, considered that Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were mere appendages to them; that in some way or another—

An Hon. Senator: No way.

Senator Flynn: You are waking up.

Senator Donahoe: I thought that tonight I had some confirmation of that. I listened to Senator Wood as she addressed us here a little earlier, and we had a great lesson in the constitutional history of Upper Canada, of Quebec and Ontario. She pointed out certain of the constitutional statutes which she said marked the highlights of that constitutional history. Having named them, she then came to the statute of 1867, the British North America Act.

I made a note at the time of what she said. It was that Confederation was an "updating of the constitutional rights of the Upper Canadians, and all it did," she said, "was to add a couple of provinces, with the promise of more to come."

Senator Olson: That is a very bad interpretation of what she said.

Senator Asselin: You may make your own speech later on.

Senator Olson: When I made a speech, you guys were interjecting every two minutes.

Senator Flynn: Why don't you go to bed.

Senator Steuart: If you would let us adjourn, we would.

Senator Olson: Yes, I would like to go to bed.

Senator Donahoe: I do not mind the honourable senator questioning my interpretation. In fact, it wasn't an interpretation at all. It was merely a repeating of the statement made by the Honourable Senator Wood. She said it. I did not say it, and I did not interpret it at all. All she said was that Confederation was an updating of the constitutional situation in Upper Canada and all it did was add a couple of provinces, with the promise of more.

Senator Olson: She said a lot more than that.

Senator Donahoe: Oh, I didn't say that she didn't say other things; but she certainly did say what I have said she said.

Senator McElman: How can you expect a proper interpretation from a party that cannot count?

Senator Donahoe: I am not interpreting it; you are interpreting it. You seem to think that it means something other than what she said.

Senator McElman: If a party cannot count to 120, how can you expect it to interpret?

Senator Donahoe: We in Nova Scotia always believed that Canada came into being because Upper and Lower Canada—or, if you prefer, Ontario and Quebec—were unable to govern themselves without arriving at a perpetual state of deadlock—

Senator Flynn: That is right.

Senator Donahoe: —and because Sir John A. Macdonald had a vision of a nation from sea to sea in which his province and the Province of Lower Canada would be predominant partners. That could only be made possible if some of the other colonies could be persuaded to join with Upper and Lower Canada. The nation which Sir John A. Macdonald envisaged was to be governed under the parliamentary system—the system that was developed over centuries in Great Britain. That was a deliberate choice by Sir John A. Macdonald and by the Fathers of Confederation, because they had before them the vision of the republican system adopted in the United States and they saw that it was in imminent danger of breaking apart by reason of the issue of slavery and the Civil War.

Representatives of the maritime provinces were, at the time, meeting in Charlottetown. They were meeting there to consider a Maritime union and the men from the Canadas joined them in Charlottetown, came in and said, "Why don't you look farther afield? Why be content with a small local union when we offer you the opportunity to become part of a great union which can form a nation?" And so the negotiations began. They were long and they were earnest.

● (0030)

At a certain point the delegates met in Quebec. They sat there and they considered what form this nation which we are discussing should take, and in the course of time they passed what are now known as the Quebec resolutions. And there wasn't anybody in on the formation and passing of those resolutions except representatives of the four colonies or four provinces, Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. There were no representatives of the British Crown involved; there was nobody except Canadians, as they were to become, involved in the passing of those resolutions.

Then in due course they took themselves to London. There they met and they sat and considered those Quebec resolutions and they refined them and polished them and put them into final shape.

Senator Flynn: Order.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, if we are going to have some order in this chamber, could not Senator Hicks and Senator Olson have their meeting or their Liberal caucus outside this chamber? He has done enough heckling already of Senator Donahoe. Could they not remove themselves from the chamber to have their meeting?

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, at the request of those delegates the proposed British North America Act was put before the British Parliament, and as a result of its passing in 1867 Canada came into being as a Confederation. The powers of government under that act were divided between the nation and the provinces and Canada was born.

Canada clearly was the result of the agreement of the governments of four provinces to yield part of their sovereignty to a central government, and to create a confederation nation.

I would just like to say, in view of the fact that in these proposals now before us there is the suggestion that a referendum is an appropriate machinery to use in the framing and forming of a Constitution, that if there had been the use of a referendum in 1867, there never would have been a Canada because the people of Nova Scotia, at the earliest opportunity, repudiated the leaders who took them into Confederation and the new leaders made strenuous efforts to persuade the government in London to let Nova Scotia withdraw, but without success.

Senator Hicks: And New Brunswickers felt the same way.

● (0040)

Senator Donahoe: I suspect that is probably true. In glancing over the British North America Act the other evening, I saw mention of section 89, and in its place it said that section 89 was repealed. Section 89, when you look for it, was a section which said, in effect, that in Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia writs of election were to be issued for the first election of members of the Legislative Assembly, in such form and by such persons as the Lieutenant Governors of those provinces thought fit, and addressed to the returning officer, and so on, and that the election should be held at the same time and at the same places as the election for a member to serve in the House of Commons of Canada for that electoral district.

So that is what happened. That is why the section is no longer there. It was done. The section was functus. It had performed its purpose and, being redundant, was repealed. And I don't think they consulted all the provinces to repeal it. It was clearly a case where consultation with the provinces was unnecessary, if you were going to amend the British North America Act by repealing a section of that nature.

So they had those elections. I would like to tell the members of this chamber that in my wife's family there has been cherished ever since that time an actual election banner which was used and displayed in the election of 1867. It was used in the constituency of Halifax. In those days there were two federal members to be elected for the constituency and three local members to be elected to the legislature. Those five men advertised together, because the elections were being held on the same day. That banner invites the people to vote for the Liberal anti-confederate candidates.

Why that banner has been in my wife's family, and why it has been treasured, is that on it is the name of one of the two men who were candidates, and who was the first member for the constituency, Patrick Power; and Patrick Power was my wife's great-grandfather. And among the three names of the three men who were running for the legislature was the name of Henry Balcom, and Henry Balcom was my great-grandfather.

Now, these were reasonable men. They were men who judged that, from their personal point of view, confederation would not be to their advantage and so they were against confederation. But they were, and continued to be, when their efforts to withdraw failed, good Canadians. They believed, or came to believe, that what had taken place was the formation of a nation with great potentialities and great capabilities.

They brought sentiment to bear in their attitude towards that confederation and they brought logic to bear on it, too. So Canada, the product of negotiation and agreement between Canadians, embarked on more than a century of growth and development under the form of government selected for it by the Fathers of Confederation.

I shall not try to review the entire constitutional history of this country. Step by step the strings of colonial control were loosened, until, with the passing of the Statute of Westminster, Canada became an independent autonomous nation. The sole legislative tie that was retained was retained at the request of the provinces of Canada—which was that amendment to the British North America Act was still to be made in the Parliament at Westminster.

It is true that Britain abdicated its power to initiate such changes, and it was clear that such changes would only be made at Canada's request. The question now is: How was that request to be made? It is pretty well understood that the B.N.A. Act will be amended only by a Joint Address of the House of Commons and the Senate, and it remains to be decided whether the consent of the provinces is a requisite.

We are now told that the consent of the provinces is not required. We are told that the Parliament of Canada can move on a unilateral basis to address the Queen or the Parliament at Westminster with a request that the British North America Act be amended.

We are also told that the British North America Act is the Constitution of Canada. We talk about repatriating the Constitution. What we mean is: bringing the British North America Act under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Parliament.

I have in my hand a book that I value. It is entitled The Amendment of the Constitution of Canada, and in gold letters on the front at the bottom I read "Honourable Guy Favreau, Minister of Justice, February, 1965." If honourable senators open the book and look on the flyleaf they will find that it is autographed by the person who gave it to me—not by the author. It reads: "With best wishes, L. B. Pearson." That book was given to me by the late Lester Pearson. It dealt with the Constitution of Canada and the proposals that were put forward in that year to amend it. It contains what has come to be known as the Fulton-Favreau Formula.

In my view, there is much of merit in this book, that applies to the consideration that we are now giving to the amendment of the Constitution. With the permission of honourable senators, I propose to read some sections from it.

The first quotation is from the very first chapter. It comprises approximately one page, and it begins by saying:

> A constitution may be defined as the body of fundamental principles, laws and conventions by which a country is governed. These may be formally expressed, as in the case of the United States where the word Constitution refers to a specific document; or they may include both written and unwritten laws as well as conventions, as in the case in United Kingdom. The Canadian Constitution is neither one type nor the other. It is a combination of both. There is a written document, the British North America Act of 1867 which resembles the American Constitution in that it united separate British North American colonies and established for the new country a federal system of government. This document, however, did not set out in detail all the constitutional rules and conventions applicable to the new federal and provincial governments. It established executive and legislative institutions with the understanding, as stated in the preamble, that the Constitution of Canada was to be "similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom". The reasons for this course—

And I am still reading.

> —appear to have been that the system of responsible government as practised in the United Kingdom had been well established and accepted in the British North American colonies by 1867, and included many conventions and practices that were difficult to define in a statute.
> Thus, in Canada the Constitution consists in part of written material and in part of conventions or customs. The written material includes both United Kingdom and Canadian statutes, the latter including such enactments as the Succession to the Throne Act, the Senate and the House of Commons Act, the Canada Elections Act and the House of Commons Act. The more important of the applicable United Kingdom statutes form a series, known as the British North America Acts. In addition to these formal laws, there is a wide range of constitutional usages and conventions that are inherent in the system of parliamentary government this country inherited from the United Kingdom.
> The principal document in the Constitution of Canada, however, is the British North America Act in 1867. This act and its amendments are collectively known as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1964.

Now, that is a most interesting exposition of the nature of the Constitution of Canada. As I propose to go on and demonstrate from further quotations from this book, some of those conventions that form part of our Constitution related to the necessity of having conference, consultation and consent from the provinces in order to proceed with the joint resolution of the House of Commons and of the Senate to ask that the British North America Act be amended.

If one listens today to the Prime Minister of this country, one would believe that no such convention ever existed, or if it existed, it may have been binding on L. B. Pearson, it may have been binding on previous prime ministers, but it is not binding on Pierre Elliott Trudeau. The very man who is saying that that convention does not exist or has no binding force is himself a living example of the fact that he is a convention—the position which he occupies is a convention. If you look at the British North America Act, you won't find any reference to a prime minister. You won't find any reference to the parliamentary system of cabinet government and cabinet responsibility, but these things are all part of the way in which we are governed. They are all part of our system. They are conventions which have come down to us, and they have a binding and a real force as part of the Constitution of this country.

On page 4 of this book—and I am not going to read all of this—there is a history of the amendments to the British North America Act. I do not want to take up your time with them, but there have been in fact no fewer than 22 such amendments, or, at least, that was the number that had been effected at the time of the writing of this book.

On page 10 there follows a review of the circumstances that surrounded the passing of those 22 amendments, and I am going to read a little bit from that part of the book. It says:

> The procedures for amending a constitution are normally a fundamental part of the laws and conventions by which a country is governed. This is particularly true if the Constitution is embodied in a formal document, as is the case in such federal states as Australia, the United States and Switzerland. In these countries, the amending process forms an important part of their constitutional law.
>
> In this respect, Canada has been in a unique constitutional position. Not only did the British North America Act not provide for its amendment by Canadian legislative authority, except to the extent outlined at the beginning of this chapter, but it also left Canada without any clearly defined procedure for securing constitutional amendments from the British Parliament. As a result, procedures have varied from time to time, with recurring controversies and doubts over the conditions under which various provisions of the Constitution should be amended.
> Certain rules and principles relating to amending procedures have nevertheless developed over the years. They have emerged from the practices and procedures employed in securing various amendments to the British North America Act since 1867. Though not constitutionally binding in any strict sense, they have come to be recognized and accepted in practice as part of the amendment process in Canada.
> In order to trace and describe the manner in which these rules and principles have developed,—

There here follows a description of those various acts which the authors say have made a contribution to the development of constitutional practice. I am not going to read all of these. I will jump to the conclusions that are made after each of them has been examined. The book says, at page 15:

> The first general principle that emerges in the foregoing resumé is that although an enactment by the United Kingdom is necessary to amend the British North America Act, such action is taken only upon formal request from Canada. No Act of the United Kingdom Parliament affecting Canada is therefore passed unless it is requested and consented to by Canada. Conversely, every amendment requested by Canada in the past has been enacted.

• (0120)

> The second general principle is that the sanction of Parliament is required for a request to the British Parliament for an amendment to the British North America Act. This principle was established early in the history of Canada's constitutional amendments, and has not been violated since 1895. The procedure invariably is to seek amendments by a joint Address of the Canadian House of Commons and Senate to the Crown.

> The third general principle is that no amendment to Canada's Constitution will be made by the British Parliament merely upon the request of a Canadian province.

This goes on to say that a number of such attempts were made but none was ever successful. I would hope that strict attention would be paid to the fourth general principle because it is a most important one. It says:

> The fourth general principle is that the Canadian Parliament will not request an amendment directly affecting federal-provincial relationships without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces. This principle did not emerge as early as others but, since 1907, and particularly since 1930, has gained increasing recognition and acceptance. The nature and the degree of provincial participation in the amending process, however, have not lent themselves to easy definition.
> There have been five instances—in 1907, 1940, 1951, 1960, and 1964—of federal consultation with all provinces on matters of direct concern to all of them. There has been only one instance up to the present time in which an amendment was sought after consultation with only those provinces directly affected by it. This was the amendment of 1930, which transferred to the western provinces natural resources that had been under the control of the federal government since their admission to Confederation.

I do not want to be led astray, but those are the same natural resources which belonged to the federal government and of which Nova Scotia as a partner in Confederation had a share but for which it never received any compensation when those resources were transferred to the western provinces. However, that is an aside and I didn't really mean to make that point at the moment, but I could not resist drawing it to your attention on the way past.

Senator Hicks: Lucky for the western provinces in 1930.

Senator Donahoe: The text goes on to say:

> There have been ten instances [in 1871, 1875, 1886, 1895, 1915, 1916, 1943, 1946, 1949 and 1949(2)] of amendments to the Constitution without prior consultation with the provinces—

Listen carefully, honourable senators, to this:

> —on matters that the federal government considered were of exclusive federal concern.

We now know, of course, that by a later amendment those matters have been brought back to Canada. Those are matters on which the Parliament of Westminster can no longer legislate. They can be legislated directly by the Parliament of Canada because they relate only to matters of direct and exclusive federal concern and there is no valid reason for requiring the consent of the provinces in that context.

The text goes on to say:

> In the last four of these, one or two provinces protested that federal-provincial consultations should have taken place prior to action by Parliament.

[Senator Donahoe.]

But, having protested, that was the end of it.

> Under the 1964 amending formula, the requirements for provincial consultation and consent are for the first time clearly defined.

Under the 1980 Trudeau proposition, the requirements for provincial consultation and consent are not only not clearly defined, they are totally eliminated and disregarded.

• (0130)

Honourable senators, I say to you that such a procedure is unconstitutional and improper. I have no doubt whatsoever that if the legality of such a unilateral procedure were put before the courts, the courts would say such a procedure is beyond the proper competence of the federal Parliament, that the requirement for consultation and consent has become embedded in our Constitution, that it is a convention of our Constitution, that it is a part of our Constitution and that it must be followed and cannot be ignored.

What I wrote here I have not said quite the same way. What I wrote here is this: I am compelled to say that under the 1980 Trudeau procedure this entire body of accepted constitutional practice is kicked aside and rejected.

Senator Perrault: Who wrote that?

Senator Donahoe: I wrote that.

Senator Perrault: You are quoting yourself.

Senator Donahoe: If my honourable friend had been paying attention and had not been busying himself with writing something, he would have heard that I said I had written this. Those are the words I applied to it, but I used other words. I shall repeat it in case my honourable friend does not understand.

Senator Asselin: Repeat it.

Senator Donahoe: I am compelled to say that under the 1980 Trudeau procedure this entire body of accepted constitutional practice is kicked aside and rejected and, still worse, not only is the procedure going forward unilaterally, but the active dissent of provinces comprising whole regions of Canada is being mocked at and ignored.

Honourable senators, to my mind, no one yet, including Mr. Trudeau, has produced any persuasive or convincing reason for this constitutional package and why it is required, or why it is required on a timetable so restricted that it requires the use of closure in the House of Commons, although the Prime Minister began by saying that he hoped every member would have his say on the proposals. Having brought the matter forward and invited everyone to have his say, he then invoked the guillotine and saw to it that the opportunity for discussion was taken away from the floor of the House of Commons, taken away at a time when more supporters of the government had spoken to it, more time had been consumed by supporters of the government than had been consumed by the opposition, and when a very high percentage of the members of the opposition were, by use of the guillotine, deprived of the opportunity of expressing their points of view.

When the Deputy Leader of the Government rose in the Senate tonight and said that I might not have had the right to have the floor on a technicality, I was mightily relieved that he said he would not adopt the attitude which was adopted in the House of Commons, that he would not invoke what would have been, in effect, a personal closure. I do not know whether he had that right, but I do not, in any way, concede the point the deputy leader was making. However, I appreciate the generosity of spirit which led him to say that I should be permitted to have my say. I only wish that the generosity of spirit shown by the deputy leader in this chamber had been shown by the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons to those who sit on the other side of that house.

• (0140)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. First, I thank the honourable senator for what he has said. However, I suppose if I am to accept this compliment of being generous, I should tell him what the basis was for my point of order—

Senator Flynn: No; no; no.

Senator Frith: I will just put it on the record. At page 346 of Bourinot—

Senator Flynn: Order! Order!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am standing on a point of order—

Senator Flynn: You cannot interrupt at this point.

Senator Frith: I am standing on a point of order, and I am entitled to make that point of order.

Senator Flynn: No, it is not a point of order.

Senator Frith: Well, let me make it before we decide that.

Senator Donahoe: We are in no hurry.

Senator Flynn: Well, if you want to discuss that, we will have a discussion.

Senator Frith: At page 346, Bourinot states as follows:

If a member should move the adjournment of debate—

Senator Flynn: All right, if you are going to listen to him, listen; you will listen to me afterwards.

Senator Asselin: His Honour the Speaker is on his feet.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senator, you agreed at the beginning that Senator Donahoe should speak. I know the point you want to raise, but I do not think it is proper at this stage, in that you agreed to continue the debate.

Senator Donahoe: I thank His Honour the Speaker for his ruling, because it would have been very embarrassing for me to oppose the right of the honourable senator to speak when I was just fresh from congratulating him on having given that right to me.

To my mind, no one has produced any persuasive reason why the package was required and why it was required on a timetable so restricted that it required closure in the other place. The Prime Minister first held himself out to be prepared to give the greatest opportunity for discussion and then, in a relatively brief time, invoked closure, thereby cutting off the rights of those who sought to discharge their duty.

Senator Olson: After 13 days. That must be in the record, too.

Senator Murray: Thus speaks a great parliamentarian. Thirteen days of debate!

Senator Asselin: On so important a matter. Shame!

Senator Olson: Only to refer it to committee.

Senator Donahoe: When I hear the term of 13 days being raised as though it were a consequential period of time, I am reminded of the latin maxim that I learned in law school, de minimis non curat lex, meaning the law takes no regard of trifles. In the light of the importance of the material that was under discussion, 13 days was a trifle. I cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, nor could any fair-minded person, concede that an adequate opportunity for discussion was made available in the other chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Olson: Would 53 years be adequate time?

Senator Donahoe: Why, may I ask, does the package require the device of reference to a committee in a manner that bids fair to circumvent the right of members of the House of Commons and of the Senate to debate and vote upon amendments to the proposal? Why must it be handled in a way that bids fair to secure a Joint Address of both houses without those houses ever having been permitted to address themselves directly to the question as to whether they wish such an Address with that content? I do not know why, and no one has yet given me any valid reason why that course should be followed.

I can see Senator Olson shaking his head. I know that we are assured that we will have full opportunity for debate. But we can get no assurance that the Address to Her Majesty the Queen will ever be the subject of a direct vote.

When Nova Scotia got representative government in 1758, the first of the British dominions to secure that right, the legislature was formed, and the legislature met and it debated the problems of the province, and it debated them ad nauseam. But the decisions were made by the Executive Council. Then in 1848 we got responsible government, and the legislature made the decision. But it appears to me that what is going on here is an effort to reduce Parliament to the status of a debating society, while the effective decisions are made elsewhere.

Well, the honourable senator can shake his head all he likes, but that is the way it appears to me, and I am not at all sure that it does not appear like that to any reasonable, fair-minded person who addresses himself to the question.

Honourable senators, the Canadian public is being sold a gold brick. It is in danger of being the victim of a con job, sold to it with all the finesse of a master con artist. Why do I speak of a con job? Let us look at the reasons for proceeding as we are proceeding.

First, we are told that efforts to bring Canada's Constitution totally under Canadian control have been going on for 53 years.

Senator Perrault: That is right.

Senator Donahoe: I am glad to hear the Leader of the Government say that that is right, because he said yesterday that it was 57 years.

Senator Perrault: Well, it feels like 57.

Senator Donahoe: Well, that is nit-picking, I suppose, but the fact remains that 53 years is the accepted term. That is what we are told. But, of course, that is a statement entirely without foundation. In fact the Constitution that we are being asked to bring under Canadian control is not the Constitution we have lived under and developed for 113 years. It is a new and different Constitution devised by Mr. Trudeau, presented for the first time only a few short weeks ago and it is a Constitution which undermines the constitutional philosophy upon which this country, our Canada, was founded and which has served it so well.

We are told that we must entrench a bill of rights. It is presented to us as though by entrenching a bill of rights we would somehow have more and better rights than we now enjoy, and the fact that in the process we are transferring legislative power to an appointed court from an elected Parliament, and an elected Parliament moreover which has an appointed regional representative upper house, that point is ignored or played down or treated as if of no importance. Finally the whole procedure is the essence of hypocrisy. It is put forward by Mr. Trudeau who has proclaimed from the house tops that it is demeaning, that it is inconsistent with our dignity as a nation, that it derogates from our sovereignty, that it is a remnant of colonialism, that Westminster should be called upon to legislate in respect of the Canadian Constitution. Don't tell me he does not say these things, because I have heard them repeated in this very chamber in this very debate by some of those who support him here.

Having established the need for patriation and attempting to justify it with such an argument, what does he then do? You know what he does. He seeks to use the instrumentality of Westminster to place this country in the humiliating position of a colony, the position that we had thought was so far behind us in the past. And he wants to do that, not to bring back our Constitution to be dealt with in Canada by Canadians, but to destroy the basis on which the country was founded, to point it in the direction of a unitary state, to inject into our Constitution the type of codified law in which Mr. Trudeau received his legal training, and then to return this new Constitution to us full of new powers, which, in some instances, the Supreme Court has said are beyond the powers of the Canadian Parliament in the present state of the Constitution, but authority for which he will seek and hopes to secure in this enlightened, emancipated age—from, of all places, th legislature of another power.

Do you wonder that I say it is the height of hypocrisy? I say, "Shame!" There is only one proper course, and that is one that I am sure has not been attempted because Mr. Trudeau knows that it can succeed, and, if it succeeds, it will stand in the way of his achieving his ends. That way is to transfer the B.N.A. Act to Canada with an amending formula that will permit, without delay, the embarkation upon a process of reform of the Constitution under the new formula, a formula which will relieve us from what Mr. Trudeau has called "the chains of unanimity," and give us an amended Constitution made in Canada by Canadians.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Donahoe: Giving due respect—"Hear, hear!"? It is unbelievable that a sentiment of that kind could be greeted by a "Hear, hear!" from the gentleman who said those words. Unbelievable! When he is going to insist that these things that I have said ought not to be permitted will take place. He will insist not that Canadians make our new Constitution but that legislators in the Parliament at Westminster do so, and only then, when they have changed the philosophy under which our nation was formed and under which it is governed, only then will Canadians be considered fit to deal with their own affairs.

Senator Flynn: Hear, hear.

Senator Donahoe: What we need—

Senator Perrault: Do you have a problem? Do you need a doctor?

Senator Flynn: I have a problem with you.

Senator Perrault: Do you need a doctor?

Senator Flynn: You certainly need one yourself.

Senator Donahoe: What we need is an amended Constitution, one that will—

Senator Perrault: It sounds like a cattle auction.

Senator Donahoe: One that will give due respect to the needs and aspirations of all Canadians, and one that is arrived at in a truly democratic and Canadian way.

I will not go into the details of the referendum proposals or the details of the entrenched Bill of Rights or the details of the various things that are provided. Those have been thoroughly dealt with already and will be dealt with, I am sure, in even greater detail as time goes on.

But I do want to say that I had occasion to look at the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, No. 50, dated the 27th of October, 1980. When I look in there, I find that on that day:

> A Message was brought from the House of Commons by their Clerk in the following words:—

The message concerned a resolution that had been passed in the House of Commons to establish a special joint committee:

—to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada"—

It goes on to say:

That 15 Members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee—

After that resolution was received, the resolution that we are now debating was put before this chamber. As does the other, it proposes that there be a special joint committee and that the Senate unite with the House of Commons to set up such a committee. It goes on to say:

That ten Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee—

Why 10? Why not 15?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Donahoe: Are we not a chamber equal in legislative authority with the House of Commons? Oh, I know that we are an appointed body. I am well aware of that fact. I also know that we are part of the Constitution of this country, and I know that as part of the Constitution of this country we have certain legal and legislative rights. As of now, those rights are equal to and concurrent with the rights of the House of Commons.

There are some limitations upon us. We cannot initiate money bills. But apart from that we have as much authority over legislation as does the House of Commons.

Here we are being asked to consider the most momentous, the most important, the most decisive piece of legislation that has come before the Parliament of Canada in my lifetime. We are being asked to consider it in a committee which is to be representative of this house and of the other place; yet we are being asked to accept a secondary position in the formation of that committee and to have only 10 representatives on it where the other place shall have 15.

Oh, I know that there are more members of Parliament than there are senators. But we are a constitutional body as they are. We have equal and concurrent power, and we should have equal representation on that committee.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Donahoe: Therefore, honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Murray, that the motion be amended by deleting the second paragraph thereof, and substituting the following therefor:

That 15 Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Donahoe, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, that the motion be amended by deleting the second paragraph thereof, and substituting the following therefor:

That 15 members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee.

Is it your pleasure honourable senators, to adopt that motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those who say—

Senator Flynn: I assume that Your Honour is not saying that this motion is not debatable?

The Hon. the Speaker: I haven't said anything about that.

Senator Fournier: Your Honour, I move the adjournment of this debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Fournier, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, that the debate on the motion in amendment be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Motion of Senator Fournier negatived on the following division:

BIRTHDAY FELICITATIONS

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, may I rise on a question of privilege? Notwithstanding what date is shown on the calendar at the Clerk's Table, my watch calendar indicates that it is now October 31, and I am quite sure that all honourable senators will want to join me in wishing the senior senator present, the Honourable Senator John J. Connolly, many happy returns.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I thank you all. I just want to make a short announcement. A year from today I will not be eligible to enter this chamber again.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): If the honorable senator votes against this resolution, it will take a year before it is dealt with. In any event, I am not looking forward to the day when he is no longer one of us. We, on this side, will miss a man of his understanding and learning.

[Translation]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how we should call you in French. Personally I think it should be "monsieur le Président". In any case I must point out to you that we have gone past midnight and that according to our rules nothing applies after midnight. Our rules apply exclusively to sittings of the Senate beginning at 2 p.m. each day. We have tried to adjourn to two o'clock tomorrow. I cannot find anything in our rules which applies after midnight. Unless a vote had been called, of course, then the division ought to take place. But there is nothing in our rules which allows us to sit at this hour. I find that altogether irregular. Since it is past midnight, I think that the Speaker has to say that the Senate will sit tomorrow at two o'clock.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Choquette: Today at two o'clock.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not believe there is anything to support the proposition that we cannot continue to sit. There are certainly precedents for that.

Senator Flynn: On agreement.

Senator Frith: I think the question is whether we want to continue sitting, not whether we have the right to continue sitting; but I take it the honourable senator has raised a point of order, so I suppose we will have to have another ruling, another series of bells and another long delay waiting for the return of the Whip on the other side, just as we have on everything else. However, I guess we have to go through this as long as they want to keep doing it.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps we might cut short some of the lengthy procedure referred to by the honourable senator if he would give us some indication of what the intention of the government is with regard to the adjournment of the house.

Senator Frith: The original intention, as I explained—

Senator Murray: Who is the house leader over there? We just had a question answered by the Minister of State for Economic Development. Now you are answering one.

Senator Guay: Stand up when you speak.

Senator Flynn: You, too.

[Translation]

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I should like to say to the Leader of the Opposition that I noticed tonight, and I kept track of this, that I have already been blamed for talking too much. But I can assure you that he is the champion, and then some. He often used the word "Speaker" because he was not too sure. He called you "la présidence" and something else. I should say to him that he would be an excellent Speaker because he speaks all the time and does not say anything.

Senator Flynn: You are breaking my heart. I am going to cry.

[English]

Senator Phillips: To say that he says nothing is a reflection on his Honour the Speaker.

Senator Guay: That is fine. Keep on talking.

Senator Frith: In answer to the question that was put to me by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, our intention is to try and complete the program that I had thought was the subject of an agreement.

Senator Perrault: There was an agreement.

Senator Flynn: You had better not say that again.

Senator Frith: We know, however, that that view is not shared. I had thought there was an agreement, as I say, that we would finish the debate on this matter by the end of this week.

Senator Guay: You should have known better.

Senator Frith: Our intention is to sit as long as honourable senators want to speak on this motion—until the end of this week, at least.

Senator Roblin: I must say that my friend leaves me a little bit confused, because if, as he says, we are going to sit until all members who want to speak have spoken without any intermission, we may be here for some time. We have been engaged in our duties now since 2 o'clock this afternoon, and it would only be reasonable that at this stage we should go to bed. We will be back here tomorrow and we will have another day to go at it. It seems to me that it would be quite reasonable to terminate our proceedings tonight and resume them tomorrow at 2 o'clock.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps I could ask the Leader of the Opposition the same question he asked me, and that is: What are his party's intentions with respect to the debate?

First, is it his intention to finish the debate on this motion by the end of this week; secondly, if we are going to cease our sitting tonight, in other words, adjourn the debate—and I guess it is our turn to adjourn it—will we sit tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock and try to get the job done. I must say that I find it difficult to understand any suggestion that we have done enough work, and if we want to get the job done and give everyone a chance to talk we should not meet tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

If we want to give everyone a chance to speak and finish up the debate by the end of the week, I do not understand why we would not sit tomorrow morning.

Senator Roblin: I think it is a question of a reasonable expectation of a day's work from people. After all, we are expected to have our wits about us. We are here discussing important business and I think it unreasonable to carry on beyond the point where the human anatomy begins to fail.

We have been at this debate for a long time today and, if we follow the same procedure tomorrow—and I suspect we will—we will be at it for a very long time tomorrow. It seems to me that it is reasonable to expect people to give up the debate shortly, I would say right now, and resume it at 2 o'clock tomorrow. I am sure we are going to have a very long day tomorrow.

Senator Perrault: Let us go on right now.

Senator Roblin: There is the possibility of sitting on Saturday. I am not quite sure how that is going to turn out. Let us be frank about it—there are limits to what we can do and if we are pressed beyond what is a reasonable expectation from the physical point of view I do not think it is fair to take that attitude. The government has its program. We have made it perfectly clear that we do not intend to try to hold that program up indefinitely, even if we could.

We have made a suggestion that we ought to quit at a certain time, which would be right after the opening on Monday, but we have had a negative response to this suggestion. We know very well that we are going to have to finish up this week if that is the government's determination. They have the numbers and they have the capacity to see that that is done. If they are determined to finish this week, then I guess they will have their way.

I think we have had enough for today and we could all honourably call this off and go home and start again tomorrow.

Some Hon. Senators: At 10 o'clock.

Senator Roblin: No, at 2 o'clock.

Senator Flynn: I should like a ruling from the Speaker as to the propriety of sitting after 12 o'clock. There is nothing in our rules, and I suggest that it is only with leave that we can sit after midnight. The rules provide for the sitting on a sitting day, and a "sitting day" is over by 35 minutes now. There is no provision for sitting at this time.

We sit at 2 o'clock on a given day. Today we can sit only at 2 o'clock, that is what is provided in the rules.

The Hon. the Speaker: I know there has been a precedent and the Senate has sat beyond 12 o'clock. Can you provide me with some other authority? I will not be the one to detain you.

Senator Flynn: It was only with agreement that the Senate sat after 12 o'clock.

Senator Perrault: No, it was not.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Flynn: It is only by agreement. I have been here for 18 years.

Senator McIlraith: No, no.

Senator Flynn: All right, Senator McIlraith, you tell me when.

Senator McIlraith: I will give you the authority.

Senator Flynn: I was not here then.

Senator McIlraith: You asked me a question and I am trying to answer it.

Senator Flynn: You answer it.

Senator McIlraith: I will answer it in accordance with the established practice that has always been sought to be followed in this chamber and in the other place. I will answer your questions.

Senator Flynn: They will applaud you in advance even if you are going to be wrong.

Senator McIlraith: I thank you for your courtesy in allowing me to answer your question. I wish you could restrain your feelings in order to observe the ordinary decencies of debate.

Senator Flynn: There is something other than decency of debate. There is decency of behaviour on the part of the majority here.

Senator McIlraith: I do not accept the principle that—

Senator Flynn: I do accept that. You accept to follow the Leader of the Government.

Senator Hicks: Order, order!

Senator McIlraith: I accept and seek to conduct myself properly and honourably in this chamber, and I expect others to do the same.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator McIlraith: The question asked me is one that I shall seek to answer, if I can.

Senator Flynn: Try your best.

Senator McIlraith: That is what I propose to do. Rule 1 of the Rules of the Senate states:

> 1. In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

The practice well established and regularly and frequently used in the House of Commons is that when a sitting begins on a day—and the most recent example is last week where the question was put on this very matter that is before us, it was put between the hours of one and two a.m. on Friday—the date remains the same as the day on which the sitting started, namely, Thursday, October 23. If honourable senators will look at the practice and the dozens and dozens of precedents there, they will find that the proceedings are always carried under that date. You will see that right in House of Commons Hansard of October 23.

Senator Flynn: Come on!

Senator McIlraith: The proceedings are dated Thursday, October 23.

Senator Flynn: Do you mean the House of Commons Debates?

Senator McIlraith: Yes.

Senator Flynn: Those are not our rules.

Senator McIlraith: Just a minute. Let me make my statement. Perhaps I am right, perhaps I am wrong, but I think I have the right to put the proposition in answer to the question you asked me. Of that I am sure. We will find that in the margin of the debates of the other place the hours are stated. You will find that, for instance, on page 4051 of Hansard of the House of Commons for Thursday, October 23, 1980, that the time indicated is 0110, which means 10 minutes after 1 on Friday morning.

Senator Flynn: What does that prove?

Senator McIlraith: I have sat in the other place until daylight, yet the proceedings were carried from the day before. That is the custom and useage of the House of Commons. As provided for in Rule 1 of the Rules of the Senate, that is the rule which governs here, clearly. I am sure there are enough former members of the House of Commons who could repeat instance after instance after instance of days on which we sat continuously without any motion to sit continuously or anything else, but just by an extension of the time with a motion only to dispense with the adjournment at 10 o'clock under their rules. That is the authority for the proposition, and it is very clear. There are many, many precedents for it. I myself was through many of those over my 33 years in the other place.

Senator Choquette: That's why you sound so tired.

Senator McIlraith: If my honourable friends opposite feel it is appropriate that we adjourn at this hour, which they suggest, and quite properly so, I do not see why they withhold the right to sit at a reasonable hour tomorrow morning, which I would consider to be 10 o'clock. I invite them to consider what conclusion will be drawn from that in terms of whether they are wishing to get on with the debate on this very important subject and put their views before the Senate, or whether there is some other reason behind their lack of consent in this regard.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might make a brief comment on that. I will neither be long nor provocative.

The point made by Senator Roblin that we have worked hard today and have much more to do tomorrow prompts me to suggest that perhaps we should talk in terms of meeting at 11 o'clock tomorrow and sit from 11 o'clock to 1 p.m., and then come back at 2 o'clock.

I am trying to strike some kind of blend, bearing in mind Senator Roblin's point that we are tired and we still have lots of work to do and the desire to get a good early start at it.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend. I think he is trying to arrive at a reasonable position here, and I will see what I can do to help him.

It is obvious that some of our tempers are getting a little short, which is only to be expected. Certainly, we do not want that situation to be exacerbated. I would suggest that we continue the debate now until 1 a.m. and then meet again at 1 p.m.

Senator Flynn: Might I inquire of the deputy leader how many members on the other side have indicated a desire to speak, and may I, at the same time, remind the deputy leader that our suggestion to have the vote on Monday is to allow as many senators as possible to be here for the vote.

Senator Olson: They could be here now.

Senator Flynn: That is right, but I think our attendance on this side is better than on your side.

You have to be reasonable in these things. I have not yet had explained to me what the difference is between holding the vote on Saturday, as desired by the deputy leader, and having it on Monday evening.

We were prepared to give an undertaking that the vote would take place at a given hour, as is done in the other place, thereby allowing members to be there at the proper time and to register their votes. To my mind, it is important to have as full representation as possible when it comes to the vote on this particular motion.

Over the course of the debate today there have been objections to many of our amendments. In the normal course of events, they would have been voted down in no time. We would not have lost as much time as we did with the division bells, and so on.

I know that you have the numbers; I know that you have the strength. But just give in a little bit and try to be reasonable. That is all we are asking.

Senator Roblin: Could I suggest that we accept the proposition that we meet at 11 o'clock, provided we rise at 12 and then come back again at 2. How would that suit the situation?

Senator Frith: I think that is reasonable, and we should leave it at that. I do not think I should make any other comment or indeed that anybody should make any further comment tonight. But where does the debate stand at the moment? We have a motion to adjourn the debate on the amendment?

Senator Flynn: The motion in amendment presented by Senator Donahoe is before the house. So I think you just have to move, with leave, that the house do adjourn until tomorrow morning. As I say, you have to move with leave and we will give you leave. But you have to revert to Notices of Motions.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motion:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, October 31, 1980, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

I should put on the record that we are going to sit only until 12 o'clock and then rise and come back at 2 o'clock.

Senator Roblin: That is a reasonable arrangement, and I thank my honourable friend for his co-operation.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That ten Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;

That the Committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980.

That the quorum of the Committee be twelve members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly; and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Donahoe, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, that the motion be amended by deleting the second paragraph thereof and substituting the following therefor:

"That fifteen Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;".

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, October 31, 1980

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Canadian Film Development Corporation, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 20 of the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act, Chapter C-8, R.S.C., 1970.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENT OF ALBERTA

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Is the minister able to indicate to the Senate if new negotiations are contemplated between either Mr. Lalonde and Mr. Leitch, or alternatively between the Prime Minister and Premier Lougheed, in connection with the energy policy of the federal government to which the western provinces are so clearly opposed?

• (1105)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, yes, the federal government is considering today what form the negotiations will take, and, indeed, when the negotiations can resume on an energy package. Of course, this is in compliance with the statement of the Minister of Energy and with the statement of the Minister of Finance when he delivered his budget—namely, that we are not only anxious to resume negotiations in a real way but if the negotiations reach an agreement requiring some modification of the budgetary proposals, that will be done.

I am sure the honourable senator realizes that several times in his public address last night Premier Lougheed also called for further negotiations, and that, if they were to culminate in an agreement, he would withdraw from the action he contemplates recommending to the legislature.

It would appear, therefore, that in the negotiations both sides are indicating that they want to reach agreement on all these points. It is certainly hoped that that can be worked out in the next few days.

OIL SHORTAGES—PRECAUTIONARY MEASURES

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. Does the government intend to attempt to negotiate the purchase of additional stocks of offshore oil as a precautionary measure to guard against any temporary shortages which might result from the proposed cutbacks in Alberta production which were announced by Premier Lougheed yesterday?

Hon H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it would be premature to reach that decision, or indeed to announce that negotiations are underway, because in the first place the restrictions on or cutbacks in production, which appear to amount to 5 per cent after 90 days' notice, would not take effect until 90 days from now, in any event, according to what Premier Lougheed has said.

In addition to that, the inventories of oil in Canada are at a high level. Therefore, it would appear that it is not an immediate, urgent problem. Moreover, as I said a few minutes ago, the Premier of Alberta has indicated that, if there was any shortage which would deny sufficient supplies to Canadians anywhere in the market that they serve, he would lift the restrictions to accommodate that shortage.

• (1110)

Senator Balfour: A further supplementary for the honourable the minister: I am sure he observed that over the past two days the value of energy stocks on the Toronto Stock Exchange has declined by approximately $5.6 billion from their listed value prior to the budget announcement. Despite the assurances of the minister responsible for economic development, in response to questions last Wednesday that the policies enunciated in the budget would stimulate energy exploration, it would appear that the former shareholders of those companies disagree with him.

Would the minister indicate if the government had anticipated that the stock market would decline so precipitously in the aftermath of the budget, and could he tell us if the government is reconsidering some of its measures so that investment in energy will be dissuaded from leaving Canada, so that energy self-sufficiency can again be added to the list of national priorities?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, to answer the last part of the question first, the determination of the government, as a high priority, to reach self-sufficiency on crude oil production has not changed. It was, it is and will be a high priority for all of this decade to get to that position as rapidly as it is physically and financially possible.

As to the other part of the question, to anticipate what might happen one way or the other in the stock market, I expect that whenever there is a new policy, whether it is in the energy field or any other major sector of the economy—or even in the area of monetary and finance—the market reacts sometimes one way, sometimes another way, until it settles down on the basis of a better understanding of what is in the totality of the package.

We have already acknowledged that it is a large and, I suppose, a comprehensive and even complex national energy package. The indications are that a number of investors—not only on this side of the border but also on the other side—are not fully informed as to what the consequences might be, and perhaps they are overreacting. That is not the first time that has happened, and it certainly will not be the last, until they fully understand what the changes are and, indeed, do an assessment of what the consequences may be over time.

I do not withdraw from the statement I made the other day that inside the component parts of that package are many enriched incentives for Canadian-owned and controlled companies. I believe the market may take a completely different attitude after it has studied those component parts and fully understand what they mean.

OIL—UNCONVENTIONAL SOURCES—PROVINCIAL ROYALTIES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I also address a question on the oil situation to the Minister of State for Economic Development? I gathered from the statement by the Premier of Alberta last night that he will again be looking at certain of the projected plants in respect of unconventional sources of oil. I believe he said that he would be looking at the question of provincial royalties in respect to them.

Is my honourable friend able to tell us which of the projected unconventional oil projects are affected by that statement?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, no, I cannot state that specifically, but I would expect that there are two tar sands processing plants. One is commonly known as Alsands. There is another proposal that is well known but which I do not believe has reached the stage of a formal commitment to go ahead—one that is supported by Petro-Canada, Nova, an Alberta Corporation, and several other interested parties.

• (1115)

I expect also—I stand to be corrected on this, because I do not know for sure—that perhaps the Esso resources plant, or project, at Cold Lake may be held in abeyance.

I have to say that we, as the federal government, are dismayed that Alberta has decided to hold in abeyance decisions on these oil sands projects, because some of the offers that have been made public, including one of $38 per barrel, plus escalation, appear to us to be attractive. We believe that the program is such that it would have made these projects economically viable. I therefore hope that the provincial government will reconsider this, and that that might be one aspect of the package we could agree on and get started on without interruption until these projects come on stream, because in our opinion they hold the greatest potential for supplying the deficiency in the Canadian oil supply, bringing us to self-sufficiency some time in this decade.

Senator Roblin: I am rather surprised to hear the minister say he is dismayed, because surely when he and his colleagues were calculating the effects of their moves in the oil and natural gas business they paid some attention to the position placed on the record by the Government of Alberta as to their possible reaction to the sort of policy my honourable friends are pursuing. I should have expected that the least they would have done was to have taken that into account in their calculations. So where the dismay comes in, I do not know.

I would ask my honourable friend, however, when he gets the information as to which of these plants are in question, he might give the house a statement as to the quantity of oil that is expected to be produced by each, so that we may have some way of assessing its impact on the goal of self-sufficiency by the end of this decade.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, some of that information is available now. The Cold Lake plant, with the enhanced steam injection technology that it was proposed to use there, is projected to produce about 140,000 barrels a day when it comes on stream, if it comes on stream, in 1986 and 1987. I think the oil sands plant is another of about the same size in terms of output. There are also several in the Lloydminster area on both sides of the provincial border that could come on stream within the next three to five years, and of course escalate over time to perhaps 75,000 to 100,000 barrels a day.

The potential of the pilot project in Peace River, where there is already about $80 million invested in not only research but experimentation to find out how those sands would respond to heat injection technology, is not known at this point. Certainly the size of that project, although there is a huge deposit, is not even projected by the company involved. They know how much they can get from each one of the components of the pilot project, but how many would go into production is something that has yet to be determined.

In any event, it is anticipated that the major portion of the deficit we have now, and of the amount we have to make up in view of the decline in the conventional oil flow, would come from these synthetic oil plants, and that is why I say we are dismayed. We believe that these projects should be a high priority for both governments. We believe also that we have already demonstrated that the construction of these projects should get under way so that they are brought on in time to make up for these deficits.

• (1120)

Senator Roblin: I was rather surprised to hear my honourable friend say that he has already demonstrated his interest, because up until the time of the budget the big hold-up regarding all those plants was knowing what the price was going to be and what the federal government's policy was going to be. Now we know its policy, although it comes at a very late stage in the day, and we find it results in this confrontation.

I hope my friend will do more than express his dismay in this matter and get busy negotiating with the Province of Alberta to do something about it. After all, the Premier of Alberta did invite renewed negotiations quite recently, and I would like to know from my honourable friend when he expects to take him up on it.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, one statement which I made, and which is not a new one, seems to have gone right by my honourable friend, and that is that the federal government indicated several weeks ago, and, indeed affirmed in the budget, that it was willing to accept a high price, starting in 1980, of $38 per barrel for the synthetic crude that comes out of all those plants. Up until less than a month ago that price was in excess of the projected requirements to take care of the capital investment and the operational costs of those projects.

I think it is grossly unfair for my honourable friend to suggest that we have not made known that we are not only vitally interested in promoting those plants but also that we have taken some positive steps to make sure that there is sufficient incentive to go ahead and make the investments.

Senator Roblin: If the $38 a barrel which was previously offered to these companies is adequate, why is my honourable friend now offering $38 plus the inflationary mark-up?

Senator Olson: No, that is wrong. The offer has always been $38 plus escalation based on the inflationary factor.

Senator Roblin: Then why has nothing happened?

Senator Olson: Because the Alberta government has indicated that it will hold these plants in abeyance until such time as all the other parts of the energy package are complete. That, in my view, is the part that we are dismayed at. We think we can negotiate on many other things, but, if we can agree on that one item, it seems to me that it would be good for Alberta and for Canada to get ahead with negotiations.

Senator Roblin: That leads me to the question I raised earlier to which I did not get an answer: When will the minister be meeting with the Province of Alberta?

Senator Olson: As soon as we have those dates settled. Obviously, that is another matter that has to be agreed to by Alberta, since we hope they will come to the meeting. I will let the honourable senator know.

CROWN CORPORATIONS—APPLICATION OF PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. It is in regard to the new petroleum and gas revenue tax which will be set at the rate of 8 per cent on net operating revenue. The national energy program suggested that this will be charged to private companies and public sector business enterprises that derive income from oil and gas production. Will this tax apply to crown corporations such as PetroCan and SaskOil?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I believe that is a correct interpretation, although I will refer the question to the Department of Finance and to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to obtain a more detailed and precise answer.

Senator Steuart: As a supplementary, at the same time could the minister inquire whether the department has had a legal opinion in respect to the legality of the federal government's position, since the Premier of Saskatchewan has indicated that if this tax is imposed on crown corporations he will go to court?

Senator Olson: I will include that as part of the question which I took as notice. I think my honourable friend realizes that the federal government does not believe that there was anything illegal in the budget.

Senator Roblin: May I ask a supplementary question on this matter of taxation of crown corporations? The budget proposes, as I understand it, that the federal government will tax, or attempt to tax, provincial crown corporations. Would the federal government be willing to have the provinces tax federal crown corporations?

• (1125)

Senator Olson: I always get a little nervous when I get into these legal arguments, because I have never professed to have the great knowledge, for example, of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in these matters, but there is one point that ought to be taken into account here. I am not sure that it is a tax on crown corporations or the profits of crown corporations. I think it is a throughput tax on gas and oil, and whether a crown corporation or a private company handles that throughput seems to raise a slightly different question than has been raised here.

Senator Roblin: I suggest to my honourable friend that sales tax is also a throughput tax, and that is a tax which is not charged by one government against another. Further, I suggest to my honourable friend that I am not really asking a legal question but a policy question. Would it be the policy of the federal government to accept taxation of federal crown corporations and similar bodies by provinces?

Senator Olson: I can answer that question because it is asked in general terms, but your earlier question was more specific—that is, the proposed 8 per cent tax on the throughput of gas and oil, even though it was handled by a crown corporation. I will get an answer to that question.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend, and I hope he will also get an answer to the general proposition I put to him, which I think is a matter of government policy that ought to be explicated in the house.

PROPOSED TAX ON NATURAL GAS—FEDERAL REVENUE

Hon. Duff Roblin: Turning to another topic, but directing this question to the same minister, it is estimated that the new natural gas tax will bring into the federal treasury $1,300 million in 1981-82, if that is the correct figure. My question to the minister is; What portion of this amount will come from the tax on gas exports, and what portion from the tax on gas that is consumed domestically? I presume that calculation is available to the Minister of Finance.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I presume it is too, but, of course, it would have to be based on the ratio of historical volume. Certainly, the tax is intended to apply to all gas in Canada, and it will be levied at the distributor level across the country. On the amount of that gas going through the distributors' hands, whether it is destined for Canadian or export consumption, the tax will be levied at the same rate. So the amount in the export would, of course, be the ratio of the totality that goes into the export market, but I will get the precise figures.

ENERTECH CANADA LTD.—MARKETING OF ENERGY-RELATED EQUIPMENT

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question of a non-legal nature for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Yesterday in Winnipeg the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy announced the formation of a new crown corporation, I believe, Enertech Canada Ltd., and listed—I confess to you, Mr. Minister, that I have not seen the release, but I have seen a newspaper account—as one of its functions the marketing of certain energy equipment to be used either in connection with renewable energy or in conservation technology. Can the minister indicate to us, if it has been established, whether this new crown corporation will be marketing products which are currently sold anywhere in Canada by private Canadian business?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice, inasmuch as neither one of us has seen the details. It would be well to have a look at that, and then get the answer from the minister responsible for PetroCan and Enertech.

Senator Asselin: Was it not decided in cabinet?

Senator Olson: Well, there are a lot of things decided in cabinet, but my honourable friend knows even better than I do, because his government observed the practice more stringently than we do, that one minister does not make announcements on behalf of another minister.

• (1130)

Senator Asselin: You don't know what is going on in the cabinet.

TRANSPORT

AIR CANADA—TARIFFS BETWEEN MAJOR CANADIAN CITIES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development or for the Leader of the Government. The question relates to a question I had on the order paper regarding increases in Air Canada fares. I was astounded to learn that over the past 10 years the fare from Ottawa to Toronto has gone up 300 per cent; the fare from Ottawa to Montreal has gone up 400 per cent; and the fare between Ottawa and St. John's, Newfoundland, has gone up 100 per cent.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government could investigate these exorbitant increases. Air Canada brags about making money, so it appears that it just taxes the Canadian taxpayer when it likes. It just increases its fares any time it likes. This is a ridiculous situation and should be investigated. Could the leader look into this on an urgent basis?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice. I am sure Senator Marshall is aware that all prices and schedules are approved by the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission. The fares are not made up by Parliament or the federal cabinet. However, as I said, the information will be obtained.

PUBLIC WORKS

GROS CACOUNA, QUEBEC—HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Since 1962, in my area in Quebec, that is Gros Cacouna, near Rivière-du-Loup, every four years the Liberal candidate gets elected as the member of Parliament for Kamouraska-Rivière-du-Loup by promising that the federal government will spend more money to develop the port of Gros Cacouna, and because of that, since then, the federal government has invested over $30 million in a port which is not being used.

The extension of a gas pipeline from Quebec to the maritimes is now being considered. The building of facilities for a liquified gas port is also being considered. Will the government build this port in Gros Cacouna to get a return on its investments made with the taxpayers' money and which, as I said earlier, amounts to $30 million since 1962?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am sure that Senator Asselin would not expect me to agree that great amounts of money have been invested in a port that has no use. I do not think he would feel very comfortable going into a community and telling people that, either.

Senator Asselin: I have already done that.

Senator Olson: Perhaps he has. Perhaps that is why his candidates cannot be elected. In any event, as far as the substance of the question is concerned, and without the opinion expressed as to whether it will be used for some other purpose described in the question, I shall make some inquiries.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary. Can the minister obtain further information? Have the officials of his department met with their Quebec counterparts to inquire into the possibility of extending the pipeline, inasmuch, of course, as the Quebec environment and agricultural zoning regulations allow it?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am sure that the officials from Environment Canada and, indeed, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources have this kind of consultation, although I do not know who is involved or the dates. If I understand my friend correctly, he asked if officials from my department have been in there, and I think I can safely say that they have not. The officials of my department do not get into the business of looking into matters like that. The departments responsible do it.

• (1135)

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Well, as the establishment of that liquefied gas port in Gros Cacouna harbour is a very important issue for Quebec, could the minister assure us that within a week he will make a ministerial statement concerning the establishment of the methanol harbour of Gros Cacouna?

[English]

Senator Olson: I shall make inquiries about that.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NUCLEAR FUSION RESEARCH

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On October 6 last, the government leader provided a delayed reply to a question that I had asked on July 15 concerning Canada's participation in nuclear fusion research. I decided to wait until after the budget before drawing to the attention of the Senate some of the alarming admissions contained in that response. I did so in the hope that the budget would provide scientific allocations of government moneys to ensure Canadian participation in this most critical and worthwhile international venture.

Seeing no such indication, I would draw to the attention of the Leader of the Government the following quotations from his response—and I quote first from page 801 of Hansard of October 6:

> Although it is not possible now to estimate realistically the costs of fusion power systems, whether imported in toto or with significant contributions by Canadian industry, the impact of total dependence on foreign technology can be assessed.
> Failure to mount a minimal program of fusion R/D sufficient to secure access to a significant portion of fusion technology developed in other countries would probably mean Canada would eventually have to import fusion reactor systems with only limited participation by Canadian industry, mainly in low technology areas. The resultant inability of Canadian industry to contribute significantly to the high-technology content of fusion power systems could greatly increase the overall costs to Canada of acquiring fusion power systems. It will be possible to make realistic estimates of those increased costs once the engineering concepts of future fusion power systems are more fully established.
> If Canada does not participate to a significant extent in fusion research our access to the detailed knowledge of fusion technology developments in other countries will become increasingly restricted. Work on fusion in other countries is already moving from the research phase to the engineering phase and the knowledge related to engineering and technological developments is tending to be restricted to the various national programs of fusion development or to those countries who collaborate in major international programs on fusion developments.

I want to underline the next part of that response—and this is important:

> In the last two years there have been several instances where Canada's ability to access the fusion developments in other countries, and our representation on international organizations concerned with fusion R/D, has been limited because of the absence of a Canadian program of fusion R/D which is seen to be of significance on an international scale.
>
> Indications have been received by officials of the National Research Council, from representatives of the U.S. and Japanese governments and from the International Energy Agency, that Canadian participation in research on fusion would be welcomed. Some small collaborative research programs are in place now and the opportunities for larger collaborative programs in specific research areas have been discussed. The possibilities of pursuing these larger collaborative opportunities are dependent on a decision by Canada to support a national program of fusion R/D.

• (1140)

I hope that honourable senators have understood why I had to read what I have read. My question is this: Would the government leader assure us, given the frank acknowledgment of the importance but yet the lack of a Canadian commitment to fusion research embodied in that response, that we can expect an early and affirmative commitment on the part of this government to renew Canada's full status in this important international scientific community.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, before the leader replies to that question, I missed some of it and I wonder if Senator Yuzyk would repeat it.

Senator Yuzyk: I think I will allow you to read it on page 801 of Hansard.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): All honourable senators know Senator Yuzyk well enough to know that he would be pleased to read again any sections which were not audible to some honourable senators.

Early in his remarks Senator Yuzyk said that he was disappointed that reference to fusion research was not contained in the budget speech. I know that Senator Yuzyk, based upon his long experience in Parliament, is aware that a Speech from the Throne or a budget presentation cannot hope to cover all areas of significance and importance to the Canadian people. However, the question will be taken as notice. But I do want to provide the assurance that Canada is very much committed to nuclear research.

All honourable senators are aware that we must find energy alternatives in this country. That challenge faces the entire world, and Canada is very much involved. Hopefully, a more complete response can be provided.

Senator Yuzyk: We are very much interested in the reply, and I hope that we will receive it a little sooner than the reply I received to the question I put on July 15.

Senator Perrault: It may not be necessary to provide a reply as long as the one quoted by Senator Yuzyk.

Senator Yuzyk: It may have to be, because I think it is a very important matter.

POST OFFICE

THE BUDGET—INCREASED LEVIES

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourables senators, I should like to ask a question based upon the still proliferating fall-out from Tuesday's budget. I was very distressed to hear the suggestions that in an extension of the user-pay policy combined with the development of the crown corporation policy for the Post Office, that instead of deficits we would have exorbitant levies on the users of the Post Office. Some of our leading economists have suggested that the price of the 17-cent stamp will go up to 51 cents in 1981. It's a shocking thing to have to pay three times more for a stamp, whereas if you are in the business of racing pigeons you can get the harness in now without customs tariff. I would like to have the Leader of the Government answer as to whether or not the people of Canada are headed for such a licking as they are going to get in that stamp price boost.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we are determined to stamp out deficits. One of the objectives the government has in its move towards the establishment of a crown corporation is not necessarily to foist exorbitant increases on the Canadian people, but rather to attempt to make the postal services in this country substantially more efficient. That does not necessarily mean that achieving greater levels of efficiency will necessitate what the honourable senator has described, in his very descriptive language, as very exorbitant increases.

Senator Macquarrie: I thank the minister and I commend him. That is pretty sharp, that "stamp out" business, after a long night. I am glad I directed my question to him rather than to the Minister of State for Economic Development, who tripped all over his javelin when he was jousting with Senator Asselin a few moments ago.

Can we get the assurance that the people of Canada are not in fact headed for a real heist in the "stamp tax" of 1981.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator is quite correct, of course, that there has been an upward spiral in postal costs not only in Canada but in many other countries. The government is determined to attempt to provide quality postal services at a moderate cost to Canadians. I know that that is an objective that the honourable senator supports fully.

Senator Phillips: May I ask a supplementary question? I observe the ardent support given by the Leader of the Government in the Senate for the budget measures providing for certain benefits for pigeons. Does this indicate that the Honourable Leader of the Government intends to fly the coop?

Senator Perrault: There is no such possibility, honourable senators, and I trust that the honourable senator is not suggesting or inferring in any way that the budget presented the other evening is entirely for the birds.

Senator Flynn: Not entirely?

Senator Perrault: I meant to say that this great budget is designed to alleviate many problems and to assist many initiatives, programs, and worthwhile endeavours in this country, and it is not confined to the concerns cited by Senator Phillips. I am not aware of the details of any new racing pigeon regulations, but certainly I shall refer to them in the budget papers.

ENERGY

THE BUDGET—TAX ON HEATING OIL

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, the budget potentially raises the distinct possibility that home heating fuel will increase by up to 75 cents a gallon by 1983. This is a very serious matter because it places an enormous burden on the backs of the very poor and the very old. I prefer not to get an answer at this time in terms of the 18-cents-a-gallon tax projected for gasoline, because most of the people I am talking about don't own eight-cylinder motor cars. They have little space heaters in their kitchens, and they are trying to keep alive in the small coves and hamlets through a long, cold winter. I wonder if there is any anticipation of finding some relief for these people.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, Senator Doody will already be aware that one of the first actions this government took was to increase the guaranteed income supplement. That was done last spring. We did that in such a way that it did not add to the deficit, and there were some taxes introduced to pay for that. I think the honourable senator would agree that action has been taken in advance with respect to the substance of the question he asked.

• (1150)

Senator Doody: I appreciate the answer, honourable sir, but the statistical fact of the matter is that almost 40 per cent of that $35 has already been chewed up in increases in the cost of fuel. Surely they are not all that much ahead in terms of the GIS as it now stands. Something more substantial, surely, has to be done.

It is highly dramatic to give a $35 increase in the GIS, but it is a great deal more insidious to take it back again through a budgetary tax on home heating oil. Perhaps the minister could address himself to that.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is a well-known fact, an accepted fact across this country, that the government that is in office now has given much higher priority to its social conscience requirements than the government that was in there temporarily for a few months.

Senator Doody: May I suggest that the government that is in power now should have a much more tender social conscience: You keep rising to defend it, and do so in terms of the budget of the previous administration. Surely the honourable minister and his colleagues have been in office long enough now to stand on their own feet and to stand on their own statistics, their own programs, their own ambitions. They should not really keep running back to the Crosbie budget for justification of their own modes and manners.

THE BUDGET—PROVISIONS RESPECTING OIL AND NATURAL GAS—EFFECT ON OFFSHORE DEVELOPMENT

Hon. C. William Doody: Would the Minister of State for Economic Development be kind enough to give me some information on the proposed Canada oil and gas act in relation to offshore development? My calculations up to now indicate to me that under this new system the federal government's increase through the crown corporation in the Hibernia project can come to almost 44 per cent of the holdings of that operation. Can the minister indicate what plans, if any, have been made to compensate the private investors who put their hundreds of millions of dollars into these shares in anticipation of receiving a return on them for that high risk money? And it is very high risk money.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, honourable senators, I will give an undertaking to obtain a more detailed and technical reply to that. My honourable friend should not forget, however, that there is a significant investment in that, both in terms of tax expenditures by the federal Treasury and in terms of Petro-Canada.

Senator Doody: I appreciate the fact that Petro-Canada has a very large involvement now. I was wondering, to use the word that the minister uses from time to time, what the totality of their investment might be as we go further down the road.

Senator Olson: That information is available to you.

Senator Doody: Will it also involve the potential of the 44 per cent ownership? I am interested in the total amount of money that they will have invested.

Senator Olson: I have already taken that part of the question as notice.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Doody: Thank you. Another facet to that situation, which should perhaps be explored, is that as we approach now the 43¾ per cent mark of federal involvement in the Hibernia project, it seems to me that the federal government is coming close to obtaining control of that offshore development through another route, rather than through the negotiation stage or even through the court stage.

Has the Government of Canada consulted with the Government of Newfoundland in opening up this new avenue of federal control? It seems to me that, if this has not been done, it will set further back the unfortunate situation we have there now in terms of confusion in ownership versus the investors.

Senator Olson: Yes, I think so. I will get a more detailed reply, but I think there were extensive negotiations going on for a number of years and perhaps even more intensively during the past few months, leading up to what would, hopefully, have been an agreement on constitutional change. That is taking place between the federal government and the Government of Newfoundland. I think my honourable friend realizes, too, that at the initiation of some parties involved in that debate or the negotiations were also taken to the media. Perhaps that serves some useful purpose, but we don't believe it does. We think we should negotiate it directly.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, last evening, or actually this morning, we agreed that we would adjourn at twelve and reassemble at two o'clock. I would suggest, if we want to follow that agreement strictly, that we adjourn during pleasure now to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately two o'clock this afternoon. However, if you would prefer to finish the Question Period now, the ministers are in the house and will stay.

That was our understanding. I want to make it clear that we intend to honour it. What is the opposition's wish?

Senator Marshall: Let the ministers go to lunch.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I think we might as well proceed as we said we would. Before we adjourn for lunch, however, may I ask the Leader of the Government if he would consider seriously the possibility of having the Senate sit this afternoon until six o'clock and then adjourn until Monday, either at ten o'clock in the morning, if he wishes, or at two o'clock in the afternoon. The vote could then be taken Monday night before ten o'clock. That would provide for a more orderly debate and for more senators to be present when the final vote is taken.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: May I suggest that the leader think about it during lunch. I would want him to take that suggestion under advisement.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, all constructive options will be considered. However, I think most senators would agree that the debate has been proceeding in a very orderly way and some excellent speeches have been proceeding in a very orderly way and some excellent speeches have been made. There will be many opportunities for honourable senators to debate during the balance of the day.

At this time, the option discussed by the Leader of the Opposition is not under active consideration at this time by the government.

Senator Flynn: Is now or is not?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I suggest that we adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately two o'clock this afternoon.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 2.40 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think we should await the arrival of the Leader of the Government. I believe he has some interesting information to give the house.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government will be arriving in a few moments. In the meantime, perhaps honourable senators might wish to continue the debate or resume the Question Period.

Senator Flynn: I suggest that we await the arrival of the leader, unless the minister would like us to continue the Question Period.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, during the luncheon hour there have been a number of meetings and conversations with respect to the most appropriate manner for the Senate to consider, debate and to dispose of the motion before us. Those conversations have involved the two house leaders—the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition—and I should like to make a statement about an agreement achieved at those meetings.

It has been agreed that the Senate shall meet at the usual time of 2 p.m. on Monday afternoon and that a vote on the motion shall take place no later than 9 o'clock in the evening.

Insofar as today's sitting is concerned, it has been agreed that should honourable senators wish to participate in the debate, that opportunity will exist until 6 o'clock this evening, and, of course, in the case of the Monday sitting, until the vote on Monday.

It has been further agreed that the matter of the selection of senators to serve on the joint committee to consider the Constitution shall be discussed at such time as agreed upon by the Senate, including the possibility that the motion to appoint the senators may be dealt with following disposition by the Senate of the present motion on Monday evening.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I wish to confirm the agreement outlined by the Leader of the Government. I would even add something that he did not mention. We are prepared to forego the remainder of the Question Period today, and also on Monday, so that the only order of the day that would be dealt with until the vote is taken on Monday would be the motion respecting the Constitution proposal.

Senator Connolly: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the Leader of the Opposition? It has always been my understanding that it has been up to the two parties to decide on the appointment of senators to serve on any joint committee. I am not talking about the overall number, but the method of selection from both sides of the house. I have understood that this has been decided by the respective parties. Is there to be a departure from that procedure?

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Connolly: I do not object, if there is any reason for it. Is the usual practice to be followed?

Senator Perrault: The usual procedure will be followed. May I take the opportunity to note, as well, that the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government discussed the matter of substitutions on the joint committee that may be established. It has been agreed that for this committee, the rights of substitution that prevail in the other place, under their standing order 65(4)(b), would apply to Senate members of the committee. Of course, that will only become operative should the Senate decide to vote in favour of the motion before us.

• (1445)

Senator Smith: Perhaps the leader would not mind telling us the substance of that order he mentioned.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): May I answer the question?

Senator Smith: Of course.

Senator Frith: The appropriate House of Commons rule deals with the power of substitution in committees that exist in the other place, but not here. We will be dealing with a joint committee, and the members of the other place will have that right of substitution. The suggestion was made by Senator Flynn, and we readily agreed to it. I think it is a very valuable and useful one in the circumstances. Incidentally, we are not saying that this House of Commons rule is going to apply to us. It is simply the principle involved that will apply. The rule is as follows:

> (b) Changes in the membership of any standing, joint or special committee may be effected by a notification thereof, signed by the Member acting as the Chief Government Whip, being filed with the Clerk of the House who shall cause the same to be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of that sitting, or of the next sitting thereafter, as the case may be.

As you see, in practice it goes through the Whips. It seemed to us that if the other house had those rights for this committee the Senate should have them also.

Senator Lafond: The Senate is beginning to see the light. Hallelujah.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I wanted to say that I think all of us appreciate the opportunity to decide in this amicable way the procedures to be followed. So, we can look forward to a 6 o'clock adjournment this evening, and a resumption at 2 o'clock on Monday afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: So is it agreed, honourable senators, that the question be put on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault no later than nine o'clock p.m. on Monday next, and that the motion to appoint the senators to serve on the special joint committee be adopted before the adjournment of the Senate on that day or such other time agreed upon by the Senate?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRANSPORT

NEW AIR TERMINAL AT WHITEHORSE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to reply to a question asked by Senator Lucier, during Question Period on October 22, concerning the start of construction on the air terminal in Whitehorse.

I regret that I am unable to provide the honourable senator with a specific date for the start of construction at the Whitehorse air terminal. Transport Canada is in the process of developing design plans following consultations with the air lines using the terminal, and a further meeting with the airlines is expected in two or three weeks. Following that, there will have to be negotiations on rental rates charged to airlines, and Treasury Board approval of proposed expenditures. Only then will the department be in a position to look at a schedule for construction.

I have several other delayed answers, but I will forego giving them for now.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE MOTION IN AMENDMENT - DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

[Senator Frith.]

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That ten Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;

That the Committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the Committee be twelve members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly; and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Donahoe, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, that the motion be amended by deleting the second paragraph thereof and substituting the following therefor:

"That fifteen Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee".—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, during the lunch hour I prepared remarks to be made on the amendment. They were, as usual, I assure you, gems of wisdom, from hearing which I am sure honourable senators opposite would have profited greatly. However, in this new found spirit of co-operation, I will forego those remarks. Later I will speak on the main motion and this will allow us to dispose of the amendment which, by the way, I think, is an excellent one.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker: An amendment is moved by the Honourable Senator Donahoe, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, that the motion be amended by deleting the second paragraph thereof and substituting the following therefor:

> That fifteen Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;

Honourable senators, what is your desire?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Flynn: On division.

The Hon. the Speaker: Would those in favour please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Would those opposed please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it. I declare the motion in amendment defeated.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have never appreciated the support of a leader in a parliamentary assembly as much as I do now. I would not have known in the maze of the exchanges at what specific moment I should intervene in the debate on the motion now under consideration. At any rate, thanks to my leader, I think that I am really on the right track now and I will have to keep going as best I can.

Following the constitutional conference in September, that conference which will perhaps be known in history as the conference of visions and mirages, I imagine that we all made forecasts.

It is perhaps safe to assume that some were concerned about the steps which the premiers might take. However, most of us were interested in the direction taken by the Prime Minister of Canada after consultation with his cabinet colleagues, as was proper, and the members of his caucus, as was necessary, and as he had said he would do during the last meeting of the conference.

Senator Flynn: Consultation or information?

Senator Tremblay: When I said "as was proper and as was necessary" I thought I was making the relevant distinctions as far as both institutions are concerned.

What would the Prime Minister and his government do? After thinking it over and recovering his equanimity following the disillusions of the conference, would Mr. Trudeau accept the invitation made by Premier Lyon, as chairman of the premiers' conference, to carry on negotiations? Would he refuse to do so? Would he conclude that there was nothing more to achieve through either? And there remained only one avenue, that of a unilateral application from Ottawa to Great Britain?

• (1500)

Personally, against the advice of many, I had hoped up to the very last minute of the evening of Thursday October 2 that Mr. Trudeau would accept the invitation of the chairman of the premiers' conference to keep the negotiations going.

Knowing, however, that the Prime Minister had indicated on various occasions in the past that he would act unilaterally, I had not dismissed that possibility, no matter how unacceptable it seemed.

That is the reason why, on October 2, I was not surprised to learn that he had made up his mind to proceed in this way and to move in the House a resolution to that effect.

However, what would be the gist of this unilateral action proposed to Parliament? On this point, I must confess that I was amazed by the extensive changes which the resolution proposed to the Canadian federation and our present Constitution. I could never have imagined that the Prime Minister would go quite so far.

Not only is the patriation scheme a daring show of strength against the provinces, because of its unilateral nature, but it is truly a coup d'état through the changes it will bring about in our federal system. At the same time, its purpose is to bring about substantial changes in the present sharing of jurisdiction. I intend today to deal with these three aspects.

First of all, I will deal with the sectorial changes which are included in the government's project. Then, I will deal with the radical changes it is likely to bring in our federal system. Finally, I will deal with the implications, both for the present and the future, of this proposed unilateral action.

As far as the substantial changes which are provided for in the Constitutional Act 1980 are concerned, it may be a little too early to talk about significant changes in Parts II and III. Some honourable senators, including Senator Argue, have emphasized the fact that Part II would enshrine the principle of equalization payments, thereby giving it a sort of constitutional warranty, while it is nothing now but a current practice. I looked up equalization in Section 31, and I only found mention of it in the title of Part II. That part of the proposed resolution deserves reading. Part II is entitled: "Equalization and Regional Disparities".

The only section contained under Part II reads as follows:

> 31. (1) Without altering the legislative authority of Parliament or of the provincial legislatures, or the rights of any of them with respect to the exercise of their legislative authority. Parliament and the legislatures, together with the government of Canada and the provincial governments, are committed to
> (a) promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians;

(b) furthering economic development to reduce disparity in opportunities; and

(c) providing essential public services of reasonable quality to all Canadians.

One cannot but agree with those generous and pure intentions. However, under subsection (2), where one should or expects to find equalization clearly introduced and explained, its intentions set forth, one reads:

(2) Parliament and the government of Canada are committed to taking such measures as are appropriate to ensure that provinces are able to provide the public services referred to in paragraph (1)(c)— which I have just read . . .

—without imposing an undue burden of provincial taxation.

Senator Frith: "The essential public services".

Senator Asselin: You say "essential"?

Senator Tremblay: Did you forget a word?

Senator Frith: "Essential public services". You forgot the word "essential".

Senator Tremblay: Does it really matter in the context of the remarks I am making? Of course, if I have skipped it unconsciously, I thank you for reminding me of the word I did not skip intentionally. You will see, as I go along that it was not deliberate.

Senator Frith: If we are paying attention on this side, it is only to reassure you.

Senator Tremblay: I am very moved by the very careful attention which is paid to me.

Senator Asselin: It is to their advantage.

Senator Tremblay: Furthermore, I am not blaming anybody. I hope I will be as thorough in the analysis I will try to make.

A mention of equalization in that paragraph was expected. But no! Equalization is characterized by annual payments which tend to transform equalization into provincial revenue. The reason for equalization is given but not the essential requirement. It is presented only under a negative aspect, namely to avoid an undue burden of provincial taxation. Perhaps it refers to equalization payments which would enable provinces to avoid an undue taxation burden. But why not say it directly? It is in that sense that equalization payments should have been referred to.

I know that someone might object that a constitutional text should not include calculation techniques. The expression "equalization payments of provincial revenue" does not call upon technique but on the very principle and on the fundamental requirement defining equalization.

It is in that sense that, as I said earlier, I found the word equalization only in the title of Part II. I tried to find it in the text but I did not.

We see virtually the same thing, perhaps in a more meaningful way, when we try to find the substance in Part III, dealing pompously with constitutional conferences. If section 32 read like this:

a constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once in every year unless, in any year, a majority of those composing the conference decide that it shall not be held.

the proposed Constitution would create a new federative institution which could be very significant. But no, the section begins like this:

Until Part V comes into force—

The constitutional conferences will therefore be held over a period of two, maybe four years—which is really very short—depending on the events which may occur during that period. Ironically enough, they will cease to exist under the terms of the Constitution itself as soon as an amending formula is established or as soon as it is possible to start the true and final global reform of the Constitution. I confess that I do not understand the logic or the rationale involved here.

But the proposal contains other parts which do have some substance. For instance, the part about the Charter of Fundamental Rights and Liberties.

That is obviously the pièce de résistance of the proposal in terms of constitutional changes. The Charter does indeed fundamentally change the Constitution. It changes it to the extent that it substantially affects the exercise of power by the two levels of government and even the division of power. I do not wish, at this point, to analyze the merits of the Charter in terms of what it does and does not contain. It has come to my mind however that ever since the publication of the proposal, several commentators have indicated those omissions. Would the preamble to this document be, to quote a political leader from Quebec, merely a first draft?

Among the changes, we must also note, of course, the changes made to the Senate's powers in terms of constitutional amendments, that is section 44. Senator Flynn and several other colleagues, not only on this side but also on the government side, have forcefully expressed their objection to this change.

● (1510)

Despite the peremptory statements made by some government spokesmen to the effect that the changes do not affect the system as such, that the government's proposal is aimed mainly at patriating the Constitution and severing our colonial ties with Great Britain, that the proposed changes do not affect the relationship between the two levels of government nor the balance of their respective powers but concern only the rights and freedoms of the people, the proposal does indeed contain substantial changes such as those I have just mentioned. It also contains even more radical changes for our federal system, of which I will speak later.

I want to indicate that the fact that this is done at this time and under the guise of patriation, under the pretext of severing our colonial ties, constitutes—as this has been indicated several times by the Leader of the Official Opposition in the House of Commons and by the deputy leader of our party in this place, Senator Roblin—a shameless exploitation of those very colonial ties. For all Canadians such an endeavour in London to solve problems which concern Canadians exclusively and which they can very well solve themselves here in this country, within their own institutions, is deeply humiliating.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Tremblay: But, for our counterparts in the Parliament of Westminster, that endeavour on our part is, to my mind, improper.

How can anyone indeed imagine that the British Parliament would consider as a simple formality the adoption of the bill proposed to them? Honourable senators, the proposed endeavour will put the British Parliament in an embarrassing situation, to say the least. It will even put them in a sort of dilemma. On the one hand, they maintain the attitude they have always adopted toward an Address from the Parliament of Canada asking them to amend the BNA Act and they continue to endorse the proposition automatically, assuming that the proposition has gone through necessary stages in Canada and reflects a general consensus. Under those conditions action taken by the British Parliament is a pure formality imposed by certain provisions of the Statute of Westminster. As a matter of fact, those provisions were written into the statute at the request of the Parliament of Canada in 1931.

On the other hand, fully aware of the extent of the changes they are being urged to endorse and knowing full well that such changes are deeply controversial and disputed in Canada, the British parliamentarians will readily see that they are being asked to solve difficulties which could not be resolved in Canada in spite of many attempts and many intergovernmental meetings to achieve that among Canadians.

We Canadian parliamentarians would thus be putting our British colleagues in such an embarrassing and unprecedented position, in a way we would be forcing upon them responsibilities which ought to be ours. That is why I say it would be an outright impropriety, to put it mildly, an impropriety that I for one would refuse to have anything to do with. It is not done.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Tremblay: I am not pleading legal arguments. This is an issue of interparliamentary propriety between sovereign countries.

I now come to the changes which the full slate of amending procedures contained in the bill would introduce in our federative regime. In my opinion, it is tantamount to a coup d'état. What we have before us is indeed a full slate of amending procedures. They fall into two categories: interim procedures and permanent procedures.

First we have the interim procedures which can be found in Part IV of the bill. I will not dwell on these interim procedures precisely because they are transitory. I cannot gloss over some provisions regarding the proposals that may be made by the provinces during the two years following the adoption of the bill regarding the amending procedure.

Under section 38, the provinces will be able to submit their own formula and it will be possible to substitute it for the one contained in section 41 following a referendum.

What I want to underline in that respect is that it will take eight provinces representating 80 per cent of the people for a provincial proposal to be allowed to stand against, if I may say so, the federal proposal, which will not necessarily be the one provided under section 41 in its present form which allows for change. Anyway, there would be two formulae: a provincial formula put forth by eight provinces representing 80 per cent of the people and, on the other hand, a federal formula.

Yet, the national referendum which would choose between these two proposals would only require a simple majority of voters without reference to the distribution of the majority among the areas of the country, or anything else.

This seems to me to be some kind of incongruity, to say the least. One would think that the requirements of interprovincial democracy came before those of the federal democracy.

I would now like to deal with the ongoing procedures, regardless of this paradox, of this incongruity. With regard to ongoing procedures, the proposed resolution contains four of them.

First, there is the formula presented under section 41 but I will not read it to you. Yet I must stress a fact which incidentally has to do with an exchange which took place quite recently involving Senator Frith, when he insisted that between paragraph (a) and paragraph (b) there is a connection reflected by the word "and" in the English version. I did not find the word "et" in the French version. At this stage in the consideration of such a project there may very well be some discrepancy as happened the other night. I venture to draw this point to the attention of the Senate because, if we are to place the whole emphasis on the word "and" in paragraph (b) of the English version, as Senator Frith seems to do, then I think it is absolutely essential that the word "et" appear in the French version, especially in a proposed resolution introduced for the first time—it is an excellent initiative and I am very happy that for the first time a French version of the Constitution will be as official as the English version. One should particularly avoid priding oneself too much, as I have heard the Prime Minister do, when he stressed that he was tabling the proposal in both English and French. One should have at least checked beforehand whether both versions were really identical and made sure also that purely from a language point of view there were no small irritating mistakes. For instance, in the French version, the third paragraph says there must be "au moins deux des provinces de l'Ouest, dont la population confondue représente". What does "population confondue" mean? I checked the English version and saw that it was only the "combined population". I am just saying that in passing.

There is, then, the formula in section 41. We know what it is. Secondly, there is the section 42 formula. Must we go over the text again, after all that has been said? Enough said.

Thirdly, there is the formula proposed in section 43 which, in general, is less important than the others because it concerns amendments that will be made to the Constitution of some provinces only, but which will not apply to all provinces.

Let me draw attention to the formula contained in section 47, because something really surprised me. I saw why it had not surprised anybody. It is because it has a very innocent beginning.

> The procedures prescribed by sections 41, 42 or 43 do not apply to an amendment to the Constitution of Canada.

There are other provisions in the Constitution for amending one part or the other. Provisions enumerated elsewhere will apply. So the section looks very innocent, but let us go on.

> The procedure prescribed by Section 41 or 42 shall nevertheless be used to amend any provision for amending the Constitution, including this section;

In other words, we can use either section 41 or section 42 to change the amending formula. This formula which will not be applied before a two year period, might make it possible for the provinces to come to an agreement, that is the eight provinces which represent 80 per cent of the people, provides an alternative to the present wording of section 41. This is a formula which could finally be accepted by referendum. Section 42 could be changed by going over the head of the provinces, once more, by referendum.

● (1520)

With this multitude of formulae a question comes to mind. What does this package mean for our federative system? On the one hand, there are formulae which go along with the system, such as the one set out in section 41. This is also the case of the formula set out in section 43.

On the other hand, there are those which alter the very substance of our federative system, this is the case, I think, of that in section 42 as well as that in section 47 as long as section 47 allows the Canadian Parliament to use either section 41 or section 42.

How can anyone state that the procedure provided in section 42 can change our federative system? It seems obvious to me because our federative system, as all other systems of a similar kind, is characterized by two levels of government, equally sovereign.

Besides, the formula in section 42, by the use of a referendum, initiated and authorized by only one of these two levels of government, in fact does away with other levels of government with regard to a matter as important as an amendment to the Constitution of our country, including amendments concerning the sharing of powers, that is precisely the sharing of sovereignty between the two levels of government. The formula in section 42 can be applied to a limitless number of subjects. I mentioned earlier that it could affect all the subjects mentioned even in the amending formula.

I submit that such a change is a denial of the federative system and that in that respect, it is equivalent to a coup, without war, without violence, but similar nevertheless to a coup because it does alter the very substance of the system. It is also the equivalent of a coup with regard to how it is going to be done, which is through unilateral action of Parliament.

In this context, the unilateral action of Parliament takes on a meaning and a scope absolutely fundamental and quite unheard of. Not only is this unilateral action proposed to us with a view to patriate our Constitution, and all the substantial changes connected with it, which would already be unacceptable, but it is also proposed that this unilateral action of Parliament become a permanent feature as a result of one of the changes proposed in the resolution.

What are the reasons and the grounds given by the government to justify such a far-reaching decision? Fortunately, the Prime Minister himself gave us the answer to this crucial question. If he had not, we would have been left with assumptions, analyses, which are always doubtful, of the intentions, of the real motives, etc. This is the reason why I say that the Prime Minister gave us a clear answer. It is with this answer and with these clues that I shall deal in the third part of my speech.

I believe that, on the whole, the explanations given by the Prime Minister, as we shall see later on, show quite clearly that the decision of the government to institute a mechanism of unilateral action by Parliament for constitutional amendments was essentially based on a new theory of federal-provincial relations within the Canadian federation. A new theory of Canadian federalism.

I shall borrow from the author of this theory, the Prime Minister himself, the name by which it can be called. I shall also borrow from him the description and the definition of this theory.

It was at his press conference of October 10 that Mr. Trudeau outlined this theory in a lot of detail, even though it is not yet complete since it is still being developed and perfected.

The press conference was about to end and the chairman or animator had just said: "Thank you very much, Mr. Prime Minister." The press conference was about to end and not one of the reporters present had asked the Prime Minister about Section 42 of the Canadian Constitution, 1980. I imagine that he was disappointed at the silence of such a group on an issue of this importance. With simplicity, not to say with the casualness which is typical of him, he therefore took the initiative of breaching this question himself.

The quotation that I shall give from his comments is rather long. I hope that you will excuse me for this. However, I wanted to respect both the subtleties of thought and particularities of speech of the author. For this same reason, I took care not to translate these comments which were made in English. I therefore must ask you twice for forgiveness about the way that I shall read this text.

● (1530)

[English]

> PRIME MINISTER: There was one question which I was hoping to get which I didn't, which may not be important, but can I ask it myself?

Why are you putting this referendum mechanism in section 42, the one that Mr. Clark attacks so strongly, and Mr. Nystrom, and which Mr. Blakeney, and so on, have been attacking?

[Translation]

Comments which everyone has noticed.

[English]

I would like to at least give you the rationale of it—

[Translation]

The word is used when explaining a theory.

[English]

—since I have something of a captive audience—

Senator Flynn: He is used to that.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, let us accept and go to the sources.

[English]

We need a deadlock-breaking mechanism. It is as simple as that. We know what deadlocks are. We have had one since 1927. The federal government and the provinces have failed to agree unanimously: and therefore nothing could be done.

But even short of unanimity, there can be a deadlock, and I think we have historical proof of that in the past 10 years—

Exactly the years he has been Prime Minister.

—when at least one province—and now certainly two and perhaps three, because I would add Mr. Peckford and Mr. Bennett's provinces to Mr. Bourassa's and Mr. Lévesque's Quebec—

Strange. Two prime ministers for one single province, which gives some insight into the chronological dimension of the theory.

—have said, "If we do not get what we want, we won't let you do anything." And that was the position at this last federal-provincial conference. Mr. Lévesque wanted absolute self-determination to be expressed in some way or another; Mr. Peckford wanted absolutely the offshore; Mr. Bennett wanted absolutely the kind of Senate he was asking for, and so on.

So, provinces can use even an amending formula to blackmail the rest of the country in saying, "No matter that everybody wants it but me—"me in, say, Quebec, or me in Ontario—"I will prevent Canada from moving." So, there can be deadlocks. There have been deadlocks, there are deadlocks. Now, we have, in the present state of the law, the Constitution, one way of getting out of that deadlock, and that is to go to Westminster and say, "You know, for 53 years there has been a deadlock. It has to be broken. Please help us break it."

But when that has been done once, it is done forever. It cannot be done any more. The Constitution is back here. The deadlock will be of our own making, and the deadlock has to be broken here in Canada. We cannot go to the Pope; we cannot go to the Queen; we cannot go to the President of the United States and say, "Help us out of this jam."

Whom do we go to? We go to the people. How in heaven's name can anybody say that that is anti-democratic? How can the New Democratic Party say that, in the ultimate recourse, you should not have recourse to the people to break a deadlock?

And that is the spirit of section 42: Once again, if we could ask God to do it, it would be better. But until God comes in and does it, we have to believe in the sovereign people, and that is what we are saying, essentially.

And that is why we have a deadlock-breaking mechanism.

Thank you very much.

And he left. That was the end of it.

It is a very nice presentation of a new theory—a very live presentation of a new theory—for the federation. It is the theory that I will call from now on the theory of the deadlock-breaking mechanism.

● (1540)

[Translation]

I must say again here that Mr. Trudeau did us all a favour, he was direct and straightforward. We know where we stand. It is neither a mistake or an oversight if section 42 has been included in the Constitution Act, 1980. It reflects a concept about the relations between the two levels of government, it expresses a new theory about Canadian federalism, which I just called the deadlock breaking mechanism. Such a new theory is based on the unilateral action of Parliament which this resolution proposes now, in order to patriate the Constitution. This is also the theory which underlines the amending formula contained in section 42, a formula which turns into a permanent feature, the unilateral action of Parliament, without any regard for the provincial legislatures.

It is indeed a general theory on Canadian federalism because the use of the deadlock-breaking mechanism will not stop with the patriation of our Constitution but it will become a permanent and integral feature of our Canadian Constitution from now on. And with this amending formula set out in section 42, the provinces are not invited to give any advice nor to suggest any alternative. With section 41, we agree. With section 42, we do not. Especially because by using section 47, section 42 can be amended and section 41. The general scope of the amendments which even affect the amending formula, this permanent feature of the deadlock-breaking mechanism requires at least an analysis and a brief review of the considerations upon which the Prime Minister based his decision which he deemed justified and necessary.

When dealing with those, my remarks will follow two themes. First, I will analyse the deadlock mechanism and second the results of this deadlock mechanism. There have been deadlocks, there are deadlocks. This is what the Prime Minister said earlier. But in his theory, it is a premise on which all systems are based. In its clear simplicty, this premise is unquestionable. To justify a deadlock-breaking mechanism there must, of course, be deadlock. This is one of those obvious statements. In Quebec last week the Prime Minister paraphrased another one, when he said with regard to another matter:

> Baptiste is dead; he is dead because he forgot to breathe.

Besides the unquestionable validity of the premise, at least two or three questions are in order: When is there a deadlock? Who decides there is a deadlock? How did this deadlock happen?

In his press conference report, Mr. Trudeau explicitly answers the first question. He might answer the other two but only by implication. In the first question he says that there is a constitutional deadlock when the provincial premiers cannot agree on a federal proposal on which the federal government is dead set, in other words, a proposal which for all practical purposes, as far as it is concerned, is not negotiable. For example, the enshrinement of a charter of rights. The diagnosis is that there is a deadlock and, this way, we must in all logic answer the second question that it is the federal government which decides whether there is a constitutional deadlock or not. That is made very clear indeed in section 42(2).

> A referendum referred to in subsection (1) shall be held where directed by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada authorized by resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons.

Here we can see emerging another theory of federalism, which the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin referred to last Tuesday in his speech in the House of Commons, if I may be allowed to quote him. He had just alluded to several theories and added this:

> Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it can still more simply be classified into two schools of thoughts, namely federalism of juridical equality between the two levels of government, to which the Task Force on Canadian Unity generally adhered, and a federalism of juridical seniority of the central government, which this resolution moderately reflects to a certain extent since it claims to be founded on present, previous, former and past agreements with the provinces.

In passing, let us admire the flexibility of interpretation which this series of adjectives allows us in deciding if there are or if there are not present, previous, former and past agreements with the provinces.

> This second school of thought, which I call federalism of juridical seniority, emphasizes, because of its wider, more ultimate and final responsibilities, that the federal government has obligations to Canada as a whole which it alone can meet, in the interest of the common good, especially in cases where there exist apparent deadlocks such as the one we are faced with now on the constitutional issue. That is a highly defensible position which I can appreciate for what it is worth, that is to say, a lot. By the way, people would be wrong to think that the rule of unanimity is an essential corollary of federalism of juridical equality. As a matter of fact, several supporters will accept that it may be limited by the will of the majority or for the sake of political expediency.
> In any event, I for one refuse to become the prisoner of either one of these two schools, though psychologically I prefer the first one.

That of the Pepin-Robarts Task Force. With all due respect for Mr. Pepin I would say that we would become prisoners, and forever, of the "federalism of juridical seniority" should section 42 become part and parcel of the Canadian Constitution.

As a matter of fact, when I listened to the comments of our colleague Senator van Roggen when he spoke in this debate I thought he too was ill at ease about section 42. He has already said he would move amendments to this section on which I will comment later on.

Senator Asselin: Senator Lamontagne as well has misgivings about section 42!

Senator Tremblay: In any event, returning to the theoretician of the deadlock-breaking mechanism and to set myself within his own logic, I think, I should like to voice the following hypothesis: why would there not be any deadlock when all the premiers agree on constitutional proposals to which only the Prime Minister of Canada is obstinately opposed? If the theory of the deadlock-breaking mechanism can be used generally within Canadian federalism without destroying it, it seems to me that this theory should be enlarged so as to take two possibilites into account. First, that the deadlock can come from provincial obstinacy in refusing a federal proposal. Second, that the deadlock can come from the obstinacy of a Prime Minister of Canada in refusing a proposal made by all the provinces.

Since I am not myself the author of the deadlock mechanism theory, I do not feel that I am in a good position to solve the problem so that the theory can be applied fully or can remain coherent. The author himself is certainly better qualified to perfect it and give it its full value as the general theory of the new Canadian federalism. In fact, as I understand it, Senator van Roggen offered yesterday to cooperate with him in this regard when he spoke about some sort of reciprocity which could be introduced in section 42, but I shall speak about this later on. I shall quickly go on to this simple conclusion.

I hope to have shown you that this theoretical hypothesis raises some rather difficult questions if we want it to apply generally as suggested in section 42 of the proposed resolution. It also raises complex issues if we want to apply it to actual situations.

For example, was there a deadlock at the last constitutional conference? Are we now in a deadlock which justifies unilateral action by Parliament? This is what Mr. Trudeau suggests, but this does not prove that such is the case. Apparently, the proof would be in the 53 years that this situation has been going on. This would be the proof that there is a real deadlock. A deadlock of 53 years can impress the public, and it justifies all types of solutions, the more radical the better. In giving his theory of the deadlock breaking mechanism, the Prime Minister referred to this time factor which governs all the practical applications of the theory. Needless to say, there can be no question of a deadlock in the theoretical sense after only one unsuccessful attempt at intergovernmental discussions. We would need several on the same issues, I imagine. This is what gives weight to the argument concerning the 53 years of supposed failures concerning patriation and an amending formula. We are being told that, for half a century, there were no solutions and only failures and that nothing has happened in the field of patriation or constitutional amendments. What exactly are the facts?

On this point, it is impossible to underestimate or overemphasize the relevance of the interpretation that Senator Flynn has given us of the constitutional amendment made in 1949. This amendment means in fact that since 1949, the Constitution has been patriated and can be amended in Canada in all its aspects which do not affect the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. However, I should point out in passing something which concerns the protection given under section 91(1) to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces and certain other rights or privileges. I underline what in my opinion would be the effect of section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1980. This is another section whose effect can be understood if we break it down: "Class 1 of section 91 and class 1 of section 92 of the Constitution Act of 1867, and so on, are repealed." What does this mean? It means what it says. However, something else should be underlined. Other clauses of the constitutional proposal of 1980, such as the Charter of Rights, contain the other elements—unless I did not get certain aspects of the proposal, which is, of course, not impossible. I did not find any equivalent of the protection of rights for the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. This means that since subsection 91(1) is to be repealed and its elements are not found anywhere else, this part of the jurisdiction of the provinces will be repealed. On the other hand, as soon as Part V of the bill on the Canadian Constitution amending procedure is enacted, section 91 and the protection it gives to the jurisdiction, rights and privileges of the provinces, will be repealed.

This would be understandable if the new amending formula involved provincial legislatures, but such is not the case, however, because of section 42, as I have already pointed out.

What I would like to emphasize at the moment is that the protection of the jurisdictions, rights and privileges of the provinces formed an essential component of the partial patriation, back in 1949 and that such protection was a prerequisite for unilateral patriation without provincial consent. This is just what happened, according to the testimony of Mr. Pickersgill, who was then chief private secretary of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent who had the privilege to witness the 1949 events.

In his memoirs, published in 1975 under the title: My Years with Louis St. Laurent, Mr. Pickersgill, in a very interesting chapter, tells of the circumstances surrounding the 1949 patriation and the rationale behind it. I would like to be permitted to quote this passage out of the chapter on the Constitution, page 116.

● (1550)

[English]

> St. Laurent argued that nothing substantial would be changed by giving Parliament final authority to amend the Constitution in exclusively federal matters. He said they had always been decided in the Canadian Parliament, without recognizing any obligation to consult the provinces or get their consent; and in the future they would continue to be made without consulting them and getting their consent.

I have given the essentials. The unilateral action of that time was justified on the grounds that the privileges, rights and competence of Parliament would be protected by the amendment itself.

[Translation]

So there is no doubt about that. If Prime Minister St. Laurent and the Parliament of Canada thought they were justified to act unilaterally in 1949, it is essentially because patriation at that time did affect the Constitution of Canada in exclusively federal matters and because, for more security, the protection of jurisdictions, rights and privileges of the provinces were written explicitly in the amendment.

Should I mention a small detail which looks a bit strange and which has a special flavour. I am well aware of the fact that recalling this historical event would be of no use to the present Prime Minister. In the chapter of Mr. Pickersgill's memoirs dealing with the Constitution we find the following statement:

[English]

> Throughout this whole period Gordon Robertson, then in the Cabinet Office, had been working on the constitutional problem with other officials, and he had come much closer than anyone else to finding a possible solution. It is of historical interest that his assistant in this work was Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

● (1600)

Senator McIlraith: Would the honourable senator put the exact reference on the record?

Senator Tremblay: Yes, it is page 120.

[Translation]

It may be by a significant coincidence that when Bill C-60 came along we found again the same people, but they had changed places with one another. We all know that Bill C-60 warranted its constitutionality from the meaning of section 91(1) passed in 1949. Sometimes history is made, how shall I say, from the fabric of careers that coincide with institutions.

What were the implications of the 1949 patriation on those elements of the Constitution that were patriated and those that were not? I shall not read everything that I have written here because enough has been said about it on previous occasions. Actually, I wanted to recall what Senator Flynn very ably pointed out, that it is with Bill C-60 and the judgment made by the Supreme Court of Canada that it was clearly understood, even by those who had worked initially on the drafting of the amendment, how to define the meaning of section 91. So I shall not press the point. I just want to say that although it is assumed that nothing has been patriated since 1927, there was at least section 91(1), which falls just about in the middle of that period. Let us speak of the historic dimension in a popular but dramatic sense and let us be precise. Let us speak of about 25 years, not 53 years.

Something else has happened besides that in the field of the Constitution. There have been amendments. I think there have been about 15 or so since 1949, but what I want to emphasize is that these were amendments which affected the distribution of powers: in 1940, the amendment concerning unemployment insurance; in 1951, the amendment concerning old age pensions, and, in 1964, the amendment to raise old age pensions, called additional benefits.

In order to be concrete and describe the trend in the evolution of events, I would add to that the significant amendments which the exercise of the power to spend, to an extent heretofore unknown, introduced in the concrete meaning of the balance of powers between the two levels of government right after the war and during the following years. These were not really formal amendments, but personally I would call these interventions, near-amendments, when the power to spend is exercised in fields under exclusive provincial jurisdiction. And God knows that there have been many in the past 25 years. There were changes which altered the distribution of powers and which placed unemployment insurance under federal jurisdiction, besides the others I mentioned. There were other types of changes, and when these changes touched on the jurisdiction it was always with their prior agreement.

In brief, the half century from 1927 to this day is not a completely void space as regards the patriation of the Constitution or amendments to our constitutional statutes involving provincial jurisdiction, a space devoid of substance and contents where there is nothing but a long series of failures, an endless succession of deadlocks.

In addition, it must be stated that none of the substantive amendments made to the Constitution—except the one made in 1949 because it did not affect the powers of the provinces—enlarged the field of provincial jurisdiction. On the contrary, such changes have always tended to enlarge the field of federal jurisdiction.

Seen in that light, how is it possible to speak honestly of a half-century deadlock, especially a deadlock that would stem from systematic obstruction on the part of the provinces?

I come now to the referendum mechanism which Mr. Trudeau explained in his press conference. The proposed resolution enshrines in the Constitution the mechanism for breaking constitutional deadlocks; that is to say, resorting to a referendum. That is an appeal to the sovereign people. Governments do not agree? Legislatures do not agree? Let us go to the people. Is democracy not the government of the people, by the people and for the people?

That approach is, of course, a very popular one. The sovereign people are naturally glad to be called upon in this way to rule on contentious matters between governments. That is the demagogic aspect of this proposal.

More objectively, I think the use of a referendum puts into question the very nature of the federal system, when it is used unilaterally by one level of government and aims to overcome opposition by the other level of government on a constitutional matter, as it is postulated, since we speak of a "deadlock".

The reciprocity that Senator van Roggen talked about does not solve the problem. What hits at the heart of the system is the fact that one level of government is attacking the sovereignty of the other by referring unilaterally to the people. The only way to protect the integrity of the system would be if both levels of government jointly agreed to proceed by way of a referendum. That is highly improbable, since section 42 would only be used in a deadlock situation, as the Prime Minister clearly indicated. Let us note in passing, however, that that is not indicated in the proposal. We have to infer that the conditions set out in section 41 for an agreement on a constitutional amendment have not been met. How could agreement be achieved on the necessity of proceeding by way of a referendum when, in the first place, agreement has not been reached under section 41?

If we want to be realistic, we must recognize that the theory of the "deadlock-breaking mechanism" leads unquestionably to the negation of the federal system and entails, logically, the negation of one level of government by another.

Honourable senators, we have to decide whether or not we agree on referring to a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons a government proposal of which I just have, I hope, analyzed and described at least some of the implications and consequences.

If we reply in the affirmative, if we accept the setting up of that joint committee, if we agree to be part of it, at this stage, immediately, our affirmative reply to the question that is put will, to my mind, mean the following:

First, that we accept not only that the Constitution be patriated, on which point all Canadians agree; but that Second, we also accept that this patriation be accompanied by amending procedures that will allow us, later on, to amend the Constitution here in Canada. On that point, at least in principle, all Canadians also agree.

• (1610)

Third, we accept at the same time the proposed amending formulae. On that point, Canadians certainly disagree.

Fourth, we accept that those amending formulae, taken as a whole, transform the federal system itself, which is absolutely unacceptable.

Fifth, we accept that changes in substance be made in our stead by the Parliament at Westminster, changes which, as we are well aware, are still being debated and on which there is still obvious division in the public mind and in the attitudes of the various governments of the country;

Sixth, we accept, finally, that this be done unilaterally, not only without prior consent of the provinces but also against the advice of the majority of the provinces representing a majority of the population.

Senator Frith: Of the provincial governments.

Senator Tremblay: Of a majority of provinces in the sense of the governments, representing a majority of the people. In fact, the figure for the six provinces is 53 per cent. These people have expressed their disagreement so categorically that they are going to refer the question to the courts.

What is the real sense behind the proposal before us, what is it exactly that makes it so hard to accept, not to say so unacceptable? Some will perhaps argue that what is actually before us is a simple proposal to create a committee and that as indicated by Senator van Roggen yesterday one could very well introduce many amendments in committee. Yet if the thesis I have developed is valid, do you really think that we could actually achieve in committee, above all a committee which will not be set up on a parity basis—

Senator Roblin: Not on a parity basis.

Senator Tremblay: Not on a parity basis. With what happened earlier, I am not sure I understood the conclusion.

How can you imagine that we are going to be able to put forth amendments which will take into account all the hypotheses I have just raised? It seems to me that it is quite like dreaming in colour. They say it is the most pleasant way of dreaming, but one seldom dreams in colour. This is what is meant by the expression. We do not know even if at the end of the process it will be possible to resume a debate on the points I have just mentioned. Let us then think twice about it.

I planned to talk about—but I see that I have already spoken too long and I will therefore sum up my remarks as quickly as possible. I wanted to refer to the remarks made here by Senator Manning the other day, which impressed me a lot personally. He carried an analysis of the factors which are at the origin of the failure of the September conference. He said that the objectives were too unrealistic and that there were too many subjects on the agenda of that conference. He added that the time limits were not realistic.

He described the very attitude of the Prime Minister and concluded that under these circumstances it was not at all surprising that the conference had been a failure. That man who was speaking to us the other day is a very learned and experienced man. Wisdom and caution would have recommended he set aside on a temporary basis all patriation-related issues. It would have been quite possible, later on, to agree on an amending formula.

Instead, the Prime Minister has chosen to act unilaterally, both to bring home and amend the constitution, in spite of the fact that the premiers had warned him of the disastrous consequences such an action would have on the future of Confederation.

It is evident that the Prime Minister is convinced that he has chosen the right way, but he is wrong. He is making an enormous mistake and he is uselessly endangering Confederation. That is what Senator Manning was saying the other day.

I suggest that this is the correct perspective. I am well aware of the fact that it is not easy, in view of the characters of the people involved, of the rigid stands they have adopted and of which they are prisoners of sort, to back up and start over the negotiations which have been broken. But there is one thing that is sure—there is open confrontation between the two levels of government. This situation, far from improving in the forthcoming weeks and months, will deteriorate if the government continues the action it has started to its logical conclusion.

Personally, I do not see any other way out of the deadlock—for this time it is a real deadlock. It seems to me that at this stage there is no way out of this deadlock other than another constitutional conference—a last chance conference—which would only seek, as Senator Manning suggested, to agree on patriation and on an amending formula. In my view, it is the only way to avoid dramatic consequences for the future of the Canadian federation, which will unavoidably result from the unilateral action of Parliament, including ourselves, based on the proposed resolution that is submitted to us. Let us not fool ourselves; the present exercise is not comparable to minor surgery. It is not merely a matter of going through a bad period, after which everything will be all right and life will go on as usual. The surgical risk is high, very much so. The patient is not sure to survive, and even if he does, the after-effects will certainly not be insignificant.

Since becoming a member of the Senate less than a year ago, I have often heard it said that this house is an instrument and the premises of sober second thought in the federal legislative process. Not being familiar with the procedural rules, I do not know how we could proceed with that sober second thought which would allow us to take a pause in the operation under way, a pause during which the dialogue could be resumed, as suggested by senator Manning. As far as I am concerned, I strongly and deeply wish that we will seek a way to reach that aim.

In a recent issue of L'Express, a weekly which is the French equivalent of Time Magazine, appeared an article entitled: The trials of a Chinese in France. It concluded with the following Chinese proverb:

> The one who makes a mistake and refuses to correct it makes a second one.

Can we find a way of giving to the Prime Minister and to the House of Commons, especially the Quebec representatives, an opportunity to reflect once more and ponder over that Chinese proverb? I am convinced that they will all understand that by giving them such an opportunity, this house has fully and clearly assumed its role and its responsibilities. It is perhaps not too late to avoid the second mistake mentioned in the proverb.

• (1620)

[English]

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, let me say I was very much impressed, as I am sure all of us were, by the speech of the Honourable Senator Tremblay. I particularly liked his old Chinese proverb; I shall now quote one from Ireland—He who loses the election always has sour grapes.

I notice there is a tendency on the other side to act as if the only time there was ever a deadlock or a confrontation was in the last ten years when Pierre Elliott Trudeau, with a slight hiccup, has been the Prime Minister. That slight hiccup was the brief period of Conservative government. I think most of us in this chamber can look back and realize that the game between the provincial governments and the federal government, for as long back as we want to remember, has been a game of power. There has been deadlock, whether one goes back 30 years, 40 years or 53 years.

While I do not like all that is in this package, and I shall have something to say about some of the things that I don't like later in my speech, nevertheless I feel we should approach this as senators not tied to party lines, but talking from how we feel in representing our regions. At the same time I am convinced that the only way we will ever bring the Constitution to this country and find a practical amending formula is if we have a Prime Minister who has the courage to do what Prime Minister Trudeau is doing. Whether we like the way he is doing it or all that he is doing, at least he is showing courage. He has broken a deadlock. I can remember two or three occasions when federal-provincial conferences were called the last chance. I think that is what we had in the last one, and we were amply warned that it was the last chance to come to an agreement, and now we are faced with this situation.

I have a sense of the importance of this debate that we are engaged in while attempting to develop a new Constitution and a new set of rules by which to govern this nation, and I am aware that what we do here will very likely affect to a great extent the future of this country. I also have a sense of frustration, and I am sure that in this I am joined by many members on both sides of this chamber. That sense of frustration is there because I am afraid that we will not, in fact, get the opportunity to amend this resolution in a meaningful way. We will have to depend on the relatively small numbers of members of the House of Commons and the Senate who are chosen to sit on that joint committee. In spite of the reassurance that was given to us by our leader, the Honourable Ray Perrault—and I think it was quite sincere—I am afraid that in a practical way we are going to be faced, when the committee reports, with an all-or-nothing situation. In fact, I do not believe we will be able to amend the committee' report. I do not think there is any practical way for us to do that.

I don't think that most senators will insist, if they intend to vote in favour of the resolution when it is finally presented to us for final vote, on having everything that they want in it. But I do think they will insist that what is in there, if they intend to vote in favour of it, will be something they can live with and something that in fact will find favour in the region they represent. Surely the main thrust of this action is to bring home the Constitution with a practical amending formula. After that, if the majority of Canadians so desire, changes can be made and rights can be entrenched. However, having said that, I acknowledge that the government is committed to the inclusion of certain rights in this resolution that is to be presented to Westminster, and will insist on them.

[Senator Tremblay.]

Those of us who have some concern in this area I think must do our best, and we are engaging in that now, and I hope that we will get some practical opportunity to engage in it when the committee meets. We must do our best to make known those changes that we wish to see. This applies not only in the matter of entrenching rights, but the same is true in regard to the various and different amending formulae suggested in the resolution. But when the committee finally reports back to the Senate we will face, without a doubt, the difficult choice of either accepting or rejecting the package. I am aware that it is possible if we wish amendments to ask that that committee be set up again, but I am afraid that in a practical way this is highly unlikely to happen. So I think we are going to be faced with a take-it-or-leave it situation, and I hope that this does not mean the defeat of the resolution, because like most Canadians I want to see our Constitution home in Canada with a practical and attainable way of amending it.

I believe very strongly that we must give to that committee for its guidance, and we must put firmly on record, the changes we want to take place. But I am also convinced, as I said when I began, that we must approach this not along party lines but as individual senators representing the provinces or the regions we come from. We should vote our consciences for our regions. Surely this is the kind of action that the founders of this country had in mind when they formed the Senate.

So it is a debate with great emotion. There is a sense of urgency, and there is tremendous regional concern. For that reason, if we do not represent our regions, then many of the things that people say about this institution will have been proven true. I believe in the party system, but I think that this particular debate in which we are engaged at this time is too important for us simply to go along with the party line, unless we feel in our conscience that way.

I will deal first, in a brief way, with some of the rights with which I am concerned and some that are of concern to the province I come from, Saskatchewan. To begin with, I am not a strong supporter of the entrenchment of rights in a Constitution, unlike Senator van Roggen, who said what he wants to be is protected from the legislatures. Well, he is a lawyer, but sometimes, when I watch the courts, when they deal with criminal cases, I have the feeling, "By God, I would like to be protected from what the courts do." He quoted somebody who said, "I don't sleep safely in my bed at night, when the legislatures are in session." When we look at what they do in some of those criminal cases, none of us sleeps safely in our bed as a result of what the courts do or fail to do.

I would like to give you a few examples of why I feel this way. If you just take a look at what has happened in this country over the past 100 years, and what has happened in the United States of America, you will see that while many of the things that we have done, or failed to do, in regard to our minorities are bad and a blot on our record, nevertheless, our record is infinitely better in treating our minorities fairly than that of the United States, and they have had from day one in their nation a constitution and a strong bill of rights.

I read the other day that back in the twenties and the thirties, when the black people were forced to ride in the back of the bus, the United States Supreme Court found, under the Constitution of the United States at that time, that being segregated in that way—for example, in the matter of buses and other places—did not contravene the rights of the black people. Yet 20 or 30 years later, under the same Constitution, with no amendments in this regard, segregation was struck down. But, in fact, even after that, under the same Constitution, white people were forced to ride in buses and take their children to be educated in all-Negro schools. That was under the same Constitution within a span of 30 or 40 years.

What does it mean? It simply means that the courts can interpret things differently at different times and in different courts. It also means in the final analysis that rights depend upon the broad acceptance of the people.

We all use the case of the way we treated the Japanese in World War II and the way the Americans treated them. They were not treated a damned bit better or a damned bit worse down there or up here—and one country had a constitution and one didn't.

It is all very well to look back 30 or 40 years later at that situation, or ten years later to look back at the Quebec crisis, and say, "Look at what they did to rights. Look at what they did to the Japanese back in the war." Well, if you had been out on the west coast at that time, I am afraid it would not have mattered how much of a Constitution we had or how many rights we had, when the people demanded what they demanded that same action would have been taken. I do not say it was good and I do not say it was not a blot on our record, but it happened, and it would happen again no matter how many rights we have.

Take a look at Great Britain compared to the U.S.S.R. Great Britain has no bill of rights; the country has no constitution as such; yet the people have more rights, probably, than those in any other nation on the face of the earth. The U.S.S.R., I am told, has one of the finest bill of rights you could find anywhere in the world. There is only one small detail—the people have no rights.

Fellow senators, while I am convinced and am confident that we will see a bill of rights entrenched in the Constitution, and we will, as the years go by be adding and entrenching various other rights. When the joint committee sits, there will be a great line of people—native people, women, and representatives of all kinds of organizations. They will be coming here to demand that their rights be entrechend. I think they will have a right to be heard. If one set of rights is entrenched, why not another? I shudder to think what will happen in this country over the next 25 to 30 years. It will be a lawyer's paradise. The Supreme Court had better be ready to see some serious expansion in its numbers and in its duties in the next quarter century.

I also find it interesting that some people, who are not prepared, for example, to trust the Senate because it is an appointed body, are prepared to trust the courts, which, in fact, are also appointed bodies.

However, there have been serious denials of rights in this country and in the provinces. We are not proud of that. We are aware that the Padlock Law in Quebec worked against religious groups, such as the Jehovah's Witnesses. We are aware of the treatment of the Hutterites in Alberta at times. I am conscious that in my own province right now certain action is being threatened against the Hutterites—action against certain classes of people who want to buy farm land. There is a denial of rights. These things exist. They are not pretty, and we do not agree with them.

If, in fact, we can improve the situation by entrenching certain rights above the relatively easy amendment of legislatures and parliaments, then perhaps that will be a step forward. But I think we should go slowly; we should be aware that doing so will not solve all our problems, and may create almost as many problems as it solves.

We have learned to live with our parliamentary system. The Americans have learned to live with their system. We are now in the process of attaching to our present system a type of system that we have not been used to; that we have not had. It will call for some tremendous changes. A great many people are looking at the situation and saying, "This is a wonderful thing. Our rights are going to be assured." But I think they should look back at the history of this country. They would see that the record of this country, by and large, balances out to as good as, or better than, that of most other countries, even those that do have constitutions.

The record of elected bodies in this country is not perfect, but I think it stands up, for example, with the closest neighbour we have, which operates under a different system. Not only does it stand up, but, in fact, by comparison, I think we come out a little ahead.

However, I am willing to accept that certain rights will be, and perhaps should be, included. Speaking for the interests of Saskatchewan, I want to mention some. Senator Buckwold mentioned them and I want to mention them. I want to make it clear that these are important. Senator Buckwold made it sound as if they were just rights being pushed forward by the present NDP government. Well, they are. But in spite of that I will support them. They are rights that have been talked about and argued in favour of by the people in various governments in Saskatchewan going back a long time.

I talk about the control and ownership of resources. I am pleased to see that the Prime Minister has said that this will be considered. I want to emphasize that it is not just a motherhood statement that provinces own the resources that we look for. We own the resources now. That is clear. There is no question about that. However, we are looking for something more than that.

Let me just briefly use as an example something that happened when the Liberals formed the government and which carried on after the NDP replaced us. This is not only in regard to the control of our own resources, but it does involve that.

In about 1967-68 the bottom dropped out of the potash industry. Sales dropped right off and the demand on the mines dropped from about 80 to 85 per cent down to about 50 per cent of capacity. We in the government at that time put in a system of prorationing, in which we took the potash orders and literally spread them around roughly evenly—perhaps not quite evenly—among all the mines. If we had not, three or four mines would have closed, throwing a tremendous number of people out of work. But worse than that, they would have been broke and they would have had great difficulty in ever coming back. So we spread the available orders out and prorationed them. We were challenged in the courts, and before the case was proceeded with we had been replaced by the NDP government, and when the case eventually came to court what the province had done was declared ultra vires.

I hope that this situation is corrected in the proposed rights to be embodied in the Constitution, because while I do not believe that a province should have the right to enter into trade treaties, or take over or assert the rights of the federal government with regard to international trade, I believe that the provinces should have total control of those resources that are within the boundaries of their own province.

I wish now to talk about equalization, which was mentioned by Senator Tremblay. I support what the honourable senator said, that we do not want just a pious statement in the Constitution that we are in favour of equalization. We want a firm statement that equalization payments—I emphasize the word "payments"—will continue to be made. If it is suggested that equalization of government services will be guaranteed under the Constitution—a certain average level across this nation—we could easily end up in a situation where we find the federal government trying to provide them in areas that are now, and I hope will remain, strictly the jurisdiction of the provinces. Again, it has been indicated that those changes will be looked at favourably, and I hope they are.

My other questions concern the amending formula. The first has been dealt with at great length here. It is one that I believe most provinces, and certainly the Province of Saskatchewan, will be putting forward, along with concerns about the referendum and the so-called deadlock breaking mechanism.

Very simply, the proposal that I am putting forward, together with a great many others, is that if there is insistence on having a referendum—I use the word "if," because I am not at all sure that it is necessary—if we have the Victoria or Vancouver formula, surely we have one system of breaking a deadlock. If there is a deadlock and we need unanimity, I have always felt that the Vancouver or Victoria formula provided a deadlock-breaking mechanism—and if, in fact, we need another, surely it would be incumbent upon the government of the day to go to the provinces first with a proposed amendment, and, if they could not agree, and it was of such vital importance, then and only then would they put in place a referendum and go over the heads of the provinces and ask the people. If they insist on that, I do not believe—and I am sure that most honourable senators will agree with me—that it should be simple for any federal government to institute a unilateral referendum. It should be done with great care, it should be difficult, and it should take some time. I also believe that if we put it in, there should be something in there that clearly spells out some kind of an independent umpire or referee who would oversee the wording of that referendum and the way the vote on the referendum was taken.

The other matter with which I wish to deal is section 44 concerning the 90-day veto by the Senate of a resolution by the House of Commons—a resolution that could change the present parliamentary system and abolish the Senate. I am aware that there are people who say that if we talk about this matter in the Senate, we would appear to be self-serving. If we are self-serving, and if it is a sin, then we are in good company, not only in this chamber but all over this nation. If we do not deal with it, then I am not sure who will.

We were not elected to the Senate, we were appointed, and if any honourable senator honestly feels that he is here only if he has wide public support, then I suggest that perhaps he should not have come here in the first place and that he should not stay very long. I believe that under Bill C-60 we could, without too much trouble, get a resolution of the House of Commons and six or seven provinces to say that they would like to see the Senate abolished on some given day, or trade it for 10 barrels of oil, or 50 pounds of fish, or something like that, and we would not be here for very long.

We are not here because the public demands that we should be here. We are here because we were appointed, and I believe that, by and large, we do a good job. I am sure that we could do a better job. It is one of the tragedies that the talent that is now in the Senate, and has been here in the past, has not been and is not being used to nearly the capacity and extent that it could be used. I am sure that part of that is our own fault, but part of it continues to be the fault of the government of the day. There are all kinds of studies, royal commissions, and a host of other endeavours that all governments engage in which could be handled by the Senate for one-fiftieth of the cost, and the results would be far more effective and far better than the commissions and studies that are undertaken at high cost by this and other governments.

The question has been put to me—and I am sure to other honourable senators—that if the House of Commons voted to abolish the Senate, and seven, eight or nine provinces agreed with the decision, would honourable senators have the gall to stay here in the face of that? I have said "Probably not. I don't know. It would depend on how I felt on that particular day." I would like to have the opportunity to find out exactly what they were angry about on that particular occasion. I do not think that we should give up our rights by default. I consider that we are a reasonable group of people. We are reasonably sensitive to public opinion, and if we were faced with that situation, I am sure that we would do what we considered was best, not just for ourselves but for the country.

I have not forgotten Bill C-60, and I am not convinced that I want to see the government able to accomplish, through the back door, or the British door—if that is what it has in mind—what it was unable to accomplish here at home, thanks to the decision of the Supreme Court.

Honourable senators, I support the move to send this resolution to the committee, and I hope and trust that the committee will be willing to accept amendments. The indications are that the government will be willing to accept amendments. When it comes back to the Senate, in whatever form, it will be our responsibility to look at it. Again, if we wish to amend the resolution in substance I hope that some practical way is found, both here and in the other place, of giving us that opportunity. If there are things in there that we do not like, and we want to weigh them against those things that we do like—and there are many things in the proposed bill that I do like—I hope that by voting in accordance with our consciences and the needs of our regions, we can vote in favour of the final resolution when it comes to the Senate. Like most Canadians, I am as anxious as anyone to see the Constitution finally here in Canada with a sensible amending formula, so that any last vestiges of colonialism, if there are any left, will be cut and severed and that anything great that we accomplish will be accomplished right here at home.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Would the honourable senator permit a question? It is the same question that I was going to put to Senator Nurgitz last night, because both honourable senators have made the same statement during the course of their remarks. Senator Steuart intimated that it is not important to have the entrenchment of the bill of rights because the rights of Canadians can be protected without those rights being entrenched in the Constitution. For comparison, he pointed out what had happened in the United States where, while there is a bill of rights, there was abuse of the Japanese people during World War II.

Is the honourable senator aware that at the present time in England, on whose parliamentary system our own is patterned, they are discussing and considering a proposal for the entrenchment of a bill of rights in their Constitution?

● (1650)

Senator Steuart: No, I was not aware of that, but if you say they are, I am quite sure that is so. I am not saying that it is going to hurt, or lessen, the rights of individuals or groups, if they are entrenched. What I was trying to say is that it is no guarantee. When you entrench rights in a constitution people should not think that it is a guarantee that their rights are secure and sound, and well looked after forever. Nothing will take the place of the vigilance of individuals, of groups, no matter what the government, and no matter what the form of government.

So if in Great Britain they feel they are going to serve their people better by entrenching rights, fine, they can do that, and I hope they will be successful. If we think it will help ensure more rights for more people in this country by doing that, then I will support it. All I was really saying is that there is no guarantee that this will happen.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak to the motion with some trepidation. I realize that some of the finest speakers in this chamber have already spoken—and I have been very impressed indeed, both by the content and by the force of their delivery. The speeches of Senator Cook, Senator Roblin, Senator Manning, and today Senator Tremblay—indeed, everybody's speeches—have demonstrated the seriousness and the earnestness with which this subject is being treated in this chamber. That, of course, is the way it should be treated.

Honourable senators, I have personally participated in these on-going constitutional discussions which have been held between the federal and the provincial governments since 1971 or 1972. I have been involved in all these first ministers' conferences during that time, and in the inter-governmental affairs ministers' conferences. I have even had quite a bit of exposure at the finance ministers' conferences. I have, therefore, had an opportunity to see at first hand how deep is the intensity of feeling of the representatives of the various provinces. I have listened to and talked with senior people from all of the provinces and from the Government of Canada and I can verify the statements of honourable senators who have expressed the fears and concerns of many people in all parts of this country. Many of these fears will be unfortunately fed by the contents of this document that we have here before us today.

I could not share the opinion, or at least the observations, expressed by some, that the premiers of the various provinces are greedy, grasping, power-hungry little people who are trying to wrestle control of the country away from the central government. I assign to them some higher motives—the motives of doing their duty as they were elected to do, the duty of fulfilling their responsibilities as the premiers of their various provinces, and the terribly difficult task of protecting the regional and provincial interests of the people in their areas, in the light of the tremendously growing power of the Government of Canada.

I do not mean that in a negative way. The very facts of economics and of the social evolution of the country are such that more and more spending power—and I emphasize "spending power"—is centered here in the Government of Canada. Yet the responsibilities and obligations of the governments in the various provinces have increased far out of proportion of their ability to deal with them. As they struggle to hold on to the powers to fulfil their constitutional responsibilities, it must often appear to Canadians generally, who watch the proceedings on television, or who read about it in the journals and papers, that these people are indeed hell-bent on unseating the Government of Canada, and on enhancing and enlarging what appear to be their own small, petty little kingdoms or fiefdoms.

Honourable senators, to the people who live in these areas—for many of whom, for all practical purposes, the whole world revolves around their particular part of a particular province—these are not fascinations of petty princelings; these are people earnestly and sincerely trying to protect, in many cases, an individual lifestyle or culture, and certainly trying to protect what they see as the rights of the people in these particular parts of Canada. They all, without exception, think of themselves as Canada.

The positions of the provinces, as I have said, have been expressed with very intense feeling over the years, and now we come to the unwholesome sight of six of these provinces taking the Government of Canada to court.

For 53 years, as some people very dramatically say, the Constitution of Canada lay untroubled and untroubling in the vaults of Westminster, and it didn't really concern all that many people in Come-By-Chance, or Little Heart's Ease or Joe Batts Arm. You would be absolutely amazed at the number of Sunday mornings you could stand on the church steps in Holyrood, and nobody would mention the Constitution of Canada at all. Many of them would be quite willing to talk about the number of squid in Conception Bay on a particular Sunday, but very few would express concern about the fact that the Constitution still lay a-mouldering in Westminster.

Nevertheless, it is a very important subject, and one that really should be dealt with, and has to be dealt with, but the kind of gloss on the cake, the kind of window-dressing, that is conjured up when you talk about 53 years of fighting and struggling and striving to get our Constitution back from these Brits is really overdoing the case, and does not add anything to what we are setting out to accomplish.

Honourable senators, during these past 10 or 12 years in particular the leaders of our country have made very serious attempts to have the Canadian Constitution reside in Canada. There can be no doubt that all those leaders, federal and provincial, wanted that Canadian Constitution here in Canada. The fact that these well-intentioned people could not agree on all the points at issue over that period of time graphically illustrates the seriousness with which they all felt the problem deserved to be handled. It is humiliating and demeaning, I agree, to have the Canadian Constitution as part of British law. It should be Canadian. All the first ministers, and I suspect all Canadians, feel the same way. So that one common thread that kept bringing all these people back to the conference table was that desire to patriate what we call, for the sake of convenience, the Canadian Constitution, but which is really only part of the Canadian Constitution, namely, the British North America Act.

Honourable senators, each of the people around those tables had concerns and responsibilities quite apart from that. As I mentioned earlier, they have responsibilities and concerns for the social well-being of the people, the economies of and job creation in their provinces, and for the responsibilities they share with the federal government. The federal government, however, cannot, by its very nature, sitting here in Ottawa, be as close to these day-to-day problems and concerns as can the provincial premiers and ministers. Many of you here know what I am talking about. Many of you have shouldered these burdens in the provinces.

The people at those conference tables had to represent, by their very mandate, the aspirations of their people, their ambitions and their interests. That is the way it should be. That is what the provinces are for. This is, after all, a federal state. It is not a unitary state. These people do not come up to the banks of the Rideau once a year to receive their instructions, carved on stone, and then go back out to the boondocks to cater to the whims of the peasants for the rest of the year. They have to deal with these problems on a daily basis, and when they come here they like to feel that they are sitting as equals around a table to discuss their problems, both common and individual.

But, honourable senators, that does not make these provincial governments any less Canadian. I feel that it makes them more Canadian, because they demonstrate a unique system, a Canadian system, a system that has worked awfully well for an awfully long time. That system has worked so well, I would suggest, as to make Canada perhaps one of the really non-violent, peaceful, democratic countries in the western hemisphere or, indeed, the world. We are having a lot of trouble, turmoil and strife now, but thank God it is verbal strife, and I see no suggestion that it is ever going to be anything else. That, in itself, is a tremendous recommendation for the system we have in place, and that is one of the reasons why I tremble at the thought of this spontaneous, unilateral rocking of this relatively comfortable boat that we have been sitting in for so long.

● (1700)

I have talked about the Canadian way, and the Canadian way means to talk, compromise and negotiate to work out a solution—albeit not a perfect solution, but work out a solution of sorts and negotiate again. Let me give honourable senators an example of what I mean by the Canadian way of discussion and resolution of problems.

Honourable senators, you must excuse me, I have to be sure my Newfoundland accent does not get carried away; it plays havoc with Hansard. I have to try and stay away from "boojit," and words like that.

Through this system of discussion and compromise, this great and unique fiscal arrangements system that we have in Canada came into place. It was not done by unilateral decree or by confrontation with the provinces; it was done by evolution, and through meetings and discussions held over many years.

A system has been devised that is uniquely Canadian, and through not only the best known part of that system which is the equalization part, but through the various cost-sharing programs or the extended program financial arrangements, reasonable levels of health service and hospital care, post-secondary education, roads and transport systems, and a host of other services which the have-not provinces could never hope to provide for their residents from their own limited funds, have been made possible.

You might say that this principle is not unique and that most federal states make funds available to their less fortunate regions; but the Canadian system is different. It makes the funding available by a pre-arranged formula, to be administered by the individual provinces in areas of provincial constitutional jurisdiction, without in any way diminishing the identity of the province; without watering down the distinctiveness; and without attempting to melt down the cultural and historic identities of the various regions. This system, which really has not disturbed anyone through its evolution or administration, is distinctly Canadian and one of which we can be very proud.

I mention these fiscal arrangements in some detail, honourable senators, as an example of how the federal system, as now operating, can produce devices that bind us together as a nation. There are many others, but this resolution, unfortunately, is not one of them.

Honourable senators, the principle of patriation, which many would have us believe is the essence of this matter, is not an issue. As I have said, indeed as most people who have addressed this question have said, we are all for simple patriation. That is not the issue. Patriation of our Constitution is a good thing, but the essence of this resolution is not patriation. This proposal goes far beyond that laudable aim and asks the British Parliament to amend our Constitution right there in the United Kingdom.

How the Canadian government and its defenders can, on the one hand, give as their prime motivation for bringing back our Constitution the shame of having it in the United Kingdom and, on the other hand, ask the British Parliament to amend it for us in this nineteenth-century colonial style, is surely a strange and contradictory set of circumstances.

My friends, what is really at the essence of the resolution which we are now discussing is a basic and fundamental change in our Constitution and in our form of government. A number of basic and fundamental changes are proposed to our Constitution. This resolution before us proposes that we ask a foreign nation—albeit a friendly, much admired and respected country but, nevertheless, a foreign nation—to enact for us very large and important changes. This, surely, is an unthinkable insult to the Parliament and the people of Canada, for changes as basic and fundamental as these to be debated in a foreign legislature will be a source of amusement in the capitals of the world and a shame to Canadians for some time to come.

Honourable senators, I note that the Leader of the Government in the Senate assured us in his recent statement in this chamber that, on its presentation to this house or to the other place, ample opportunity will be given to members in both places to debate and discuss the committee's report. I am pleased to hear this but, like Senator Steuart, I am concerned as to how meaningful our discussion will be and what opportunity we will have to make amendments, but I look forward to a free-wheeling, unmuzzled debate in both chambers. I think this will be helpful, but we will see how meaningful it will be as time goes on.

In my opinion, we should be reading or listening to the debate in the other place so that this chamber of sober second thought could have the benefit of the opinions of representatives of the various constituencies in that place, but that is not to be. It has been decreed that this important matter should be out of committee by December 9. By that date we must have this embarrassment ready for the British government to deal with. We must have it ready so that the British Parliament can do for us what the Supreme Court has said the Canadian Parliament may not do.

Honourable senators, we were sent here to defend the rights and interests of our provinces and our regions and to articulate their concerns in this place. In so doing, we will be no less Canadian for it. My pride in being Canadian and my admiration for the Canadian federal system and its institutions in no way detracts from my responsibility to my province and to my region, and it is in this context that I address my remarks.

During the series of constitutional conferences to which I referred earlier, the representatives of the Province of Newfoundland put forth the position of that Province and outlined its hopes for the future of its citizens. Needless to say, we, in our province, were bitterly disappointed when the Prime Minister, despite the support of the other nine provinces, refused to recognize Newfoundland's offshore mineral claims. Our request for major input in national fishery policy was denied as well, despite the entire rationale for the being of our province is the fishery. Our history and heritage is based on the fishery, and many contend, and I agree, that the fishery is our long-term future. We were denied. The story of our hydro transmission right-of-way requests is also well known to honourable senators.

I could go into great detail on all three of these items which are so crucial to the orderly development of Newfoundland and Labrador, but perhaps this is not the time. I will impose later on honourable senators to put forth Newfoundland's position on these matters. The final shot has not been fired in these battles, and I hope the fight will be taken up at another time.

As I have said, the people of the province and their provincial government were and are bitterly disappointed because they feel that the Government of Canada does not understand their position. Though these matters are vital, they can wait for another day. The major concern in our province today cannot wait. According to the Prime Minister's timetable, this package must be ready by Christmas.

We agree that patriation is fine. An amending formula, if one can be found and agreed upon, is also fine. An amending formula which places the territorial or cultural integrity of my province in jeopardy is certainly not fine. Any amending formula which allows a decision of major import to any province—in my case, Newfoundland—to be decided by a simple majority referendum by national or regional voters in this country is totally unacceptable. We cannot be expected to have questions, which vitally affect one province, to be decided by a majority referendum held in other provinces. It is possible now that the Prime Minister shares these concerns. I note that in a recent address he agreed to look at this question.

● (1710)

Honourable senators, let me offer, if I may, two examples to illustrate my apprehension. These illustrations are much discussed in the province of Newfoundland today—some saying they are impossible and others saying they are not. One of them is the denominational educational system. Under the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada of 1949, article 17 was inserted to protect this unusual educational system. In some other provinces variations of this system can be found, but nowhere else is the system protected by the Constitution as it is by article 17 of the Terms of Union.

We have a denominational educational committee representing the various religions in the province, and the government of our province is obligated to pay an equal per capita amount to each denomination which, in turn, passes it on to its respective denominational school boards. These boards, in turn, control the building of schools, the curricula, the staffing, and the whole detail. Very often you have three complete systems operating at the same time in the same community. Is it wasteful? In terms of money, it certainly is. Is it efficient? In terms of efficiency and in terms of duplication, it certainly is not efficient. But the people of Newfoundland would have it no other way. They are more than willing to take the expense and the inefficiencies as part of the cost of having religion and morality in their schoolrooms.

Honourable senators, I do not expect the majority of the taxpayers of Canada to see this system in the same light as we see it in Newfoundland. But these same taxpayers, through equalization and through post-secondary education payments, are paying, at least in part, for this system. I could understand their wanting at some later date to change this system through a referendum. After all, it isn't all that efficient. I can understand it, but I cannot accept it, and I won't accept it.

Some honourable senators say this will not happen. Some talk about section 42, section 43 and section 47, and some talk about the British North America Act as it now stands, and some talk about this referendum, which may be decided on a regional basis—a majority of the people in a region. A majority of the people in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick may very well decide what will happen in Newfoundland. We will never have a deciding vote on that. Prince Edward Island would be in the same position. There is no room for "maybe's" in a constitution.

Another matter that haunts the people of Newfoundland right now is the Labrador boundary. All Canadians are not happy with the present boundary. Many Canadians do not, to this very day, recognize the Labrador boundary. In Newfoundland we have only 500,000 people. Are they to be ruled by referendum when the majority of the voters reside elsewhere? Surely not, say honourable senators opposite. Indeed, all honourable senators here would say surely not. But that possibility exists in this document as we see it now. Is it possible that at some time in the future some people in governments, who are not as sympathetic as the people in all the various jurisdictions today, might decide, for the sake of vacating one province at the expense of another, to change a boundary or change an educational system, or change this or that which we can't even foresee at the present time, by referendum? The prospect of constitutional change by referendum is frightening.

Let me give you some thoughts that a former Canadian Minister of Finance put forward recently about patriation generally and about referenda particularly. These comments are from a speech the former Minister of Finance, John Turner, made in Regina recently, so that most of the references are to the west. There is far more interest in the west at the present time. They have a lot of financial clout. Maybe we'll join that lucky club some day.

In talking about patriation, Mr. Turner opens by saying:

> What about the Liberals in western Canada? Their position has been deteriorating ever since the retirement of Mackenzie King. What are the reasons? I think among them is the fault of attracting enough men and women to the party who have represented the main stream of western thinking. But failure in policy has been the principal reason. The Liberal Party has been unable to come to grips with western alienation. The decision-making fulcrum of the party is seen to be Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto. The Liberal Party has not succeeded in permitting policies relating to freight rates, tariffs, investment and energy that meet the rest of western Canadian ambition.

He then talks in some detail about the resource situation in western Canada, and goes on to talk about the constitutional proposals put forward by the federal government:

> Some observations are pertinent. The constitutional resolution may be too wide to achieve consensus in the country. It has already been attacked by six provinces. Patriation alone would meet general acceptance from most Canadians, but patriation without a satisfactory amending formula could hamstring the country. An amending formula which could be imposed by a national referendum where the federal Parliament could dictate the formula and the wording of the question might provoke division and resentment.
> Referenda don't work too well in a parliamentary democracy particularly in a federal state. As Mr. Blakeney put it so well before the Conference of First Ministers held on open TV—this country is based on a consensus of two majorities, one expressed through its Parliament in Ottawa and another expressed through the collective wills of our people represented by their provincial legislatures.
> The referendum might override this delicate balance. A question might be accepted in some parts of the country and opposed in others. The constitutional formula is too complicated to be reduced to a simplistic yes or no form. The referendum procedure undermines representative democracy under which we elect men and women to study these questions and decide them for us. One wonders whether under our system the referendum is really necessary. If an issue is important enough, the will of the people can be tested at any time in a general election. And finally, the referendum which is worded in Ottawa and reinforced by opinion polls and advertising paid for at the taxpayers' expense might unduly weight the question against provincial interests.

Patriation with a formula for amendment should be completed before substantial amendments to our Constitution are proposed. Despite declamations to the effect that we have the most decentralized country in the world, the trend since the depression and the post-war reconstructions has been a centralizing one. Within the current political imperatives of our country, some decentralization is probably necessary to satisfy the ambition of the people of Quebec and western Canada.

These words are not mine but the words of John Turner. I very happily associate myself with them.

To return to my own theme, honourable senators, I just mention two possibilities that are of concern in the Province of Newfoundland right now. Who knows what might come up in the future. A majority outside a province might want a change inside a province at the expense of a minority. We can only conjecture or suppose. Many honourable senators and many learned people say this could not happen; I know just as many learned gentlemen say that it could happen. I would suggest we are building here a guaranteed annual income for the legal fraternity, and I rather suspect that they don't really need it.

● (1720)

Perhaps, if honourable senators prefer, we could refer it to the Supreme Court now before the resolution goes to the United Kingdom. We could resolve it there and tell the people of Canada that we have it written by the Supreme Court that this is not a problem at all, that their territory and cultural integrity are protected, and will be forever. As it sits now, honourable senators, it is just not acceptable and really is not a document worthy to be included in any Constitution.

There are many other problems I have with the document before us. The Charter of Rights was mentioned a few minutes ago. I feel that that leaves a lot to be desired. I have received one letter already from a concerned group, and I am sure most other senators have received letters as well. I received a letter from a group of handicapped people who feel that their rights are not protected in the Charter of Rights. They had no worries before that, because they were in the same boat as the rest of us. Now they are suddenly excluded from having any rights, and they are concerned about that.

I noticed, while flipping through this document, that the right to own property is not included in the proposed Charter of Rights. That is passing strange, because in the Diefenbaker bill the right to property is expressly laid out. If that whole section of the Diefenbaker bill were transposed to this proposed bill, then property rights suddenly slipped off the table. Certainly I am not cynical enough or suspicious enough to suggest that there is some motive behind that, but others in Canada may not share my trusting nature and may think that there is a reason for that. In any event, I should like to examine that.

In my opinion, and in the opinion of people far more knowledgeable than I, such a list of rights really limits one's rights. The more one looks at that list, the more one realizes that people are excluded. People are really not protected at all, except those people who want to get paid for the litigation that comes out of this.

Like my friend opposite, I like the United Kingdom's system. I would have thought, from the colonial subservience with which we are now approaching the British Parliament, that the framework of this document would have been like the British system. I would challenge any senator, or anybody for that matter, to show me a country with an entrenched charter that has something to equal Speaker's Corner in Hyde Park on a Sunday morning. I have watched row upon row of demonstrators marching down the streets of London with all the protection any country in this world could be asked to provide. At one demonstration held in London I saw a group of Irish people, who were presumably working in London, or whatever Irish people do in London, marching down the streets denouncing the British government for the troubles in Ireland. Young British soldiers have been killed or maimed in Northern Ireland, yet these Irish people were marching down the streets of London demanding that the troops be removed, and they had thousands of British policemen protecting them. I cannot imagine any other country in the world where that would be tolerated or accepted. I cannot find a thing in the British Constitution that even suggests that this be done.

Senator Bosa: They are discussing it now.

Senator Doody: The British have been discussing constitutional matters for thousands of years, and I hope they continue to discuss them for thousands of years to come, but I pray God that they never try to set them down on paper.

Honourable senators, there are many troublesome things with respect to this resolution. Many have been discussed by other senators, and in a far more capable way than I could ever hope to discuss them. I will not repeat them, but I must repeat my conviction that we have an obligation to our provinces. As Senator Steuart suggested, we have an obligation to the provinces by virtue of our being here, and by virtue of being members of a political party. I think we have to seriously look at our obligation, look at our terms of reference and think of these problems when we think of our mandate. I think we have to make certain, as far as we can, that all the premiers of all the provinces are given ample time to present their cases at the joint committee hearings. I will even go so far as to invite the leaders of the opposition parties from the provinces to make sure that the Liberal Party gets some representation.

In any event, I think we have an obligation to look at the provincial interests and to express them in this chamber and to make sure that the provinces are heard.

Senator Flynn: Mr. Ryan will be invited for sure.

Senator Doody: I know the Government of Newfoundland has indicated that it will send a delegation to Westminster to present Newfoundland's case. I can well understand that, because the Terms of Union of 1949 were written at a time when the Government of Newfoundland was really a ward of the United Kingdom. The Constitution had been suspended and was in safekeeping in Westminster. The government at that time denoted us as a ward of the United Kingdom. We entered into a marriage with Canada, and the United Kingdom was the father and the giver of the bride. I would sincerely trust that the father of the bride has not lost interest in this ward and will protect us in the court of opinion in the United Kingdom.

I also hope, honourable senators, that we manage to have a clause-by-clause examination of that document. Like Senator Steuart, I do not know how productive it will be in terms of amendments, but I do know that it will certainly be useful in terms of airing the concerns or letting various senators discuss the problems they see from the viewpoint of their provincial and regional responsibilities.

Honourable senators, there are many other comments I could make. I have other notes here, but in the interest of peace, order and good government—and the other declaratory powers which I think should remain in the Constitution—and in the interest of a new era of peace which has been found in this chamber, I thank honourable senators for their forebearance and I will take my seat.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I listened with great interest to my honourable friend, colleague and fellow Newfoundlander, Senator Doody. He has spoken with his usual brilliance and wit. I must say that I am in agreement with him with respect to most of what he has said, but there are some points on which I will diverge, but that is to be expected.

I wish to congratulate Senator Doody and others who have spoken in this debate. While we do not all agree, I do think that for the most part those who have spoken have spoken in moderation and have been reasonable. Without any exception, I think their speeches have been characterized by a genuine concern for the future of our nation.

I had intended to speak on a number of aspects of the general proposition before us, but inasmuch as we are running short of time—and I appreciate there are others who wish to speak—I am deleting all but one of the aspects. Perhaps I will have a chance to come back to those I am deleting at a future date.

As I understand it, the present motion is designed simply to authorize the creation of a committee to study and report on certain constitutional proposals advanced by the Government of Canada. Approval of the committee in no way indicates approval of the proposal. It is important that we make that distinction right away. The fact that I may vote for the formation of the committee does not mean I necessarily approve the matters which that committee will consider. Presumably, the full Senate will have a chance to debate the committee's recommendations. This being so, it seems to me, at any rate, that there is no valid reason for me to vote against the present motion.

• (1730)

I have been greatly interested in all of the speeches in this debate so far, and I was especially interested in Senator Cook's speech when we debated the matter of the proposed resolution earlier. I find myself in agreement with a number of points which he made, but not with all of his conclusions, particularly his feeling that, to use his actual words, "this strong central government is shafting Newfoundland." I cannot go along with that. He did not spell out in detail what he had in mind, and perhaps he will do that in a speech later in this debate, or some subsequent debate.

We are all aware that the Premier of Newfoundland has taken forceful objection to some of the constitutional proposals, stating his unequivocal conviction that if these proposals are adopted, it would be possible for Newfoundland's boundaries to be changed or her denominational system of education abolished without the consent of Newfoundland.

As Senator Doody pointed out, these are very serious charges so far as Newfoundland is concerned, and I agree with him 100 per cent. As one might expect, there is already some apprehension and agitation among our people at this very moment. I do not intend to get into a dissertation on our educational history, but I think I should add a little to that which Senator Doody has already given us.

For over 200 years—and this may not be known to a great many Canadians—Newfoundlanders were fighting, both literally and figuratively, to get title to what they considered to be their rightful claim, both on the Island of Newfoundland and in the territory of Labrador. It was not until 1904 that a settlement was finally reached with respect to the Island of Newfoundland itself. Up until that year, and for 200 years preceding it—in fact, back as far as the Treaty of Utrecht in 1714—Newfoundlanders were hindered and, in some cases, physically prevented from taking advantage of their claim because a foreign country, France, claimed the sole right to utilize about one-half of the coastline of the Island of Newfoundland for fishery purposes, thereby precluding any settlement by Newfoundlanders or, for that matter, any fisheries. It was not until 1904 that that was settled. It was more than 20 years later, in the 1920s, before the Labrador boundary was settled to Newfoundland's satisfaction by a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council at Westminster. That decision stated that Newfoundland was entitled to all of that part of the Labrador Peninsula which is now delineated as part of the Province of Newfoundland.

Then in 1948 our Terms of Union with Canada stated that Newfoundland's boundary in Labrador recognized by the Judicial Privy Council at Westminster would be the one recognized by the Government of Canada. Canada, in agreeing to the Terms of Union, which are now part of the British North America Act, accepted that boundary, and it was adopted in 1948.

Turning now to education, during the early part of the nineteenth century, Newfoundland's population was composed, almost equally, of Irish Roman Catholics and English Protestants. The discord and the animosity—indeed, the outright hostility and military confrontations—between those two groups was greatly reduced when the Irish Catholics were guaranteed the right to establish and operate their own schools, a right which was subsequently accorded to several branches of the Protestant churches, including the Anglican Church and the United Church, which was then the Methodist Church.

Most Canadians, I am sure, would be surprised to hear me speak of military confrontations between those two groups, but actually that was the case. The last military confrontation was as late as 1883 when Newfoundlanders of those two different cultural and religious backgrounds were murdering one another at Conception Bay, the ancestral home of my honourable friend, Senator Doody. That discord, that animosity that had characterized relations between the two groups was greatly reduced with the introduction of the denominational school system, and that denominational school system was entrenched in the Terms of Union. If it had not been entrenched in the Terms of Union, there would not have been a snowball's chance of Newfoundland ever becoming part of the Canadian nation.

The churches themselves have the right to exercise co-operative action, and have done so repeatedly. Some 12 or 15 years ago, the major Protestant churches in Newfoundland integrated their educational services and relinquished any right that they might have individually to their respective schools.

I do not entirely agree with Senator Doody in terms of the duplication of services as a result of the denominational educational system. In addition to the Roman Catholic Church, there is at least one other denomination, the Pentecostal Church, which exercises the right to operate its own schools. So there are a few communities where you might find as many as three different denominational schools. But the amount of duplication, to my mind, has always been grossly exaggerated. It is not, in my opinion, a very serious factor in the cost of carrying on education in the Province of Newfoundland.

The Roman Catholic Church still operates its own schools, and that church, you must remember, comprises almost 40 per cent of the population. It exercises that right with the full co-operation of the Protestant churches of Newfoundland.

Newfoundlanders, no matter what their religion, would not take kindly to any amendments to the Constitution or to any decisions, whether by the Supreme Court or any other body, which could impinge, directly or indirectly, on their control over education or which could eliminate or modify the denominational educational system without the consent of the Government of Newfoundland.

I, for my part, have examined the constitutional proposals over and over, trying to determine, to my own satisfaction—and many honourable senators will know that my early background was in the field of education—whether or not the fears in respect of education are justified. I have arrived at the conclusion that the possibility that Newfoundland's system would be imperilled is, for all practical purposes, non-existent, and that if such a theoretical possibility does exist, the chances of its being invoked are, I think, astronomically remote. I recognize, however, the possibility that I could be wrong.

With respect to the boundary, I, along with many others, find myself in an ambivalent position. In a telegram to me – and I believe others received it—Premier Peckford states, and I quote his words:

● (1740)

> Section 47 allows for any section of the Constitution Act to be put to a national referendum. A national referendum can make changes without our consent. Thus section 47 overrules any supposed guarantees in section 43 or any other section of the Act.

That is the end of the quotation from Premier Peckford's telegram.

In a telegram to Newfoundland's representative in the federal cabinet, the Honourable William Rompkey, a copy of which Premier Peckford sent to me, the premier states:

> The Terms of Union do not protect us any more because everything in the Constitution is amendable without our consent. Our rights are clearly not protected when changes in our border and our school system can be made without our consent.

Further on he states:

> The long and short of it is that all of the present rules of the game are at the mercy of a national referendum, a referendum which can make changes without our consent.

For his part, Mr. Rompkey, our representative in the Government of Canada, has consistently and unequivocally asserted that the Newfoundland government is in error in this matter. In one public statement Mr. Rompkey says:

> The Constitutional Resolution as now proposed by Prime Minister Trudeau explicity guarantees the Labrador Border and our Denominational Schools. Two sections of the resolution, sections 43 and 47 are our protection.

Mr. Rompkey's statement—a public statement by the way, a copy of which he provided for me—continues:

> Section 43 provides a special rule whereby amendments that would not apply to all provinces such as Terms of Union would be made with the consent of Parliament and the province concerned. But more than this, section 47 is even more explicit. It says that no amending formula as outlined in the proposed Resolution would apply where the Constitution contains another procedure for making an amendment. The B.N.A. Act of 1871 is clear on this point. The boundaries of provinces can only be changed with the consent of the provinces concerned.

> To top it off, our Terms of Union clearly define our boundaries as including Labrador. The Terms of Union is a solemn contract between us and the rest of Canada. These terms are inviolate unless Newfoundlanders and Labradorians want a change.

The Prime Minister of Canada has been equally firm in his contention that the new proposals would not interfere in the slightest with Newfoundland's basic rights under the Constitution. Thus in a telegram to former Premier Smallwood who had sought the Prime Minister's assurance in this matter, the Prime Minister stated—and his office sent me a copy of the statement and I quote from it verbatim:

> You have asked for categorical assurance that the boundaries of Newfoundland will not be changed without the consent of the Province. I am pleased to be able to give you that assurance. As you were responsible for Newfoundland's joining Confederation, you are aware that our Constitution provides that provincial boundaries cannot be changed without the consent of the provinces concerned. This provision remains unchanged in the new constitutional proposals.

● (1745)

That is from the statement made by the Prime Minister, and which was made public with his approval.

Premier Peckford has stated that he is receiving legal advice on this matter. That is almost axiomatic. I am equally confident that the Prime Minister, although he is himself a constitutional lawyer, would not have made these categorical statements without having sought the best advice available to him.

For my part, although I have been a life-long student of history and political science, I am not a lawyer. So I have done what I consider to be the sensible thing: I have consulted with a number of people who are lawyers. In fact, I have discussed these matters with 12 lawyers, several of whom are well experienced and competent in the field of constitutional law and in federal-provincial relations. So far as I have been able to sum up their opinions, there is no consensus among them regarding this matter.

Several agreed with the Newfoundland Premier; others with the Prime Minister of Canada; and still others expressed the view that in any constitution some degree of theoretical threat might exist, but that in the present case—that is, in the case of the proposed changes to our Constitution—that threat is not serious enough to worry about.

That leaves me somewhat confused, and it is safe to assume that tens of thousands of our Newfoundland people find themselves in the same situation. At one moment you listen to a categorical statement from Premier Peckford; at another moment you listen to another categorical statement from the Prime Minister of Canada, the two statements being completely antagonistic.

But of one thing I am fully confident, honourable senators: if the new proposals do contain the built-in dangers to Newfoundland that Premier Peckford and others see, I, for one, cannot support them. On the other hand, there is the opinion of the Prime Minister and of other constitutional authorities such as our own former colleague, Senator Eugene Forsey, himself a dedicated Newfoundlander by birth, and such as our colleague Senator Goldenberg, who, although he is not here today, has authorized me to use his name in this matter. Senator Goldenberg was for 18 years an adviser to the Newfoundland government on federal-provincial relations, and, as we all know, he is a lawyer with vast experience in constitutional matters. If we were to take their opinion, the opinion of the Prime Minister, of former Senator Forsey and of Senator Goldenberg, then we Newfoundlanders would feel no fears in these matters.

Obviously, we have here at least two schools of thought. I think it needs to be said that this is not a question of the "good guys versus the bad guys." This is not a Hollywood western. It is not a question of heroic defenders of Newfoundland confronted by, and standing up bravely to, others who are anxious or willing to shaft Newfoundland. Both Mr. Peckford and Mr. Rompkey are deeply committed to Newfoundland's welfare—as I am, and also Senator Cook and others. They have their roots deep in Newfoundland, and when one has that, one is not likely to want to shaft the province. My use of the word "shaft" has no reference to the point made by Senator Cook the other day.

● (1750)

I am equally sure that the Prime Minister sincerely believes that Newfoundland's interests are being protected. To me it seems to be a genuine case of differing interpretations. Clearly the draft legislation is ambiguous and confusing, since there is this element of doubt and misunderstanding.

I repeat that we must accept the innate honesty and integrity of the different parties involved here. It follows, therefore, that instead of choosing sides and then proceeding to bash one another, we should insist that the sections concerned be re-examined with a view to eliminating any misunderstanding and confirming to Newfoundland, without any equivocation and without the faintest shadow of doubt, her basic rights in these matters.

I suggest that this should be one of the responsibilities of the committee, if it is formed. If no remedial action is taken, Newfoundland will be split down the middle. Rancor and animosities will be resurrected, with consequent political turbulence and further deterioration in relations between Newfoudland and the Government of Canada.

Make no mistake about this, honourable senators, these matters are of paramount importance to Newfoundland. To my mind, one obvious solution would be an amendment to the proposed legislation, to be considered by the committee, which would state simply and clearly that nothing in the amendments could be construed as enabling the boundaries, or the educational rights or privileges, of any province to be changed without the consent of that province.

No doubt there are other ways that this could be done. The all-important thing is that it be done—that is, that the cause for misunderstanding or apprehension be removed. Therefore, speaking as one of the representatives of Newfoundland in the Senate, I ask the committee, when it is appointed, to regard this matter as one of its priorities. I intend, therefore, to address the following letter to the chairmen of the committee when it is set up:

Gentlemen,

The Premier of Newfoundland and others have alleged that the proposed changes to the Canadian Constitution would be prejudicial to the interests of the Province of Newfoundland in that amendments could be made affecting the basic rights of Newfoundland and Labrador without the approval of that province. Specifically, they have stated that under the procedures for changing the Constitution, Newfoundland's boundaries could be altered and the denominational system of education could be modified or abolished without the province's consent. The Prime Minister of Canada and others have categorically denied that under the proposed changes such action would be possible without the province's consent.

I have myself examined the proposed Constitution amendments minutely without being able to satisfy myself as to the validity or otherwise of the charges. I have consulted with a number of prominent lawyers experienced in constitutional matters but have not been able to find any consensus of opinion among them. Some agree with the Newfoundland government, others feel the Prime Minister is correct, while still others feel that while there might be a theoretical possibility of actions prejudicial to Newfoundland's rights without the province's consent, the chances of such action being taken are astronomically remote to the point in fact where the possibility could be considered ridiculous.

● (1755)

One fact seems to emerge from what I have said above. It is that the proposed legislation is capable of several interpretations. In view of this, as a representative of Newfoundland in the Senate of Canada I feel impelled to draw these conflicting views to the Joint Committee's attention and to request that, among its duties, the Joint Committee include a study of the proposals to determine whether or not Newfoundland's interest could be prejudicially affected and if this is found to be the case, that the Committee recommend whatever changes are necessary to remove from the proposals any possibility whatsoever that the boundaries of the Province could be altered or the denominational system of education changed or abolished without the consent of the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Yours sincerely,

F. W. Rowe,
Senator.

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I enjoyed the honourable senator's speech very much. I always enjoy hearing someone learned in the history of his province or country tell me about it.

I would like to ask the honourable senator a question. This concerns the letter you are proposing to send to the theoretical chairmen of a theoretical committee. I wonder if you would make a small change in it? Perhaps you would consider not using "gentlemen", and never "chairperson" but at all events, some other form than "gentlemen".

Senator Rowe: Thank you. That occurred to me as well. I am sure honourable senators appreciate that this is purely a draft letter, and I assure them that that very important point will be looked at.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, this is Halloween, and it is the time when one hears goblins and other magicians pretending to read the future. I would presume that I would not be terribly unpopular if I asked leave to call it 6 o'clock and move the adjournment of this debate.

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED RESOLUTION FOR A JOINT ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada", tabled in the Senate on 6th October, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I mentioned on an earlier occasion, since the subject matter of this inquiry fully overlaps the subject that is being debated in the chamber right now, I am proposing to say no more. If no honourable senator wishes to speak to this inquiry, I would ask that it be considered as having been debated.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT MOTION WITHDRAWN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I take it that I also will not make anyone too unhappy if I ask leave, under rule 23, to withdraw the following motion in my name:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday, 1st November, 1980, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, and that rules 7(1) and 13 be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, November 3, 1980, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, November 3, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report to Parliament on Immigration Levels, pursuant to section 7 of the Immigration Act, 1976, Chapter 52, Statutes of Canada, 1976-77.

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada, Volume I, Abstract of Statements of Insurance Companies in Canada, for the year ended December 31, 1979, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Insurance Act, Chapter I-17, R.S.C., 1970.

Reports of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76, regarding the following references:

1. Mr. Maurice S. Hébert, Montreal, Quebec, dated October 24, 1980.

2. Mr. Gilles Cossette, Montreal, Quebec, dated October 24, 1980.

3. R. Bratti and Associates Ltd., Concord, Ontario, dated October 24, 1980.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, November 4, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from Friday, October 31, the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That ten Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;

That the Committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the Committee be twelve members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, it is not a cliché to say that I am honoured to be participating in this debate, because it has been a debate of high quality. If, at some future date our future scholars will place alongside the volume Confederation Debates, 1865 the Constitution debates of 1980, I am convinced that those emanating from this historic and little understood chamber will hold a high place for those who care about the real things in their country. But it is not an easy position in which I find myself, because our debate ends today and everyone knows that he who is the beginning of the end is not, indeed, in an enviable position. However, I will endeavour to bear with my heavy responsibilities, trusting to the charity of my colleagues.

There are, in this measure before us, this Address, three basic aspects which lead me not to praise it but to consider it somewhat unworthy, unworkable and most assuredly untimely; or, to put it another way, I am concerned about its contents, its genesis, and its destination—and all those aspects cause me deep concern, profound anxiety and much foreboding.

● (1410)

Many senators have spoken with eloquence and perception about many aspects of the resolution. Particularly have they dealt with the question of entrenchment of rights. I am not so upset about this. If that were the only part that bothered me, I would not be terribly troubled, because while I am not at all bemused with the notion that the mere inscription of rights guarantees a democratic state, I know, too, that tyranny is not confined to those who engrave the rights of citizens on a piece of paper or on a constitutional document. I often think it is a bit unfair constantly to compare Great Britain with the Soviet Union or Paraguay. Probably a better comparison would be with the Republic of France or the Republic of the United States.

Suffice it to say, since one does not want to be repetitive, that two interesting documents, by two people who are not known to be protagonists of my party, did attract my attention, and I commend them to honourable senators. One is a editorial by Mr. Peter Newman, in Maclean's Magazine of November 3, 1980, in which he deals very succinctly with the dangers of western alienation and the dangers of too great reliance on the enshrinement of human rights. The other document was a most interesting interview in an article by Richard Gwyn with A. Alan Borovoy, General Counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association. These are, I think, very valuable and insightful.

On section 44 I fully share the view which many colleagues have so clearly expressed. We know that this chamber retains its untrammelled veto power, unique among second chambers in the world, because it has had the wisdom over many years not to use it. Perhaps there are good reasons for changing that veto to a suspensive or limited one, but I repeat what has been said before: let such a change be openly proposed and openly discussed. The back alley approach of section 44 is, to say the least, and to be as euphemistic as I can be, unseemly.

Section 42 has been seen, and rightly seen, as the most dangerous part of the proposed Joint Address. I am not one, honourable senators, who views the dominion government leaders as solely responsible for our present constitutional discontents, though I might not go quite so far as a brilliant Toronto critic the other day, who, in describing the last conference, said that the premiers came into town like renaissance warlords, and some of them got so carried away with their power that they began to stab each other in the front.

I think we have had enough provincialization in recent years, and we should all remember that the Dominion of Canada is more than a league or an alliance of independent states. Our founding fathers were profoundly right when they saw that the whole must be more important than the parts, or than the sum of the parts. It is therefore not as an emotionally charged provincial rights advocate that I condemn and denounce the provision of the device whereby a federal government can, if thwarted, act as if there were in fact no provinces. Two areas of jurisdiction with their rights before and for their people, are essential to a federation. Sir John A. Macdonald was wise enough to know that he could not get a unitary state. No one should get today what in a perceived deadlock would be essentially a unitary state. Those who see danger in that provision are, I think, making a sound assessment of the situation.

Apart from what is in this package, and what should not be in it, I believe that this is not the time, and most certainly not the atmosphere, in Canada, to bring forward the package at all. Apart from the economic malaise, what is the state of Canada today? What is the climate for constitutional discussions or for profound change in the nature of our state? Not even a cockeyed optimist would say that it is good. The voice of dissent is heard all over the land. Region is against region and more strongly against the national government. Provincial governments are trooping to the courts with actions against the federal government. Confederation by court action is surely not a cheerful chapter and not a good omen for the future. Serious Canadians in the great and growing west are issuing stern warnings. "Alienation" is becoming an inadequate word to express the views of many people in the four western provinces.

● (1415)

I do not very much enjoy personal criticism of people of other parties, but some of the most disturbing utterances on this matter in the last few days have come from the Prime Minister of Canada in his last press conferences here and in the west at a Regina Liberal meeting. To say that there is no western separatism or that it will come to absolute nil, that he can tell the real article from the phoney, and to dub the whole feeling of discontent as mere hysteria is not wise, not helpful and not conducive to assuaging any of those feelings which I am sure everyone here regrets.

I would advise the Prime Minister—and my advice is much more often unheeded than it is wrong—to heed the voices of anger and frustration He should listen to Senators Buckwold and Balfour, to Gordon Gibson, if he can recall who he is, to Robert Andras and to John Turner, if he has not forgotten him. These men recognize the problem, and to recognize it is the beginning of a solution. To minimize or ignore it is the course of danger.

The depressing part of the whole situation, honourable senators, in this current phase of constitutional discussion is that the exercise of itself, an exercise which should lead us to greater plateaus of achievement, to greater heights of common purpose, is exacerbating disunity and divisiveness. Everywhere you look you see people who you would expect to be supportive but who are opposed.

We are enjoined that we must respect the sentiments of the Province of Quebec. We know what the premier in that province thinks, but what are the views of that most eminent man, Mr. Ryan, whose federalism has been proved over many years? He opposes this measure.

Discussions in the other place are broken off by closure. The whole discussion is muddied up with the leaking of dubious documents—if I may again be highly charitable—and costly advertising campaigns that make people wonder, in the name of goodness, what kind of jiggery-pokery is going on in the higher levels of constitutional discussion. I can remember when I used to like geese.

The other day I was looking at the adoption of a Joint Address on a most important constitutional issue in this country, that concerning the adoption of the Statute of Westminster in 1931. In those days the whole matter was dealt with in one day in each of the chambers. In the Hansard of the House of Commons nine pages were devoted to it; in the Hansard of the Senate five pages were devoted to it. We senators were less loquacious then as now. The matter was passed with agreeableness and with unanimity. Why did that happen in 1931? It certainly could not be because the then Prime Minister was a great diplomat—they said he was not. They said he was an autocrat. Why the smooth passage? We must look to the sources, as every scholar should. It is found in the Address itself, and I read the pertinent lines:

● (1420)

> ... pursuant to certain other resolutions made by the delegates of His Majesty's Government in Canada and of the governments of all of the provinces of Canada—

Therefore, it went through in a day and it went through rapido in Westminster because it was based upon consensus. There was consultation; there was consensus; and there was agreement. As Senator Roblin so eloquently put it the other day, legitimacy and consensus are essential to all such processes.

I would be very much ill at ease in voting for an Address which I have already seen create division and disagreement. Part of the problem is the imposition of a deadline. Why is December so sacrosanct? It is the month of Santa Claus, but beyond that, why is it constitutionally so important? And is July 1, 1981, the only date in the calendar, the only epoch in the history of Canada? If this country has survived under this supposedly antiquated British North America Act for so long, why is the calendar—the very week, the very day—now more important than the nation's conscience? I also ask is this present version, this latest version, perfect? Are we sure that even this is the last, best word?

In the academic year 1978-79, while waiting for a government which at that time did not want elections, I gave a course in constitutional government at Mount Allison University, and agreeing with my friend, Dr. Eugene Forsey, that most of the people in Canada have never read the British North America Act, especially those who criticize and condemn it, I was going to make sure that my students would be an exception. So I lugged down about 40 pounds of the British North America Act and distributed it. Then along came Bill C-60, so I lugged down another 100 pounds of that act and all attachments that went with it. Then along came the Pepin-Robarts report, and the poor little devils were given that to study. I wanted them, you see, to be well-informed.

Last week I was down at the same institution as a guest lecturer, and what did I do? I carted down copies of this document. If they weren't such bright young people, as well as being so fortunate, I am afraid that they might think I was either a constitutional hustler or a Grit agent the way I am distributing these things to them. Speaking of the Pepin-Robarts report, I was so sad that for so long my long-time friend and academic colleague, Jean-Luc Pepin, was silent, which is an unusual posture for him because he is a garrulous man and a charming man. There he sat, but just a few days ago I read that he had come out and said that the new idea was pretty good and that he thought it was even better than his own. By one of those curious things that comes along and makes life a bit interesting, the very same day I read that the Vatican had decided, after 350 years that they might re-open the case of Galileo. Perhaps when he said that the sun went around instead of the earth he might get a second chance, and we all remember what happened to poor Galileo and he was made to recant but he muttered "eppur si muove"—nevertheless it still moves. Way down here in the eastern end of the Centre Block I couldn't hear any mutterings that Mr. Pepin made, but I wonder if he may have said "a task force was still better." I wouldn't blame him if he had because we all have the pride of authorship and we love nothing more than our written articles unless it be a speech that we deliver, upon which I must hasten. Part of my anguish is that much of the division of today is not necessary. Too much of it is aided and abetted by brittle confrontation, by deadlining instead of patience, deliberation, and compromise.

● (1425)

One of the wisest men in the world of politics and government was Edmund Burke. He uttered the classic that:

> All government, indeed every human benefit and enjoyment, every virtue and every prudent act is founded on compromise and barter.

It was not easy for our founding fathers to stage plenary conferences in the 1860s, but those politicians in that rough age held 16 conferences between 1836 and 1867, and seven of those in the five years before the event took place.

We heard Senator Tremblay with eloquence and perception talk about the last chance notion and how dangerous that was. It would be a great disservice to declare that we have reached the last chance and now must take brutish action. Not all options should be declared closed before all avenues are explored, and just as constitutional law transcends statute law, so should the process whereby it is achieved be all the more careful, the more full and the more sure.

I am indebted to my friend Senator Murray, who reminded me the other day about a great former Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, who was being chastized for not putting into effect things he had promised during the electoral process that put him into office. He gave this answer, and I thought it was a very good one: "It is better to be right than be in a hurry."

The third thing that disturbs me most—and Borden of course brings this to mind because he was the father of our independence—is that while Borden has been dead for years, we in the 1980s are suffering the indignity of Canadian matters being discussed by parliamentarians of another country. I resent the reversion to a state of being that existed before Borden, and indeed before I. We were competent in all domestic matters long before Borden. That, of course, is why I always bristle when I hear people use the word "patriation." I agree with Senator Molson when he says there is no such word. It is one of these terrible things that come up such as "disincentive," and so forth. If we must use that conglomeration, it must be "repatriation," and I say that because the B.N.A. Act was, in fact, a Canadian document. It was made by Canadian politicians; it was the result of Canadian compromises and Canadian judgments. If we bring it, we are bringing it back. The British simply acted as a sort of notary for us, and that is all they should be doing now, notarizing the document, to use that expression.

The Canada we know was created in Charlottetown and in Quebec City. It is humiliating to have this important process transferred to another country. If I had my way—and I am like Senator Steuart, because I am pretty realistic and do not think I will—I would take this document and send the first 12 pages over to Westminster. I would have them cut that unnecessary but not painful link which left that technicality with them, it being one of their acts. I would suggest that Canadians, in all levels, settle down and make for us in this country, as our fathers did before us, a Canadian Constitution, and not say it is the last chance, not say it must be done by December so that we can get it out by July. Why should those things be in there? I am not sure that there is not still time for us to get into the whole process and make the examination of our country a little larger than 12 men sitting periodically in the old railway station in Ottawa, sometimes going off in all directions, as people in railway stations tend to do. Perhaps we should yet look at the idea which Mr. Diefenbaker had many years ago, and which Mr. Clark has brought up since, that we should have a national convention of interested people, including, but not only including, politicians. It would be the responsibility of the politicians in the end, but the making of a Constitution is a great and noble exercise. It is not a little gesture in self-fulfilment, and certainly it is not a partisan exercise. I do not see how there can be party alignment to a great Constitution.

● (1430)

Honourable senators, I have left to the last a subject which is particularly close to my heart. To say "last but not least" would be redundant. There is something in the proposed Address which is inimical, to say the least, to the province which I have the honour to represent. It undermines the status of my province, and that makes it all the more painful. That it should be an iniquitous action against the birthplace of Confederation is ironically and tragically a trampling of history and a brutal disregard of our roots and our foundations.

Since 1864 Prince Edward Island has had a special place in this Confederation, although we did not join until 1873. We were proud of the designation "the Cradle of Confederation," and while it was the smallest of the provinces, it was by no means least or last in its contributions to the country to whose institutions it had given so much and whose basic political structure, in the words of Sir John A. Macdonald, had indeed been outlined in detail in Charlottetown in 1864.

But under what we are discussing today, under the new constitutional structure, Prince Edward Island will have a puny role indeed, an inglorious place in a new Canada. As my successor in the House of Commons, a brilliant young man, Mr. McMillan, put it, there are under the Joint Address provisions three types of provinces; the first-class ones—and there are just two riding first class, Ontario and Quebec; then seven second-class provinces which, individually, can combine with one other of that group to be either a veto to oppose or a vehicle to put something through; and the third class being Prince Edward Island.

The population of Prince Edward Island is so small that there is no other province in the Atlantic region with which Prince Edward Island can join to form half of the population of the Atlantic region. We cannot unite with one other province and become 50 per cent of the population. I do not have to say what would happen in a national referendum. We would be snowed under—our voice mute; our views unheard.

I do not suggest that the little province of Prince Edward Island have a veto in all matters. We are realistic. However, there were other proposed formulae in the past which were not quite so brutal; which did not simply say, "Well, they are only 120,000 people out of 20 million," forgetting that they were one province out of ten, which they are. When you ruthlessly discard that recognition, something is wrong.

Canada was anxious to have Prince Edward Island in 1873. It was first proposed that we be given four seats in the House of Commons, but the Islanders refused to enter into Confederation unless they were given six, which they got. Then it was cut down to five, and then four. And what is keeping it from going down further?—the British North America Act, which is supposed to be no good. Section 51A decrees, and rightly so in a democracy, that no province shall have fewer members in the elected house than it has in the appointed house. But under this resolution the Senate itself would be undermined. The British North America Act will be torpedoed out of existence, and the so-called senatorial floor which gives the province of Prince Edward Island four voices and four votes in a growing House of Commons will find that guarantee gone, and probably gone forever. Whether the Senate will share its fate, we do not know.

So our province has in store for it perhaps one of the most cruel assaults upon its individuality, upon its provincial status, and upon its proud place in this dominion, the locale for the birth of which it provided in 1864.

I can say that such unfair, unnecessary and unjust depredations of our rights must be resisted—and that they will be resisted, let no one have any doubts.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, during this debate it is of paramount importance for all of us to make our opinions known so that if the joint committee is established, the senators who serve on it will have been given clear guidelines by us for the conduct of the inquiry.

[Translation]

I intend to vote in favour of the motion. Like most Canadians, I find it ridiculous and humiliating to have to go to Westminster every time we want to amend our Constitution. I hope 1980 will be the last year we have to do that.

[English]

There are three specific sections of the resolution that I want to mention briefly. First, it is my considered opinion that a Charter of Human Rights must be entrenched in our new Constitution. I reached this conviction long before the proposed resolution came to this house, long before Parliament passed the present Human Rights Act and long before the First Ministers' Conference in Victoria in 1971. I also thought the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights should have been entrenched in the Constitution.

Why have I felt so strongly about this for so long? The answer is that I lived in Montreal during the 1930s. I will never forget my dismay and anxiety over the potential effect of the infamous Padlock Law on human rights.

Later, when I was living in Manitoba, my belief in the necessity for entrenchment was strengthened when the Alberta Accurate News and Information Act attempted to restrict freedom of speech in the press. Fortunately, the Supreme Court declared those laws to be ultra vires. But that does not alter the fact that any legislature at any time can pass similar outrageous laws restricting human rights that do lie within its jurisdiction. Of course, Parliament has the same power.

As we all know, certain rights concerning language, education, and the conduct of Parliament are already entrenched in the B.N.A. Act.

The decision of the Supreme Court on October 10, 1979, in regard to schools and statutes in Quebec and Manitoba is an example of why entrenchment is necessary. It is also, I think, an example of why action should be taken by the courts in less than 90 years, which seems rather a long time.

There is one other caveat I should like to make. I think that if we begin to lose confidence in our courts, if we make fun of them and denigrate them, we will be doing great harm to our whole social order and to our constitutional system. In any case, all that the proposed resolution does is to add to the list of entrenched rights and make them apply to every part of Canada.

Entrenchment is also important in order to set at rest the fear of discrimination of women, minority groups, and immigrants who have come from countries where people are still persecuted because of their religion, the colour of their skin or their place of birth. Women are not a group or a numerical minority, but they are still a psychological, economic and sociological minority which has been discriminated against for centuries.

They feel deep anxiety about losing the protection against discrimination which has now been given them by provincial Human Rights Acts and the federal Human Rights Act. They want to be sure that only an amendment to the Constitution, which requires a great deal of negotiation and debate, can deprive them of long fought for rights and opportunities.

My second point is that the joint committee should direct its attention to the wording of every single clause of the proposed resolution.

[Translation]

Honourable Eugene Forsey told us many times that we often receive from the other place poorly drafted bills which must be amended by this house. This resolution is no exception.

• (1440)

[English]

In particular, I think that the committee should give careful consideration to the wording of section 15(1) in regard to equality before the law and to the equal protection of law without discrimination because of sex. I say that, because reliable lawyers have warned the women's organizations that the wording of that section does not give women adequate protection against discrimination. I do not question the intent of this section. I am sure the government wants to protect the rights of women. I congratulate it on subsection (2) of the section which makes affirmative action programs possible. It will now be the committee's responsibility to make sure that the intent of that section is so well expressed that it cannot be misinterpreted by any court in the land.

My third point has been mentioned several times in this house. Like so many other senators, I am worried about section 44. As several senators have pointed out; it would be exceedingly difficult for us to justify voting against an amendment that had been agreed to by the provinces under the Victoria formula as well as by the other place. On the other hand, it would be irresponsible to vote for an amendment that proposed such an unworkable and chaotic upper house as has been suggested in Bill C-60, or in Ryan's beige paper, or in Premier Bennett's proposal.

In any case, 90 days would be a very short time for the Senate to give an amendment the study in depth that it is our responsibility to give. Senators ought, surely, to have a year or at least six months to prepare a reasonable case for or against a proposed amendment.

When discussing a 90-day suspensive veto, the committee would do well to take a look at the powers of the upper house in other countries. For example, in Great Britain, in the Mother of Parliaments, the Commons and the House of Lords were equal up until 1911. At that time, Lloyd George reduced the powers of the Lords in regard to money bills and also did away with the right of absolute veto and imposed a suspensive veto. In 1949, this delaying power of the Lords was again reduced. In 1967, Prime Minister Harold Wilson once again reduced the length of time of the suspensive veto. At present, the House of Lords can delay a bill for two consecutive sessions spread over one year. The one year is there so that the government cannot reduce the time of the suspensive veto by calling a session which only lasts for a day and then saying that there have been two sessions and the legislation can go forward at once.

Britain doesn't have a written Constitution and is a unitary state; so, of course, this only applies to bills, not to amendments.

In conclusion, and this I speak from my heart, I feel strongly that we have already gone too far in eroding the necessary powers of the federal government. The present posture of the premiers in regard to the proposed resolution, as well as some of the members of the other house, and even of some of the members of this house, is doing great harm to Canada. Their behaviour is turning Canadian against Canadian. Their behaviour is undermining the confidence we have in ourselves as well as the confidence other countries have in us. Right now, other countries have the impression that we are committing national suicide.

On October 12, a syndicated article, by a Professor of International Relations at the University of Virginia, was published by the very authoritative Washington Post and by other papers in the United States. It is a typical example of the way others see us. The learned professor states that:

> It is time Americans faced up to the reality that Canada, as we have known it, will no longer exist by 1982. This is not yet appreciated in the United States, but the signs that the 113-year old Canadian federation is in the process of breaking apart are very clear in Canada.

Well, honourable senators, we know that is nonsense. As an academic friend said to me the other day, when I quoted that article, "There is nothing worse than a moron with a PhD."

But what is serious, honourable senators, is that articles of that kind are bound to influence the private sector in the United States and the American government, so that they now see us as a country about to break apart like a pie that has been cut into slices. As a result, the administration and the new Congress will regard us as a weak and divided nation that speaks with a small voice and has little clout, when negotiations take place on such vital matters as the East Coast Fisheries Treaty, the Garrison Dam, pollution of the Great Lakes, and other matters that concern the east, the west and central Canada.

Our present image abroad is certainly going to dry up a great deal of the risk investment on which we depend so heavily. Who in his right mind would want to invest or lend money to what is regarded as a fragmented country, about to turn into two or three small, ineffectual nations? This apparent balkanization can only lead to a great loss of world confidence in our future. The results could be a disaster for all of us wherever we live.

One final word: I hope with all my heart that as we draft our new Constitution, each and every one of us in this house will exert maximum forbearance and wisdom. This is a moment in history for us to think as citizens of Canada, regardless of political affiliation and regional loyalty. Our present undertaking is the most difficult and important thing that any of us has ever done, or ever will do, in all our lives.

[Translation]

It is for us a heavy burden, a major responsibility and a great honour.

[English]

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, under the proposed resolution the federal government is asking the British Parliament to pass an act which, basically, would do two things. Actually, the resolution could be divided into two separate parts, although they are not so listed. There is the request to bring to Canada that statute of the British Parliament known as the British North America Act, which is the basis or foundation of our present Constitution; along with that, and as part of that request, the government is asking for an amendment to provide a formula to amend that act in Canada by the federal Parliament.

There is general agreement that this be done, and, indeed, that it could have been done years ago. It was not done years ago because we were more concerned with other matters which we believed to be more important and more urgent. Personally, I believe we still have more important and more urgent matters to consider than bringing the British North America Act to Canada.

At this stage of the debate I do not propose to go into the merits of having the right to amend our own Constitution. I believe we should have it, but on the question of how it should be done I would say only that I believe with those who agree that the B.N.A. Act is not the whole of our Constitution, and, as for amending it, I believe the point of view expressed by Professor Lederman is correct. I do not know whether he could convince a court of law of that, but I do know that his writings have convinced me, and I believe his views are entitled to the highest respect. To my mind, he is the outstanding constitutional expert in Canada.

However, honourable senators, without being in any way anti-British, I must tell you that, personally, it offends my sense of pride as a Canadian to have to go to the British Parliament for anything. Nevertheless, I know that as a practical matter, since the B.N.A. Act is an act of the British Parliament, that Parliament has to amend it. I also appreciate that an amending formula of some kind is essential and will have to be put in the statute by the British Parliament.

● (1450)

Honourable senators, that is as far as I can go. I do not consider that Canada should have to ask, or should ask, the British Parliament for any further action. Yet, under the proposed resolution, that Parliament is to be asked to make a substantial amendment to our Constitution before we receive it. In my opinion, that is wholly wrong. I believe that we in Canada have the ability, the know-how, the political majority and the inclination to make a Constitution in Canada for Canadians.

Personally I feel it is degrading, it is humiliating, that after all these years the Government of Canada still retains a feeling of colonialism. I thought we had cut the ties of colonialism long ago. Yet apparently our government has a feeling of inferiority in relation to the British Parliament, a feeling that Britain can do better than Canada, as an independent country, can do for itself. Personally I want a Canadian Constitution—a Canadian Constitution made in Canada by Canadians for Canadians. I want a Constitution which can be stamped "Made in Canada," and not one which bears the inscription "Made in England," and if anyone tries to tell me that we in Canada are not capable of making a Canadian Constitution, then I wholly and violently disagree. If by chance it is proved that we are not capable of making our own Constitution at this time, then I say leave things as they are until we are capable.

However, I do not think that in this day and age anyone would dare to say that Canadians cannot govern themselves, that we are incapable of making a Canadian Constitution. So there must be some other reason why there is this humiliating approach to the British Parliament, and so far in this debate I have heard nothing which would justify it.

I have noticed that there has been a tendency to try to make the package deal acceptable by intimating that if one is opposed to one part, then one is opposed to the whole deal. Nothing could be further from the true situation. I want to make it crystal clear, if I have not already done so, that I approve the patriation of the B.N.A. Act to Canada with an amending formula, but I am wholly and strongly opposed to having the British Parliament make up a new Constitution, as would be the case under schedule B.

Honourable senators, I do not propose to speak on the various proposals which affect the provinces. They have been debated and explained, and I am enough of a political realist to know that eventually the government will have its way. I simply say this: I think the government is all wrong in its approach to the provinces. I seem to detect an attitude of superiority on the part of the federal government. The idea of co-operative federalism seems to have disappeared and been discarded. The idea of a partnership between the federal and provincial governments appears to have been rejected in favour of a master and servant approach, which I believe can only lead to difficulties and disputes in the future.

Of course, I do not claim that one government is good and another bad, that the federal government is always right or that the provincial governments are always right. I well realize that they are sincere people doing what they believe to be in the best interests of those they represent. So when they do not agree, some compromise must be made.

As I have mentioned, I know that this resolution will be passed, as it is government policy, and I have no doubt that in due course the British Paliament will do as requested. No doubt that Parliament will be surprised or perhaps annoyed to learn that the ties of colonialism are still in existence.

Honourable senators, there would appear to be some uncertainty as to whether Parliament will be given the opportunity to make amendments to the proposed legislation after the joint committee has made its report. If the proposed timetable is adhered to, there will not be sufficient time for the joint committee, before making its report and having it translated and printed, to hear all interested parties and persons who wish to be heard. Also, the time allowed for debate prior to the Christmas recess will certainly not be sufficient for adequate consideration of the report and any amendment, if amendments are permitted. At this point I would say that I consider it to be a strange commentary on our priorities to have such a strict timetable for the debate on this resolution. In contrast, the revision of the Bank Act has taken years to consider, and it is still not completed.

Honourable senators, at this point I wish to speak briefly on one or two matters contained in the proposed resolution. Section 6 has been mentioned which would give to every citizen of Canada the right, among others, to pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any part of Canada. Mention has been made of the need for such a clause because at times, in places where unemployment may be exceptionally high, such a right is abolished or limited. I believe that every citizen of Canada should have the right to move freely anywhere in Canada in order to seek employment, although I can understand and appreciate the pressure on some provincial governments by the unemployed to limit such free movement. As has been mentioned before, a great many people from the eastern provinces have moved to central and western Canada to find employment. Indeed, there is a movement of many people from the eastern provinces to Alberta at the present time.

I agree that to be able to move freely in Canada to pursue the gaining of a livelihood, as the proposed act puts it, or to seek employment, which is the usual wording, is a fundamental freedom. Yet, honourable senators, there is a more fundamental right, a more important right which nowhére is mentioned in the proposed Constitution Act, 1980. The fundamental right I refer to is the right to employment, the right to have the opportunity to work. If this is to be a Charter of Human Rights, then I hope and trust that the joint committee will insist on a new subsection being added which would guarantee to all Canadian citizens the right to have employment—the right to be employed, to be guaranteed a job with a living wage. This is all the more important in this day and age when labour-saving devices of one kind or another are coming more and more into use.

There is no point in our thinking that education, job training and the like will suffice. Many of the new labour-substituting machines are of tremendous complexity, and it is idle to think that even highly trained and highly educated people can operate and maintain them. It is idle to think the ordinary working people can be given a training course to enable them to work with such machines. We must realize and accept the fact that opportunities for employment for the ordinary, average person are becoming less and less. In my opinion, the proposed Charter of Rights and Freedom must have in it the right for all Canadian citizens to full-time employment if they so wish; and if it is not in that charter when it comes to Canada, then it should be inserted once we have it in Canada.

Honourable senators, other sections of the proposed charter have been dealt with by other speakers. I wish to refer to only one other section at this time, and I direct your attention to section 7. It is short and reads as follows:

> Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Just what that means in actual practice, I confess I do not know. It reads well and sounds good, but it is not precise. There is no definition as to what is meant by "the right to life". Does it mean that the unborn have the right to be born and not to be killed before birth? I would hope it does, so that the evil of abortion will at least be diminished. What is meant by "liberty"? I would hope it means the liberty to enjoy good health without the danger to health from pollution of the atmosphere, and of our rivers and lakes. What is meant by the "security of the person"? I would hope it means economic security as well as the security to live in peace protected by good laws and good law enforcement. There is no definition of what is meant by the principle of fundamental justice. If this section is to mean anything it must be improved. It must state just what is meant by the high sounding terms it uses, and if this is not done by the committee then I hope it will be done when it comes to Canada.

● (1500)

Honourable senators, before I close I just want to mention that I wholly agree with the statement by Senator Donahoe in reference to the ownership of offshore lands. As he stated, prior to the creation of Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1905, and the enlargement of Manitoba, Quebec and Ontario, the lands given to these provinces were mutually owned by all Canadians. Yet the interest the maritime provinces had in these lands was extinguished—and extinguished without compensation. At that time there was no land available for the widening of their boundaries. Now there is. There is the land nearby under the water. The boundaries of the maritime provinces can now be enlarged by the addition of land under water which may contain valuable mineral wealth. By agreeing to the widening of the boundaries of these provinces in this manner, the federal government would be righting a wrong and compensating for an old injustice. I do not expect this matter to be dealt with in the proposed legislation of the British Parliament, but again I hope it will be dealt with when we have a Canadian Constitution.

Honourable senators, as you may have gathered from my remarks, I support one part of the proposed legislation, namely, that part which would bring the B.N.A. Act to Canada with an amending formula. I cannot and do not support that part of the proposed legislation which would have the British Parliament, or any other foreign parliament, pass a Constitution Act for Canada. Since the package cannot, or, at least, will not, be separated, I will vote against the motion.

[Senator Macdonald.]

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I am coming rather late into this debate, and there is probably little new that I can add to the excellent speeches that have preceded mine. However, the proposed resolution, and the draft Canada Act, and the Constitution Act, 1980, which it encompasses, are of such importance that I must comment upon them.

There is no doubt that the joint resolution which is the subject of the motion we are debating has ingredients of historic significance to our country. If and when the Constitution Acts, 1867 to 1980, which are the short titles of the proposed constitutional measures, are proclaimed, we shall be immediately subject to their provisions. The real effect of some of those provisions on the citizens and residents of Canada, on the shape and structure of Canada and its institutions, will not be fully felt or understood for many years to come. That is why we, as parliamentarians, have a great responsibility to consider this proposed resolution as carefully and conscientiously as we are able. There is also no doubt in my mind that the vast majority of Canadians, myself included, support the government's objective of patriating the Constitution, and ensuring that in the process we provide the means, when it seems necessary or desirable, of further amendment.

The entire subject matter of the draft resolution, with its many components, is one which I have absolutely no difficulty in supporting in principle. However, I still have a good number of concerns about its contents, and questions which I should like answered. Since the special joint committee to which the resolution is to be referred will have the power to consider and make amendments, and since the government leader in the Senate has advised us that this chamber has the power to deal, as it sees fit and within its rules, with the report that the committee will present, I am sure that during the course of those events most of my misgivings—perhaps some of them are unjustified—will be allayed.

As I listened to Senator Nurgitz's remarks, and then Senator Steuart's on the following afternoon, in which they argued forcibly against the entrenchment in our Constitution of a Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, I thought they sounded familiar—and no wonder. As a common law lawyer, and a person who is interested in human rights, I, too, have held and expressed similar doubts. Honourable senators will recall that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs established a subcommittee on the Constitution just before our last summer adjournment. One of its mandates was to consider and make recommendations with respect to a Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms. That particular task was given to a very small working group composed of Senator Donahoe, Senator Frith and myself, all of whom were trained in the common law.

We spent a good deal of our time during the summer trying to digest learned articles, and weighing the arguments for and against entrenchment of such a charter. Unfortunately, we were not in a position to make our report before other events overtook us. I cannot speak for any other member of that working group, but I can tell you that I started out as a non-believer, and ended up a believer, on the question of entrenchment. The final impetus to my conversion was provided by the Honourable Gordon Fairweather, Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, who told us that he had been a non-believer, even during the days in which the government of which he was a member introduced our present Bill of Rights, but that he, too, had come to believe that an entrenched Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms is an important symbol for the people and institutions it seeks to protect, and particularly for those tens of thousands of new Canadians who have come here to seek security and freedom they have never known.

I do not agree with those who argue against entrenchment on the grounds that it shifts power from Parliament to the courts. Individuals, corporations, and even governments, turn to the courts for arbitration of their differences and resolution of their problems, and courts deal with them on the basis of either the common law, which can always be changed by statute, or statute law, which has been enacted by parliaments and legislatures.

Incidentally, it has been frequently argued that the Constitution of the United States, with its protections for American citizens, has frequently been unable to protect them from violations of their civil and human rights. Yet we know that the provisions of the same Constitution have been used later, as social, ethical and moral standards have evolved, to correct the inequities which earlier had been practised under its banner. So constitutions, and the courts which interpret them can be flexible, but, as Senator Steuart said the other night, it is only the will of the people which, in the final analysis, will ensure that that happens.

Some people may say that we already have a Bill of Rights, and that we do not need anything more. I would respectfully disagree. Professor Walter Tarnopolsky, a distinguished lawyer and expert in the field of human rights, has written extensively on the subject, and about the frailties of the Canadian Bill of Rights. Without going into all the legal reasons, I can say that, because of judicial interpretations of the language of certain sections many provisions of the Bill of Rights are now considered unduly restrictive, ineffective, or unsatisfactory. Therefore, the number of times suppliants before the law have had recourse to it in recent years has been comparatively small. Those people who were disappointed because they were not protected by the Bill of Rights, will support the present efforts to enact a Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms which will provide a better range of protections, and which will have primacy over all other statutes.

● (1510)

Perhaps I should state my belief here that the government which proposes a Charter of Rights and Freedoms to be entrenched in our Constitution, and the draftsmen who draw the words and phrases, must be prepared to explain and justify the differences, the additions and the deletions, between the bill they are presenting and our present Bill of Rights. Even though the Bill of Rights has not been adjudicated upon as often as we might have imagined in the past 20 years, nevertheless, a body of law has grown up around it which cannot be ignored. Judicial decisions have exposed its weaknesses and its rigidities, and now is an ideal time to correct them. I would draw your attention to what I perceive as weaknesses, improvements, or simply changes in the present draft charter as compared to the Bill of Rights. The members of the joint committee also have their special responsibility to understand the reasons for those changes and to be able to explain the provisions of the draft charter which they will eventually recommend to their respective houses.

Again, however, it must be Parliament which finally accepts full responsibility for measures it approves either by way of special resolution, as in this case, or by ordinary legislation.

I have spent some time comparing the Bill of Rights with the provisions of the draft charters submitted by the government to the First Ministers' Conferences in July of this year and later in September, as well as with the present draft we are discussing. It has been pointed out that one of the most serious weaknesses in the Bill of Rights is that because it is an ordinary statute its provisions do not take precedence over the provisions of any other statute with which it might come into conflict. That view has been confirmed by judgments rendered in the Supreme Court of Canada and is probably a significant reason for the lack of substantial recourse to the bill.

I was therefore very pleased to see the comprehensive unequivocal statement in the July draft, in what I believe to be Professor Tarnopolsky's wording, that would have given that charter paramountcy over any law or any administrative act inconsistent with its provisions. Section 18 appears in a different guise in section 24 of the September draft, but the latter seems to provide comparable protection. However, I find it very disquieting that section 25 of the present draft purports to give primacy only to any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the charter. The omission of any protection against the often inequitable and sometimes unjust administrative decisions of tribunals, boards and the plethora of regulatory bodies that bedevil us, can only be described as lamentable. Moreover, the very fine recourse and enforcement provisions contained in section 19 of the July draft have been omitted from subsequent drafts. I hope that the joint committee will receive a satisfactory explanation for the weakening of the protections and rights provided in the present draft, or else devise amendments which will give those protections the range and clout they deserve, as well as the positively stated right to enforce them.

To go back to the beginning of the present draft Charter of Rights and Freedoms—which is perhaps where I should have begun—I see that the opening declaratory phrases of the Bill of Rights referring to rights and freedoms which "have existed and shall continue to exist" have been omitted from the current draft. Since judicial interpretation of those words led to what is known as the "frozen concepts principle," which, it is argued, has impaired the potential vitality and strength of the Bill of Rights, the omission of that phrase from the last draft is an improvement and should provide more flexibility.

I consider the first two sections to be a vast improvement over the equivalent section 1 of the Canadian Bill of Rights because they provide for a broader range of freedoms, with one notable exception, in clear, concise language. The significant omission in section 2 is the right of the individual to the enjoyment of property. That disturbs me, but since we have heard Senator van Roggen's remarks on the subject, we can be assured that he will have that particular anomaly corrected, if at all possible.

Senator Flynn: Will he be a member of the committee?

Senator Neiman: He can make recommendations. I do not know if he will be.

That brings me to a very important section in the draft charter—paragraph 15 on non-discrimination rights. In comparison with similar provisions in the Bill of Rights on which it is based, I would rate some of its provisions either better or potentially better, with the added protective categories of ethnic origin being in the former group and of age being in the latter group. In principle, I approve of the inclusion of the protection against discrimination on account of age, but I worry because the range of contexts in which age might be a relevant factor is almost unlimited. Is a person of 70 too old to fly a commercial aircraft, or too young at 14? The questions we can pose are endless. I really do believe that if non-discrimination on account of age is to be given protection in this charter, then its reasonable application and limitations must be more clearly defined.

Incidentally, I was delighted to hear Friday morning that the First Report of the Special Parliamentary Committee on the Handicapped has made a recommendation, among others, that if a Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms is entrenched, it should contain similar protection for the handicapped as we have for other categories in section 15. However, I do have some reservations about the difficulties in defining and delineating the group, so my remarks about the aged apply equally to the handicapped.

Some of the language of subsection 15(1) is now considered unacceptable by numerous groups of people, particularly the phrase "the right to equality before the law and to the equal protection of the law," which has been taken directly from a paragraph of the Bill of Rights. That phrase has been tested in various Canadian courts including the Supreme Court of Canada, and to put it as kindly as I can it has been found wanting in ensuring the equality of women and protecting them from non-discrimination because of their sex.

As Senator Bird has already mentioned, the Chairman of the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women, to whom Senator Nurgitz referred the other night, was perfectly justified in expressing the concern of all the women whom the council seeks to represent. Whatever the rationale for decisions made in the Supreme Court of Canada in such cases as the Lavell, Bedard or Bliss cases, we now have what we consider bad law—law invidious to the rights and interests of women, but law that must, nevertheless, be respected and followed unless the particular phraseology on which the decisions for those cases were apparently based is changed. Senator Bird and I and several of our colleagues have joined with the National Advisory Council to seek assurance from the government that if suitable alternative wording can be found which will clearly provide the protection that is sought, the appropriate amendment to subsection 15(1) will then be made. It may be of only theoretical interest to the members of this chamber that about half of the eligible voters in Canada have a beneficial interest in any such amendment, but as human beings I know you are all anxious to find the words that will ensure equality and fairness for both sexes.

The provisions in subsection 15(2) do not appear in the Bill of Rights and, therefore, are a welcome addition in the current draft. Once again I enter a caveat to the joint committee that it examine the language carefully because, while everyone would approve the intent of the provision, I have heard some fears expressed to the effect that they could still be misconstrued or misapplied.

There has been at least one case in the Supreme Court in which the judgment appears to depend rather heavily on the meaning of the phrase "and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law," which is used in paragraph 1(a) of the Bill of Rights in connection with the protection of certain legal rights of individuals. That phrase is omitted from the equivalent section 7 in the present draft charter, and replaced by "and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principle of fundamental justice." Senator Macdonald has just referred to this particular section.

Since section 7 provides the kind of legal rights which will be relied upon in many situations, particularly trials of a criminal or quasi-criminal nature, substitution of a new legal standard of exception to those rights has considerable significance. I assume the members of the joint committee will enlighten themselves as to the reasons for the change in wording, and bear in mind some of Senator Macdonald's comments when doing so. I hope, eventually, when making their report, they will enlighten us as well.

The phraseology of section 11(d) with respect to the exception to the right to reasonable bail has also been changed. The words "except on grounds, and in accordance with procedures, established by law," replace the simple phrase "without just cause" which appears in the Bill of Rights. That same rather murky language, "except on grounds, and in accordance with procedures, established by law"—and we could all ask what those words really mean—appears in section 8 with respect to search and seizure, and in section 9 with respect to detention or imprisonment. In fact, they seem to weaken the rights cited in section 9 in comparison to the equivalent section 2(a) of the Bill of Rights which affords protection against arbitrary detention, imprisonment or exile of any person without any exception. What does that phrase mean—or more particularly, what is it intended to mean, and why was "exile" omitted from the latest draft? Again, I should appreciate some enlightenment.

What can I say that is helpful about section 24 on undeclared rights and freedoms? I know that some of the native groups are unhappy, and I cannot blame them if they feel the language of the section is not sufficient to protect their status, rights and claims. After being concerned and often actively involved with their problems for years, and knowing how various levels of government have tried to solve those problems with massive injections of money and various forms of aid, I have come to the unhappy conclusion that many native peoples and vast numbers of non-status Indians are far worse off than they ever have been. I believe that an entirely different and radical approach must be taken, not only by the people in the groups to which I have referred, but also by the governments and institutions that purport to help them. A few words in a Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms will not enhance their pride of origin or protect their human rights unless there is the will on all sides. But if some changes in the language of the proposed charter can provide the incentive for such a will, then I would heartily support them.

I have some comments to make with respect to section 44. I agree with much of what Senator Roblin had to say about that section because I already had formed my own opinion as to the possible constitutional problem inherent in it. I must confess, first, that I am no constitutional expert, and, secondly, that I have tried out my theory on a couple of colleagues, whose opinions I respect, and I may not have convinced them. However, the recollection that I was sure that certain sections of Bill C-60 of 1978 were unconstitutional in the face of impressive expert opinion to the contrary, and that my belief was sustained by the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada last year, gives me courage to elaborate my thesis once more.

Senator Roblin has read the pertinent portions of the question put to the Supreme Court of Canada which bear directly on section 44 of the draft Constitution Act, 1980, that is included in the proposed resolution that we are studying. Without repeating those questions in full, I should like to remind honourable senators that one particular question asked if it was within the legislative authority of Parliament to enact legislation to provide that bills approved by the House of Commons could be given assent and the force of law after the passage of a certain period of time notwithstanding that the upper house had not approved them. That is the important difference in the context and procedure. The section in Bill C-60 dealt only with Parliament's enacting a bill, while here we have a Joint Address requesting the Queen to approve an act passed by the British Parliament. However, I do not believe that the different approach changes the constitutional aspect of the question.

Without getting into a laboured legal discussion, I would like to read other portions of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada which elucidate the course of its reasoning in reaching its answer to that particular question. They are extremely pertinent to my argument. In referring to the historical background in which the creation of the Senate as part of the federal legislative process was conceived, the Supreme Court quoted the following words of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Sankey, in another Canadian case:

> Inasmuch as the Act embodies a compromise under which the original Provinces agreed to federate, it is important to keep in mind that the preservation of the rights of minorities was a condition on which such minorities entered into the federation, and the foundation upon which the whole structure was subsequently erected. The process of interpretation as the years go on ought not to be allowed to dim or to whittle down the provisions of the original contract upon which the federation was founded, nor is it legitimate that any judicial construction of the provisions of ss. 91 and 92 should impose a new and different contract upon the federating bodies.

The Supreme Court goes on to say:

> In our opinion, the power given to the Federal Parliament by s. 91.1 was not intended to enable it to alter in any way the provisions of sections 91 and 92 governing the exercise of legislative authority by the Parliament of Canada and the Legislatures of the Provinces. Section 91.1 is a particularization of the general legislative power of the Parliament of Canada. That general power can be exercised only by the Queen by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons. Section 91.1 cannot be construed to confer power to supplant the whole of the rest of the section. It cannot be construed as permitting the transfer of the legislative powers enumerated in s. 91 to some body or bodies other than those specifically designated in it.

● (1530)

Later on there are these comments:

> The continued existence of the Senate as a part of the federal legislative process is implied in the exceptions provided in s. 91.1.

I should like to quote just one further section in answer specifically to the question that was put to them with respect to the Senate. It states:

> A provision of the kind contemplated would seriously impair the position of the Senate in the legislative process because it would permit legislation to be enacted under s. 91 without the consent of the Senate. For the reasons already given in respect of Question 1, it is our view that Parliament cannot under s. 91.1 impair the role of the Senate in that process. We would answer this question in the negative.

What we are dealing with here is, of course, the proposed Joint Address of Parliament asking the Queen to approve an act which would be passed in the British House of Parliament which would materially affect a fundamental characteristic of our Constitution before it is sent home. We cannot use the ordinary legislative process, because that simply is not open to us in the one last Joint Address to the Queen, but it is, nevertheless, a legislative procedure that affects the very foundation on which the legitimacy of the Parliament of Canada depends. I can do no better than quote some of the concluding statements of the Supreme Court of Canada in the judgment to which I have referred. It states:

> The character of the Senate was determined by the British Parliament in response to the proposals submitted by the three provinces in order to meet the requirement of the proposed federal system. It was that Senate, created by the Act, to which a legislative role was given by s. 91. In our opinion, its fundamental character cannot be altered by unilateral action by the Parliament of Canada and s. 91.1 does not give it that power.

And so I am strongly persuaded that, even if every member of both houses of this Parliament was prepared to give his or her approval to section 44, we do not have the legal right to make the change it contemplates in the power of the Senate by any means whatsoever without the prior approval of the provinces.

I would add one further observation. Section 44 as it is contemplated appears to fly in the face of the statement in section 28. In my view the diminution of power of one house of Parliament vis-à-vis the power of the other house of Parliament automatically enhances the power of the latter chamber and at the same time diminishes the powers and rights of the provinces vis-à-vis the Parliament of Canada as a whole.

Honourable senators, almost since I entered this chamber and began to understand more fully the parliamentary process, I have believed that the Senate should have only a suspensive veto. I think that belief is shared by a majority of my colleagues here. I do not think, however, that such a change could be effected in the powers of the Senate without the consent of the provinces under whatever amending formula may then be enforced. I know that section 44 rests upon section 44(1) then being in force, and that that supposedly final amending formula requires approval of a certain number of the provinces. The problem as I see it, however, is that the whole of Part V could presumably come into force by mere efflux of time and without the consent of the provinces—that is, if the provinces could not reach the necessary consensus required under section 38 to force a referendum, or if they merely decided they would accept Part V as the best possible or least offensive formula, the right of the provinces to consent to a change in the powers of the Senate would be lost.

I repeat again that I fully support the principle embodied in section 44, but I would prefer to see the Senate's powers changed later as part of a package deal which, undoubtedly, would change other facets of the upper chamber at the same time.

In closing, I should simply like to say, with respect to the section on amending procedures, that my only hope is that the formula which is finally approved and adopted will be fair and will be seen to be fair by all levels of government, by this Parliament and all legislatures and, above all, by the people of Canada whom our Constitution must be designed to serve and protect.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, the Canadian government must be fair to all its citizens, including those of the ethno-cultural groups. In the proposed resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, there is no mention at all of the place and role of the ethno-cultural groups. There is an indirect reference in section 15(1). It states:

> (1) Everyone has the right to equality before the law and to the equal protection of the law without discrimination because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age or sex.

The document constantly refers to, "citizens", "Canadians", "persons", "everyone", and sometimes "population." This indicates that there must be people in Canada. The only reference that can be found to people, however, is only about natives, and that is found in section 24. That section states:

> The guarantee in this Charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed as denying the existence of any other rights or freedoms that exist in Canada, including any rights or freedoms that pertain to the native peoples of Canada.

Certainly, there is constant reference to English and French as "the official languages of Canada." Section 23 talks about "English or French linguistic minority population" of a province, and instruction in a "minority language" as well as "minority language educational facilities."

Although it is implied, there is no specific mention of the English or the French as a people or a group which, in reality, cannot exist without a language. He has clearly ignored these minorities in the Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms. His obsession is paramountly with English-French relations.

● (1540)

Eric Wells of the University of Winnipeg, a well-known journalist and broadcaster, gave a frank analysis of Trudeau's aims in a recent radio commentary on minority rights in Winnipeg. Here are some brief extracts from that commentary—a western Canadian viewpoint:

> The Prime Minister's chief objective is in having his Charter of Rights enshrined in our Constitution . . . This topic is political double-talk about freedom. This is the unmentionable subject shrouded in sacred fields of mythology of minority rights.
>
> Our politicians talk about minority rights as if we are considering one hundred or more ethnic groups.
>
> But minority rights in Canada in this regard only mean two races, at least within the meaning of the new Charter.
>
> The plain truth is simple—only French and English. French is to be implanted in seven English-speaking provinces, and English is to be protected in one French-speaking province.
>
> I don't know why the Prime Minister doesn't come out and say just that . . .
> Meanwhile, nobody except the deluded will salute 1981 as the year of our freedom.

If the present document becomes the Constitution of Canada, approximately one-third of Canadian citizens will be the most deluded. These are the numerous ethno-cultural groups, over 80 in number, of non-Anglo-Celtic, non-French origin. They have made significant contributions to the building of this country and the progress in all walks of Canadian life. Composed of Germans, Italians, Ukrainians, Poles, Jews, Scandinavians, Baltic peoples, East Indians, Chinese, Japanese, Portuguese, Indians, Eskimos, and many other groups, this third element of the population of Canada is much more numerous than the French in all provinces, except Quebec, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. Yet, they have no place in the new Constitution.

What concerns the leaders and active members of these non-Anglo-Celtic, non-French groups is that the present Trudeau government has ignored many of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, and particularly many of the recommendations of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, tabled in both chambers on March 16, 1972. It should be noted that the Joint Chairmen were Senator Gildas Molgat, who is still with us in this chamber, and the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, the Minister of External Affairs in this government.

In my judgment, this joint parliamentary committee was closer to the people of Canada than our Prime Minister and our premiers of the provinces. In its two years of intensive effort, the committee held 145 public meetings, including 72 sessions in 47 cities and towns located in all the provinces and territories. The 1,486 witnesses who appeared before the committee ranged from acknowledged experts, leaders in various walks of life, representatives of various institutions, organizations and ethnic associations to students and common people, such as labourers, farmers, housewives, trappers and others. Some witnesses made presentations in languages other than English or French, and there was a full parliamentary session in Vancouver using Chinese. Mayors and cabinet ministers made appearances before the committee. This large-scale national exercise in participatory democracy was a method of ascertaining public opinion which falls just short of conducting a referendum.

The final report of this parliamentary committee embodies recommendations hammered out as a tolerable and reasonable exercise. It reflects our agreement, arrived at by representatives of all political parties, as well as the differences of opinion within the parties. Taking into consideration the consensus of public opinion, when it was clearly evident, as well as their own personal views, the members of the committee, who themselves were fairly representative of Canadian society, have presented proposals that reflect the main streams of opinion of this diverse population. It was largely a majority report, in which the parliamentarians acted in the best interests of Canada as a whole, to which I can testify as I was a member of the steering committee.

This report on the Constitution of Canada, comprising 37 chapters and 105 recommendations, is a blueprint of the new Constitution and therefore should be at the fingertips of all Canadians interested in constitutional revision and problems. I have no intention of summarizing the chapters or noting all the recommendations, only a few of which have been implemented. I shall concentrate on the place and rights of the non-Anglo-Celtic, non-French element that composes nearly one-third of the Canadian population which has been left out of the proposed Constitution Act, 1980.

The first recommendation advocates, and I quote: ". . . a new and distinctively Canadian Constitution, one which would be a new whole even though it would utilize many of the same parts." This apparently, is being carried out. Further, it states that this Constitution ought to be "both an inspiration and a mirror for its community". This cannot be said about the present proposal. The 1972 report stated that "the Canadian reality of today" was "an independent, democratic, officially bilingual, multicultural, federal state." This can be considered as the Canadian identity and, because of the continuing process of immigration, will be for generations to come; hence, it should be embedded in the new Constitution.

In the 1972 report much emphasis was placed on the preamble to the new Constitution, which the present proposal lacks. Here the Canadian nation is distinguished as "a free people in a free society; a country characterized by rich diversity in linguistic communities, cultural heritages and regional identities; a country where individual fulfilment is the fundamental goal of society; a country where individual Canadians look to the state not simply as a vehicle by which to serve their own self-interest but as a vehicle by which they can contribute to the well-being of other Canadians."

● (1550)

The basic objectives recommended for inclusion in the preamble to the new Constitution are the following:

1. To establish a federal system of government within a democratic society;

2. To protect and enhance basic human rights;

3. To develop Canada as a bilingual multicultural country in which all its citizens, male and female, young and old, native peoples and Métis, and all groups from every ethnic origin feel equally at home;

4. To promote economic, social and cultural equality for all Canadians as individuals and to reduce regional economic disparities;

5. To present Canada as a pluralistic mosaic, a free and open society which challenges the talents of her people;

6. To seek world peace and security, and international social progress.

The joint parliamentary commitee endorsed the entrenchment of certain basic political, legal and human rights, including provisions contained in the Canadian Bill of Rights in 1960. There is no need to outline these rights, as most of them are found in the present proposed resolution.

Because language is a vital part of the culture of most peoples and because its recognition is of great symbolic importance, chapter 10 on Language Rights is one of the longest in the report of 1972. The committee recommended that English and French be constitutionally entrenched as the two official languages of Canada. For the most part the language recommendations have been adopted in the present resolution.

An important recommendation that was not adopted was the one recognizing the parents' right to choose the language of instruction in publicly-supported schools where a sufficient number of persons could justify the provision of necessary facilities. Clause 23 of the resolution complicates this matter, in that citizens must continue with the "first language learned and still understood," either English or French, requiring parents "to have their children educated in that language." The choice of Canadian citizens is definitely restricted, and immigrants who have no knowledge of either official language have no choice but to accept the language of the province, which they might not prefer. I believe that most people would approve the parents' right to choose the language of instruction as advocated in a United Nations covenant.

The report of the Constitution of Canada of 1972, showing awareness that large groups of Canadians speak other languages, particularly in the western provinces where languages of German, Ukrainian, Italian and other groups are spoken more than French, approved constitutional recognition for these languages. One way of recognizing the contribution to Canada of these non-Anglo-Celtic, non-French groups is to regard their languages not as foreign but to give them the status of Canadian languages as an integral part of the Canadian linguistic mosaic. Some of these languages are now taught in the public school systems and universities of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and British Columbia.

Since the languages of the third element ethnocultural groups are "regional rather than national," the report of 1972 recommended that it would therefore be appropriate that specific recognition be given to them at the provincial level. This recommendation would confer no additional rights upon the provinces, for section 92.1 of the B.N.A. Act gives the provinces power to amend their own constitutions, and section 93 gives them the power to make laws in relation to education. The joint parliamentary committee advised that:

> The Constitution should therefore provide in its section on language rights that provincial legislatures may confer rights on other language groups with respect to use in the legislatures themselves, or in government administration, the courts, and education in publicly supported schools.

Here, I would like to interject a personal note. Having been born in Saskatchewan of pioneer Ukrainian stock, I learned Ukrainian from my parents, and at Saturday schools conducted in Ukrainian halls in Saskatoon, and I took higher courses at the University of Saskatchewan. My children have studied Ukrainian in the secondary schools of Winnipeg; and two of them continued with the language and literature at the University of Manitoba.

I would now like to quote a gem from Ukrainian literature, a short verse from a longer poem of the great poet Taras Shevchenko, written 140 years ago, which I believe is very appropriate on this occasion.

> Uchitesia, braty moyi,
> Dumayte, chytayte,
> I chuzhoho nauchaytesh
> Svoho ne tsuraytesh.

For the benefit of those who might not have understood the language of some three-quarters of a million of Canadian citizens, here is the translation:

> Learn my brethren,
> Think and read,
> Study other cultures,
> Do not shun your own.

In chapter 29, on education, the report of 1972, recognizing bilingualism and multiculturalism, considered that this fact be appropriately reflected also in the policies of provincial governments and that the federal government must have certain obligations in this respect. I quote from the conclusion:

> Moreover, where a province confers a particular public right upon a language group, it would be appropriate for the federal government to provide a measure of financial assistance. By doing so, it would help the provinces to provide a valuable public service to a group of citizens.

It is gratifying to know that since this report the federal government has been providing financial grants to provinces which have introduced German, Ukrainian, Polish, Hebrew and other languages in the public school system, even without a provision in the Constitution.

That being the case, it could have been expected that the constitution of the proposed resolution now being considered would give some kind of recognition to the non-Anglo-Celtic, non-French languages. Alas, one would have to look in vain. Instead, there is a "beating about the bush" or, more aptly described, "nothing" clause. I quote clause 22:

> Nothing in sections 16 to 20 abrogates or derogates from any legal or customary right or privilege acquired or enjoyed either before or after the coming into force of this Charter with respect to any language that is not English or French.

We are to be grateful for small mercies.

The joint parliamentary committee in 1972 stated that the preamble of the new Constitution should recognize Canada as a bilingual and multicultural country. Although English and French should be recognized officially, there should be no official culture in Canada. The committee made the following statement in this regard:

> One of the deepest aspects of our national character has been its cultural tolerance towards minority groups. Canadians do not feel the need to impose a common culture nor to divorce people from their cultural roots. All democracies allow their citizens freedom under law, but many do not go so far as to allow cultural freedom. Canada must continue to do so, but more consciously and more effectively.

● (1600)

Now let us look at the proposed resolution. One will look in vain and will not even find the word "culture" in the whole document. I suppose that this must be logical for the government, as there is no reference in the document to the people of Canada or to the Canadian nation.

If we cannot look to the Canadian Constitution of 1980 to find the reflection of the Canadian reality, we can look at the actions of the Trudeau government. In response to Book IV of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, of which Senator Frith was a notable member, and to announcements of a policy of multiculturalism by the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta, Prime Minister Trudeau announced a federal policy of multiculturalism on October 8, 1971, in the House of Commons, which received the endorsement of all parties.

After the fall election of 1972, Trudeau's minority government, sensing the mood of the country, established in November a Ministry of State responsible for Multiculturalism of which Dr. Stanley Haidasz, now Senator Stanley Haidasz, became the first minister. This ministry, now headed by the Honourable Jim Fleming, has been active to the present day. Its annual budget of some $10 million made it possible to expand a variety of programs in the multicultural field, including assistance to provinces to implement courses in ethnic languages with the public school system.

In May 1973 the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism was appointed, consisting of approximately 100 members representing most of the ethnocultural groups. This advisory body holds annual conferences and publishes reports for the consideration of the Minister of Multiculturalism. For several years, Senator Peter Bosa, ably chaired this council. Today the C.C.C.M. chairman is Mr. Lawrence Decore, an Edmonton lawyer.

In the meantime, most of the provinces have adopted a policy of multiculturalism and many have established ministries responsible for cultural and multicultural activities. Some of the provinces have included language courses in German, Ukrainian, Italian, Polish, Hebrew and other non-official languages in the curricula of the public schools, primary and secondary, with some financial support from the federal government.

Multiculturalism, based on the preservation and perpetuation of the languages and cultures of various ethnic groups, to be shared by all Canadians, is a living fact of Canadian life. It is steadily gaining momentum. For the sake of harmony and unity, this reality of Canadian society must be recognized in the new Canadian Constitution. The Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada must seriously study the report of the joint parliamentary committee of 1972. If its wants to gauge public opinion properly, this special committee will not be able to meet the deadline of December 9 but must continue its work for at least four months. It must have a mandate to carry out substantial amendments, otherwise it can be expected that there will be trouble throughout the country.

Regardless of how we identify Canada, whether in terms of geography, governmental institutions, natural resources or human resources, such as ethnic and cultural communities, these are not enough. A state is constituted paramountly by the collective will of the people to live, work and sacrifice together for the common good. If this will falters, then inevitably the nation falls. We know from history and experience that the common strain binding Canadians together is a pervading goodwill towards persons and peoples other than their own, and their love of this great land.

In the words of the report of 1972, "a modern Constitution for Canada is ultimately a restatement of our faith in ourselves and our country." Our faith in freedom and democracy, truth and justice, equality and brotherhood and co-operation and peace has been the strength that has maintained Canadian unity, which has produced progress, prosperity and general happiness for Canadian citizens. This faith and work has built a great and dynamic Canadian nation. Let us continue along this proven path to build a better Canada.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, it is with a sense of real trepidation that I attempt to speak on this subject, first, for the simple reason that there is so much in it that requires to be spoken about and examined by both the Senate and the other place; secondly, because I am sensible of the long-term effect of this legislation, as distinct from the more regular type of legislation that we pass or reject in this chamber from day to day; and, thirdly, because I am perplexed by the procedure adopted.

Because of its very nature, the proposed legislation is not being passed by the Parliament of Canada, but—at our request, presumably—by another Parliament in another country, albeit a friendly country; and I, as a Canadian do not particularly relish that process when we are dealing with such a substantive matter as this.

I suppose the best way in which I can attempt, in the few minutes at my disposal, to deal with this enormous subject is to take a look at the actual motion that we shall be voting on tonight. Let us look at it for a moment. It calls for the appointment of a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. That is simple enough. What is that committee to do? It is not our usual type of committee that undertakes studies or deals with legislation that comes before us.

• (1610)

The committee is:

> —to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada"—

That is the purpose. What are the members of the committee to do in fulfilling that purpose? They are:

> —to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

Then there is a fourth rather unusual little thing tucked into the motion:

> That the Committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980.

Honourable senators, I have long honoured certain days in December for a very special purpose in my life, but I have not yet had explained to me why December 9, 1980, is chosen in this instance, and why the haste for the committee's report. I know they cannot adequately examine the many points respecting the Constitution raised in the document before them, hear the witnesses, examine the law and draft suitable amendments, and so on, in the period of time allowed them. All I can say to them is that I wish them well in their work. I will be glad to help them in any way I can, but I do not like limitation of time very much.

I was feeling this concern when the matter was being debated in the other place. On October 21 I sought information, knowing that this was only a document that was before the committee and not a legislative measure of the Canadian Parliament. There are many ways by which honourable senators—the members of the other place can speak for themselves—can react to legislation by way of acceptance or amendment, as they see fit. As I say, I sought to inform myself about all of this, and to find out whether, since we were not going to directly enact legislation, those responsible were going to do the next best thing and bring the Address itself before us for our direct examination, and such treatment as we in our wisdom might see fit to give it.

In any event, our leader took my questions as notice, and answered them. I will not repeat the answers he gave. I can, I think, with propriety, say that I did not think they were very satisfactory.

Among other things, the leader said that he would bring a statement before us. In that respect, I should read a little bit from page 958 of Debates of the Senate of October 27 last where the leader is reported as saying:

> Honourable senators, in the course of this debate I would be pleased to bring to the chamber a statement from the government on the particular point raised by Senator McIlraith. I can give him the assurance, however, that since he raised that point and other points the other day, a good deal of discussion has been held with advisers to the government and with the ministers to make sure that the rights of both houses are zealously protected. Certainly every effort will be made to assure that the rights of both houses are zealously protected. Honourable senators, of course, are aware that the procedures in which we are involved lead us into some uncharted waters.

Well, the latter sentence is exactly what I had been saying. The procedures sought to be set up would lead us into uncharted waters. The leader continued:

> There is a lack of precedents. I give the assurance again that a statement will be brought to this chamber in the hope that honourable senators will be satisfied on certain points. Certainly, as I have said, the question raised by Senator McIlraith has been under study.

Now, I conclude from that that the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate was answering in his dual capacity of government leader in the Senate and a minister of the Crown speaking for the cabinet. I thank him for that, and I will not go through the points of difference.

A couple of days later the leader did come before us with a statement, much of which dealt with procedural matters I will not concern myself with at this stage. However, one thing he did say was that the procedure being adopted—that is, a special joint committee to sit until December 9, and examine a document that is not before Parliament—provides, first, greater opportunity for public input, and, secondly, a flexible forum for detailed study.

That kind of setting up of a committee could be done at any time with reference to any matter before the Senate for its acceptance or rejection. The usual procedure is to set up a committee to study such a document after the document itself has been laid before the house for its action. That was not the procedure respecting the matter with which we are dealing. The Address is not before us. There are, of course, other points of that kind.

The honourable leader then goes on to say what his view of the procedure is, and this can be found at page 977 of Hansard of October 28. I am satisfied from his statement that there may be a further looking at the procedure by those directly concerned—that is, the leader himself and the cabinet—and for reasons that will appear later in my remarks I hope his statement means exactly what it says. It will be seen from the answer and the subsequent statement that we have a wide ranging commitment by the government to permit full consideration of our views, and I want to thank the honourable leader for it.

There are other things, of course, in the statement on these procedural points. I am not going to fight with the leader now, but I would read again from page 979 of Senate Hansard:

> All honourable senators know, however, that, as is customary in committee proceedings, they are entitled by the rules and by tradition to participate in the committee proceedings, but they cannot, of course, vote or move amendments. Senators who are not members of the committee are invited to participate in the committee's activities to the extent that they have enjoyed those privileges in the past. Honourable senators may therefore feel assured on this point.

Well, I just want to point out that no such assurance can be given in the Senate. This is a special joint committee. The Senate procedure, which is very adequate on that point, is not available to a joint committee, which sets up its own procedure. The Senate members will be in the minority. I cannot speak for what the committee will do, because it is not yet created, but I am not very much inclined to believe, bearing in mind the shortage of time and the past practice of joint committees, that our procedure is likely to prevail.

I leave it at that, but I must say very directly, "Let all things be done decently and in order". I would like to approach this great subject that way, if I can.

Let us look at the resolution itself. The document referred to has on its cover "The Canadian Constitution 1980", and that seems a good enough description of what is being proposed by this unusual procedure. But what is that document? What are its contents? Since this subject began to interest me long before I started my parliamentary life, and has continued to do so, I want to look at the document itself. It is in the form of a resolution for a Joint Address of the two houses of the Parliament of Canada to Her Majesty the Queen. In addition, this resolution contains an awful lot of legislation. What kind of legislation? It is not legislation to be passed by the Canadian Parliament, but legislation that we are asking Her Majesty to cause to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom. For what purpose? So that they may enact it for us.

● (1620)

Let us look at what we are asking them to enact. It is this proposed resolution that we do not have the opportunity to examine even in the way we examine a minor bill on some routine matter that comes before us. This resolution does many things. It proposes to change section 17 of the B.N.A. Act which, in rather clear language, says that Parliament shall consist of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. The proposed permanent amending formula, namely, Part V of the resolution, and particularly section 44, changes the very nature of one of those houses of Parliament without the Canadian Parliament dealing with it. I am all for parliamentary reform, and I have been for a long time, and I have been pretty impatient at times, but I am not happy to see our Parliament reformed in this indirect way by the Parliament of another country.

Honourable senators, I will not go through the resolution clause by clause because it is my understanding that several others wish to speak before the deadline we have set for ourselves.

Parliament did attempt to deal directly with some of these matters in what was known as Bill C-60, when there was an attempt to sharply change or replace one of the houses of Parliament. The matter was referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. I happen to respect the Supreme Court of Canada and, in the course of a lengthy well-reasoned judgment, it seemed to me that it indicated that this subject was of direct concern to the provinces. We could argue it at length, but I do not want to digress by arguing the details of that judgment. Certainly, I think that all honourable senators would have to grant that it seemed to indicate the question of this house of Parliament, at least in part, was of direct and immediate concern to the provinces.

Unless Part V of this resolution is changed by the temporary amending procedure, at the end of two years it becomes permanent, and we, in dealing with such legislation, have every reason to believe that it may be permanent. Whether it will be a permanent amending formula, I cannot tell, but certainly no one can tell me it will not be the amending formula. Therefore, it must be viewed in that light.

Although some of the sections of Part V are confusing to read, and they are certainly not a monument of draftsmanship—in fact, I think they are devoid of distinction—it seems to me that they diminish the authority of the provincial legislatures. Provincial legislatures, like all parliaments, come and go, by statute, at least every five years—and some of them more frequently than that—but while they are there, they have full sovereignty over those matters within their legislative competence. I am one of those who, while disliking at any given time a particular provincial legislature or its internal structure, respect provincial legislatures. I do not relish the prospect of seeing their authority bypassed. The resolution diminishes their authority by authorizing the bypassing of the legislative body by a referendum procedure.

I am not talking about the temporary amending formula during the two years; I am talking about what will be the permanent amending formula. I doubt the wisdom of that proposition, never mind the legality of it, although I am sure the courts will deal with this matter. However, I am concerned with the political wisdom of such a step. To me it is not desirable.

While viewing the last federal-provincial conference on television, several things came through apart from the particular words said. One of the things that came through was that we have deteriorated in this country, in dealing with our Constitution, from a process of conciliation and seeking consensus to a doctrine of confrontation. I saw one province confronting another with this and that, and confronting the federal government. The whole atmosphere was one of confrontation. I regret and deplore that. I think we must set ourselves on the path of adopting the tried and true and better procedure of seeking to obtain consensus by way of conciliation. I say that with full reservations about the lack of respect I may feel for the conduct of one or another of those 11 men.

What else does this proposed resolution seek to do? I have mentioned what it seeks to do in connection with one of the houses of Parliament. I would point out at this stage that that house of Parliament was created, as all honourable senators know, and anybody dealing with the Constitution would know, at the request of some of the colonies in the years immediately preceding 1867 as the basis on which they would come into Confederation so that they would be protected in their regions from the mere population figures of the elected House of Commons. We are to take away that regional protection by this document. We are to diminish the authority of the provinces by the use of the referendum. Further, I am not even going to say that it is only when they have rejected a proposal that we make "an end run"—since this is the football season—around the provincial legislatures directly to their people.

Then there is the matter of parliamentary reform within provincial jurisdiction—that class of matters that is exclusively within provincial jurisdiction. Our present legislation seems to permit such amendment after consultation with them. They have great powers of amendment in their own areas of jurisdiction now, but we are asked to diminish their ability to act in that field.

As I read these clauses, with great deference, I feel they need much improvement and redrafting. In fact, I do not like to see them here at all. I think they are not germane to the real purpose. It even appears that they may permit the federal Parliament, without reference to the provincial legislatures, but by going this circuitous route of referendum, to make amendments in that area. I do not assert that as a firm opinion, but these clauses appear to permit that.

● (1630)

The resolution goes on to deal with the subject of equalization. Equalization has become in comparatively recent times, a most important and well-accepted practice. It was developed in this country in a peculiarly Canadian way, but by Canadians and for Canadians in Canada, and it works. I know one premier or another who will argue certain things about it at certain times, but it works.

I went through some of the changes and made speeches in the other place during these years, and I am proud, as a Canadian, of our achieving what to me seems a very sensible and important principle for Canadians in many parts of Canada. Yet, we have some clauses in the resolution dealing with equalization that are rather short. They can be attacked, perhaps because they don't do much, but that is not the point I am raising in this abbreviated way. However, understanding the situation of some of these provinces when the process of equalization, as we now know it, was developed, I cannot understand why it is proposed to be done by the United Kingdom Parliament without consultation with the provinces. Surely equalization is a greater thing. As I say, I am very proud of our achievement in the field of equalization, and I am second to none in asserting that, and surely it is something that we can do decently and in order with the concurrence of the provinces. We have worked it out over these last—how many years is it since we first got what we call—

Senator Roblin: Thirty.

Senator McIlraith: Actually, there was a little bit of agreement on taxation before that. The provinces were dealt with a little differently in some of those agreements during the war years. Senator Roblin says thirty years—

Senator Flynn: Fifty-five.

Senator McIlraith: I would say its roots were a little earlier. It was 40 years ago. In any event, honourable senators, I leave that subject there with you. That is another important item that is in this package.

The next thing included in the proposal to the United Kingdom is that they are to legislate substantively for us a Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. If you analyze those different sections, you see they include many different rights. Some of them are mere transfers from the Canadian Bill of Rights; others are transfers from sections of the British North America Act, perhaps suitably slightly amended. I have no criticism of that.

There are some other rights and I want to deal with them. Leaving aside for the moment anything about language under that general heading, because I do not think that is where the language provision belongs—and I support, as will appear later, the subject of language in this bill and, similarly, the subject of the right to move about Canada—the other rights will be strongly attacked, undoubtedly, for their inadequacies. Many will say that they leave out many things that should be in them; others will say they have got in them things that should not be in them, and that will only lead to endless litigation when a particular province passes a particular act because, mark you, those rights are binding on the provinces. They are not binding merely on the federal area of jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada which is about to approve this legislation.

I, for one, have always viewed a Charter of Rights and Freedoms as some great document that serves as an inspiration to Canadians as well as adding to the guarantee of their freedoms and rights. I want it to be a great document of inspiration, a guarantee of my existing rights and perhaps an extension of them, and done in Canada by Canadians after full discussion, and accepted by the Canadian people. No charter of rights in any country is any good unless those who have the responsibility for legislating it have the support of the people generally.

What does the proposed resolution do? It appears to do these and some other things. It brings back the British North America Act to Canada—and here I commend the government most strongly for taking the initiative to bring it back—and in doing so it puts in Part IV, a proviso that is very fair, and, I think, ingenious, that the Constitution cannot be amended in the first two years, subject to certain exceptions, without the consent of all the provinces.

That, obviously, is not an acceptable thing as a permanent structure. There can be no doubt about that. It is just not good enough. So it sets up in those clauses preceding Part V an amending formula for use in those two years in attempting to get a permanent amending formula. That is a very good and ingenious approach, and I approve it. That temporary amending formula to be used for the purpose of obtaining an amending formula in the next two years. It involves the consent of a combination of provinces, and that part of it is excellent. It also contains a referendum provision—that I am quite tolerant of—in order to break a deadlock that might arise in trying to get an amending formula. There is nothing in the proposed measure that says that use of the referendum in that connection is limited to breaking a deadlock after the governments directly concerned have had an opportunity to use the regular method. I hope the committee will pick that up. It is not a very difficult matter to correct.

● (1640)

This legislation deals with an act of another country, albeit a friendly country and one which I respect. It is not an ordinary piece of legislation; therefore, we are not given the chance to deal with it in a substantive way. Instead of being what I thought it was—a proposal for legislation to patriate our Constitution—it is a piece of substantive legislation dealing with many other matters, the first of which is the very structure of the Canadian Parliament itself. With great deference to members of the media, they believe it to be a mere return of the Constitution to Canada so that Canadians can deal with it, plus a temporary amending formula. It deals with much more. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, in addition to the usual contents of such a charter, includes language rights and language education rights. I support those language rights, but they should be in a separate provision. The Quebec referendum certainly created a situation we have to take account of.

Bearing in mind what I have said, and bearing in mind that we are diminishing the rights of the provinces—to me almost irrelevantly and unnecessarily—at a time when vast areas of this country are experiencing feelings of frustration and alienation, I think we should deal with the substantive amendments that are not related to patriation and an amending formula in a direct and honourable way. I could be justified in mentioning, without attempting to define them, the problems experienced by the Province of Quebec and what they have gone through during the past 15 years, which culminated in a referendum. Bearing in mind all those things, I ask the Government of Canada to consider again these matters. I think it should consider them carefully, even at this eleventh hour, to see if it is possible to withdraw those parts of the resolution and proposed legislation which deal with matters of substance and not the mere formality of bringing the Constitution back from the United Kingdom.

In addition to the alienation I have spoken of, there are two other things I should mention. There are many people still living in Canada—and many students know about this—who are proud of the achievement of the Imperial Conference of 1926 and the subsequent conference of 1930, which culminated in the Statute of Westminster. I hope honourable senators will read the debates leading up to that Joint Address. It was made clear then that the United Kingdom had no longer any right to legislate for Canada. It is true that at the behest of the provinces a little amendment was put in to enable us to carry on until we got the Constitution wholly back here.

I, for one, as a young student, probably because I had nothing else to do, or for whatever reason, followed those conferences and was proud of them. I was very proud when the Address was passed by the houses of the Canadian Parliament and we got the legislation that made it clear that the last vestige of colonialism was removed and we were to have complete freedom and independence. Yet, by this process now before us we are asked, on substantive, internal matters in Canada, to return to a state of colonialism to procure their passage, instead of carrying out that responsibility here in Canada.

I ask and beg the government, parallel with the work of the committee, to look at these things to see if they cannot do something that would prevent adding to the alienation currently felt by so many of our people. I ask the government not to alienate those Canadians who are not yet alienated. I ask the government to not humiliate any part of our Canadian citizenship.

Honourable senators, I have been a little longer than I anticipated. You have been very courteous and patient in listening to me. I want to leave the matter with you. I, for my part, am going to vote—and I urge everyone do the same—for sending the document to committee so that the committee can get at its work. I hope that my plea to the Government of Canada will be listened to.

• (1650)

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my colleague from Prince Edward Island, Senator Macquarrie, began his address by saying that this was an historic debate. Seldom do I get the opportunity to disagree with the distinguished gentleman. However, I do not feel that this is a debate. To me, a parliamentary debate should consist of discussion, consideration of the various viewpoints put forward, and the possibility of amendments flowing from the discussion. This procedure, to date, has not given us that opportunity.

As a member of the minority in this chamber, I am quite accustomed to the feeling of futility and frustration that develops late in a debate. However, in this case those feelings developed before the resolution was even presented on television or, at a later date, presented to Parliament.

Before the First Ministers' Conference began, the federal government, without parliamentary approval, spent millions on advertising, presenting the viewpoint of the federal government. The Office for Canadian Unity was converted into a propaganda organization reminiscent of those existing in Germany and Italy before World War II. Wild geese and beavers became our constitutional experts.

I would remind honourable senators that both Germany and Italy used a bird in their propaganda efforts, the bird being an eagle. Their eagles became bombers. I do not expect that that will happen to our wild goose. I think the last budget pretty well crippled him, and I do not expect to see him flying for a while.

The pattern followed throughout this procedure—presenting the resolution in what Senator McIlraith has termed "a most peculiar manner"—reminds me of the book Animal Farm in which the animals took over the farm and began to operate it in what I suppose Mr. Trudeau would term co-operative federalism. It eventually got to the stage where the pig sold the horse when the horse was no longer able to work.

Honourable senators, I know who is being sold down the river in this case.

The second development that disturbed me was the leaking of the so-called Kirby document, a document prepared by an official in the Prime Minister's Office in which the government was advised to avoid parliamentary debate and get the resolution into committee. There, of course, it is much easier to control the procedure and also the press coverage. It is quite easy to hand out announcements, and the press will not go looking for anything else.

When the provinces expressed their concern, they were ignored, pushed aside. They knew nothing. Only the wise in the PMO knew the procedure to be followed.

After the First Ministers' Conference failed, there was a new and rather unusual angle introduced into the debate, that being that it was unpatriotic to oppose the views of the Prime Minister. The premiers were portrayed as being power-hungry, ambitious, and uninterested in the whole of Canada. This treatment of the premiers—and through the premiers the provinces are affected—is particularly offensive.

The premier of my province, who seems to cause the Prime Minister some concern—he can't even recall his name—did not purchase a false birth certificate and run for cover in the last war. He walked through Europe during the war after he was shot down. The Prime Minister toured Europe after the war was over. I think his standard of patriotism compares with that of the Prime Minister.

In case anyone has any doubts that the Office for Canadian Unity was used for propaganda purposes, let me remind you that the budget for that office was increased from $6 million to $35 million per annum. The Senate budget is $15.1 million per annum. I do not think I need elaborate further on that.

Canada was created as a union as a result of a legal agreement between the provinces which created the federal government. Now we find the federal government attempting to break this agreement. First the MPs became nobodies, and now the provinces are classified as unimportant.

It was rather a paradox that during the seventy-fifth anniversary of the western provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan everyone, including Mr. Trudeau, reminded Canadians what a great nation we have built. At the same time we were being bombarded with propaganda from the Office for Canadian Unity stating that we needed a new Constitution, bring it home, make it work.

During all of this artificial hysteria—and I use that phrase in company with the Prime Minister—no one has taken the time to ask why it is we need a new Constitution. When, where and why did our present Constitution go wrong? Where has it failed us?

● (1700)

We should pause to ask ourselves these questions: First, what are the weak points in our present Constitution? Does the resolution before this chamber correct those weak points? This examination cannot be conducted in the present atmosphere of futility, hostility and indecent haste. We should also ask ourselves which section of the present Constitution is responsible for inflation. Is the written or the unwritten part of the Constitution the cause of our high rate of unemployment? We should also ask ourselves if the proposals contained in the resolution correct any of the faults that we find in the present Constitution. Are we providing a means of combatting inflation? Are we providing those over one million unemployed Canadians with an opportunity and the right to work? Canadians have always enjoyed unwritten freedoms as part of their heritage. Does the resolution improve upon those freedoms, or are we restricting those cherished freedoms?

I ask you, honourable senators, to look carefully at the attitudes towards Confederation created in the provinces. Not one of the ten provincial partners in Confederation has expressed complete satisfaction with these proposals. Many of the provinces are uneasy, dissatisfied, and, in some cases, vigorously opposed to the federal government's unilateral action. Is this any way to terminate the legal agreement which led to our Constitution?

I ask you to compare the provincial concern with the indecent haste to get this resolution into committee and to get it out of committee by a specified date, and I ask you if the limitation, and the manipulations and mutilations done to our parliamentary system are really necessary.

I remind you of another aspect of the Kirby document. It was to get the resolution into committee and then distract the public's attention from the work of the committee by coming out with some more relevant pieces of legislation that the people would be interested in and concerned with, such as bringing in a budget or bringing in an energy policy to distract the attention of the Canadian citizens from the committee.

The referral to a joint committee with a time limitation is a dangerous precedent. In the past we have had a number of joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons. We had a joint committee dealing with the Public Service Staff Relations Act. That committee took six months or more to consider that act. The Constitution gets one month!

There was a joint committee to deal with the national anthem. That committee sat for a number of years, eventually arriving at a solution. But the Constitution gets one month! Surely, the Constitution is worthy of the same amount of time as the national anthem.

It is dangerous, honourable senators, to establish a time limit. Suppose the federal government introduces a resolution dealing with energy matters; suppose it establishes a joint committee and says, "Take two weeks," and the members of both houses say, "Two weeks is insufficient time." "You only took a month on the Constitution; why should you take more on the study of energy matters?"

Further amendments are on the horizon. Both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have made that quite clear. Will those amendments be proposed and enacted in the same manner, with the same limitations, manipulations and mutilations?

Only a few hours were allocated to the House of Commons debate before closure was introduced. Will future amendments be introduced just prior to an election, with closure being enforced in order to make sure that a dying government has its way before an election? The Prime Minister has already threatened further closure, if there is further debate after the resolution is returned from committee. Honourable senators, what will happen if we, or the members of the other place, attempt to debate that committee report? Anyone who saw the Leader of the Government tiptoeing through the tulips to avoid the questions of Senator McIlraith must have some concern.

Why has July 1 become what I term "a constitutional doomsday"? Why is it necessary to override so many of our parliamentary procedures and place in this resolution the artificial deadline of July 1?

Honourable senators, when you vote on this resolution you have the opportunity to express your faith in our procedure as it has been followed, and followed successfully, for 113 years. Again I emphasize that this resolution, conceived in closure, delivered in deceit and manipulated by majority into committee, will end our Canadian co-operation and will further divide this country. The next step will be an announcement from the Prime Minister's Office that only the Trudeau precedent established in this resolution will apply to all future Parliaments. We will have mandarins, such as Pitfield and Coutts, duly coached by Kirby, running Parliament rather than the parliamentarians themselves. That is a matter of great concern.

Is any amendment to the Constitution worth the pattern you are establishing here today? Instead of proceeding with this indecent haste, I urge the members of this chamber to consider those who are opposed. First and foremost are the provinces—not the premiers, but the provinces. The Senate was created to protect the provinces from an all-powerful federal government, such as the Trudeau-Broadbent combination, attempting to seize not only their authority but their tax bases. Let us not forget to mention that the main purpose of this constitutional amendment is to ensure that the federal government gets control and ownership of natural resources.

• (1710)

At the time of Confederation the provinces had a great fear that they were creating a monster that would consume them and rob them of their tax bases. I am amazed at the wisdom shown by the Fathers of Confederation at that time.

The provinces are not appealing to this chamber. I am rather disappointed about that; but I have to be a realist and I recognize that the reasons are obvious. Blind allegiance to government policy has been adopted by too many members of this chamber for too long. Now the Senate is ignored by both the provinces and the federal government, and if that blind allegiance continues, we will deserve the fate that is down the road.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Phillips: Members of Parliament have traditionally quoted from newspapers as a forum of public opinion supporting their views. In this case, newspapers across Canada are generally opposed to unilateral federal government action. It is my understanding that in the Province of Quebec the newspapers are almost unanimous in opposing the resolution. Not too long ago the opinion of newspaper editors was a virtue in the Liberal Party. Today the Prime Minister says "It doesn't matter. They are just trying to be intelligent."

The Charter of Rights was opposed by some of the provinces during the First Ministers' Conference. I watched the conference. I had no great concern one way or the other about the Charter of Rights. After listening to Premier Lyon of Manitoba, I now have some concerns.

As many honourable senators have already pointed out, Russia has a Charter of Rights. I do not see any great benefit from that. I do not believe that the people of the Baltic nations—Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania—benefit from an entrenched Bill of Rights. Uganda, with all its murderous oppression, had a Charter of Rights, and I do not believe that we would benefit from that.

I would point out that if one disagrees with something that is confined to a legislature, one can oppose that legislature and try to get it to amend the legislation; but when a matter goes to court and a final decision is rendered, one cannot oppose the court's decision, nor can one criticize it. By entrenching the Bill of Rights we are, in effect, restricting our own privileges. I would prefer that my rights remain where they are, which is under parliamentary and legislative control.

Let me give honourable senators two examples to illustrate my point. Let us suppose that the Supreme Court removes all the rights, or a portion thereof, of some group of Canadians. For the sake of discussion, let us say it is the disabled. There is then a public outcry requesting that this be changed. What can the members of Parliament, or the members of the provincial legislature, say? "We will have to convene a constitutional conference to change that."

My other example is one dealing with the right to education in the mother language where numbers warrant it. I have no objection to this. I believe it to be quite proper. But let us suppose that the provinces decide that 25 is an adequate number. A group of people then take that to court, and the Supreme Court says, "The number will be five." The next morning the Minister of Education has a group of parents in his office with a court order, ordering the minister to provide those parents with the opportunity of having their children educated in either of the official languages. The Minister of Education says, "I cannot do it this year. I do not have the money in my budget." What choice does he have? The Minister of Education would have to obey the court order.

Earlier today I believe Senator Bird mentioned the rights enshrined in the Constitution of the United States.

Senator Bird: No, I did not mention it.

Senator Phillips: I am sorry, I thought you did. I should like to refer to the situation in the United States after the American hostages were held in Iran. The President of the United States tried to have certain of the so-called Iranian students in the United States removed from that country; but they went to court, and the President was prevented from having them removed because of the Charter of Rights.

Honourable senators, I would like to move on the amending formula for a moment. The provinces agreed to the so-called Vancouver formula, a formula calling for agreement of the federal government and seven provinces containing 50 per cent of the population. The provinces did not retract from their agreement. It was the federal government who changed; and I have a feeling, honourable senators, that it was done to place pressure on the smaller provinces: "You will agree with the viewpoints of the federal government or we will swamp you in a national referendum."

The principle of unanimous agreement has, up until now, been part of our constitutional dominion-provincial conferences. This resolution recognizes the existence of the unanimous agreement in that it will continue for another two years.

After that, the smaller provinces will not count. They will be relegated to a position of second-class partnership. They will count in the amending formula, when it is convenient for the federal government, and, if it is not convenient, they have several different courses they can follow and the smaller provinces will not count.

That is very important to my province, which is the smallest of the small. We do not insist upon a veto, but we would like to have an opportunity to be heard and to be counted. The Vancouver formula, with its seven provinces, would give us an opportunity.

● (1720)

The principle of a national referendum by-passes both Parliament and the provincial legislatures. It also reduces the stature of a provincial legislature in that the provinces have no say in the wording of the question posed in a referendum. I think a referendum could be very easily manipulated. Let me suggest that probably the first question on a referendum would be, "(a), do you prefer the Alberta Heritage Fund, or Hibernia, and; (b) would you prefer both?" I think, with a bit of advertising, almost anybody could win that referendum.

There is a further aspect that causes me concern. The federal government can say, "We have a deficit. Therefore we must have more sources of revenue. We must own the natural resources." Put that to a referendum, honourable senators, and with a bit of advertising and manipulation, even Senator Frith could win that one.

Senator Steuart: He won five votes the other night. I thought he was pretty good.

Senator Phillips: And that was without manipulation. That was just with a whip.

Throughout the parliamentary procedure to date we have had very little mention of the place of the monarchy in our Constitution. Mr. Trudeau, when he was being questioned after his television presentation of the resolution, was asked why the monarchy was still retained. He replied, "Well, I would be happy to deal with it in the next round." Honourable senators, when the Prime Minister refers to the monarchy as "it," the days of the monarchy are limited.

Section 48 also affects the office of the Governor General. In section 48 the executive government of Canada is made exclusively subject to amendment by Parliament. The meaning of these words is defined in the British North America Act as "... the Crown acting on the advice of its Privy Councillors."

By changing the word "functions" to "office" the Parliament of Canada, under section 48, could eliminate the discretionary powers of the Governor General without affecting the office. Such an amendment could deny the Governor General his existing discretion in the event of a loss of confidence motion in the House of Commons. Thus the Prime Minister could require the Governor General to again call upon the Prime Minister who was defeated to form another government, or he could advise him not to dissolve the house. The advice of the Prime Minister would have to be acted upon by the Governor General, and his discretion as to whether to call upon the Leader of the Opposition, or dissolve the house, would be completely lost. This is very similar, honourable senators, to a section in Bill C-60 providing for just this scenario, and it would have resulted in a Prime Minister being defeated, yet staying on in office for his full term of five years.

With regard to the principle of equalization now placed in the proposed Constitution, it is my understanding, or at least my understanding of the federal government's intention in this regard, that it was to appease and meet the request of the provinces. I have really no strong objection to equalization being included in the Constitution, but there are two things that cause me concern. Firstly, "adequate" is not "equal," and secondly, the tax structure to be used as a base for equalization should be clarified and should be clearly understood. There is a danger in this, in that the federal government could say to the smaller provinces, and, indeed, to the Province of Quebec, "Agree with us, or the next equalization formula will not be very generous with regard to your province."

It has frequently been pointed out from this side that we are not opposed to patriation, or repatriation, of the Constitution, and we are not opposed to the Vancouver formula, so I will not go into that any further. I would point out, however, that the present Constitution was drafted in Canada, by Canadians, and approved in Westminster. It was not imposed upon us, nor did Westminster oppose our Constitution, which elevated us from the status of a colony. It seems rather strange, indeed, that we should now reverse the procedure and have our Constitution imposed upon us from an external Parliament. I do not think it is necessary, to avoid the Canadian Parliament in order to amend our Constitution. With a bit of effort, a bit of flexibility here and there, we can reach an agreement. It cannot be reached by December 9, but what is so magic about December 9? It is probably a little closer to Christmas than Labour Day, but beyond that I can see nothing particularly magic about that date.

Honourable senators, I believe that a Constitution conceived with closure, manipulation and mutilation cannot succeed in this country. I want to see Canada continue, but it cannot continue with the spirit that has been created throughout this procedure. We should pause long enough to erase the deep hostility existing in Canada, where one region is pitted against another, where certain regions are drastically opposed to the federal government.

I do not feel that a joint committee consisting of 25 members is sufficient to deal with this complex problem. I would point out that only one-tenth of the membership of this chamber can go to that committee and move an amendment. We have heard suggestions and expressions of concern from various people saying they hope that points causing concern will be amended in committee. How is anything to be amended in committee if you cannot move the amendment yourself? Honourable senators, there is a difference between presenting a brief to a committee and participating in that committee, as the provinces will find out when they appear before it. Should we ignore the municipalities? The territories? The native people? The minorities? Should we ignore them all or should we also give them an opportunity to participate?

• (1730)

Honourable senators are familiar with the Biblical quotation:

> For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?

I ask you: What will it profit us to gain a Constitution and lose a country?

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, during the Throne Speech debate I expressed my views on the British North America Act and made a number of comments about the high expectations which I felt had been raised among Canadians as to the results of patriating our Constitution and which I felt were unwarranted. I also expressed some of my views about constitutional amendment at that time and, if any of you are interested, you may read what I had to say in the Debates of the Senate of May 7. Therefore, this afternoon I do not propose to speak at length about the substance of the resolution but, rather, to put on the record some views and reservations I have and to express a hope at the end of my remarks.

First of all, of course, no one is opposed to patriation of the Constitution. Any thoughtful Canadian regards it as anomalous that our Constitution should be an act of the Parliament of Westminster rather than a purely Canadian document. We have said time and time again that, whereas everyone can agree on that, our great difficulty has been to agree on the mechanism by which the Constitution would be patriated and, particularly, to agree on the formula for the amendment of the Canadian Constitution in the future; for if we "patriated" it—to use a rather inelegant word which has become popular in this debate—without an amending formula, we might put our country in a tighter straitjacket by far than we are in at the present time with a Constitution at Westminster and with the Parliament at Westminster being more than anxious to do whatever it construes Canadians to agree upon it doing. This, of course, is the difficulty.

In respect to the present resolution, I have some reservations. I have never thought it was very important to entrench a Bill of Rights. As previous speakers have said in this debate, most of the totalitarian countries have excellent Bills of Rights and they do not do their people much good. The United States had a Bill of Rights for many years which countenanced the preservation of the institution of slavery and which certainly did not guarantee to their Japanese Americans any better treatment than our Japanese Canadians received from this country where we did not have a Bill of Rights. I generally felt that if the entrenchment of a Bill of Rights were regarded as important by some Canadians, I should forego my reservations and go along with it in a cheerful and relaxed manner.

There came upon my desk a while ago, however, a very interesting paper on the entrenchment of the Bill of Rights by Professor G. P. Browne of the Department of History of Carleton University. I am just going to read three paragraphs from the beginning of his paper. He says:

> In practice, the entrenchment of a Bill of Rights would do little either to protect our fundamental rights or to promote a more equitable society. On the contrary, entrenchment might lead to both a restriction of our liberties and the frustration of certain policies designed for disadvantaged groups.
> But in any case, the dispute over entrenchment does not pertain solely, or mainly, to rights at all. It pertains, rather, to the transfer of power—a transfer from the federal and provincial parliaments to the Supreme Court, and from the provinces to Ottawa.

I am not sure that on first reading I agree with the latter phrase about the transfer of power from the provinces to Ottawa; indeed, as some of you recall, I do not believe in a weakened central government in order to build a strong Canada. I suspect that we have been transferring more powers to the provinces in the years since World War II or since the 1920s when the necessity of legislating in respect of radio and aeronautics changed the trend which had motivated the Privy Council under Viscount Haldane during the first two decades of this century.

In any event, I will read one further paragraph from Professor Browne's paper. It goes on to say:

> What entrenchment would amount to, in effect, is that the Supreme Court would become responsible for defining our basic social values. In other words, a legislative authority that presently resides with elected and accountable representatives would be transferred to appointed and tenured judges.

The paper is well worth reading and I hope that the joint committee will pay some attention to Professor Browne's argument.

I have reservations not only about the desirability of entrenching a Bill of Rights, but I now feel, along with Professor Browne and some others, that there may be a distinct disadvantage to entrenching a Bill of Rights in our Constitution.

I may say, however, that I do not think this applies to the guarantee of certain language rights, nor does Professor Browne. This can be done in the Constitution if we want to do so, but we should do so fairly. Here, I must say, the history of mankind shows that legislation has almost never had much to do with the use of language in countries. Language trends operate for other social, political and economic reasons, and whether or not language rights are entrenched in our Constitution I do not think will determine the pattern of language use in Canada in 100 years' time.

I could go along with the Victoria amending formula. It might not be ideal but, as I say, I could live with it. I do not like the referendum which stands behind it and which Senator McIlraith said gives the federal government an opportunity for an "end run" around the legislatures of the provinces. I would be prepared, after the two-year waiting period, to say that if we could not agree on any other amending formula, we could incorporate the Victoria amending formula into our Constitution, and I would leave all reference to referenda out of our constitutional document entirely. I would do this in relation to the adoption of the Constitution as well as to the resort to a referendum in future issues which might involve differences of opinion between the federal government and the governments of some or all the provinces. I do not like referenda. We are elected in the legislatures of the various provinces of Canada and to the House of Commons of Canada and appointed to the Senate in order to assume these representative responsabilities. I do not think it is part of our system of representative parliamentary democracy to get around the elected member by a referendum.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hicks: Again, I would be prepared to leave the referendum to be used once if that seemed to be a factor for the adoption of the Constitution in its initial patriation to Canada, but I would hope it would not be resorted to again and that our Constitution would clearly show that it would not be possible to resort to it again.

I also think that most members of this chamber agree that the Senate in the future should be satisfied with a suspensive veto in respect to most legislation. What does this resolution, which contains a bill which might become law, if passed by the Parliament of Westminster, do? It gives the suspensive veto for one purpose only and leaves us with the absolute veto for everything else. You may read between the lines and say that the drafter of that particular section does not expect the Senate to be here for any appreciable length of time after the two-year period.

Earlier someone in the debate talked about the Victoria formula in relation to the Senate and said that if we in this chamber should find that our presence were not wanted, either by the House of Commons or by the four regions of Canada, that it is unlikely we would stand in the way of an abolition or drastic change in the nature of the Senate anyhow. Again I would like to approach this in a straightforward manner and not in the—I think it is not unfair to say—"rather devious" way that this resolution approaches the problem.

Those are the points I wanted to make. I think the resolution should go to the committee, of course. Like Senator Steuart I would hope that it emerges from the joint committee in a form that all or at least most of us can support. In this respect I also am unhappy about the arbitrary imposition of a time schedule on the handling of this resolution and, particularly, the imposition of a time schedule on the report of the committee which is embodied definitely in the resolution. I would hope that the committee would study this resolution very carefully and call witnesses including witnesses who, like Professor Browne, have something to say in criticism of the way we propose to go about things here. There are other constitutional authorities in Canada whose advice should be sought by this joint committee before a step is taken which may well be irreversible.

[Senator Hicks.]

In any event, I support the creation of a joint committee and sending this document to it. I express the hope that the joint committee will do its work to satisfy me and other honourable senators and members of the House of Commons as to the aspects of the resolution on which I have reservations, so that it might come back to this chamber and the other place in a form that could win the support of the majority of the members in both houses.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I am very glad to begin my participation in the debate following my good friend and colleague from Nova Scotia, Senator Hicks. It won't be the first time that I have done so, nor indeed will it be a great surprise to him, or to me, if somewhere along the line we don't quite see eye to eye. However, I was greatly encouraged by what I heard him tell us a few minutes ago and, therefore, glad that perhaps I will not be compelled to diverge so much from his view as I had been on other occasions.

Honourable senators, I want to say at the beginning, and I want to say it with all the emphasis that I can command, that I want to see the Canadian Constitution in Canada where it can be dealt with by Canadians and for Canadians without reference to the Parliament of another country as though we were still colonials. I want to see our Constitution totally within the jurisdiction of Canadians with an amending formula, and for the moment I can quite truthfully say that I could find it in my heart to accept quite willingly either the Victoria formula or the so-called Vancouver formula. Then I want to see our problems settled by Canadians in the Canadian way. I am not in favour of asking or, indeed, of allowing the Paliament of another country to arbitrate our difficulties or to solve those difficulties by its legislation except to bring our Constitution within our own jurisdiction and with a workable formula.

I want to say something which is important to the whole of this debate and certainly to the whole of what I propose to say. I heard it said—indeed it has been said during this debate in this house, as I understood it anyway—that the governments of the provinces are not interested in packages for the people, as the fancy phrase goes, but are only interested in increasing their own power. I want to deny that with all the strength and emphasis which I can command. Those governments are the governments of the people of the provinces exercising on behalf of the people of those provinces the powers given to the legislature of those provinces by our Constitution. When it comes to talking about packages for the people, they are a lot closer to the people than the federal Government of Canada ever is, will be or can be simply by virtue of the fact that they are provincial governments and are not therefore so far removed from their people as the government which is centralized in one part of Canada. When a provincial premier says, "I don't believe that the natural resources of my province should be wrested from my grasp or the grasp of the people of my province," he is only doing what the people of that province want him to do, and by virtue of the Constitution have the right to expect him to do. If he didn't do it, he would be false to his duty and false to those who elected him to the position which he holds. So I resent, with all the resentment that I can command, this allegation that because a provincial premier stands up for the rights of the people of his province, which he was elected to defend and has the constitutional right and duty to defend—I say that I resent that with all the resentment that I can gather. I think it is unfair. I think it is untrue. I think it is incorrect. I think it is a devious, specious argument that is not worthy of any worthy government of Canada to make.

Shortly, I will turn to deal particularly with some of the contents of this document that is before us, but before doing so perhaps I might be allowed to make some brief references to what has been said by others in this debate. Of course, I wish to associate myself with my leader, my deputy leader and my colleagues, and to congratulate them. I can find much to agree with in many things that have been said by honourable gentlemen on the other side of the house. I believe the standard of debate has been high, and I want to congratulate all those who have contributed to keeping it high. If I refer to some of the matters that have been dealt with—I know that the field has been fairly widely and deeply covered—I do so only to add some thoughts of my own and perhaps to emphasize what has already been said.

I wish to associate myself particularly with what has been said by Senator Manning and the views that he presented so ably here during his speech. I doubt if there is anyone in public life today who has a better comprehension of what is involved in these constitutional matters and what they mean than does Senator Manning.

I should like to say a word or two about the remarks of my very good friend and fellow Nova Scotian, Senator Graham.

He made, as I have long since come to expect, a very eloquent speech and, as usual, I enjoyed listening to him. I share with him his comments about being a Canadian, about Canada and about Nova Scotia, and I congratulate him on the impressive way in which he expressed them. But when he came to deal specifically with the matters relative to the resolution, I must reluctantly, but in some respects firmly, part company with him. I will confine my recital of such items to one, and that is offshore mineral rights. Senator Graham said that Canada had obtained these rights by negotiation with other countries. Honourable senators, I have to tell him that these rights accrued to Nova Scotia before Confederation, and the British North America Act states that whatever the provinces had before Confederation in the line of minerals they were to retain after Confederation. Anyone who doubts that can simply turn to the British North America Act, section 109, which I may read a little later in another connection. The first seed of such ownership was planted in 1605 by the commission given to de Monts and the activity of that gallant and dashing explorer from France. It was nurtured by the Royal Charter of 1621 given by the King of England to Sir William Alexander. Then there were the treaties of Utrecht and Paris in 1713 and 1763. It was ripened by the Commissions of Cornwallis and other governors and brought to maturity by the creation of its legislative assembly in 1758, and the legislation passed by the Government of Nova Scotia, including that legislature, between 1758 and 1867. I shall, I hope, deal with that subject at some length when I deal with the inquiry which still stands in my name on the order paper. I am sure honourable senators hope the length is not too great.

• (1750)

Senator Olson made an interesting speech which I, perhaps with somewhat less courtesy than I might have exercised, tried to help him with. At one stage he got to the point of alleging that I did not trust the people of Canada but that he did. I wish to say to him that I trust the people of Canada in matters within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, and I trust the people of Nova Scotia in relation to matters within the legislative authority of the Legislature of Nova Scotia. That seems to be more than Senator Olson can say for himself, because obviously he does not trust the people of Alberta in relation to matters within the legislative authority of the Legislature of Alberta.

Senator Olson: That is not so.

Senator Smith: That is what the honourable gentleman indicated the other day. Like many others, he spoke of the process that has been going on for 53 years as though it has occupied the attention of Parliament and governments of Canada and of the provinces for that length of time without interruption. All honourable senators know that is not so. The first significant discussion took place in the Dominion-Provincial Conference of 1927, and it is true that intermittently thereafter, and not on a continuing basis but by fits and starts, whenever someone got around to arousing interest in it, it was talked about again. However, it was not always easy to arouse much interest in it.

But even if it had been more or less continuous for 53 years, which I say is not the case, that should be a reason for caution and not for hasty, unilateral decisions. That ought to indicate to everyone concerned with the matter that there is something difficult within the problem itself. It ought to indicate to all interested that it is complex and something about it which people have strong feelings on. After all, if it had been the subject of serious discussion for so long, it must mean that inevitably it is difficult and complex and not a subject to be solved by a wave of the hand, some fancy words, or one man's desire to impose his views on the whole country.

The honourable gentleman also used a phrase which seems to sound great and sounds as though the government was doing something it could not avoid. He said, "Government must take its responsibilities." Surely government must take its responsibilities. That is a hackneyed phrase that the government uses whenever it wants to do something that others don't want. I notice it avoids it like the plague when it has a responsibility to do something that it does not want to do. That phrase is not worth the effort it took the honourable senator to say it. Surely the government's responsibility in this matter is to avoid confrontation and to use conciliation to reach a reasonable understanding with the governments of the provinces of Canada.

Senator Olson: And make some movement sometime.

Senator Flynn: A good movement.

Senator Smith: Make a movement which will leave behind it not a legacy of distaste, not a legacy of almost hatred, not a legacy of alienation and dissatisfaction, but a legacy of acceptance, of pride in having worked together to improve the Constitution of our country, to make it a Constitution in which we can continue to take pride.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: A Canadian Constitution.

Senator Asselin: Are you serious?

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman for his help. I always appreciate it and try to reciprocate it.

An Hon. Senator: Some help!

Senator Smith: I hope he will find it possible to continue his assistance.

There is one other matter that seems to me should be mentioned, and that is the question of amendment of the proposed legislation. This question was raised by Senator McIlraith at the very beginning of the debate in this house—in fact, even before the debate commenced. He asked what opportunity this house would have to move amendments. As I follow the leadership of the government in this house, it was almost like asking them to put aside the Holy Scriptures for a while when we asked them to think of the possibility of this house amending anything in the proposed legislation. Well, just to indicate that the business of amendments to the contents of loyal Addresses to Her Majesty in these matters asking for amendment of the British North America Act is, after all, not such an anathema, I should like to make one or two references to what has happened in previous years in the House of Commons. In the Journals of the house—I must admit that for the moment I have lost the date, but in Mr. Diefenbaker's time, I think about 1960, Mr. Diefenbaker, as Prime Minister, moved that a loyal Address be sent to Her Majesty the Queen asking that certain legislation be laid before the Parliament of Britain, just as this resolution does. During the debate in that house on the motion, Mr. Pearson, who was then the Leader of the Opposition, seconded by Mr. Martin, another respected name in the party of the present government, moved that the resolution be amended in the proposed section 99. He then set out the amendment asking that some words be deleted and others be changed. The Speaker accepted the resolution as being in order. It was debated for some time, put into the Journals, and eventually voted on and lost. Following the disposition of that amendment, Mr. Fulton—who, while he may not be as respected in the ranks of my honourable friends as Mr. Pearson and Mr. Martin, certainly is known to them—moved, seconded by Mr. Fleming, that the resolution be amended by deleting the paragraph numbered 3 at the end thereof and substituting therefor his proposed wording. That was accepted by the Speaker as being in order and was passed, and eventually the main motion, with this amendment included, was passed.

• (1800)

There are a number of other items—

Senator Frith: Excuse me, Senator Smith, but would this be a convenient point at which to break?

It being 6 o'clock, I suggest that the Senate adjourn during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock.

Senator Smith: Yes, I quite agree. Had I not been so absorbed in my own scholarship, I perhaps would have noticed the clock myself.

Senator Steuart: Time goes fast when you are having fun.

The Hon. the Speaker: I have to inform honourable senators that I am leaving the Chair. The debate will be continued when the Senate resumes at 8 o'clock this evening.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: The sitting is resumed. Senator Smith.

Senator Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Honourable senators, at six o'clock I was speaking about some authorities with reference to precedents where amendments had been made on previous occasions in the House of Commons. I was unable to give the exact authority at the time, but I have searched my notes since then and I think the document I was quoting from with reference to the motion moved by Mr. Diefenbaker and the amendments moved by Mr. Pearson and seconded by Mr. Martin, and the further amendment moved by Mr. Fulton and seconded by Mr. Fleming, are taken from the House of Commons Journals, for Tuesday, June 14, 1960, at pages 652, 653 and following.

At this stage perhaps I should say that I realize we have agreed to finish at 9 o'clock. During the recess it was conveyed to me that perhaps two or three other senators wish to speak before that, so I shall try to finish somewhat earlier than I otherwise would have done. I do note, however, that even now it is already 10 minutes past 8. I shall nevertheless endeavour to leave sufficient time for briefer speeches than mine to be made before 9 o'clock.

I may say that I am leaving out a good deal of what I originally intended to say, especially some of the things I intended to say from these various books I have brought with me.

I should like to examine now some of the provisions of Part IV of the proposed legislation to accompany the Address to Her Gracious Majesty the Queen for placement before the Parliament of the United Kingdom. Part IV begins on page 27 of this document entitled "The Canadian Constitution 1980" with clause or paragraph 33, and continues up to and including paragraph 40. Insofar as it is intended purely to cover a transition period, as the heading "Interim Amending Procedure and Rules for its Replacement" indicates, I would not bother very much with it, but this group of sections is indeed, in my humble opinion, very much more than a mere interim provision. As a matter of fact, I think it contains, with regard to referenda, the most important provision of the whole document. It is a provision which, if it becomes the law of this land, will allow the Parliament of Canada to make a very drastic change in the whole fabric of our country as we have known it, in the constitutional sense, at least, and in the practical sense of carrying out the day-to-day affairs of government.

I ask you to be so kind, honourable senators, as to turn to section, clause or paragraph 38—I think I shall just refer to them as sections—at the bottom of page 28, which reads as follows:

> (1) The governments or legislative assemblies of eight or more provinces that have, according to the then latest general census, combined populations of at least eighty per cent of the population of all the provinces may make a single proposal to substitute for paragraph 41(1)(b) such alternative as they consider appropriate.

I would point out here that paragraph 41(1)(b) comes under Part V which is headed "Procedure for Amending Constitution of Canada". So the reference in section 38, is specifically, and in so many words, a reference to paragraph 41 which appears under that heading "Procedure for Amending Constitution of Canada".

● (2005)

The part I have just read, which is subsection (1) of section 38, means that, if the governments or legislative assemblies of eight or more provinces can agree on a formula for amendment, and if they represent 80 per cent of the population of the country, they may make that agreement into a single proposal to substitute for paragraph 41(1)(b)—that is, to substitute it for the main amending formula of the whole document that is before us.

If those eight provinces, representing 80 per cent of the population, agree on this particular proposal, then each of them may deposit a copy thereof with the Chief Electoral Officer within two years after the act, except Part V, comes into force, but, prior to the expiration of the two years, any province that has deposited a copy may withdraw it.

We then come to subsection (3), which says:

> Where copies of an alternative have been filed as provided by subsection (2) and, on the day that is two years after this Act, except Part V, comes into force, at least eight copies remain filed by provinces that have, according to the then latest general census, combined populations of at least eighty per cent of the population of all of the provinces, the government of Canada shall—

It is "shall".

> —cause a referendum to be held within two years after that day—

That is within two years after the act, except Part V, comes into effect.

> —shall cause a referendum to be held within two years after that day to determine whether—

Now listen to this if you will, honourable senators.

> —to determine whether
> (a) paragraph 41(1)(b) or any alternative thereto proposed by the government of Canada by depositing a copy thereof with the Chief Electoral Officer at least ninety days prior to the day on which the referendum is held, or—

That is, to determine whether any alternative thereto proposed by the Government of Canada, or > (b) the alternative proposed by the provinces, shall be adopted.

There are a great many words there but, as I read them after considerable study, they simply mean that supposing the eight provinces with 80 per cent of the population do agree on a formula to substitute for paragraph 41(1)(b), the Government of Canada nevertheless can put up any other formula it likes. It says "any alternative thereto proposed by the Government of Canada." It can then order—shall order, as a matter of fact—a referendum to determine which of those two alternatives will, in fact, replace paragraph 41(1)(b), the main amending formulae, or one of the two main amending formulae set out in the main portion of the part of the bill which is supposed to be the permanent part of our Constitution.

I want to say that again. Even supposing the eight provinces, representing 80 per cent of the population, agree on a proposal for an amending formula, the Government of Canada can propose any alternative thereto, and can then order a referendum on a national basis to determine which of those alternatives shall be adopted.

● (2010)

Section 39 says what will happen after the referendum so far as the proclamation is concerned. I come now to section 40, and I ask honourable senators to listen to this:

> (1) Subject to subsection (2), Parliament may make laws respecting the rules applicable to the holding of a referendum under subsection 38(3).

That is the section I was dealing with. Subsection (2) simply deals with the right of every citizen of Canada to vote. Let us go back to section 39. It says:

> Where a referendum is held under subsection 38(3), a proclamation under the Great Seal of Canada shall be issued within six months after the date of the referendum bringing Part V into force with such modifications, if any, as are necessary to incorporate the proposal approved by a majority of the persons voting at the referendum and with such other changes as are reasonably consequential on the incorporation of that proposal.

As I read that, honourable senators, it means that if the Government of Canada puts an alternative proposal, no matter what it is, in accordance with section 38(3), and if after a referendum—for which it makes the rules and for which it can spend as much money as it likes over a period of two years in propaganda—it succeeds in having its alternative accepted, then that is the alternative which will govern the amending process of the new Constitution.

When we look at section 41(1), we find that it deals with how an amendment to the Constitution may be made. That is the one that mentions resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons and the legislative assemblies of a majority of the provinces that includes a certain number of provinces. So it is quite possible for the Government of Canada to say, "Well, the alternative proposal we make under section 38 is that all amendments to the Constitution shall be governed by a majority of the people of Canada voting in a referendum, which we will call, the rules for which we will write, and in respect of which we shall have two years in which to spend all the taxpayers' money we want to spend on convincing the people that they should accept our formula, "the sovereign will of the people" to justify doing that.

Senator Olson asked me the other day, when he was making his speech, who can quarrel with a majority of the people of Canada? Who can? Well, I can, as a Nova Scotian, if they decide to take away my rights as a Nova Scotian. Not only can I, but I will.

So we are putting ourselves, if we ever adopt these particular provisions, in a situation where the provinces, so far as their legislatures and governments are concerned, do not exist in matters relating to constitutional reform, once this should happen. That is the way I read it, and honourable senators can read it for themselves and make up their own minds. Obviously it is the way that some premiers read it, because of the things they have been saying about what can be done under this proposed new Constitution.

If I am right in my premise that these provisions will enable the Government of Canada simply to put the alternative and have the amending formula decided by the majority of the people of Canada—if I am right in that, and I believe I am, then the government or the legislature or a province will cease to have any useful existence so far as constitutional reform is concerned.

The Government of Canada, after this comes into effect, could say, "Let us have a referendum on whether we can take over all the natural resources of the Province of Alberta." If they could get half the people who voted on the referendum plus one to vote in favour of that, then the Legislature and Government of Alberta, and the people of Alberta, would lose the rights over their natural resources given to them under section 92 of the British North America Act—and so would any other province.

● (2015)

If Senator Olson or Senator Godfrey wish to take me to task for saying that I would not vote, or would not be prepared to have our Constitution amended in that way, I make no apologies—none whatever.

[Senator Smith.]

Just think for a moment about what it means. What do you have to do to get a majority of the people voting in Canada? Well, you and I all know where substantially more than half of those people live. They live in two of the provinces of Canada. I am not suggesting that even the most efficient propaganda could get all the people in those two provinces to vote the way the government may want them to vote, nevertheless, it would be a very difficult proposition indeed, for the remaining provinces of Canada, with a total population of, say, ten million, as they have today, to make very much headway in opposing what would be the wish of the majority of the people of those two provinces, which have a combined population of something like 14 or 15 million people. You can see, therefore, what would happen to the rest of us. You can see what would happen to Nova Scotia. It would be just the same as my colleague Senator Macquarrie said would happen to Prince Edward Island, or Newfoundland, or any province of Canada.

I doubt very much if the people of Nova Scotia, or the people of Alberta, or even the people of Ontario and Quebec, want our country to get itself in the position where that kind of thing can happen. I do not know whether the draftsman intended it to have that effect—I can only assume that he did, or else my interpretation is wrong.

I just want to repeat the effect this would have. It would create a situation where the federal government would have absolutely unlimited scope for choosing any alternative amending formula it liked to put before the people, which would thereafter be used; it could set any date for the referendum within two years; it could spend unlimited public money on propaganda in favour of its own alternative, over a period of two years; and it would need to get only a bare majority of one vote plus 50 per cent of the votes cast in that referendum to have its alternative selected.

I do not want that kind of a country. I do not want to live in a province which has hanging over its head that kind of threat. I do not think it is fair or reasonable or right or proper that any province should be asked to remain in this federation with that kind of threat hanging over its head. I am not here in any way advocating separation. That is the last thing in my mind. I am just saying that it is so completely and utterly unfair, so completely contrary to the basis on which this country was built in the first place, and on which it has lived for 113 years, so completely contrary to the whole concept of the country, that I do not think it merits the slightest jot or title of support from anybody who has the wellbeing of this Canada at heart.

Of course, this is not the only formula—that is, the amendment of the Constitution solely by national referendum—that has some difficulties about it. As I said, however, I am willing to accept the Vancouver formula or the Victoria formula. However, let us look at section 38(1) again. Section 38 states:

● (2020)

> (1) The governments or legislative assemblies of eight or more provinces that have, according to the then latest general census, combined populations of at least eighty per cent of the population . . . may make a single proposal—

On the face of it this seems to be reasonable, but perhaps we can examine for a moment what that means.

For the purposes of these comments, I am assuming the population of Canada now to be approximately 24 million people. Eighty per cent of 24 million, according to my calculations, is 19.2 million and, on the other side of this calculation, 20 per cent of the population is 4.8 million.

Now we must look at the population of the provinces. On the basis of eight provinces, you must find two provinces which, between them, have greater than 20 per cent of the population or more than 4.8 million. That immediately would wipe out any two of the Atlantic provinces because the whole population of the Atlantic provinces is approximately 2.2 million. Saskatchewan and Alberta between them have perhaps 3½ million people so they could not stop it; British Columbia and Saskatchewan could not stop it; Alberta and Nova Scotia could not stop it; and Saskatchewan and Newfoundland could not stop it.

I suggest that this is also trespassing upon what would be fair and reasonable having regard to the way our country was built, the way it was created, and the way we have lived ever since 1967.

An Hon. Senator: 1867.

Senator Smith: I just lost 100 years.

Senator Frith: What's a hundred years?

Senator Smith: I am getting to the age where 100 years does not make much difference.

I realize that time is moving ahead rapidly, and I cannot say very much more of what I want to say and still keep my word. However, I do want to say something about equalization and regional disparities.

The section I want to refer to is found on page 26 of the document. Although I have been very closely acquainted with this question of equalization and the Constitution and the question of regional disparities and the Constitution—in fact, I think I might reasonably claim to have drafted the first draft on regional disparities which ever found its way into a draft Constitution—I am far less than happy with this provision. All that it commits the Government of Canada and the provinces to is:

> (a) promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians;
> (b) furthering economic development to reduce disparity in opportunities; and
> (c) providing essential public services of reasonable quality to all Canadians.

In the first place, that is not a very good statement of the principle. Instead of providing essential public services of reasonable quality to all Canadians, surely the principle should be "providing an average standard of public services without a greater than average burden of taxation."

Look at this how you will, there is not a single chance—not even the proverbial snowball's chance—of enforcing this commitment as it is written if a province feels it is entitled to equalization and is not receiving it, or if it feels it is not receiving enough. It can do nothing by way of resort to the courts to remedy what it believes is an injustice.

• (2025)

I have heard it argued many times that it is difficult to put a precise legal obligation into the Constitution, but I thought that is what this new Constitution was all about. I thought it was creating opportunities for people to take to the courts what is no longer to be left to the legislatures and Parliament. Surely, if it is designed for that purpose, then the same principle ought to be applied to equalization, because equalization gets back to the people. It determines the standard of public services that can be provided to those provinces which are entitled to them. It is just as important to them as many of the other things that are enumerated in this document.

There is no use in telling me it cannot be done because all you have to do is look at Australia where there is a grants commission established to calculate equalization. It does calculate equalization although so far as I can tell, they have not gone the one step further of saying the calculation of the grants shall be enforceable by law. It would be a simple matter to do that if the will were there.

Similarly, to take the constitutions of two other well-known countries, you can look at West Germany and India for better models or proposals than can be found here.

Honourable senators, as you can see, I am putting aside over half of my speech and am now within striking distance of the end. We all know—we have heard it quoted time and time again—and I think we accept it without reservation, that this country could not have been built unless the provinces were given the rights which they are given by section 92 of the British North America Act. If you read that act you will find that the provinces are authorized by it exclusively to make laws regarding the various subject matter enumerated there.

That does not make them second-rate governments. Within the limits of those powers, they are as sovereign as the Parliament of Canada, with the exception of the fact that in certain circumstances the Parliament of Canada can use its declaratory power or its "peace, order and good government" powers under section 91 to do things that it ordinarily would not do. Subject only to that, the provinces are completely sovereign governments with just as much and just as complete jurisdiction over those subjects as is the Government of Canada within its jurisdiction. There is a tendency abroad, to which I referred briefly this afternoon, to look at them as though they were inferior governments, but they are not in any way, shape or form. They are the equal in sovereignty within their jurisdiction to the Parliament of Canada. We could not have built this country unless they were made that way.

All you have to do is to examine the history of the efforts to change our Constitution over the years, as detailed in the document put out by Mr. Guy Favreau while he was Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada. In every one of those efforts you will find that the interests of the provinces were put high on the list. It was accepted everywhere, including the Statute of Westminster, that the Constitution was not to be changed in any way which affected substantially the rights of the provinces without the concurrence of those provinces. If you examine the Confederation debates held in the Legislature of Canada or—to put it so that we might more readily understand it—the combined Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec, you will find that George Brown and Sir John A. Macdonald, two men who were vigorously opposed to one another on everything else, said the same thing. You will find that wherever you look.

I had intended to go through these precedents one by one, but I will not. Just let me say, as you all now know and which has been said by many people in this debate, that the contents of the document which I held before you a little while ago asks the Parliament of the United Kingdom to do something for us, to solve difficulties in a way that cannot legally be done in Canada. I haven't the slightest doubt that that is the deliberate intent of the Government of Canada. One has only to read that so-called leaked cabinet document which is now pretty well public property, and which I have read, to realize that it was clearly brought to the attention of the negotiators for the federal government before the last Conference of First Ministers took place that there was grave doubt about whether these provisions could be declared constitutional by any Canadian court if they were passed by Parliament.

Indeed, the reason for the short timetable also appears in that document because, among other things, it urges upon the federal negotiators the necessity of acting quickly before those who are opposed to the proposal have time to get it before the courts. That is in that document. I think it is subparagraph 6 on page 52. All you have to do is take a look at that, and you will see why December 9 suddenly becomes so important. It is hoped that the federal government, before that time expires, will have this thing safely out of Canada, or what they think is safely out of Canada, and therefore out of reach of the Supreme Court of Canada. I doubt if they are right about their being able to do that, but that is what they intend.

There has been some talk about getting rid of the last vestige of colonialism, namely, the right of the British Parliament to deal with the British North America Act. I am as anxious as anyone to get rid of that, but I say that this proposal we are now considering is an act of colonialism. It is taking a course which shows that those who put it forward are really the last colonials. They want something of a colonial nature done by the British Parliament which they cannot get done here.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Honourable senators, I shall close by moving an amendment to the resolution. It is now clear that the timetable of December 9 is simply a timetable put forward in the hope of escaping from the jurisdiction of the Canadian courts before the matter can be placed before them. I do not think that is a worthy objective; I think it is a most unworthy objective.

[Senator Smith.]

Accordingly, I move, seconded by Senator Grosart, that the motion before us be amended by deleting the sixth paragraph and substituting the following therefor:

> That the committee submit its report not later than March 1, 1981.

● (2035)

I have a number of copies of this motion in amendment, and I would ask that they be distributed.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your careful attention. I would ask that those who are condemned to follow me not be restricted as to time. I ask you to realize that I should have concluded sooner in the circumstances, and we should not take out on them the trespass that I have committed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Smith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grosart, that the motion be amended by deleting the sixth paragraph and substituting the following therefor:

> That the committee submit its Report not later than March 1, 1981;

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise, as seconder, to support the amendment proposed by Senator Smith. Perhaps I might be permitted to say that I regret that, because of circumstances entirely beyond my control, it was not possible for me to participate in this historic debate during the course of last week. However, I welcome the opportunity to make quite clear the position that I take in regard to the proposed amendment—which, in many ways, goes to the heart of the problem that confronts the Senate and the people of Canada at the moment.

The amendment proposes a delay, a putting back of the deadline. The purpose of that, of course, is to permit further discussion of the many points that have been raised in opposition to the proposal that is before the Senate at this time.

I have had the opportunity of reading carefully the very great contributions that have been made in the debate on this proposal in the Senate, and I feel, once again, that the Senate has more than fulfilled, up to the present, its important function of reviewing legislation, particularly considering its traditional role of the protection of the interests of all of the partners in Confederation, including the federal government and the provinces.

It has been an unusual debate, strange in many respects. One very heartening respect to me has been the lukewarm approval the resolution taken as the whole, has received from honourable senators whose political persuasion is other than that of those of us in the Progressive Conservative group. I say "lukewarm" because there have been so many examples of defects—defects of omission and commission—pointed out by honourable senators, many of whom have made it very clear that the proposal as it stands is not satisfactory to them.

I appreciate the fact that many honourable senators have said they will vote for the resolution, which is to refer the matter to a special joint committee. That is understandable. But the essential purpose, I think, of Senator Smith's amendment is to ensure that the many objections raised, not only by the official opposition, which is understandable, but by others, are given the fullest possible consideration by the government.

At the moment everything seems very unclear. Repeated questions to the Leader of the Government to explain some details have resulted only in further confusion. For example, he was repeatedly asked if the resolution to submit an Address to Her Majesty will be voted on, and he has given us quite contradictory answers. He has said, on the one hand, that, yes, the resolution itself will be debated, and then he has said, "No. If the committee happened to say, 'We recommend that the Parliament of Canada do such-and-such,' then it might be deemed to be a resolution." That, of course, is nonsense. Obviously the British house will say, "Where is your resolution? Are you asking us to make a decision on the basis of a report of a Canadian parliamentary joint committee which happens to have been approved and concurred in by the Senate of Canada?" Of course they would say, "Where is the resolution?" The essence of this whole procedure is that this Parliament, both houses, must pass that resolution and the Address will be forwarded to Her Majesty. That is one example of the type of confusion that has arisen, because it must be obvious to all honourable senators that this is an ad hoc concept, a hurried, hasty attempt to push through something without careful consideration.

I remember when Senator McIlraith raised a very important question the answer he had from the Leader of the Government was, "Well, now, since you have raised that, we have had some serious discussions about this whole matter. We have started to think about it." We seem to have this kind of evidence over and over again in all the discussions that have taken place.

It is, of course, an historic occasion, one that places tremendous obligations on all of us. I am sure every honourable senator would have wished that in this historic development in our Constitution, all across Canada we would have been ringing bells and saying, "Here we are bringing back our constitution. It is being patriated," to use the current phrase. "We have brought it back." Instead of that enthusiasm, that excitement across the country, we have deliberate confusion. We have gross errors of commission and omission. We have doubts as to the constitutional legality of the approach that the government is taking. We have a situation where the government says, "We will now try to do," and this has been pointed out over and over again, "by indirection what the Supreme Court of Canada said the Government of Canada cannot do directly." We are asked to put the Westminster Parliament in an impossible situation by saying, "You must pass this. We are asking you to pass it because we think these are constitutional reasons why you cannot refuse, no matter how embarrassed you may be. But we do not know what we can say to you if after you have passed this address, and made the amendment we ask to the British North America Act, if you have done that, then we have to warn you that the Supreme Court of Canada might decide that the action of the Canadian government, which you acted on, was unconstitutional under the Constitution of Canada as it existed at that particular time." This is one of the many absurdities, one of the many reasons why, it seems to me, that this amendment makes a great deal of sense. It says, "Let us take time; let us put an end to this concept of getting through by closure, closure in the other place, a mild form of closure here, closure on the extent of deliberations in a joint committee of the Parliament of Canada on the most important matter that has ever been referred to a joint committee." They must report on the 9th December, and there again there is the implication of closure on the whole constitutional process, closure on all the rights of the provinces, if I may say so, closure by a form of referendum.

Acceptance by the government of the suggestion put forward in this amendment would at least put a stop to this steamroller which is certainly, surely, no way to bring about a change in a constitution which is based on an original agreement between partners, It is late in the day, and it is probably very old-fashioned to talk about the pact of Confederation, but it is a fact that for at least the first 50 years of our Confederation there was never any doubt in the mind of anybody that it was a pact between partners, Laurier, Taché, Mercier, Sir John A. Macdonald—name anyone you will and every one of them spoke of the federal pact and that is, of course, what it was. Yet we are now saying it can be unilaterally torn up and thrown away which is exactly what we are asked to do.

Honourable senators, I support the amendment fully because it may give us an opportunity to reconsider this undue haste, to take another look at the confusion and the complexity of the method. In conclusion I would say this, speaking for myself personally, if the Leader of the Government were to rise and say that the government will now accept in the remaining time at our disposal, the approach suggested today by Senator McIlraith, not a Conservative, an experienced parliamentarian and one of the great leaders of the house in the other place, a man of great wisdom, then I say personally that I would accept completely an undertaking by the Government of Canada that they will accept the McIlraith approach, and I believe my colleagues in the opposition would agree with me in that.

Honourable senators, I commend the amendment and I regret that the hour being what it is, I do not have the time to give some of the many other reasons which I would like to give why I think there is a necessity for us to pause and use that traditional sober, second thought. It is about time, I think, that the Senate exercised that.

● (2045)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have heard some excellent speeches in this debate, and I mean to speak only very briefly with respect to the amendment proposed by the Honourable Senator Smith. The importance of passing the main motion and sending the constitutional proposals to committee as quickly as possible cannot be underestimated. It is important to enable as many representative groups as possible to be heard as soon as possible. That procedure will move ahead rapidly if the main motion is adopted this evening. As far as the proposal to extend the time of the hearings is concerned, I have received advice from the Clerk of the Senate, because advice was sought on this point, that it would be possible for the joint committee to recommend extended hearings. The joint committee in an interim report to both houses could ask for an extension of the reporting date. Both houses, of course, would have to adopt such a report simultaneously. The possibility exists, then, according to our Senate procedural advisers, that an extension of time could be considered by the joint committee, and I want to assure honourable senators on that point.

That really is the only contribution I have to make at this time. Based on the information we have now, the government believes that it will be entirely possible for the joint committee to hear from a sufficient number of groups, and to complete its consideration of the constitutional proposals, by the reporting deadline of December 9. But let the committee itself decide if it needs further time. If the procedural possibilities exist, they may wish to submit an interim report recommending that the reporting date be extended.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will remember that it was agreed that the question on the main motion would be put at 9 o'clock this evening. If no one else wishes to speak, could the question on the amendment be put now, and then the question on the main motion?

● (2050)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I had hoped that when we were discussing this amendment I could express, if somewhat irrelevantly, how disappointed I am that so few Liberals from Quebec have stood for the viewpoints of the three parties in Quebec and that so few senators have considered as serious the opposition of the provinces and have not defended the viewpoint that, since 1949, the role of Westminster in dealing with any other request for an amendment is not the same as it was before then, owing to the wording of the 1949 amendment, which refers exclusively to problems of interest to the provinces.

It had been my hope that if a delay had been accorded to the committee it would have had the benefit of a decision of the courts, which could have been made on that very point. I understand, for example, that the Manitoba Court of Appeal has set the date of December 4 for the hearing. Thus, if the committee were not forced to report too quickly, it could have the benefit of the decision of the Manitoba Court of Appeal, or of that of either of the other two which have been consulted.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is now 9 o'clock. Unless the Honourable Senator Lafond has leave of the Senate to speak, I do have an order here to take a vote on the main motion at 9 o'clock.

Senator Lafond: It is just that I take objection to some of the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition concerning the participation in this debate by senators from Quebec.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Flynn: You are entitled to do that.

Senator Lafond: This motion was strictly one of referral to a committee. Those senators from Quebec who have not yet spoken may well have their say when the report of the committee comes back.

Senator Flynn: Good! I am looking forward to that.

Senator Frith: Question!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we have a main motion, which reads as follows—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Very well. An amendment to the main motion has been proposed by the Honourable Senator Smith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grosart, that the motion be amended by deleting the sixth paragraph thereof and substituting the following therefor:

> That the committee submit its Report not later than March 1, 1981;

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those in favour of the amendment please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those who are opposed to the amendment please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

Senator Flynn: On division.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment defeated, on division. We will now take a vote on the main motion.

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that the Senate do unite—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those in favour of the main motion please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those who are opposed please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The question was resolved in the affirmative on the following division:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before proceedings to the next item of business, I should like to point out that part of the agreement in connection with the motion we have just dealt with was that the motion to appoint senators to serve on the special joint committee be adopted before the adjournment of the Senate today, or at such other time agreed upon by the Senate.

I have informed the Leader of the Opposition that the list of senators on this side is not quite complete.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: I say this in fairness, because the Leader of the Opposition had told me the names that he had proposed for this side. And so I ask honourable senators—and I have discussed this with my honourable friend—to have this aspect of the matter postponed until tomorrow evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—HISTORICAL FACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA REFERENCE CASE—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry by the Honourable Senator Smith:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores which distinguish that claim from the British Columbia claim as dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights (the British Columbia Reference case), (1967) Supreme Court Reports, 792, and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, and submit that the said decision does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I ask that this item stand, but I make what you may regard as a somewhat threatening assertion to the effect that I will likely speak to it tomorrow.

Inquiry stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—MOTION TO APPOINT SENATE MEMBERS -MOTION IN AMENDMENT –DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a):

> That rule 66(1) be suspended in relation to the nomination of senators to serve on the Special Joint Committee to consider a proposed Address to Her Majesty the Queen concerning the Constitution of Canada;
>
> That the following senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the said Special Joint Committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Argue, Asselin, Austin, Connolly, Frith, Goldenberg, Hays, Lamontagne, Roblin and Tremblay; and
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, is there any precedent for a cabinet minister sitting on a committee like this?

Senator Frith: I believe, honourable senators, there are many precedents, and I would be glad to table a list of precedents for the presence of cabinet ministers on committees.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I rise to speak regarding the representation of an area in which I do not live, and to say that I am appalled by the fact that no senator from the Atlantic provinces is named a member of this committee.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree that is perhaps regrettable, but there will be many House of Commons representatives of the Atlantic provinces, and, of course, there will only be Senate representation for some of the western provinces.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would join with Senator Godfrey's remarks regarding Senator Argue's being on the committee. He is a minister of the Crown and, as such, he is bound by cabinet solidarity. He is in no position to voice any independent opinion. I am appalled at the suggestion that he be a member of the committee.

● (2005)

As I look at the rest of the committee membership, I see that the only one who spoke on this matter from the government side is Senator Frith himself, and we know where he stands.

Senator Asselin: Senator Argue, too.

Senator Flynn: I just mentioned Senator Argue. I do not think I have to repeat what I said with regard to Senator Argue.

As I said, Senator Frith is the only one from the government side who spoke on this matter. I see that the others are: Senator Austin, Connolly, Goldenberg, Hays, Lamontagne, and so forth. They have all remained silent on this matter. None of those who had reservations about this resolution has been picked. That cannot be but by design, and I protest that.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think any objective observer—

Senator Flynn: Oh, are you one?

Senator Perrault: —reviewing this list of names would draw the conclusion that these are people of exceptional ability.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: I am not speaking only of the government supporters on the committee list. My remarks apply equally to those members of the official opposition.

Senator Flynn: We at least indicated where we stood.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, would you restrain yourself and attempt to observe parliamentary decorum. Increasingly, recently, you have violated the basic principles under which we operate.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but you tried to snow us with—

Senator Perrault: When I look at this list of names of such able parliamentarians as Senators Argue, Asselin, Austin, Connolly, Frith, Goldenberg, Hays, Lamontagne and Tremblay, I think the test should not be whether they participated in the debate this week, last week, or any week. The record of these senators is outstanding. This is known to the Leader of the Opposition. For him to stand in his place tonight and suggest that these senators would serve on the joint committee under some kind of direction, or to infer that they are not worthy to serve on this committee is unworthy of the senator himself to say.

Senator Flynn: You would not be able to swear that they have not been chosen by design. Not one of those who opposed the package partly or entirely is on this list. They are left out.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators it would be as ridiculous for me to charge that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition had chosen his people by design—

Senator Flynn: I have. Admit that you have done the same.

Senator Perrault: At some point in the future, then, you must describe the motives for your choice.

Senator Flynn: The motives are clear. We stood very clearly on our principles on this side, but there was division on the other side. Those who disagreed do not appear as members of this committee.

Again, I protest the inclusion of Senator Argue, a minister of the Crown. He is bound by cabinet solidarity.

Senator Perrault: I wish to remind the honourable senator that one precedent to cite is the instance in parliamentary history when the late Prime Minister R. B. Bennett chaired a committee of Parliament.

Senator Flynn: The chairman of what committee? On what question?

Senator Perrault: May I suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that he temper his remarks and agree that this is a good list of senators.

Senator Flynn: I shall never do that.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, I should like to suggest that the Leader of the Government, by voting against the amendment moved by Senator Donahoe, has deprived the Atlantic provinces of representation on the special joint committee. If the committee membership had been expanded to include 15 senators, then one senator from each of the regional areas could be on the committee.

I am not asking that there be a senator from the Atlantic region appointed from the minority. I would be perfectly happy to have Senator Cook appointed to the committee. I think I can trust him, and I would ask the Leader of the Government to consider that.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as the deputy leader pointed out, there is a regional and provincial balance to be achieved, and the committee has to be regarded—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Perrault: —as a committee which reflects the entire nation, whether the membership of that committee comes from the other place or from the Senate. I should also like to remind the honourable senator that it is proposed—and honourable senators are aware of this—that the right of substitution—

Senator Flynn: Let us see that?

Senator Perrault: —be brought into operation along the lines prescribed in the other place. We discussed that the other evening. There could be many opportunities during these committee hearings for senators from various regions to serve on this committee.

• (2010)

Hon. Daniel Riley: First of all, I should like to tell the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the people of the Atlantic provinces are going to resent deeply the statement that he made here tonight—the statement which implied that there is no one in the Atlantic provinces—

An Hon. Senator: Shocking!

Senator Riley: —of exceptional ability, who is capable of serving on that committee.

Senator Perrault: I didn't say that.

Senator Riley: You implied it.

Senator Walker: You implied it. That's right.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning Senator Argue, whom I respect very much indeed. Can he tell us whether, in order that he be impartial and objective during the committee hearings, Senator Argue has been freed by the cabinet from his obligations under the convention of cabinet solidarity.

Senator Sparrow: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: No, no! We would like to hear the answer to that.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, all of the Senate members who participate in those committee activities will be operating according to conscience.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Perrault: And they will bring to bear their own individual judgments.

I want to take this opportunity to state that in no way did I imply, nor did I intend to imply, that there was a lack of ability or a lack of capacity among the senators from the Atlantic region. The fact of the matter is that the present government has no House of Commons representation in the four western provinces—

An Hon. Senator: And never will have.

Senator Perrault: —and I think honourable senators are realistic enough to know that, in view of that circumstance, it is thought to be necessary to provide more Senate Liberal representation from the western provinces. Ordinarily, in order to achieve balance, greater Senate representation from the Atlantic provinces would be proposed, but in view of the need for western senators to create a balance, it is proposed that the Atlantic provinces should be represented by more members from the other place.

Now, that is not an entirely satisfactory situation. Had we ten more places on the joint committee, without any question, all of the regions represented here in the Senate would have been represented on that committee by senators.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I think we will let the people of the Atlantic region judge the words that have just been spoken by the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, speaking from the west and from Saskatchewan, I just want to say that I believe it is almost disgraceful that a cabinet minister from Saskatchewan would be appointed to that committee, when we have very competent Saskatchewan senators who are not in the cabinet—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Sparrow: —and who could serve on this committee. I refer to Senator Buckwold and to Senator Steuart, who have played a very important part in this chamber. It would indicate to me that there must have been some type of blood test taken to ensure that the Saskatchewan representative was a cabinet minister. On behalf of our province I want to say that I object to that most strenuously.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have followed the comments of other members of this house with some interest, particularly with respect to the nomination of a member of the cabinet to sit on this committee. I am completely at a loss to understand the explanation of the leader of the house that that honourable gentleman will operate according to his conscience.

I am sorry to say that that is not the rule in connection with members of the cabinet. I am sure they have consciences. I have been a member of cabinet on occasion and I guess I had a conscience, but I knew perfectly well that cabinet solidarity came first, because, if at any time my conscience could not stand what the rest of the cabinet proposed to do, I had an easy remedy, and that was to resign. But until such time as resignation took place, I was bound by convention and by all the traditions of Parliament to observe the principle of cabinet solidarity.

I don't think that Senator Argue can be excused in any way from that same obligation. I don't think the leader of the house can in any way say that this rule does not apply to him—although he is not here to speak for himself—and that he can operate outside the rule of cabinet solidarity and cabinet responsibility, because I simply don't believe it.

● (2015)

If we put this senator, as estimable as he is—and I have a sincere regard for him—on the committee it has to be assumed that his mind is closed insofar as cabinet decisions are concerned. There may be amendments made by this committee which the cabinet will approve of, in which case we would expect Senator Argue to support them, but I do not believe he is a free agent to decide by himself what attitude he should take toward the momentous issues that will come before this committee. It is a contradiction in terms that anyone should advance that proposition in this house, and a bit of an insult, I think, to those of us who follow the traditions of the British parliamentary system.

So I think that the government ought to reconsider this proposition, and propose some name other than Senator Argue's. I would suggest that they should replace him with some gentleman or some lady from the maritime provinces of Canada.

I don't care what the leader says about the House of Commons, although I agree that that is important. I agree that there will be a wider representation there because there are more members in the House of Commons. Nevertheless, if we have a duty as regional representatives, as indeed we have, to think that the whole Atlantic territory, four provinces—one whole senatorial district, if you like—is not represented in any way in this committee is a matter of some sadness and concern to me. I wish that on our side we had a little room to accommodate that sort of thing, but we have not been able to do so. In view of the overwhelming representation in this committee that we will find from the two central provinces, I think that either Senator Argue should be replaced by some one from the Atlantic provinces, or one of the representatives of the central provinces in the Senate could well be dropped so that the Atlantic provinces could be represented.

I hope we will not indulge in too heated a discussion of this matter, because the merits are so clear. I would ask the leader of the house to accept this suggestion as a suggestion made in good faith and in an attempt to be helpful. If he cannot move on it at the present time, I hope he will take the matter under advisement.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government a question in this regard. I have nothing but praise for the function that Senator Argue has fulfilled in the Senate. He sat beside me for a long time and I know him well. I would have no objection to his appointment to any of our committees. Nevertheless, I ask the Leader of the Government if he can assure this chamber that in accepting an appointment to a parliamentary committee of this sort, there is no conflict of interest on the part of Senator Argue in view of his cabinet responsibilities. Without that assurance, I for one certainly would not favour such a motion.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not believe that there is a conflict of interest as far as Senator Argue's responsibilities are concerned.

I want to say in response to the Deputy Leader of the Opposition that, of course, his proposal will be considered by the government. This has been a very difficult process to achieve balance and to make sure that all provinces will be properly represented on the joint committee by both government and official opposition members from the Senate and from the other place. Certainly the proposal will be considered and discussed. I give that kind of commitment, but that is all I can say.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words on the rather narrow but specific objection to any cabinet minister being appointed to a joint committee, or, indeed, to a committee of this house or the other house. In the first place it is not precedent-setting. It has been done a number of times in the past.

• (2020)

Senator Flynn: When?

Senator Olson: Well, we have a list if you would like to see all the precedents. We can drag them out.

Senator Roblin: What kind of committees, pray?

Senator Olson: There is a very important point that has been brought out here, and that is that anyone who has a predetermined bias or position ought not to be appointed to a committee. If that is so, I should say to the Leader of the Opposition—

Senator Flynn: I did not say that—

Senator Olson: I should say to the Leader of the Opposition—well, that is essentially what has been said. It has been said that because a cabinet minister is committed to supporting the government's position, which is an opinion, therefore he should not be a member of this committee. If that argument is to be followed through, and the Leader of the Opposition has indeed disqualified a whole lot of other members who have stated their position—

Senator Flynn: You never understood a word of what I said.

Senator Olson: It may be that there is a position, a bias, a commitment, and so on, for the support or otherwise of the resolution, to be put before the committee; but I can tell you that the government has already indicated that some flexibility with respect to amendments will be shown—well, you can laugh about it if you like—

Senator Flynn: They are laughing behind you.

Senator Olson: That is right. That has already been said. I, however, am talking about a point of principle, which is that I would hope that that same degree of flexibility will be shown by other members, because it must be remembered that this cabinet minister is not going to have any stronger vote than any other member on that committee. Therefore, I hope that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition does not want to argue out of both sides of his mouth—

Senator Flynn: I do not want Argue to argue at all.

Senator Olson: —because if he wants to apply certain rules to one particular member, then surely he should apply them to the biases that have been displayed by other members, and they are very clear.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, we all noted that last night the government was not ready with its list, and I submit that they are not ready tonight, either. Some very, very serious things have been brought to the attention of this chamber. It is not at all as Senator Olson says, in reference to the presence of a minister on a committee of this kind. The government leader referred to R. B. Bennett heading a committee. I am not sure that that is right. On the other hand, I am not going to say that it is wrong, because I do not have my documents with me. I wonder if he is not thinking of the Honourable H. H. Stevens, who was a minister in R. B. Bennett's cabinet, and who headed a price spreads committee which later became a commission, with an investigative function which is an entirely different thing.

Here we have a Joint Address which emanated from—where? From the government. In fact, it is down as a government notice of motion, whereunder the Honourable Senator Argue is a committed party. He cannot be a member of the cabinet without being a committed party. When Mr. Stevens headed up an investigation, he knew not what was ahead of him. Certainly Mr. Bennett did not know what was ahead, because it ended up with his decline, the near-destruction of the Conservative Party, and the eclipse of H. H. Stevens. If that history should repeat itself in this regard, I might be prepared to let it go, being an eternal optimist. However, on the other aspect in respect of Saskatchewan, why should that province not be represented by Senator Buckwold or Senator Steuart, or some other senator from Saskatchewan? The suggestion is implicit that there are not, among the five senators from Saskatchewan, persons of quality, capable of serving on this committee. I already know these members, and I know that they are very responsible, able people.

I was shocked that the Atlantic provinces were overlooked. Here is the distinguished Senator Hicks in this corner, and Senator Robichaud in the other, both of whom were premiers, together with all sorts of able people in between.

Senator Roblin: Senator Barrow.

Senator Macquarrie: Why were they not designated?

I really believe that the government side should say, "We are not ready. Let us move the motion tomorrow, and do some thinking and consulting in the 24 hours intervening."

• (2025)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this is a useful discussion in that we can deal with this problem by considering the present composition of this committee by regions. I have hurriedly marked down on a sheet of paper exactly where the proposed committee balance lies now. Honourable senators may wish to write this down—

Senator Roblin: I've got it; don't worry.

Senator Perrault: —by party and by region. Honourable senators, I wonder if we are achieving very much by escalating this issue. Most honourable senators have been in public life for some time and are aware of some of the problems of selecting a committee with a balanced membership. First—

Senator Flynn: We know your problems.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, does the official opposition want all-out political conflict or do they want to listen to some facts? Here are the facts. Honourable senators may wish to jot these names down. The Conservative Party has five members from the House of Commons on the joint committee. The following are the names and the provinces: Mr. Beatty of Ontario, Mr. Crombie of Ontario, Mr. Epp of Manitoba, Mr. Fraser of British Columbia, Mr. McGrath of Newfoundland. At least two of them are former ministers in the Conservative government—which is no impediment, but I draw that to the attention of the house.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: Who do you think we are?

Senator Perrault: If the honourable senator wishes to make a speech, then I will not continue; but it may be of some value to those who are interested in coping with the problem of putting together a joint committee.

It is interesting that on the Liberal side—

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Would the honourable gentleman please read the last two names on the Conservative list.

Senator Perrault: I will do that. I will repeat the list from the top: Mr. Beatty, Progressive Conservative, Ontario; Mr. Crombie, Progressive Conservative, Ontario; Mr. Epp, Progressive Conservative, Manitoba; Mr. Fraser, Progressive Conservative, British Columbia; Mr. McGrath of Newfoundland. So one out of the five members from the House of Commons is a Progressive Conservative from Newfoundland.

On the Liberal side there is Mr. Bockstael, Liberal, Manitoba; Miss Campbell, Liberal, Nova Scotia; Mr. Corbin, Liberal, New Brunswick; Mr. Henderson, Liberal, Prince Edward Island. Three out of the four from the Atlantic provinces, then, are Liberal representatives. There is also Irwin, Liberal, Ontario; Joyal, Liberal, Quebec. I have been informed from the other place that in order to strengthen the representation on the committee from the Atlantic provinces, a Newfoundland member, a Liberal, may be added. So of the total Liberal membership on the committee from the House of Commons, seven—

Senator Asselin: There is one missing—Lapierre, from Quebec.

Senator Perrault: I am aware of this. Out of seven, four from the other chamber will be from the Atlantic provinces.

In terms of regional balance, are we being asked tonight to delete any representation from the Province of Saskatchewan and give another place to the Atlantic provinces.

Senator Asselin: That's not the case.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I assure you that the geographical problem is one of significance. There was much criticism to the effect that Newfoundland should have a member from that important island on the committee from the Commons side, and I understand that another member from Newfoundland will be added very shortly. If this is done, four out of seven of the House of Commons list will be from the Atlantic provinces.

Honourable senators, is this really unfair? That is a higher percentage than the Progressive Conservative Party has provided in its representation on that committee.

On the Senate side we have—let us take down the names—Senators Austin, Liberal, British Columbia; Hays, Liberal, Alberta; Argue, Liberal, Saskatchewan; Connolly and Frith, Liberals, Ontario; and Goldenberg and Tremblay from Quebec. There is also Senator Martial Asselin, Progressive Conservative. The other Progressive Conservative is Senator Tremblay. Have I omitted one?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Flynn: Lamontagne.

Senator Perrault: Lamontagne, yes.

Senator Asselin: You did not mention Frith.

Senator Perrault: Yes, I did. I think the list reflects a rather good balance of provinces and party affiliations, and I appeal to senators to look at the total task of putting together a joint committee. I appreciate the opportunity of attempting to put the case forward.

• (2030)

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I believe that my leader omitted a very important name from the list of Liberal members from the House of Commons. My copy of the Commons Hansard shows Bryce Mackasey of Ontario as a member. Mr. Mackasey's name was not on the list that the leader gave a few minutes ago.

Senator Perrault: If his name was omitted, it was not done deliberately.

Senator Hicks: Would my honourable friend read the names of the Liberal members from the House of Commons again, please? He read them in such a confused way that it was impossible for me to make a notation.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope it wasn't in a confused way because I read it in order from a list, but I would be glad to read it for you again. Bockstael, Liberal, from Manitoba. Does the honourable senator have that? Campbell, Liberal, Nova Scotia; Corbin, Liberal, New Brunswick; Henderson, Liberal, Prince Edward Island; a Newfoundland member to be appointed; Irwin, Liberal, Ontario; Joyal, Liberal, Quebec; Lapierre, Liberal, Quebec—

Senator Hicks: Who is the Ontario one?

Senator Perrault: The Ontario one was Irwin, Liberal, Ontario; Joyal, Liberal, Quebec; Lapierre, Liberal, Quebec.

Senator Marshall: The information is in today's paper.

Senator Perrault: Yes, but some honourable senators haven't read it.

Senator Hicks: That is only six names so far.

Senator Perrault: Bryce Mackasey, Liberal, Ontario.

Senator Hicks: I am sorry, Your Honour, but the leader hasn't—

Senator Perrault: May I write the list down for the honourable senator and send it over to him this evening?

Senator Hicks: Yes, you may, but I don't see why you can't tell us now.

Senator Perrault: May I go over the list again then?

Senator Hicks: If you want us to make notes, don't read it as if you deliberately want us not to understand it.

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, I will read the names at dictation speed. Mr. Bockstael, Liberal, Manitoba; Mr. Campbell, Liberal, Nova Scotia—

Senator Roblin: That member is a lady.

Senator Perrault: Miss Campbell, Liberal, Nova Scotia; Corbin, Liberal, New Brunswick.

You were in the House of Commons too long. Henderson, Liberal, Prince Edward Island; Irwin, Liberal, Ontario; Joyal, Liberal, Province of Quebec; Lapierre, Liberal, Province of Quebec. Are honourable senators keeping up?

Senator Bélisle: Bearing up.

Senator Perrault: Mr. Mackasey, Liberal, Ontario. On the NDP list: Knowles, New Democrat, Manitoba.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: My friend. I will sleep better tonight.

Senator Perrault: The spectacle of Senator Steuart applauding the NDP boggles the mind.

Nystrom, New Democrat, Saskatchewan.

Those are the names from the Commons. Honourable senators know the senators who have been named. If one forgets about one house or the other house there is reasonable balance on the committee.

Senator Roblin: Isn't that just what you cannot do?

Senator Riley: I would like to draw attention to what the Leader of the Government has just told us. We are talking about two houses of Parliament; he was talking about the House of Commons. This is a separate house of Parliament, and you must remember, if you go back to Confederation, that the reason the Atlantic provinces are in Confederation today is that our leaders laid down certain conditions that were accepted by the Fathers of Confederation—the New Brunswickers and Nova Scotians. Now you tell us that we have representation on the committee from the Atlantic provinces from the other house, but the Senate was set up originally to protect the maritime region and the other three regions of Canada, and set up to do just one thing—to protect our rights.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Riley: Now you have the effrontery to tell us by inference that there is no one capable of representing the Atlantic provinces on this committee.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I am not very good at arithmetic but I added up 16 people on the committee from the House of Commons. When did we change from 15 to 16?

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator is alert as ever. One of the non-Atlantic members, I understand for some reason, will not be able to serve and will be replaced by a person, I suspect, from Newfoundland if the will prevails on the other side.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I can't say that I appreciate the quality of this debate because I don't, but at the same time I must say with all the conviction at my command that it is utterly impossible for me to understand why a group of people could get together and form a committee of 10 persons to represent the Senate of Canada on a joint committee and not be able to select one from the Atlantic provinces, to represent two million people.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

An Hon. Senator: It is shocking.

Senator Robichaud: I know that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is extremely sincere in carrying out his task. I know that his deputy is equally sincere—

Senator Marshall: But!

Senator Robichaud: —but—yes there is a but—it is beyond me how anyone can ignore the presence in this chamber—not in any chamber in Fredericton, Charlottetown, Halifax, St. John's, or in the House of Commons—of a number of senators from the Atlantic area.

I could say something more but I will refrain from doing so because I don't think this debate should be prolonged. I believe in the concept of the resolution before us; I believe in the formation of the joint committee that has been established, and I believe in the competence of all the people who have been appointed to the committee, including the 10 members of the Senate. I am not questioning the qualifications of any one of them. However, I am appalled that no honourable senator from the Atlantic region, regardless of what the Commons representation is on the committee, seems to be qualified to be a member of the committee.

● (2040)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators—

Senator Donahoe: Senator McElman will be in favour of it.

Hon. Charles McElman: Richard, even you can be surprised. I sincerely say to my honourable friend, Senator Donahoe, that it is as difficult for me to speak against something put forward by my party as it would be for him to speak against something put forward by his party.

Senator Donahoe: I don't often have that problem.

Senator McElman: I pay you that compliment. I agree that you don't often have that problem, and thankfully I don't often have it either. But I do tonight.

I cannot accept the argument put forward by my honourable friend, the Minister of State for Economic Development, that the objection to the appointment of a cabinet minister to sit on this committee is equivalent to the appointment of some person who has strongly expressed himself one way or the other with respect to the consideration under debate. It is entirely different.

I think our good friend, the former Premier of Manitoba, Senator Roblin, expressed the case very well: A cabinet minister is bound; a cabinet minister cannot go freely to such a committee; and a cabinet minister cannot fully express his conscience in such a committee unless he resigns. Of course, if he wants to resign his seat in the cabinet to sit on such a committee, then that is a decision for him to make but, falling short of that, I would hope that Senator Argue, after hearing the views of his colleagues in the Senate, would give them sufficient credit for their sincerity, which is a lack of confidence from both sides of the chamber, and gracefully retire from the committee to make way for a senator from Saskatchewan of the Liberal persuasion. I believe we have several who are highly qualified and have great experience. Therefore, I see no problem in replacing Senator Argue on the committee. I would recommend this to those who are responsible on the government side.

I am delighted to hear from the Leader of the Government in the Senate that some corrective action is to be taken on the Commons side to do what was not done in the initial recommendation of members from that house, and that is to leave, from the Liberal standpoint, an absolute vacancy for Newfoundland. To my mind, it was unbelievable. The Liberal party in Canada today represents Canadians in greater or lesser degree from Newfoundland through to Manitoba, and yet Newfoundland was the only province that was not in the Liberal list which was initially supplied. I find it unbelievable that that could happen. It leads me to use a term of the sort I do not like to use, but it was a very "ham-handed" operation as is what I believe we are seeing here tonight—a very "ham-handed" operation.

Senator Donahoe, I am finding this as difficult as you would find it if you were back in your old slot in Nova Scotia standing in your house and speaking against the administration of which you were a part. I do find it difficult. This is a place where, although the allegiances to a party are strong, they cannot be so firm that when we find ourselves totally offended we have to sit in our seats and be quiet.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator McElman: I did not ask to be on this committee. I do not seek to be on this committee. At one point it was indicated that I would be on the committee. I am not surprised that I am not on the committee because of the views I have expressed elsewhere than here. The British parliamentary system sits on the one foundation stone that it cannot live without the party caucus. I impress on all senators that the system we enjoy has one firm foundation stone, and that is the caucus where we express ourselves freely, with emotion, and with all the force we can. One cannot speak here of what happens in that sort of situation. I can say that in all things I speak my conscience and my mind within the party caucus. I do not wish to be on this committee. However, I do think that those who are responsible for the selection in this chamber should perhaps ask for an adjournment tonight, and consider what they have done.

The Atlantic provinces constitute a very proud part of Canada. People today refer to "have" and "have-not" provinces. I do not like that term. I have used it myself, but I do not like it. I like to hear the provinces described as the "wealthy" and the "less wealthy", because every region of Canada is wealthy relative to other parts of this worried world we live in.

Two of the provinces of the Atlantic area are charter members of this Confederation—Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I meant to speak of this yesterday if I had had the opportunity, but I was frozen out by the strictures of time, and that is my own fault entirely. Anyone who has paid any attention to, or has any respect for, the history of the founding of this nation knows that in no circumstance would Confederation have been possible except on the basis of a bicameral system, which was demanded by New Brunswick and Nova Scotia—a bicameral system where they would be represented in the Senate not on the basis of population, but on the basis of fairness and looking to the future of the nation. That second chamber would have an absolute veto. Those were the terms on which New Brunswick and Nova Scotia came into Confederation. They did a little log-rolling along the way in connection with the Intercolonial Railway and that sort of thing, but those were the basic matters that determined Confederation, because without New Brunswick and Nova Scotia there would have been no Confederation.

At this point in time I find it inconceivable, and I find it unacceptable, irrespective of the fact that Newfoundland is to be represented on the Commons side, that there is to be no Senate representation from the Atlantic area, which includes two of the charter members of Confederation. I will not accept it; I do not accept it; and I ask those responsible to take this ill-advised list back to where it came from and revise it.

• (2050)

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, there are a few things I should like to say regarding this matter, and I should like to begin by saying to Senator McElman that I can understand very well how difficult it was for him to speak as he did. Therefore, I am prepared to give him a great deal of credit for having the courage and adherence to his conscientious beliefs to do so.

There is one thing that struck me with particular force. I remember last week how we were urged to press on, at no matter what time of day or night, to bring this resolution to a vote. I thought the honourable gentlemen opposite had selected their committee and were raring to go; that the committee could hardly wait to get started. Tonight I find they have not even got themselves ready to begin. The honourable gentlemen must not have had their list ready last evening when we took the vote at approximately nine o'clock. I find that to be an incredible situation. The point was laboured here that there could not be any further delay, that the government just could not wait, and then when they were free under the rules to draw up a list of senators to serve on the committee, they did not have it ready. I find that an incredible way to lead a house, to deal with the situation, and to treat senators of whatever political belief they may be. I say that I find that incredible, although, after the experiences I have had at the hands of the honourable gentlemen opposite, nothing should surprise me any more.

Two senators, perhaps more—Senators Riley and McElman I remember—specifically raised the point that this house was created to give proper representation to the regions of Canada. They pointed out that obviously this was not done as far as the selection of Senate members of this committee is concerned.

I want to say this, and I expect that I will say it a good many times—don't get impatient—that we are not fulfilling that duty if we do not arrange our committees, especially joint committees, in such a way that that representation is given. So, those who are responsible for the leadership of the house have neglected one of the fundamental duties of the Senate.

Another thing is that all this difficulty, or much of it, springs from the fact that there are only 10 members, instead of 15, representing the Senate on this joint committee. All this could have been avoided or much alleviated had the honourable gentleman stood up for the rights of the Senate to be represented evenly and equally with the House of Commons.

The honourable gentleman, the Leader of the Government, said it was traditional that we have only 10 members on joint committees. I don't know whether that is true or not, but it should not be true in respect of a joint committee dealing with the Constitution of Canada, the very thing on which the Senate is supposed to represent the regions of Canada.

Senator Frith: That is out of order. That was decided.

Senator Smith: Sure it was decided, but I am referring to it and saying that the trouble could have been avoided had that amendment been accepted. It is no use for the honourable gentleman to say it is out of order, because if we do not say it here we will say it in other places where it will have as much effect. I say that the honourable gentleman, who readily acceded to that argument on the grounds that it was traditional, let down this Senate and did not fulfil his responsibilities as the Leader of the Government in this house.

I now come to Senator Argue. I will not spend much time on that point because it has been adequately canvassed by others. How, in the name of goodness, can the members of this house have any confidence that Senator Argue can take any other position except that put forward by the government at any given time, unless he resigns? We all know that that is so. That is no reflection on Senator Argue. He is an able, reliable, responsible and honourable man. He should not allow himself to be put in such a position, and perhaps he will not. Perhaps he was not even consulted. However, he is bound by all the traditions of his party, our party, and parties in parliamentary institutions of this kind everywhere, to follow cabinet solidarity, which means support what the government puts forth.

Those of us who have expressed firm opinions—and I have not made any secret of mine—have certainly put ourselves in the position that we are likely to maintain those positions if we are selected to serve on the committee, but we are not bound to, and if we hear something that appeals to us, we are at liberty to change our minds. I believe that that is the situation with regard to all other Liberal members named on this list. We know the views most of them have expressed. Therefore, we know how they are going to enter the committee, just as we know how we are going to enter the committee. We also know that they are not bound by any tradition of cabinet solidarity, and if they find reason to change their minds they can, just as we are not bound and can change our minds if we like. Whether we will or not is another matter.

There is one further matter I wish to mention. I think I have listened to most of the speakers in this debate. The remarks of those to whom I have not listened are recorded in Hansard and I know where they stand. It is significant to me that I cannot recognize on that list of Liberal senators anyone who expressed some hesitation or doubt regarding some parts of this resolution or the text that goes with it. I would have thought that if the government wished to give fair representation to its ranks it would have made sure that somebody from among the many who expressed some doubts and reservations would be on the committee, so that that substantial group of people could be confident that there was a member of that committee to give expression to their doubts and reservations. It is very significant to me that none of those honourable gentlemen are on that list, so far as I can tell.

When one couples that with the inclusion in the list of a cabinet minister, it is hard to avoid the impression that the honourable gentleman who selected these senators had in mind making sure there was no possibility of any of the government members of the committee wandering from the straight and narrow path of complete support. I think that is a most reprehensible and improper way to set up a committee. I think it would be an improper way to set up any committee, but when we come to set up one which deals with the very fabric of our constitutional being, the very existence of our nation as we know it, it seems to me to be beyond the pale of parliamentary words to express what should be thought of that type of action.

Senator McElman made an excellent suggestion, namely, that the people who made up this list should ask that this debate be adjourned, and should take advantage of the time between now and the next sitting to remedy some of the difficulties that have been brought so forcibly to their attention.

Senator Barrow: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition a question? In this list there are two senators from the province of Quebec—Senator Asselin and Senator Tremblay. Why can't there be a senator from the Atlantic provinces?

Senator Flynn: It is quite obvious that we had to make up there for the lack of representation from the House of Commons, and we have not as many on our side as you have to work with. If that is not sufficient explanation for you, I am sorry, but that is the only answer I can give you.

Senator Olson: Is that argument not equally true for the other side?

Senator Flynn: Well, I am not discussing that particular point. I raised the problem of Senator Argue's presence on the committee, and that problem is not solved. Others have raised the problem of the representation of the Atlantic provinces. That is something else.

Now, you, Senator Olson, said that we on this side had listed some people whose opinions are known. Senator Smith has replied to that, but I never criticized the fact that you would have on the committee people who supported the resolution as such. What Senator Smith mentioned, however, and what constituted the substance of my criticism, was the fact that you picked only people who had not expressed any opposition to the resolution. That was my point. None of those who criticized the government has been selected. I don't know where some of the silent ones stand, but I have my suspicions.

In any event, as far as the problem of Senator Argue is concerned, I think it is a principle that we should dispose of in this house, and, therefore, I will move that his name be deleted from the list. That will leave a vacancy which will give an opportunity to the government leader to replace him by someone from either Saskatchewan or the Atlantic provinces.

Senator Asselin: Or a lady senator. There are no ladies on the committee.

Senator Flynn: That is true, there are no ladies either. I don't know if there are any lady senators from the Atlantic provinces.

An Hon. Senator: Senator Anderson.

Senator Flynn: Yes, of course, Senator Anderson. In any event, that is a problem for the government side. I am certainly not going to solve all their problems, but I will give them the opportunity to solve one problem by moving that the motion be amended by striking the name of Senator Argue from the list of senators mentioned there.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, an amendment has been moved by Senator Flynn—

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, on a point of order—

Senator Perrault: There is no motion before us to amend.

Senator Flynn: Yes, there is.

Senator Molgat: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the point of order related to the amendment?

Senator Molgat: Yes, it is, Your Honour. I think the problem before us is that Honourable Senator Frith asked leave to move a motion, but leave was not granted—

Senator Flynn: Leave was granted.

Senator Perrault: Leave was not granted.

Senator Flynn: Certainly it was.

Senator Smith: It certainly was.

Senator Molgat: No. I for one am not prepared to grant leave, and leave has not been granted. Therefore, there is no motion before us.

Senator Flynn: That's not so!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: You were stupid to fall into that trap.

Senator Tremblay: So leave was not granted by Senator Molgat.

Senator Frith: Leave not having been granted, honourable senators, and to give an opportunity—

Senator Phillips: Leave was granted.

Senator Flynn: If you say that leave was not granted—

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Perrault: Leave was not granted.

Senator Flynn: Well, we will check tomorrow, but if leave was not granted, then you can move that it be put over until tomorrow.

Senator Frith: That is precisely what I was about to do.

Senator Flynn: Gee whiz! What lack of frankness. I don't mind. I agree with postponing this. We have been asking you to postpone it until tomorrow. Now, just to save your faces, you say that leave was not granted.

Senator Perrault: Oh, no. Now, come on. Sit down.

Senator Flynn: That is shameful. Shame!

Senator Frith: It is certainly difficult to be frank or anything else, when I am not able to get two words out of my mouth before someone is on his feet.

Senator Flynn: You said that leave was not granted.

Senator Frith: Well, I just heard that it was not.

Senator Godfrey: You have to ask the question before you can get the leave.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators—

Senator Frith: I sat here pretty patiently listening to your side.

Senator Roblin: On a point of order.

Senator Perrault: He is on a point of order.

Senator Roblin: Are you on a point of order? If it is a point of order, I will sit down.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it seems that we have a problem of order. Either the motion is before us with leave having been asked but not granted, or the motion is before us with leave having been asked and granted. In either case, in view of the many comments that have been made with reference to the motion, it seems to me that an opportunity should be given to put before the government the many suggestions that have been made here today.

In short, then, honourable senators, I suggest that in either case the matter should be put off until tomorrow, and we can do that either on the basis of leave not having been granted, in which case I now give notice, or, if leave has been granted, I move the adjournment of the debate.

In either eventuality, I feel the matter should certainly be brought forward again tomorrow and I assure honourable senators that we will bring to the attention of the government the constructive suggestions, and the perhaps less constructive but, in any event, important suggestions, made by senators on both sides.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please! I think we have clarified the situation. Leave was granted, and now it is proposed that the debate be adjourned.

Senator Flynn: After the amendment has been moved.

The Hon. the Speaker: I will put the amendment, and after that there will be a motion that the debate be adjourned.

It is moved by Honourable Senator Flynn, seconded by Honourable Senator Roblin, that the motion be amended by deleting the name of Senator Argue.

Senator Frith: I move that the debate be adjourned.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Frith now moves that the debate be adjourned until tomorrow. Those in favour of Senator Frith's motion—

Senator Roblin: Is the motion to adjourn not debatable, Mr. Speaker?

Senator Perrault: No.

Senator Roblin: It is not?

Senator Hicks: The amendment must be put first.

Senator Frith: I am moving the adjournment of the debate on the amendment.

Senator Hicks: So you are moving the adjournment of the debate on the amendment? Very well, I agree.

Senator Roblin: Is no one allowed to speak before the debate is adjourned? I don't want to speak to the motion to adjourn; I want to speak to the amendment.

Senator Perrault: That is what he adjourned.

Senator Roblin: Are you foreclosing free speech in this house?

Senator Perrault: No; it is adjourned until tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by Honourable Senator Perrault, that the debate be adjourned until the next sitting. That motion is not debatable. Either you are in favour of the motion or you are against it.

• (2110)

Senator Flynn: It is not debatable, but one can rise on a point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Oh, yes.

Senator Flynn: The point of order is that if Senator Frith moves the adjournment of the debate, then, as he suggested on a previous occasion—that is, last Thursday—he will have forgone his right to speak on the amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Flynn: I mention that to show how ridiculous was the position the government side adopted two or three days ago. It was unfair. Anyway, I now withdraw my point of order.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, let us be very clear about the point just raised by the Leader of the Opposition. The point is not that if a senator moves the adjournment of the debate he has lost his right to speak; it is if he moves the adjournment of a debate and the Senate rejects that motion that he loses his right. There is quite a difference. The authority for that is quite clear in Bourinot. There is, as I say, a big difference. If you move the adjournment of a debate and it is negatived, you then lose your turn to speak.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we have here a motion for that—

Senator Smith: Honourable senators—

Senator Perrault: His Honour is on his feet.

Senator Smith: I am listening.

Senator Perrault: Well, then, sit down.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we have before us a motion that the debate on the amendment be adjourned until the next sitting. That is a motion which is not debatable. So let us vote on it. If it is defeated, the honourable senator will be allowed to discuss all those points. I will put the question on the adjournment motion.

Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion that the debate be adjourned please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are opposed, please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it. The debate is adjourned until tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—MOTION RESPECTING PROCEDURE FOR CHANGING SENATE MEMBERSHIP—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move—and I believe that in this particular matter I have the support of the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition, and perhaps I can ask that he second this motion since it was his suggestion to which we readily agreed—with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i):

> That changes in the membership of the Special Joint Committee to consider a proposed Address to Her Majesty the Queen concerning the Constitution of Canada may be made by notification thereof, signed by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, or any senator named by him, with respect to government members, and by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, or any senator named by him, with respect to opposition members, being filed with the Clerk of the Senate who shall cause the same to be printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of that sitting, or of the next sitting thereafter, as the case may be; and
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that house of such changes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by Honourable Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i)—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I was going to speak a few moments ago before the previous debate was adjourned because of the very serious concerns and considerations which have been expressed here tonight about the selection of the minister. That is not what we are discussing at the moment, but the fact is that he has certain duties to the house and to his ministry. I am wondering, given 20 days from tomorrow until December 9, how a minister, if he remains a members of the committee, or any parliamentary secretary, could fulfil his duties. It is my understanding that we have at least four parliamentary secretaries on the Liberal side appointed to the committee.

It bothers me, and I have to express my concern because I feel we have so little time in which to discuss this important resolution, and the committee has to consider it. How can we permit the moving in and out of members when the committee has only 20 days in which to complete its task? That is all it is allowed at this moment. I cannot support this motion that will allow members of the committee, for in the short period of time that they are allowed, to be substituted.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): There are circumstances where it is absolutely essential that there should be substitution for certain members of any committee because of illness or indisposition. There are many other good reasons. The idea for substitution was advanced originally by the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition, and I think it is a constructive initiative. I think it would accommodate any problems which may arise not only among the membership in this chamber but in the other chamber as well. I think that the proposal is totally reasonable and certainly consistent with the parliamentary tradition.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Would these new appointments come about because a member of the committee who has already been chosen is not able to be present or has asked to be replaced, or will he be replaced at the wish of the government?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hardly care to dignify that question with a reply.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: I think honourable senators are well aware that substitution on committees is a standard parliamentary practice. It has been a feature of the parliamentary system for many years, not only here but in Great Britain, and if honourable senators wish to read anything ominous into the practice, then they are challenging a substantial parliamentary tradition.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. I am very glad that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has deigned to answer my question. I must say that it upset me a little to hear his preamble, because quite frankly I am very much concerned about maintaining the regional balance. I am also concerned by Senator Frith's comment that he would like to bring what we are talking about before the government. Is it the government who is picking this committee or is it the Senate that is picking this committee? That is the question I would like to ask.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, Senator Perrault said that this is an old parliamentary tradition. My understanding is that the parliamentary tradition in the Senate is that we do not have substitutions, so that we have people there who know what they are talking about. They hear the evidence, and so on. In the House of Commons they substitute something like 7,000 committee members a year and that is the reason why the committee system in the House of Commons has proved so ineffective. I can tell you that as far as the Joint Committee on Immigration, a joint committee of which I was a member five years ago, is concerned—and it dealt with a matter nearly as important as this, but not quite as important—we agreed that we would not have substitutions except when the committee held meetings outside Ottawa. Occasionally a local member or senator would turn up.

However, as far as I am concerned, I am completely opposed to our falling into that House of Commons routine, which has destroyed their committee system, of having substitutions—people coming in and out who do not know what has gone on, and who keep asking questions that were answered the day before.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, let me attempt to explain a little further, and perhaps the Leader of the Opposition may wish to supply a supplementary explanation, because the idea came from him. If the substitution rule is going to apply to the Commons representatives, and if a plague sweeps through this place and six of the honourable senators are taken away to hospital, I think it inconceivable that senators would be satisfied with a situation where because of illness or some other factor we are left with only four members to serve on the joint committee. I think, however, that very properly the Leader of the Opposition said that if the rules applied to the Commons membership, they should apply to ours. I would think that the Senate members of that committee would dutifully perform their responsibilities, and would do their best to be there for all the meetings. The honourable senator, I think, is basing his comments on observing some of the work habits of the other place; but I think the Senate attendance has been good, and I would think we would follow our usual role and practice.

● (2120)

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I have been trying to get a word in for quite a while, though it may not now be as necessary as it was before, because Senator Buckwold raised the point that I was interested in.

I was pleased that when Senator Frith moved this present motion he referred to the composition of the committee as being determined over the signatures of the leaders of the government side and of the opposition side. Before that, however, when Senator Smith moved his amendment, I was greatly distressed to hear him say that he would confer with the government about the substitution of a member of the committee. It ought to be clearly understood that it is the Senate, not the government, that is determining the Senate membership of a joint committee.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on that point—

Senator Roblin: How many times are you going to speak?

Senator Frith: I have not spoken to this motion.

Senator Roblin: You moved it. That is speaking to it.

Senator Frith: Are you not allowed to speak to a motion that you move? That is a brand new one, I must say.

Senator Roblin: You had your chance.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am not speaking on this, but on a point of privilege raised by Senator Hicks.

Senator Grosart: It was not a point of privilege.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I was referred to as saying something that was regretted. I just wanted to make it clear that of course the decision as to who from the Senate is to be on the committee is made by the Senate. If it is not made by the Senate, we would not be debating it; we would not be postponing it or considering any of those things. The decision has to be made by the Senate. I fully agree with both senators. I was talking about proposals that would be made, and I said that the views of the Senate would be taken into account in the hope that the decision could be made by the Senate and receive the full support of the Senate.

Senator Hicks: What you said was that the views of the government would be taken into account.

Senator Frith: I did not say that.

Senator Hicks: With respect, you did.

Senator Frith: I said that the Senate's views would be taken into account.

Senator Roblin: You did not say that.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I want to confirm that the motion made by Senator Frith was made at my suggestion, but under the circumstances—

Senator Lamontagne: Oh, oh.

Senator Flynn: Wait a minute. Everything was going well before you came in, Senator Lamontagne.

Senator Lamontagne: I said, "Oh, oh".

Senator Flynn: Yes, and you need say no more in order to disturb the whole place. I was saying that in the course of the debate that took place before you came in, the climate of the discussion was very pleasant. So that I may explain—not to you, Senator Lamontagne, because I would never try that in my whole life—the reasons behind the motion, I now move the adjournment of this debate until tomorrow. It does not matter anyway, because we have to deal with the other motion tomorrow.

Senator Frith: It will be an interesting day tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: It surely will.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Honourable Senator Flynn, seconded by Honourable Senator Roblin, that further debate on the motion be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR RULES COMMITTEE TO STUDY PROCEDURE RESPECTING REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I know that honourable senators would like to be able to listen to the results of the U.S. election tonight—

Senator Hicks: Reagan has won.

Senator Flynn: If that is final, then we may carry on with the Question Period for longer than we had anticipated.

I have one question, which is directed to the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, Senator Molson. In view of the debate with regard to the way the Senate can deal with the report of the joint committee when it comes to us, would his committee consider the problem, and if our rules are not clear enough, or if they are silent on this question, could he repeat to this house, and perhaps make some suggestions as to how to avoid having a debate on procedure when we are seized with the report.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I had better take that question as notice. As the committee is empowered to consider any matters which are of importance to the Senate, I see no reason why it should not be able to do as Senator Flynn requests; but I would like to have a minute or two to discuss it.

Senator Lamontagne: Sober!

Senator Molson: Sober second thought.

ETHNIC REPRESENTATION ON SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Since so much emphasis has been placed on regional and political representation on the committee, has any thought been given to ethnic representation by the Leader of the Government and by the Leader of the Opposition?

Could I ask the honourable leader a supplementary question? Did he not think that Senator Yuzyk or Senator Rizzuto or Senator Haidasz could have made a valuable contribution to that committee? Furthermore, does the leader think that the only criterion by which members should be selected for this committee is expertise on the Constitution? Is the committee not a forum where the concerns and aspirations of all segments of our society may be considered?

I ask the Leader of the Government if he has given any thought to this particular aspect of the question?

Senator Perrault: Yes, a great deal.

ENERGY

THE BUDGET—POLICY RESPECTING CANADIAN OWNERSHIP OF OIL COMPANIES

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Honourable Senator Olson. It has to do with PetroCan, and the government's stated objective of Canadianizing—if I can use that word—the oil industry and taking every possible step to encourage greater development in all aspects of the oil industry.

I have had complaints from some people in the service end of the oil industry in Alberta that PetroCan, in the major part of the service end of its business, turns to the international and multinational companies rather than to Canadian companies. I wonder if the minister has had a chance to look into this. If what I have reported is a fact, is there anything that can be done about it?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I thank the honourable senator for his question. He did not give me notice of it, but the same point has been raised directly to my office by a number of service companies. I am pretty sure that in the last few days an inquiry has gone forward from the minister responsible for PetroCan to find out whether there is any validity to the allegation, and, if there is, they will be encouraged to change their policy.

● (2130)

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, we have the assurance of the minister that if it turns out that the company is favouring multinational non-Canadian companies, the government will exert all its efforts on PetroCan to see that this situation is changed, and that, all things being equal, the company will favour Canadian companies.

Senator Olson: In response to the honourable senator's question, I would refer to the positive side and say that it is the declared well-stated policy of this government to increase Canadian ownership in developing new energy resources, and, indeed, to own an increasingly higher percentage of those resources after they have been developed.

[Senator Bosa.]

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

STATEMENT BY CLERK OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on October 21, Senator McElman asked a question concerning an alleged statement by Michael Pitfield.

I have been informed that Mr. Pitfield's remarks were of an informal nature and related to the American Constitution, not the B.N.A. Act. Unfortunately no transcript of Mr. Pitfield's remarks is available, and they were not accurately reported.

Senator Flynn: Did you say "unfortunately" or "fortunately"?

Senator Perrault: "Unfortunately."

THE ECONOMY

THE BUDGET—EFFECT ON NUMBER OF BANKRUPTCIES—INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY—MEASURES TO FIGHT INFLATION—JOB CREATION PROGRAMS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I should like to reply to questions asked by a number of honourable senators with respect to the budget measures announced last week by the Minister of Finance, with particular reference to the subjects of bankruptcy, inflation, industrial strategy and job creation.

As I promised during Question Period on October 29, I have prepared a copy of the budget statement for each of the honourable senators, with the relevant sections underlined for their attention. I will send a copy of the statement to Senators Charbonneau, Murray and Doody, and I trust that they will find the information they are seeking—in fact, I am sure they will. They will discover that in the budget, the government tried to be responsible and responsive to the needs of Canadians.

In addition, I should point out that the sections of the budget statement that I am bringing to the attention of honourable senators include reference to the national energy program. It is obvious that the measures the government is taking to ensure a secure energy future for the country will have a fundamental impact on our economic development during the 1980s. I will send a copy to each of the honourable senators, so that it will not be so difficult for them to find the information.

ENERGY

THE BUDGET—POLICY RESPECTING CANADIAN OWNERSHIP OF OIL COMPANIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Murray on October 30.

The honourable senator should be informed that the Canadian Ownership Special Charge is part of the ways and means motion. It will be introduced as an amendment to the Petroleum Administration Act, which will provide Parliament with the opportunity to review this specific provision.

With regard to Senator Murray's specific questions on the legality of this charge and the precedents, I would refer him to the Petroleum Administration Act. The contents of that act will provide him with the authority for this charge and a list of the precedents.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—HISTORICAL FACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA REFERENCE CASE—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores which distinguish that claim from the British Columbia claim as dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights (the British Columbia Reference case), (1967) Supreme Court Reports, 792, and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, and submit that the said decision does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, I withdraw my threat of last night, and ask that this Inquiry stand.

Inquiry stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—SENATE MEMBERS—COMMUNICATION FROM THE HON. HAZEN ARGUE, P.C.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have received the following communication from the Honourable Senator Hazen Argue:

> I very much regret my absence from the chamber today, but I have been advised as to the debate in the Senate yesterday.
>
> Because my independence to act as a member of the proposed special joint committee to examine the constitutional proposals has been called into question, and there seems to be doubt in the minds of a number of senators as to the advisability of a cabinet minister acting as a member of the committee, I would ask you to please withdraw my name from those indicated to serve on the committee.

That message is signed by the Honourable Hazen Argue, P.C.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (1405)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in view of the communication that has just been read, and in view of certain other considerations in connection with the debate that took place last evening, as well as observations made by honourable senators from both sides of the house, I would ask honourable senators to agree to proceed directly to Order No. 2 on the Orders of the Day. My explanation is that I have a motion to present which I believe amends the main motion, the subject of Order No. 2, and which I hope will resolve the concerns expressed by some honourable senators last night with reference to a cabinet member being a member of the joint committee. That subject has just been dealt with, partly, at least, by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The proposed motion also resolves the other concern, or at least responds to it, which is the need for a senator on the committee from the Atlantic provinces.

I informed my friends on the opposite side of my intention to present this amendment and I asked for their leave to do so, and they graciously consented. It seems to me that we now face the amendment proposed by Senator Flynn, which he may wish to have voted on, and which could be voted on in the light of what has been said. When that has been disposed of we could proceed with my amendment to the main motion, and, hopefully, after debate, it could be voted on. As I have said, I hope that my amendment will meet the concerns expressed by some honourable senators last night.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I understand that in simple terms what the deputy leader is asking is to bring on Order No. 2 immediately in order to accommodate some people who want to leave early today. We agree with that. When the question is put, we can deal with whatever proposal the deputy leader has to offer.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I understand that leave is granted to Senator Frith so that Order No. 2 can be proceeded with immediately?

Senator Flynn: With regard to Order No. 2, yes.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—APPOINTMENT OF SENATE MEMBERS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.:
> That rule 66(1) be suspended in relation to the nomination of senators to serve on the Special Joint Committee to consider a proposed Address to Her Majesty the Queen concerning the Constitution of Canada;
>
> That the following senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the said Special Joint Committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Argue, Asselin, Austin, Connolly, Frith, Goldenberg, Hays, Lamontagne, Roblin and Tremblay; and
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly, and
>
> On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., that the motion be amended by striking out the name of the Honourable Senator Argue.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

MOTION ON AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I ask honourable senators, although this is Senator Flynn's amendment, that they agree to having the question put on the amendment now, and that we then proceed to deal with the main motion. I hope there was enough debate on it last night, but that is up to others.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I am ready for the question to be put now, but it seems to me that, in view of the position taken by Senator Argue, the amendment should be accepted at this time. The deputy leader could then move his amendment.

• (1410)

Senator Frith: I prefer to leave it for honourable senators to vote on the amendment, taking into account the feeling of the Leader of the Opposition that it should be carried or not carried depending on each senator's reaction to what the Leader of the Government said on behalf of Senator Argue.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in connection with the amendment—

Senator Flynn: Let the Speaker put the question on the motion in amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, that rule 66(1) be suspended in relation—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: In amendment it was moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, that the motion be amended by striking out the name of the Honourable Senator Argue.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

Senator Steuart: What are we being asked to vote on—the amendment or the motion?

The Hon. the Speaker: On the amendment.

Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

Senator Flynn: We have to call a vote; after all, we will be put in a very difficult position if you do not agree with the amendment.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I suggest that some senators voted against the amendment because they felt that the effect of the amendment had been achieved by reason of the statement made on behalf of Senator Argue.

Senator Roblin: Let's have the vote.

Senator Frith: I do not see that we are put in any difficult position at all. Some honourable senators thought they should support the amendment in the light of that statement. Some thought that they would not vote for the amendment since Senator Argue had already withdrawn. That is a difference of opinion. I do not see that it puts us in any difficult position at all.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in view of the statement—

• (1415)

Senator Grosart: On a point of order, it seems to me that the Speaker has called for the "yeas" and the "nays". Surely there can be no debate after the Speaker has called for the "yeas" and the "nays".

Senator Frith: I agree, and I did not intend to debate it. I simply wanted to say that I do not think its result puts us in a difficult position.

The Hon. the Speaker: I said that in my opinion the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

FURTHER MOTION IN AMENDMENT RESOLVED IN THE AFFIRMATIVE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, in amendment, that the motion be amended by striking out the second paragraph thereof and substituting therefor the following:

> That the following senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the said special joint committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Asselin, Austin, Connolly, Goldenberg, Hays, Lamontagne, Lucier, Petten, Roblin and Tremblay; and".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, in amendment, that the main motion be amended by striking out the second paragraph thereof and substituting therefor the following:

> That the following senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the said special joint committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Asselin, Austin, Connolly, Goldenberg, Hays, Lamontagne, Lucier, Petten, Roblin and Tremblay; and".

● (1430)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Although it is well disguised, this motion runs clearly against the decision just made by the Senate to keep Senator Argue on the committee. Therefore you cannot ask the Senate to change its decision unless you give notice. Then, you would need a certain majority of senators for the motion to carry. Therefore, as far as the absence of the name of Senator Argue is concerned, this motion is entirely out of order.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the motion just dealt with was seeking a particular amendment to the main motion. That motion in amendment was defeated. We are now moving another amendment to the main motion, and I suggest that it is completely in order and ask that it be proceeded with.

Senator Flynn: When my honourable colleague says it is in order, the only thing it changes in the main motion is two names. It replaces Senator Argue by Senator Petten—

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Petten: By Senator Lucier.

Senator Flynn: Well, if you want to say that you can, or it replaces Senator Frith by you. But I would agree that it was the intention to replace the deputy leader by the whip. That is obvious. In any event, it is not by changing a paragraph that you change the substance. The substance is that the name of Senator Argue is replaced by the name of Senator Lucier, and by the vote just taken the Senate has decided to keep the name of Senator Argue on the list.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Flynn: So you are asking the Senate indirectly to decide exactly the opposite of what has just been decided. You cannot rescind an order of the Senate—and this is mentioned in the rules—unless you give notice, and unless it carries with a definite majority, and my honourable friend, the deputy leader, cannot contest that. It is not a face-saving device that will work with us.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise to support the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition. I think it is quite clear that this is in no way an attempt to delay the proceedings.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, no?

Senator Grosart: It is not an attempt to delay the proceedings. If it were, I would not be on my feet. It is an attempt to convince the leadership of this house to keep to the rules. It is about time such a decision was made by the Senate.

I suggest that the Leader of the Opposition is quite right when he says that the vote just taken was a vote to have Senator Argue's name remain on that list. The amendment was that it do not remain, and the negative vote was, therefore, that it do remain. That was the decision of the Senate. It was a clear decision of the Senate that Senator Argue's name should remain. Now we have a motion absolutely reversing that, because that was the whole purport of that motion. Now, this completely reverses the decision the Senate made a little while ago. I therefore suggest, with respect, if His Honour is going to make a ruling, that for once we keep to our rules.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the tactics are, of course, transparent.

● (1435)

Senator Flynn: On your side, of course.

Senator Perrault: No. We have listened to the senator's agitated eloquence for the past ten minutes, but may I suggest—

Senator Flynn: You are noisy.

Senator Perrault: May I suggest that in view of the forthright action by Honourable Senator Argue to communicate to this chamber his unwillingness to serve owing to the concerns expressed in the Senate chamber yesterday afternoon, it is obvious that he will not be a member of the joint committee. Accepting this statement from Senator Argue, the government has proposed that another senator occupy the committee vacancy that has been created on the Senate list by Senator

Argue's expressed unwillingness now to serve on the joint committee. Furthermore, it is proposed that yet another change be made in the Senate list for that committee.

The essence of the question before us is not the procedural one advanced by opposition senators. The question relates to one of our colleagues and a decision he has taken. The fact is that this respected colleague, the Honourable Senator Argue, in deference to remarks made during the debate held in this chamber yesterday, has stated: "I am unwilling to serve because of the criticism that it is not appropriate for a member of the cabinet to serve on the committee."

I think the best description of the position taken by the—

Senator Flynn: That is not relevant.

Senator Perrault: The best description of the position taken by the official opposition is that their reaction to Senator Argue's decision to withdraw his name constitutes a particularly ungenerous act—

Senator Flynn: Oh, horsefeathers!

Senator Perrault: —and it is unparliamentary in its spirit.

Senator Flynn: What was ungenerous was that you would not accept the amendment.

Senator Perrault: I suggest that we proceed to support the initiative of the house leader of the government and allow the joint committee to commence its important work.

Senator Flynn: That is not on the point of order.

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to address the point of order, if I may, and I would ask honourable senators to turn to rule 47, which was mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition. It reads:

> 47. (1) A motion shall not be made which is the same in substance as any question which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative, unless the order, resolution, or other decision on such question has been rescinded as hereinafter provided.
> (2) An order, resolution, or other decision of the Senate may be rescinded on five days' notice if at least two-thirds of the senators present vote in favour of its rescission.

All the honourable gentlemen opposite had to do to avoid this difficulty was to agree to the motion. Why did they object to it? It only sought to achieve officially what they had announced Senator Argue was wanting to do by means of a letter, and, therefore, unofficially so far as the motion was concerned. If they now find themselves in the embarrassing position of having excavated a hole for themselves into which they have fallen, they have nobody to blame but themselves.

As my colleague and former Speaker, Senator Grosart, who is known to be well versed in the rules, has just said, surely this house, whether it results in delay or not, will follow the clearly enunciated rules. We have to have some rules, and if we are going to have them we should follow them. That rule is perfectly clear and it should be followed. It is exactly as the Leader of the Opposition said.

As for the honourable gentleman's saying it is an ungenerous act, that is not so. It is an act to enforce the rules, and all the honourable gentleman had to do was forget his partisanship for a moment and say, "Sure, we don't mind adopting an opposition motion that will accomplish what we have already decided should be accomplished." That is where the trouble started. Had the honourable gentleman simply said, "Well, sure, let us adopt the motion", then officially Senator Argue's name would have been off the list and we would not be in this difficulty.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I should like to speak to the point of order that has been raised. In some circumstances this point of order would be quite appropriate, but I suggest that in the current circumstances it is not. If the amendment, as proposed by the Leader of the Opposition, had carried, there would have been one name removed from the list. That would have left a vacancy. The number of Senate members would not be up to the maximum provided for the committee. Therefore, it is not the same situation.

The amendment now proposed is entirely different, in that it proposes not only the removal of the name of Senator Argue but also one other, and their replacements, and it brings the complement of Senate representation on the joint committee up to what it is intended to be, namely, the 10 members that we are entitled to have. So I suggest that the point of order in this circumstance is not valid and that the purpose of the present amendment is entirely different. It is for two removals and two replacements.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words—

Senator Grosart: May I—

Senator McIlraith: I was about to speak—

Senator Grosart: It is more a point of privilege. I will sit down.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Grosart: I am not objecting. I merely said to Senator McIlraith, "It is more a point of privilege, so I will sit down." That is all I said before the noise started.

Senator McIlraith: If the honourable senator wishes to raise a point of privilege, I have no objection. In any event, I wanted to address myself to the point of order and rule 47, which has been quoted. I will not repeat it here. We should look at the amendment on which we voted a few minutes ago, to see whether it comes within the ambit of what is referred to in rule 47.

We should recall the circumstances very carefully. An amendment was moved yesterday to remove the name of Senator Argue from a list of names comprising 10 senators, three supplied by the opposition, in keeping with our tradition for choosing committees, and seven supplied from the government side, making a total of 10.

The amendment moved yesterday was simple and direct. It was that the name of Senator Argue be removed from the list in the main motion before the house. That being so, and bearing in mind the wide-ranging discussion that we had last night, some of it involving Senator Argue directly, as a person, and the suitability of his serving on the committee, and a good deal of it involving the lack of representation from the Senate of a vast region of this country—two vast regions, in fact: one being the Atlantic provinces—

Senator Flynn: That is irrelevant. Speak to the point of order.

Senator McIlraith: —and the other being the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. That was the nature of the discussion. What happened when the house met today? A message was read from Senator Argue to the effect—I have forgotten the exact terminology—that he had been apprised of last night's debate and asking that his name be removed from the list. It was a perfectly simple and appropriate request for an honourable senator to make, under the circumstances.

That message having been read, the Deputy Leader of the Government announced his intention to accede to that request and make a change. He did not develop that—

Senator Flynn: Why did you vote against the amendment? Come to the point.

Senator McIlraith: Hear me out. Be courteous. I tried to be courteous with you. Let me make my argument, rightly or wrongly. Let it come forward. The Deputy Leader of the Government indicated that he proposed taking action, in view of the message, at the appropriate time. That was agreed. He then proposed that the subject be brought forward as the first item of business today, and that was concurred in by the Leader of the Opposition. That we have done.

The amendment—I believe I have described it accurately—was voted upon. That amendment being out of the way, there is room for a new amendment, which the Leader of the Opposition has called in question. But what does the new amendment do? It does several things—

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh!

Senator McIlraith: The Leader of the Opposition may laugh, but we would get on better if we listened to some of the views of others as well as those of the Leader of the Opposition.

The new amendment before the house does something quite different. It sets up a whole new combination of representation of the Senate on that joint committee. It sets up a representation that will take account of the desire to have representation from that vast territory in the north of this country—a territory that is small in population but vast in area—

Senator Flynn: You are not discussing the point of order.

Senator McIlraith: Yes, I am, and I hope to stay strictly within the rules.

Senator Flynn: You are not.

[Senator McIlraith.]

Senator McIlraith: The amendment represents an attempt to bring forward the name of someone to represent that vast territory, bearing in mind the nature of that territory and the fact that the native people form a large proportion of the total population—another point that was raised in last night's debate—and removes the name of a senator to enable that to be done. It then brings forward an action that would give representation from the whole Atlantic region—those four provinces that were not represented by the choice of names in the original motion.

Senator Flynn: You are speaking to the amendment and not to the point of order.

Senator McIlraith: I am speaking on the point of order. I wish to make my argument. The Leader of the Opposition persists in interrupting. I don't mind. If he wishes to do so, that is all right; but surely—

Senator Flynn: Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to decide whether the honourable senator is speaking to the merit of the amendment or to the point of order. As I see it, he is speaking to the merit of the amendment.

Senator McIlraith: No, I am not speaking to the merit of the amendment. It will be demonstrated that I am right, even to the satisfaction of the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: Next year!

Senator McIlraith: That is the nature of the amendment before us. It does something wholly different. In its effect, it appoints a new group of senators to the committee, a whole new type of representation by the Senate—and that is completely different from the motion that was voted on.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator McIlraith: It is quite in order, because it involves the removal of two senators and calls for their replacement by senators from different regions. This is the first time that I have seen a situation in either house where, after a member has asked that his name be withdrawn from a committee—bearing in mind the necessity of having names coming from each side of the house—and action has been taken to accede to the members' wishes, the house pursues the matter, as was the right—

Senator Flynn: You did. You voted against the amendment.

Senator McIlraith: As was the right—but that is another matter. Perhaps I am getting away from the rule there, but I invite honourable senators to look at what the action would have been had that motion carried. It would have been perceived to be not merely an action which would have the legal effect of removing the name, but, since the procedural practice for removing the name had already been put in motion, it would also have been perceived to have been vindictive. I am not going to pursue that, however. I am sorry this happened, but it is perhaps another matter.

• (1450)

For the reasons I have given I think the amendment is perfectly in order.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, the reason I was perhaps overanxious to rise a few minutes ago was to make clear my protest against the statement by the Leader of the Government that an action in which I participated was "unparliamentary" and "ungenerous." I would ask him to withdraw that, because I made it very clear that I was rising only to support a point of order. I was not discussing the merits of the amendment in any way. I agree with Senator McIlraith that all of us owe Senator Argue thanks. He made the right decision—a difficult decision, I am quite sure—and I for one give him all the respect it is possible to give any senator for the kind of action he has taken.

There is nothing personal in any way in the position I am taking, but when I rise to discuss a point of order, which is my right, particularly when I am supporting a point of order raised by my leader, I object strongly to, and ask for withdrawal of, the statement that I was in any way ungenerous or unparliamentary.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the remarks I made were not directed specifically at any one senator. They were directed, rather, at the attitude of the official opposition. I described what in my estimation are their questionable initiatives this afternoon as being "particularly ungenerous." In the circumstances, after a senator has sent a communication of the kind sent by the Honourable Senator Hazen Argue, I would have thought it would have been more in the parliamentary tradition for the official opposition to have withdrawn their amendment, the point having been made.

Senator Flynn: Since the Leader of the Government suggests that our actions are directed at the person of Senator Argue, may I remind him that the objection to his presence on the committee was because of his position, not his person. It was on that principle that I believed the government side would have accepted the amendment, recognizing that an error had been made on its part in suggesting that the name of a minister be put forward for this particular committee. That is the point.

As far as concerns the argument of Senator McIlraith, to the effect that it is an entirely new proposal, I disagree entirely. I do not know if the same situation exists with regard to Senator Frith. He did not resign, yet he is being replaced. Since Senator Argue, however, has accepted the principle of the discussion of yesterday, the government side should have accepted the amendment we proposed. Now, however, they come in by the back door and say, "We want Senator Argue removed." I say they have made a decision and they should stick by it.

Senator Grosart: I appreciate the point made by Senator McIlraith, that in his view a whole new situation has arisen in respect to this. If that is so, I submit that it will be necessary, if this is an entirely new thing, and not just an ordinary amendment or a change, to go back to rule 61 and obtain leave of the Senate to introduce this completely new situation with regard to the appointment of a senator to a committee.

Senator Frith: Your Honour, may we have a ruling?

The Hon. the Speaker: Thank you, honourable senators, for your contributions to this discussion. Here is how I see the problem.

Honourable Senator Flynn would be right if rule 47 were applicable. A resolution cannot be changed during the same sitting, or even after it, without appropriate notice. This, however, is not a resolution. It is a motion, with an amendment, that was not voted on. The motion in amendment would have deleted the name of the Honourable Senator Argue from the resolution, and that was defeated.

Senator Flynn: The Senate said, "No".

The Hon. the Speaker: If a body as important as the Senate orders that the name of a senator be deleted from a list, the problem is to know whether that is the same as that senator's offering his resignation. Of course, if the Senate wishes to discuss the merits of the resignation, whether it was a tactic or a manoeuvre or something else, that is another matter.

If Honourable Senator Flynn is suggesting to me that the second amendment is the same as the first one, I cannot agree. Perhaps the letter should have been read after the first amendment had been defeated. Although it was read before, it has exactly the same meaning. If Honourable Senator Argue notifies the Senate that he does not want to serve on the committee, that is surely not the same thing as an amendment, adopted by the Senate, saying that his name is to be withdrawn from the list.

In my view, the amendment is in order.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

Senator Flynn: Your Honour has decided that the amendment is in order. We respectfully disagree, but we will not appeal the ruling.

I would say that it is a very interesting motion in itself. Senator McIlraith discussed this at length, and dealt with the substance of what it meant. On the point of order he explained that we were replacing someone with a senator from the Yukon, Senator Lucier, whom we will welcome on the committee, of course. The other change consists of replacing the deputy leader. I do not see in practice what change there is in that, unless it is merely to hide the fact that he had agreed that a minister should not be a member of the committee. Instead of admitting, very simply and very clearly, that a minister should not be on the committee, he uses that device. In any event, the motion can carry, but the record will speak for itself.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Just for purposes of the record, honourable senators, I should like to speak to the motion. I am not objecting to the composition of this joint committee, but I think it should be fully recognized for what it is. Before saying any more, however, I will say that I have the greatest respect for the experience, knowledge and wisdom of Senator Connolly. I know that in connection with the work of this committee there is imposed upon him a very serious obligation, and I am only sorry that he is the only member of the Senate on that committee from Ontario. This, to me, is a rather astounding distortion of our demographic limits in view of the fact that Ontario represents one-third of the population of Canada.

Let us look at this committee for one moment. Newfoundland has a representative on the Senate section, Quebec has four, British Columbia has one, Ontario has one, Alberta has one, Manitoba has one, and the Yukon has one.

I am not going to vote against this motion, but I do not want you, my colleagues, or the public or the press, to think that I am unaware—and I hope they are aware—of how badly this committee is loaded against the main population, and, in fact, the main economic base of this country.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Very briefly, I want to say that before honourable senators move to appoint members to this committee they should be aware of very serious restraints that are being put on the work of the committee by various spokesmen for the government, including two ministers and a parliamentary secretary, who are interviewed in today's edition of La Presse.

● (1500)

In an article by Gilbert Lavoie, it is clear from the interviews with the two ministers, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Gray, and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Ouellet, that the government has decided, not to cede an inch of ground to the requirements of the Senate concerning the amending formula and, in particular, section 44.

The point is made that, in the same way that the government wishes to provide for a mechanism to break an impasse with the provinces, it is necessary also to provide for a mechanism to break any impasse with the Senate.

In particular, I want to draw your attention, honourable senators, to the reference to the two ministers of the Crown and to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice, Mr. Irwin, who is to be a member of the committee, as I understand it, and also a reference to another member of Parliament, Mr. Lapierre of Shefford. If I may quote from the text of the article, Mr. Lavoie says:

[Translation]

> Interviewed separately, two ministers, Mr. Herb Gray and Mr. André Ouellet, gave the same answer practically word for word and stated that they could not see why the Senate ought to be exempted from the proposed resolution which empowers the government to abolish the monarchy in Canada if it so desires. Mr. Ron Irwin, Parliamentary Secretary to Justice Minister Jean Chrétien, made a similar statement, adding that the whole question had already been the object of lengthy discussions but that it had been impossible to reach a compromise.

[English]

Then the article goes on in much the same vein and quotes another member of Parliament, Mr. Lapierre of Shefford, who is to be a member of the committee, as I understand it. It says that one of the reasons for putting in place this mechanism to break any possible deadlock with the Senate would be if the government wished to abolish the monarchy and the Senate objected. I will give honourable senators the precise quotation:

[Translation]

> Mr. Lapierre pointed out that it would not be logical to allow the Senate to stand in the way of constitutional reform—

And then, in quotation marks:

> "after giving ourselves the means to go over the heads of the provinces". He expressed the opinion that within two years Canada will definitely break all ties with the British monarchy.

Again in quotation marks:

> "If we were to do so and appoint a head of state in Canada the Senate might object and everything would amount to naught . . . that would be inadmissible". "Similarly, if we wanted to change the Senate, the senators would be both judges and party if we leave them with the right of veto".

[English]

Then Mr. Lapierre, referring to himself and to his colleague, Mr. Serge Joyal, makes some remarks that some honourable senators may find insulting about their attention to their duties and their property qualifications in various provinces.

To give him credit, and as one might expect, Senator McIlraith, who was interviewed, said:

[Translation]

> —Liberal Senator George McIlraith said it is revolting to see members of the Commons censure the Senate in advance and hold it responsible for the constitutional impasse. "In 70 years the Senate has never been at the origin of an impasse. Now and then it did send bills back to the Commons so they could be improved, period". Mr. McIlraith said he did not know how his Liberal Senate colleagues would react if the proposed resolution is not amended, etc—

[English]

I simply think it is important, before the Senate moves to appoint its members to the committee, that they know precisely some of the constraints that are being put on this committee by two ministers of the Crown and by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice—the minister who has the responsibility in the government for constitutional reform, as I understand it—who will also be a member of the committee, and by a member of the Liberal majority in the other place, Mr. Lapierre of Shefford.

I think it important that honourable senators be aware of those facts before they proceed to vote.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Before the vote is put on the motion as amended, I should just like to say a few words. While I recognize that with only 10 members representing the Senate of Canada on this joint committee, it is practically impossible to represent all provinces and territories—and I did support and I do support the principle that a cabinet minister should not be on this committee—nevertheless, I must rise to say a word for those of us on this side who represent regions which are not represented on this committee. While Lorne Nystrom, an NDP member from Saskatchewan, is a fine young man, he will in no way reflect the views of a great many on this side who come from Saskatchewan.

Having said that, I do not propose to vote against the motion but, in view of what was said by the honourable senator who just spoke, I am greatly concerned by the way this committee was chosen. I am aware that the way these names are brought forward is not particularly democratically. However, we are having a vote and, of course, a vote is a democratic way to proceed.

I have great respect for the members of that committee, and I hope that they will, in fact, represent the various views that have been expressed on this floor by members on both sides and, certainly, in the caucus. This will be a difficult job because when the final stage of this constitutional Address comes to this house, there will be no practical way to amend it in substance. That means that when it comes back here, if the views of a great many members are not in fact represented in the final draft—and statements have been made which would lead one to suspect that they may well not be—then we will be faced with the very difficult choice of all or nothing—either voting entirely against it and defeating it, or voting in favour of it—take it or leave it.

A great many senators have already indicated that they do not intend to follow party lines but that they will, in fact, follow their conscience and the best interests of their regions.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, having spoken last evening on this subject, I should like now to say just a few words. I am grateful that government representatives here have shown flexibility and a spirit of compromise in the light of the comments made in the Senate last evening. I appreciate very much that the Atlantic provinces will now be represented. I commend them also for their good judgment in placing the name of the Honourable Senator Paul Lucier before the Senate to represent that important part of Canada, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Having expressed my appreciation, I would just like to say, a few words in reply to Senator Lang who said that Ontario, with one-third of the population, would have only one spokesman from the Senate. I draw to his attention that in the Senate we do not deal in demographic terms and we do not deal with representation in the Senate on the basis of population. That is something all of us have to bear in mind always. It is regional representation in this chamber.

● (1510)

Senator Lang: It is a pretty large region.

Senator McElman: It is regional representation in this house, and I believe I am accurate in saying that the Province of Ontario will now have on the total committee six members out of 25, and that is not bad regional representation—not bad at all. I do not think we should take too seriously any representations that may be made here that the Province of Ontario, because of its population and acknowledged economic strength within the Canadian community, is being badly done by.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words on this motion containing the revised list of senators recommended to be accepted by the Senate for membership of this committee. I certainly take no personal exception in any way to any of the members on that list—they are all very estimable gentlemen—but I do draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that the leadership of the Senate missed a glorious opportunity to remedy two very obvious omissions which were mentioned last night.

First, they have clearly omitted any representative of those senators who have expressed reservations about the contents of this document that we are dealing with, that is, the Joint Address and the suggested statute that goes with it. There was an excellent opportunity of putting up a new list. I realize, of course, that the Leader and the Deputy Leader of the Government pay no attention to what is said by anybody except themselves anyway, so I do not object to the fact that they are making a racket over there and paying no attention to me. That is perfectly all right. I would not expect to impress them in any event, but I repeat there was an excellent opportunity to put on that committee someone who, at the very heart of the deliberations, could represent the views of those senators—and clearly there are quite a number of them—who have some reservations about the content of the resolution and what goes with it.

The second very clear omission was mentioned last night by Senator Bosa, that is, there appears to be no one who could be said to represent what he referred to as ethnic groups. Surely when this new list was being formulated, those two omissions could readily have been taken care of with a little foresight and a little attention to the interests which are represented in this Senate and in this country and which ought to be represented in the persons of the Senate members of this joint committee. I think it is most unfortunate, indeed, that this oversight was permitted to occur.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Government informed the Senate yesterday that he regarded it as important that he consult the government. This appears on page 1156 of yesterday's Hansard. On two separate occasions he made it clear that he thought it necessary to bring the suggestions, comments, and so on, to the attention of the government. I would ask him now if he has done that and, secondly, if the agency known as the Federal-Provincial Relations Office was consulted on the decision to put before the Senate this list of names?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the procedure that has always been followed in my experience when a joint committee is to be established—and the only two I have had any experience with are the Joint Committee on Official Languages and this committee that we are now considering—is to discuss membership on the committee, first, with the other side in this house, and then with the Commons representatives, including those in the government. The exact procedure that I have been engaged in has been to forward the names of senators to act on behalf of the government party in the Senate, and then the other place put forward names. We discuss these names, and in that sense both members of the House of Commons and members of the government were consulted. I did bring to the attention of the government and members of the House of Commons the debate that took place here last night. What was the second question?

Senator Grosart: The second question was whether the Federal-Provincial Relations Office was consulted?

Senator Frith: I did not consult them—not knowingly, in any event. Whether they were consulted—putting it in the passive sense—whether somebody consulted them about anything I dealt with, I don't know, but I was not dealing with a body by that name.

Senator Grosart: In fairness to the honourable senator, perhaps he may wish to correct the following sentence which appears in today's Ottawa Citizen.

> After a prolonged procedural wrangle, debate on the list was adjourned and Frith promised to consult the government, meaning the Federal-Provincial Relations Office which is masterminding procedure for the constitutional debate.

I would ask him, first of all, to comment and then to assure the Senate, if it is so, that that particular agency is not masterminding the procedures before us?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not think it is proper for me to comment on what was said in the newspaper, and I do not intend to do so.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, I would like to make a few brief comments. I echo the sentiments expressed by Senator McElman during last night's debate. He did bring forward the appointment of a representative from the Atlantic provinces. However, I think of the treatment accorded the Negroes south of the border. In the United States the blacks are often afforded one member on a committee, or a member of the United States Cabinet, and this individual is referred to as the "token black". I hope that Senator Petten will not consider political colours too much, but rather that he will pay diligent attention to the Atlantic region.

I suggest to Senator Petten, with great respect as a friend, that he has a rather difficult task because we find that three former premiers from the Atlantic region, and now members of a chamber that is supposed to represent provinces and the regions, have been overlooked. I do not wish to discourage you, Senator Petten, but, rather, I want you to know that there is a very heavy burden on your shoulders, and we from the Atlantic provinces will be watching you.

I have great respect for the ability and experience of Senator Hicks. He is a Rhodes Scholar, a former university president, and a former Premier of Nova Scotia. He is a difficult man to replace. Then at the far end of the chamber we have Senator Robichaud, a former distinguished Premier of New Brunswick, and a former Chairman of the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission. He has a lot of experience and a lot of knowledge, which will take a lot of special effort on the part of Senator Petten to equal. I don't mean Senator Petten does not have the ability, but rather that it will take a lot of work on his part.

Last night it was suggested that Senator Argue would not have the time to attend the committee because of his duties as a cabinet minister. I suggest, with the same thought in mind, that Senator Petten will not have time to be the Liberal Whip and a member of that committee. The committee will be meeting morning, noon and night, and he cannot continue as Liberal Whip in this chamber. I don't like to see him lose his salary as Liberal Whip, but I think he should resign in order to be able to attend the committee meetings. I am sure he would be very welcome. Not only his colleagues on the government side, but also those senators on this side, would welcome him back as Liberal Whip after the committee has finished its sittings.

I am also pleased that the Northwest Territories and the Yukon were considered in the composition of the committee. I do not wish to criticize Senator Lucier, but I am surprised that a senator such as Senator Adams, who was present throughout the whole debate and at every vote, was not appointed to the committee. I hope Senator Adams will take Senator Lucier aside and bring him up-to-date on the proceedings in this discussion.

Honourable senators, I have just received a note from my seat-mate suggesting that I overlooked Senator Smith when I mentioned the former premiers. I did not do so deliberately. His ability and experience are so well known that I did not consider it necessary to mention him.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question. After the last few days, during which there have been a great many provocative remarks, perhaps provocative questions, I want it clearly understood that there is no underlying provocation in my question.

Since the start of this debate there has been a question as to the procedure to be adopted when the resolution has gone to the committee and the committee reports back. The Leader of the Opposition suggested yesterday that the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders look into the matter of the procedure. I replied that it sounded like a reasonable request and that I would examine the question. Obviously I have not had time to do so. My question to the Leader of the Government is a very simple one. What does he propose the course of events will be when a report is received back from this Joint Committee on the Constitution and reaches the floor of the Senate? Would he mind explaining to us exactly what will happen then?

Senator Perrault: I understand that the report would be debated, as is every report which comes from a committee. The particulars of the report would be open for debate. I expect that certain honourable senators will wish to suggest changes. They may propose motions to alter the report, to change the report. If those motions are adopted, as I stated in an earlier discussion on this point, the report, with the assent of the other place, would then go back to the joint committee for consideration by that committee, and perhaps subsequent revisions in that report might go to the joint committee. The report would then, of course, have to go back to both chambers for final agreement from the other place and from the Senate.

Senator Molson: Perhaps I could ask a supplementary question. That suggests that not only would the details, or the elements, or the clauses of the report be debated, but it would be possible to amend them if the Senate saw fit. Am I right on that point?

Senator Perrault: I have nothing to add to my statement.

Senator Molson: I was trying to clarify that position.

Senator Perrault: I want to say to the Honourable Senator Molson that I am sure the house leader in the other place, and certainly officials who work with me as Leader of the Government in the Senate, will co-operate in any way to attempt to assist the honourable senator's efforts in preparing a summary for the Senate.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask my honourable friend to clarify a portion of his statement that I did not quite clearly understand. He said that amendments could be made to the report with the consent of the other place. Did he really mean to say that?

Senator Perrault: I didn't say that.

Senator Roblin: The honourable senator said something that sounded very like it to me. Perhaps I could put my question in another way. I trust it will be possible for this house, on its own initiative, to make amendments in detail with respect to the report that is received back. Is that a correct statement?

Senator Perrault: I regret very much that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition seems to want to read the worst into things. I never stated there would have to be agreement in the other place before an amendment could be advanced in the Senate. I am sorry the honourable senator would even presume for a moment that any suggestion of that kind would emanate from this side. Of course, such a procedure would be totally contrary to Senate tradition.

What I did say, and what I stated some days ago, and what is a matter of record, is that, because this is a joint committee, when the report of the committee comes to the Senate and if after debate certain proposals are made in the Senate to change certain sections of the Address to Her Majesty or to the proposed draft bill, those proposed changes would be proposed in the form of a motion duly seconded and, if passed here by honourable senators, sent back to a re-constituted joint committee. However, in order for the committee to resume its activities to study these proposed Senate changes the co-operation and the agreement of the other place would be required in order to revive or re-establish the committee.

Senator Flynn: Do you mean you won't raise any procedural objections to amendments being made either to the report or to the proposed resolution?

Senator Olson: Just a minute.

Senator Flynn: Well, that's what I want to know. In other words, do you intend to claim that the report cannot be amended when it comes before us—legally, I mean?

Senator Perrault: The report will be dealt with like any other report that comes to the Senate, according to the rules, which the Leader of the Opposition frequently states he reveres so much.

Senator Flynn: I did not say that. On the contrary. That is why I suggested to Senator Molson that he should have his committee clarify and, if necessary, establish rules that would clearly indicate what procedure we will follow when that report comes to us. I suggest that that committee should meet and establish that. The Leader of the Government said that we were masters of our own rules. Therefore we can establish those rules in order to avoid any objections based on procedure that could be made by the Leader of the Government or by someone else.

Senator Perrault: I said that the Senate is master of its own rules, but it must be borne in mind that when we are involved with the other place in a joint committee the usual rules pertaining to joint committees apply. Of course, the honourable senator is aware of that.

Senator Flynn: I am speaking of the report and what the Senate can do with it. The Leader of the Government said that as far as the report and the document to which the report will refer are concerned, we are masters of our own rules, and that is why I suggest that we clearly establish what rules we want to follow when this report comes to us.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, that rule 66(1) be suspended in relation to the nomination of senators to serve on the—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that the motion be amended by striking out the second paragraph thereof and substituting therefor the following:—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

• (1530)

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are opposed to the amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it, and the motion in amendment is carried, on division.

Will those honourable senators in favour of the main motion, as amended, please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are opposed to the main motion, as amended, please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it, and I declare the motion, as amended, carried.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENT OF ALBERTA

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development some questions with respect to negotiations between the federal government and the Government of Alberta on the oil question.

I asked my honourable friend some time ago when he thought these negotiations would start, insofar as the federal government has indicated it is willing to negotiate with Alberta. Could he tell us what the schedule is?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, as my honourable friend Senator Roblin knows, Premier Lougheed has suggested that negotiations begin at the officials level. That is now being explored, and perhaps there will be some progress to report as to when the officials will find some means or some basis on which negotiations can resume. At this stage, I am unable to give him the date when that will begin, or at what level. Indeed, I am unable to give him the date on which it might move from there to the ministerial level.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I wish to follow up on this with one or two more questions. The Prime Minister stated that he was willing to reopen negotiations with Alberta, in order to avoid a confrontation. To my mind that implies that there are areas where negotiation is possible. This is followed in the next paragraph by a statement attributed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Honourable Marc Lalonde. He said that the federal budget announced on October 28 would not be changed. This leaves me in a bit of a quandary as to where the area of negotiation might be.

That being the case, I ask my honourable friend to clarify the policy of the government as to the area of negotiation which might be possible with respect to this matter. Is it possible to negotiate any changes in the tax regime that the government has announced?

Senator Olson: What the honourable senator is trying to do is something that I should caution him against at the outset, because he is not going to succeed. He is trying to pre-empt the basis of negotiation that might take place after some preliminary discussions have taken place. My honourable friend knows that the entire energy package that would be most appropriate to both the producing provinces and to the federal government, and the people it represents, is a large and complex package.

Discussions at the officials level are taking place now, but I am not going to be drawn into a discussion on what sections there is absolutely no possibility of negotiation on, and what sections are open. We can talk about things of significance, such as bringing on more Canadian supplies, the terms and conditions under which that might be done, and so forth. It would be foolish for any minister to set these things out prior to negotiations taking place.

I remember that when I was on that side of the chamber I made inquiries as to where the negotiations were at, and I got exactly the kind of answer I expected when the opposition was sitting on this side of the house. I was told that while negotiations were under way they would not give any staging of them, because that could frustrate the negotiations. I am sure my honourable friend will understand that that will be the response about all the details he is trying to get out of me now. I am sorry, but it just will not happen, and I would not like him to be involved in an exercise in futility. I can promise him now that that is what it will be.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate the co-operative spirit of my honourable friend's response. Just to show him that there are no hard feelings, I can tell him that I see the point of his argument. I shall try to make my question a little easier, so that we will be able to get some kind of an answer.

Can the minister tell us, as a general principle, and without reference to specific areas, in regard to the question of taxation, the question of price, the question of incentive, the question of division of revenue, whether in any of those areas there is room for negotiation?

The reason I ask the question is that we have this interesting statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources which gives me the impression that there is no room for negotiation in these areas. If that is the case, I should like to know where the room for negotiation is. So, without wishing to embarrass my honourable friend by having him show his hand, in any respect, could he give me a general impression as to where the negotiations may fruitfully be expected to lead us?

Senator Olson: I can, in general terms. It is obvious that the conciliatory statement made by the Premier of Alberta, and the very conciliatory statements made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and by the Minister of Finance in the budget documents, express a sincere hope on both sides that a basis for negotiation can be found so that an agreement can be reached. This would be highly desirable for everyone in Canada.

Senator Roblin: May I ask my honourable friend if he can conceive of any areas in which the federal government is willing to make some concessions to meet the Province of Alberta?

Senator Olson: Yes, I can, and I will report them to this chamber as soon as there is some discussion with the producing provinces so that we can go forward with them.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. I have been trying to find out since July 14 what the actual understanding is between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States with respect to the Garrison Diversion Project in the state of North Dakota and the Province of Manitoba. I have elicited from him over these many months very little with respect to the matter.

We now have a change in the administration in the United States and it becomes more pressing than ever that I repeat the question. I asked whether he could give the Senate the aide memoire, note, or whatever it was, which established the actual undertakings of the American government given verbally to the Canadian representatives, and indeed who gave those representations?

Now that there is a new administration, the soundness of those undertakings certainly will have to be examined carefully. I wonder if my honourable friend could co-operate by providing this information asked for many weeks ago.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as a philosopher, I know the Deputy Leader of the Opposition knows that good things come to those who wait. I do have some information this afternoon, but it may not specifically meet all his stringent requirements.

● (1540)

We understand that no decision has yet been taken in the United States regarding the expenditure of recently appropriated funds for this project. Pending such decision, the United States Department of the Interior office in North Dakota is continuing with essentially administrative activity, including a general invitation to bidders to examine the site before winter, in anticipation of a possible tender call in the spring. This preliminary administrative procedure may have led to speculation that a decision had been taken and a call for tenders made. United States authorities have confirmed that they will provide Canada with warning of any such decision.

In view of the results of the presidential election yesterday in the United States, I shall seek from the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs any further information which may be available as to any new initiatives with respect to this matter.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for the information he has given me. He had a proverb and I have one—Hope deferred maketh the heart sick. Hope has been deferred for a very long time in respect of getting an answer on this particular matter.

I now ask my honourable friend if he has already asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs for an answer to the question I put to him several months ago, and perhaps he might tell me when he asked him.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the request for information was submitted to the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs some considerable time ago. Great care is taken in the preparation of these replies so that they will be accurate in every respect. This one has taken a particularly long time to prepare.

Senator Roblin: I have no answer to that.

ENERGY

OIL—FORECAST REDUCTION IN EXPLORATION DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question to address to the Minister of State for Economic Development. The President of the Canadian Association of Oil Well Drilling Contractors has predicted that the combined effect of the budget and the cutback by the Alberta government on production could reduce available funds for exploration and development by 40 per cent. The same gentleman further said that, as a result, only 5,500 wells will likely be drilled in Canada next year compared with nearly 9,000 in 1980. Would the minister inquire of his colleague, the Minister of Energy, to ascertain whether federal government figures corroborate the expectations of Mr. Porter?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, I will, honourable senators.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—REPORTING PROCEDURE

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate arising out of the answer he gave to Senator Molson regarding the procedure in the matter of the proposed Address to Her Majesty. Did I understand him to say that the situation would be as follows; if there is concurrence in the report of the joint committee, that will not be assumed to be or deemed to be a resolution for an Address? In other words, is there a further stage? He has mentioned stages 1, 2, 3 and 4, which are not quite distinct in my mind, although I have read his comments over several times. Will there necessarily be a fifth stage, where there will be introduced into Parliament a resolution for an Address?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice, because it is an important matter and it is vital that the correct information be communicated. The question to which I addressed my remarks related to the possible changes in the so-called constitutional package and how they might be put in place. I would like to take this question as notice, to make sure that an accurate reply is provided.

Senator Grosart: I have another question that is somewhat allied to that question, and certainly related to the last comment the Leader of the Government made. In the event that there is no immediate concurrence by the Senate in the report of the joint committee, and that there is a motion to return the report to the committee, suggesting or recommending certain amendments, and that the House of Commons refuses to agree to the joint committee's being reconstituted, is it the position that the Senate's recommendations will automatically die and therefore will not be heard by that committee? If the House of Commons does not agree to the reconstitution of the committee, perhaps on that I might also ask him—if not now, certainly at some time in the future—to give us the authority for the statement that when that joint committee reports it automatically ceases to exist.

We have had many examples here of special committees and joint committees reporting. Perhaps I should not say joint committees, but certainly there are many examples of special committees reporting, time and time again. In relation to the authority for the automatic ending of the mandate of a committee, has the leader considered, or has there been taken into consideration, the possibility that that committee might—to protect the Senate in this case, and also the House of Commons—bring in an interim report?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on the latter point relating to the cessation of the committee mandate and its responsibilities, and indeed the life of the proposed joint committee, may I cite Chapter 15 of Beauchesne Fifth Edition, page 206, section 663.

Senator Grosart: May I ask the date of that edition?

Senator Perrault: The printing is 1978, published by The Carswell Company Limited.

> 663. A special committee ceases to exist at the moment its final report is presented to the House. Therefore the report cannot afterwards be sent back to the committee with instructions to amend it in any particular way unless the House agrees to revive the committee by adding the following words to the motion for recommittal: "and that the Committee for such purpose be revived."

This is the only citation which I have available at the present time. We have been involved in recent hours in helping to bring into being a special committee, as the honourable senator is aware. I understood that when this special joint committee has completed its work, it will submit its report simultaneously to the other place and to the Senate. Both houses will debate and discuss the report. They may wish to make changes in the committee report. If the changes are proposed by the other place, concurrence to re-establish the joint committee would have to be obtained from the Senate in order to have that joint committee consider the proposed Commons changes. Similarly, agreement by the other place would be necessary should the Senate wish to have the joint committee re-established in order to consider Senate changes in the joint committee report. In any case, the Joint Address could not proceed to Her Majesty unless and until it had the support of both the other place and the Senate.

• (1550)

Senator Grosart: Would the honourable senator agree that the key word in that quotation, if it is valid, is "final"? And there may be some question as to the validity because of the date. I understand that that particular edition is unrevised and is just a reprint of the 1958 edition. But assuming that it is so, would he not agree that the key word in that description of the procedural situation is "final"? That is the point I made.

To protect the Senate, surely it might be suggested that it be not the final report of the committee; because—and I don't think the leader has fully answered my question—in the event that the House of Commons says, "We will not revive that committee," the situation will be that anything that has been done or recommended in the Senate will be dead, useless.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, well—

Senator Grosart: No. I ask for an answer to that. Let me repeat it. We make recommendations; we make amendments; we spend perhaps days and propose amendments; then we vote to send the report back; and the Commons says, "No, we won't agree to revive the committee. We are not prepared to agree to revive this committee." Is the effect then that everything that has been done in the Senate is dead? Nullified? Useless? A waste of time? Is that the situation?

Senator Perrault: I cannot imagine any advice ensuing from the Senate that would be useless and of no value; but, apart from that—

Senator Grosart: Of course it could be ineffective!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I stated a number of days ago that established parliamentary practice would be to obtain the agreement of the other chamber in order to revive the committee; and I suggested that in the ordinary course of parliamentary practice, parliamentary tradition, the spirit of Parliament, there would be no difficulty in obtaining the support of the other chamber.

For example, I can think of no circumstance that would have the other place seeking Senate approval for the re-establishment of a joint committee in which the senators would not, with their usual generous spirit, extend their support for such an action. However, I will take that portion of the question as notice so further information can be sought on the point raised by the Honourable Senator Grosart.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—SENATE PROCEDURE FOLLOWING PRESENTATION OF REPORT

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have a question for the government leader in the Senate. What will happen when the report of the joint committee has been tabled and we wish then to make the Address to Her Majesty the Queen?

In the motion it says:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

I would like to know this: Once the report is made and tabled in the Senate, how do we then formulate the resolution for the Joint Address? Is a resolution then put forward to unite with the House of Commons in a Joint Address? All this motion says is that the joint committee will report, whether or not an Address should be made.

Let us assume that the committee reports that an Address should be made; that does not constitute an Address in itself.

Senator Frith: You simply concur in the report.

Senator Everett: Well, we can concur in the report, but it does not seem to me that that constitutes an action by the house. All we will have done is to have concurred in a report of the joint committee. We will have said, "We agree with you. What you say is correct. An Address should be made." But that is different from saying, "We are now about to make the Address." When we do make the Address, somebody has to stand and move "that we unite with the House of Commons and make an Address."

That is what has been bothering me all along. Maybe I am obtuse—

An Hon. Senator: Not at all.

Senator Everett: —but I keep reading the resolution over and over again, and all it says is that this joint committee will be giving its view as to whether or not both the Senate and the House of Commons should unite to make such an Address. It does not say that by adopting the report we have thereby made the Address.

The deputy leader says that the rules do. Well, if they do, then I think it would be useful to know what the rules are that do that for us so that we will know what we are getting into.

Senator Grosart: No rules do that.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Everett has asked an important question. When this committee schedules its meetings, I am sure that that the honourable senator's question will be one of the matters discussed by the committee. At some point during its deliberations it must determine the form of its report to Parliament.

It may be that its report will take the form of an interim report. Indeed, I mentioned the other day the possibility of an interim report. Our distinguished Clerk has advised us that it may be possible for the committee to issue an interim report, saying, for example, "In view of the great number of witnesses, this committee seeks approval from Parliament to have constitutional proposals."

So an interim report appears to be at least a possibility. But the final form of the report would, of course, be determined by that joint committee. However, the form of the report and how it is developed or drawn up finally is a matter that has yet to be determined. No doubt those senators participating in the work of the joint committee will have a great deal to say about how the report is written and the manner in which the Address to Her Majesty will be presented to Parliament for final approval.

From the standpoint of the government, the latest information I have is that no hard and fast rule has been established with respect to the final form of the report. It is expected that the committee itself will do a great deal of work to determine the most acceptable form of the report.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. It seems to me that there is a well-established principle that a body to whom authority is delegated cannot take on greater power than that which is delegated to it.

Senator Roblin: That is right. That is bang on.

Senator Everett: Therefore, it follows that it is hardly within the power of the committee to determine what the Senate will do with its report. It can do no more than the Senate asks it to do.

Senator Perrault: That's right.

Senator Everett: The resolution says that the Senate asks the committee to report whether or not such an Address should be presented to Her Majesty. That is as much as the committee is enabled to do. It cannot make any rules that would bind the Senate, that would force the Senate to say, "If we accept your report, we have automatically made an Address." All it can say is whether, in its view, the Senate should or should not make the Address.

• (1600)

It would seem to me that the job of the committee is to hear evidence as widely as possible and to attempt to come up with a form of Address that would be acceptable to both the Senate and the House of Commons. A motion would then be constructed on that basis and put before the Senate, subject to debate, subject to amendment.

It seems clear to me, from reading this, that there is no doubt that once that report comes back, a motion must then be put forward for this house to unite with the House of Commons for a Joint Address to Her Majesty.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator's observations are, of course, of great interest. I hope that he will make his views known to those senators who will serve on that committee—or perhaps he may wish to appear before that committee at some point. Honourable senators are, of course, free to attend the meetings of the joint committee. The honourable senator's proposals are most interesting, as are his views regarding the form of the Address to Her Majesty.

Honourable senators, as in my earlier reply to Senator Grosart, I suggested that I would take the question as notice, and more information will be sought.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I should like to reply to the Leader of the Government in this respect. Of course, I will not make such a submission to the joint committee, because I would then be suggesting that they had the power that I am suggesting they do not have. I make my representation to the Senate, and the Senate then decides whether or not that joint committee has the power.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I wish to rise on a point of order. The leadership on this side of the house agreed today to have the Orders of the Day re-arranged to accommodate the government, or some senators on the government side who had other matters to attend to. In doing that, I was not aware that the leadership on this side agreed to forego the Question Period, which, with great respect to the one minister who is remaining, results from the absence of the other two ministers—the departure of the Minister of State for Economic Development, as well as the continued absence of the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, who was not here yesterday. He obviously is following the deliberations of the chamber with quite avid interest, and he is close enough to Parliament Hill to get a letter to us overnight. I cannot believe that he is very far away, given the efficiency of the Post Office. In any case, a number of us on this side of the house have questions for the Minister of State for Economic Development and for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, which there is no point in pursuing in their absence.

I simply wish to state, on the point of order, that the leadership of the government should not think that in future the Question Period can either be abbreviated at their whim, by getting us to accommodate them on the Orders of the Day; nor can it be cut off by the sudden departure or absence of ministers. We are not going to put up with that sort of thing.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the circumstances today were rather special. The Honourable Senator Argue, of course, is battling agricultural problems in North Battleford, Saskatchewan—

Senator Murray: Who is winning?

Senator Perrault: I am pleased to report that the Liberal government is winning.

Senator Nurgitz: In Saskatchewan?

An Hon. Senator: That will be the day!

Senator Perrault: As for Senator Olson's absence—a rare absence, as honourable senators must admit—he is dealing with some vital matters on behalf of Canadians from coast to coast, regardless of party. May I say, however, that in my humble way I will attempt to answer any questions that the honourable senator may have.

BANKING

ELECTRONIC TRANSFER OF FUNDS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. A newspaper account yesterday reported Mr. Robert MacIntosh, President of the Canadian Bankers' Association, as saying that the technology is available, and has been for some time, for government to electronically transfer funds to the accounts of recipients of such government benefits as Unemployment Insurance, Old Age Pensions and Family Allowances—and, I assume, a whole raft of other government benefits.

Mr. MacIntosh, in a speech made at a Toronto press conference, said that the government tried the system some five years ago but declined to adopt it, despite the potential saving of millions of dollars to the taxpayers of this country. He alluded to the fact that it would be upsetting to the Post Office.

Can the leader confirm that the government did experiment with a system of electronic transfer of funds, and, if it did, can he tell us why implementation of a cost-saving system like this has been rejected or delayed?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—SENATE MEMBERS

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. He has been flitting to and fro. Senator Frith, may I ask you a question? It's nice to have you back. It is a very innocent question, of course.

Senator Perrault: Yes—lost innocence.

Senator Walker: Did my honourable friend—I am speaking of you, Senator Frith—bring to the attention of the government the question of the composition of the committee, which has resulted in the change in personnel that has been tabled today? It is a simple question. Did you bring the matter to the attention of the government before changing the names of the representatives from the Senate on the joint committee? Did you bring this matter to the attention of the government before re-arranging your list and bringing it back to the house today?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the answer to that question will depend on what the honourable senator means by the words "attention of the government." I certainly discussed it with our caucus.

Senator Walker: Did you discuss it with the government? You just said the caucus.

Senator Frith: I discussed it with the caucus, and there were members of the government present at the caucus.

Senator Walker: Members of the cabinet were there, were they?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Walker: And was it as a result of that, that you decided you would make the changes you have made?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will not say anything further about what took place in caucus.

Senator Walker: I am not asking you to, but was it as a result of your deliberations in the caucus, and only in the caucus, that you made these changes?

Senator Frith: I cannot answer that question.

Senator Walker: You refuse to answer it?

Senator Frith: No. I am saying that I will say nothing more about what took place in caucus than what I have already said, and that the decisions were made by the Leader of the Government, myself as Deputy Leader of the Government, the whip, and representatives of the Senate caucus.

Senator Perrault: Recommendations.

Senator Walker: Yesterday you were being questioned by Senator Hicks, and this is what was said as reported at page 1159 of Hansard:

> SENATOR HICKS: What you said was that the views of the government would be taken into account.
>
> SENATOR FRITH: I did not say that.
>
> SENATOR HICKS: With respect, you did.
>
> SENATOR FRITH: I said that the Senate's views would be taken into account.
>
> SENATOR ROBLIN: You did not say that.

Which one is right?

Senator Frith: If I understand it correctly, both were right. I took the views of the Senate into account, discussed them with the persons that I have already mentioned in reply to Senator Grosart, and with the persons that I have mentioned to you. There was an exchange, and the exchange of views and information resulted in a decision being made by the government party leadership in the Senate and the government Senate caucus as to whom would be put forward by this side.

Senator Walker: Under all the circumstances, you did not do as you promised to do at page 1156, namely:

> I assure honourable senators that we will bring to the attention of the government the constructive suggestions—

Senator Frith: In the sense that I have just answered the question, I did exactly that.

Senator Walker: That is a question of opinion. Two and two usually make four, except with you.

• (1610)

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—SENATE PROCEDURE FOLLOWING PRESENTATION OF REPORT

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. It relates to the questions and supplementaries asked by the distinguished senator from Manitoba, Senator Everett.

As I understood his question originally, it was to the following effect: Is it not correct, under the terms of the resolution, and under the rules and practice of the house, that all the joint committee can do is make a report to the house as to whether or not a loyal Address should be forwarded, and that, before further progress can be made, or the Address can be dispatched, it is necessary to have a resolution of the Senate to that effect?

I also understood the leader—perhaps I misunderstood him—not to agree with that assertion, but to characterize it simply as an interesting suggestion which perhaps the senator should put before the committee. By that answer I took it that the leader was not willing to agree that the suggestion made by Senator Everett was correct. If that is so, and if that is the view of the leader, then what alternative has he in mind?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not wish to cast myself in the role of attempting to make advance rulings with respect to matters to be raised in a joint committee which will come into existence very shortly as a result of our actions today. I want to assure honourable senators, as I stated before, that the government fully expects that certain amendments may come before that joint committee. It does not regard the joint committee's responsibility as being that of merely approving or disapproving of the proposed Address to Her Majesty in its present form. The government expects that there may be changes proposed by the joint committee and dealt with by Parliament before the final form of the Address to Her Majesty is accepted by Parliament. There could be changes recommended by the joint committee in the report which will follow the termination of its activities on December 9. It will then be for both houses of Parliament fully to debate the report and any proposed changes which may have been recommended by the committee.

Senator Smith: I thank the leader for his explanation, which is much appreciated. It does not, it seems to me, answer the question raised by Senator Everett, and now raised by myself. I do not think Senator Everett was asking, and certainly I am not, the Leader of the Government to predict what the committee might do. What we are concerned with is what this house will do, or has the power to do, when the committee reports.

Let me go over this again, so that we will be clear on what I am asking—if it is possible to make it clear. I understood—and certainly if Senator Everett was not asking about this, then I am—that when the report comes back, it will be necessary, before an Address can be forwarded with the concurrence of this house, for someone in this house to move that the Address, containing whatever it might contain, be forwarded to Her Majesty, with the concurrence of the House of Commons. I understood the Leader of the Government, also, in the way he answered Senator Everett, not to agree that that was the procedure, but to suggest that perhaps Senator Everett should try to persuade the committee that it should be.

That leads me to believe that the Leader of the Government, since he does not agree with the suggestion of Senator Everett, must have some other course of action in mind which the Senate could and might take. I am asking, therefore, if he would be kind enough to say what alternative there is to the suggested procedure which Senator Everett put to him.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the resolution route could very well be the procedure which the Senate would follow. I would like to take this question as notice. I believe the joint committee may well recommend to both houses what procedure should be followed when the Joint Address comes back here. No one has any way of knowing. I would rather take the question as notice and attempt to provide a fuller reply during some later Question Period.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, so that I can be clear on this point, is not the question raised by Senator Everett and Senator Smith exactly the same one that I raised and on which the Leader of the Government said he would make a full statement? Am I correct in that?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Grosart: Fine.

Senator Roblin: He made a statement, but did not say anything.

ENERGY

ATLANTIC REGION—HOME HEATING—CONVERSION GRANTS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday the energy minister, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, announced that the Atlantic provinces must prove that they are not burning imported oil to generate electricity, before homeowners there can qualify for grants to assist in converting their home heating to electricity. This unilateral action on the part of the Minister of Energy has altered the proposals outlined in the budget—but then, unilateral action seems to be popular this year.

Would the Leader of the Government assure us that this discriminatory action will be delayed until the federal government has completed the drafting of anti-pollution guidelines for the generating plants converting to the use of coal?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am rather surprised at the political edge that I detect in the Honourable Senator Phillips' comments. It is rather unusual for him to engage in that kind of thing. I must say that my colleague, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, has not made available to me a copy of the statement in which the Honourable Senator Phillips alleges these remarks appear. As a result, it would be unfair of me to offer many comments on that subject.

Honourable senators, I think that all Canadians support the idea of having $460 million spent under the Energy Program in the Atlantic region to meet increasing energy problems. The program is an impressive one, as some honourable senators are aware.

[Senator Smith.]

I am sure that the Honourable Senator Phillips is enthusiastic about more natural gas going to the maritimes, via a new pipeline, just as he must be about an acceleration of offshore development, ensuring local purchases; a utility off-oil fund—that is, conversions to coal—financing of interprovincial electrical connections; a $200 million equity contribution for the Lower Churchill; financial support for local technology in the Donkin mine feasibility studies; coal research and development; coal utilization technology; extension of the Prince Edward Island conservation and renewable energy agreement; up to 50 per cent of the cost of energy efficiency improvements in industry; an enhanced conservation program in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island; and many, many other measures which I am sure will bring great benefits to the Atlantic region.

I know that the Honourable Senator Phillips must be very supportive of these measures, despite the fact that they originated with a Liberal government.

Senator Phillips: The fact that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is unaware of the announcement of the Minister of Energy, an announcement made before a committee of the other place, confirms my view that it was a unilateral action. I cannot imagine the Honourable Marc Lalonde operating without the consent and knowledge of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is the Leader of the Government in a position to tell us how long it will take to convert an oil-burning generating plant to coal?

• (1620)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the latter question I will take as notice. As to the senator's earlier observations, that he is surprised I had not read the Honourable Marc Lalonde's latest speech, let me assure honourable senators that I have spent a very busy 24 hours, and I am somewhat behind in my reading.

Senator Flynn: It was right in your field of expertise.

AIRLINES

GREAT LAKES AIRLINES SERVICE

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government relates to a question I asked about six months ago concerning the regularity of the Great Lakes Airlines service to Peterborough. I realize this is a technical question and that the department will have to give this matter careful consideration. However, I have waited almost four or five months for an answer.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe I presented an answer to that question some time ago. The honourable senator may not have been in the chamber at the time. The Ministry of Transport did provide me with a rather extensive summary of the take-offs and landings, cancellations, and other problems which have afflicted a particular carrier, which may have been Great Lakes Airlines. If I am wrong, I shall most certainly find out why there has been a delay in obtaining that information for the honourable senator. I believe the information brought to the chamber related to Great Lakes Airlines.

INDUSTRY

IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE AUTOMOBILES

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I spoke to the Leader of the Government some time ago about the influx of Japanese cars into Canada. The situation has become critical and tens of thousands are unemployed, because of the easy manner in which the Japanese are able to export their cars to Canada. Canadian automobile firms are on the verge of bankruptcy, and as a result the Canadian government, which means the taxpayer in the final analysis, is paying subsidies to certain automobile companies to keep them afloat. All this is the result of the Japanese being allowed to export their cars to Canada.

Is any consideration being given, in cabinet or out of cabinet, to imposing an embargo or quota on the importation of Japanese cars or is a tariff being proposed which would certainly greatly diminish the flow of those cars into Canada? Once when things were bad in Canada, the Conservative Party adopted as an election slogan, "No truck nor trade with the Yankees!" That slogan appeals to me now in connection with the importation of these Japanese cars.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, some weeks ago I believe I replied to a question regarding imported automobiles. However, it may have been a question other than the one posed now by Senator Walker. The question will be taken as notice and the reply brought to the chamber just as quickly as possible.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—PROCEDURE FOR CHANGING SENATE MEMBERSHIP

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Frith:

> That changes in the membership of the Special Joint Committee to consider a proposed Address to Her Majesty the Queen concerning the Constitution of Canada may be made by notification thereof, signed by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, or any Senator named by him, with respect to government members, and by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, or any Senator named by him, with respect to opposition members, being filed with the Clerk of the Senate who shall cause the same to be printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of that sitting, or of the next sitting thereafter, as the case may be; and
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that house of such changes.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when I moved the adjournment yesterday, it was to give the Leader of the Government and the deputy leader some breathing space.

This motion was moved at my suggestion, as I said, yesterday, the idea being that the normal procedure to change the members of a committee, be it a standing, special or a joint committee, is to have a motion before the Senate.

This joint committee will probably sit five days a week, whereas the Senate usually sits only two and a half days. Replacement could be required on short notice, and problems might occur if the Senate were not sitting. I suggested, therefore, that the same rule which applies in the House of Commons be applicable to us in this place.

Senator Perrault: A good idea.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

On the Inquiry of Senator Marshall:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to certain problems in the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program and to the desirability of improving the program to better meet its original objectives.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with leave, I ask that Inquiry No. 2 standing in my name be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 6, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, in a few days' time, on November 11, Armistice Day, Canadian veterans will commemorate and pay homage to their comrades who fell in two world wars and in the Korean conflict—battles that after 62 years, unfortunately, fade in memory.

Lord Julian Byng of Vimy, a famous Canadian Corps Commander, and a former Governor General of Canada, once said:

> Manliness, courage, loyalty—these are the qualities that make our Canadian troops famous; qualities that gained them their splendid series of victories; that brought them through the critical times; and these qualities of the fighting men were characteristic of the whole nation.

Honourable senators, I think it is appropriate, too, to repeat the words of the late Honourable Dan J. MacDonald, who in a Vimy address given two years ago, commemorating a battle in which Canadians distinguished themselves, said this:

> Let us mourn our fallen sons and daughters, but let us remember that they did not die in vain. They died for the high principles they believed in—peace, freedom and democracy.
>
> It is my firm conviction—

He said

> —that we Canadians will continue to play an important role in the advancement of the great causes of mankind—peace, disarmament, human rights, and ultimately, social justice—those same virtues that Canadians fought and died for on foreign soil sixty years ago.

It is significant, honourable senators, that we are debating changes in the make-up of our nation, changes which will determine whether or not the words of these two great Canadians mean anything to those who are charged with the responsibility of designing our future.

In the name of those who sacrificed their lives for a better Canada, "We should remember them."

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I join in the very eloquent tribute paid by Senator Marshall to those who sacrificed so much for Canada.

We have almost reached another November 11, and memories of all sorts fade a little further into the past. But no one should forget the magnificent sacrifice made by thousands of Canadian men and women who fought for this country and worked for this country and died for this country in World War I, World War II, the Korean War and other conflicts and peace-keeping missions.

In recent weeks we have been engaged in a vigorous discussion of human rights and whether or not they should be entrenched or enshrined as part of a new Constitution. Perhaps the fundamental question to be asked by every Canadian is this: Had it not been for the sacrifice of those thousands of men and women—many of whom are dead and many of whom are living, some still suffering from the physical and psychological wounds of those conflicts—we would not be enjoying our present freedoms. Indeed, we would not even enjoy the freedom to discuss whether human rights should be entrenched or protected in some other manner.

I know that all honourable senators will join in the Honourable Senator Marshall's tribute. The sacrifice of those who served must never be forgotten.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

> Report on Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981.
> Report of the Superintendent of Insurance on the Administration of the Investment Companies Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 27(1) of the said Act, Chapter 33, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

PRIVATE BILLS

MONTILAC LTD. AND SOCAM LTD.—FIRST READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc presented Bill S-13, to revive Montilac Ltd. and Socam Ltd.

Bill read first time.

Senator Leblanc moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday, November 12, 1980.

Motion agreed to.

TREMUS INDUSTRIES LIMITED—FIRST READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc presented Bill S-14, to revive Tremus Industries Limited.

Bill read first time.

Senator Leblanc moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday, November 12, 1980.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Wednesday next, the 12th of November, 1980, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981.

Motion agreed to.

● (1410)

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday, November 19, 1980, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I would like an explanation for the record.

Senator Frith: The explanation given to me by the committee chairman—and he might wish to add something—is that he has a witness appearing at that time who has an extremely busy schedule. The chairman wants to be able to give the witness that much notice to appear on that date.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, we are studying the main estimates for 1980-81. We are also studying government policy on regional disparities. We want the President of the Treasury Board to appear before the committee to give us an overview of those estimates. When we adjourned before the recess we had booked a number of witnesses to appear before the committee with respect to government policy on regional disparities. At that time we had not foreseen the need to have the President of the Treasury Board appear as a witness, but now the need is apparent. Taking into account his busy schedule and our limitations under the block system, the most suitable time for the committee to hear this witness is November 19. For that reason we are seeking the approval of the Senate to allow the committee to meet while the Senate is sitting on that day.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—ELECTION OF SENATOR HAYS AS JOINT CHAIRMAN

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to inform the Senate what transpired at the first meeting of the joint committee on the so-called package on the Constitution. I am using the words of the Leader of the Government when I describe it in that way. Do I understand that our colleague, Senator Hays, has been elected joint chairman?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was not present at that meeting. I could ask Senator Goldenberg, who is a member of the committee, or Senator Lamontagne who is a member of the committee, to answer that question, if that is the wish of the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Goldenberg: Senator Hays was elected joint chairman of the committee.

Senator Flynn: I regret his absence very much, because I would have asked him to report to the Senate what took place after his election as joint chairman.

Senator Olson: Ask Senator Goldenberg or Senator Lamontagne.

Senator Flynn: If the Senate gives me leave to do that, I shall. Normally I can only address questions to the chairman of a committee. I am wondering whether some important decisions were made.

● (1415)

Senator Olson: Several members of your caucus were there.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but I can hardly ask them.

Senator Olson: Why not? Aren't they talking to you?

Senator Flynn: It is not in accordance with the rules, and you know how I respect our rules.

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—ALLEGED STATEMENTS BY CABINET MINISTERS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, yesterday I read into Hansard portions of an article that appeared in La Presse of November 5, reporting on interviews with two ministers of the Crown and a Parliamentary Secretary, as well as with one of the government party's nominees on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

The question I wish to address today to the Leader of the Government is whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, as well as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice, were speaking for the government in making the remarks that are attributed to them in the article in question; in particular in regard to the intention of the government not to cede an inch to the demands of the Senate concerning the amending formula and, in particular, section 44 of the resolution, and whether the statement by Mr. Lapierre that one of the reasons for dealing with the Senate in this way is to provide against the possibility that the Senate might try to block a government attempt to abolish the monarchy.

Would the Leader of the Government tell us whether or not those gentlemen are speaking for the government in that regard?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, these honourable members of the other place have a right to speak for themselves and express their own personal opinions.

Senator Flynn: Opinions different from those of the government?

Senator Perrault: The views, if reported correctly, certainly do not represent the official position of the government. Furthermore, may I say that the honourable senator persists in quoting from truncated and abbreviated newspaper reports, largely taken out of context—

Senator Murray: I resent that.

Senator Perrault: I wonder if the honourable senator is prepared to provide me with the full text of the remarks which are supposedly covered by this article. That would be most helpful, and I think probably fairer to those to whom the remarks are attributed.

Senator Murray: Yesterday I read into Hansard what I honestly regard as being the relevant excerpts from the article. I can table the article, a copy of which I have here; I can send a copy of it to the Leader of the Government; or I can read the entire article into the record now so that it will appear in both French and English in today's Hansard, if the honourable senator wishes. But I would not have thought that he would want me to take up the time of the Senate with that. I can do it, if he wishes.

[Senator Olson.]

I resent the implication that I have quoted the article deliberately out of context in order to create an impression that the article does not give. I have read the article very carefully, and I think I have omitted nothing that was relevant to my remarks yesterday or to my question of today. If the leader wants me to read the whole thing, I shall do so. In fact, I think I will anyway since he has made the point. It will then appear in both official languages—

Senator Leblanc: Order.

Senator Murray: —for the edification of honourable senators. Who is calling me to order?

It is stated in La Presse of November 5, 1980, under the headline:

[Translation]

> "Non-compliance of government with Senate's demands."
> Although the Trudeau government claims to be open to amendments to its constitutional reform project, it seems agreed that it will not cede an inch to the demands of the Senate concerning the amending formula, and, in particular, Section 44 of the resolution which would allow the House to go over the head of the Senate in amending the Constitution.
>
> This is what came out of the series of interviews given by La Presse to Liberal members and ministers who were all in agreement: In the same way that they had to provide for a mechanism to break a deadlock with the provinces, it is necessary also to provide for a mechanism to break any deadlock with the Senate, should the Senate stand in the way of constitutional reform. Interviewed separately, two ministers of the Crown, Mr. Herb Gray and Mr. André Ouellet, gave the same answer practically word for word and stated that they could not see why the Senate ought to be exempted from the proposed resolution which empowers the government to abolish the monarchy in Canada, if it so desires.
>
> Mr. Ron Irwin, Parliamentary Secretary to Justice Minister Jean Chrétien, made a similar statement, adding that the whole question had already been the object of lengthy discussions but that it had been impossible to reach a compromise.
>
> The honourable member for Shefford, Mr. Jean Lapierre, who is also going to be a member of the committee, went even much farther. "It would not be logical to allow the Senate to stand in the way of constitutional reform which is the wish of the people. The Senate cannot demand such power, since its qualification with regard to representation is rather dubious" he said.

• (1420)

[English]

Senator Olson: You are out of order on about ten different counts, but go ahead.

Senator Murray: I beg the pardon of the Minister of State for Economic Development, but an imputation has been made that I quoted the article yesterday out of context. "Truncated, abbreviated, press articles out of context," was the phrase used, I think. I did not omit yesterday anything that was relevant, and I will proceed now to read the article in question.

Senator Frith: The Leader of the Government asked for a copy. He did not ask that it be read; but anyway, carry on.

Senator Murray: Well, clearly the honourable gentlemen opposite do not like to hear what is being said by their colleagues in the other place.

[Translation]

> Mr. Lapierre maintained that it was the natural survival instinct of senators which makes them object to section 44 which, among other things, would enable the government to abolish the Senate whether senators agree or not.
>
> He went on to say: "I am not worried, I think that many senators will be wise enough to put the interests of the country and the needs of the electorate before their instinct for survival." Mr. Lapierre pointed out that it would not be logical to allow the Senate to stand in the way of constitutional reform—

And then, in quotation marks:

> "after giving ourselves the means to go over the heads of the provinces". He expressed the opinion that within two years Canada will definitely break all ties with the British monarchy.

Again in quotation marks:

> "If we were to do so and appoint a head of state in Canada the Senate might object and everything would amount to naught, that would be inadmissible". "Similarly, if we wanted to change the Senate, the senators would be both judges and party if we leave them with the right of veto".
> Mr. Lapierre revealed that he and his colleague Serge Joyal had looked into the extent to which senators can be said to be provincial representatives. He declared that in many cases they are not. "Several of them have nothing more than a small $4,000 parcel of land in their province and they do not even know the exact location", he added.

[English]

Perhaps some honourable senators would like to deal with that matter on a question of privilege.

[Translation]

> The risk inherent in that line of thought on the part of Liberal members of the Commons is that it may well lead to confrontation between the Senate and the Commons. Contacted yesterday by La Presse Liberal Senator George McIlraith said it is revolting to see members of the Commons censure the Senate in advance and hold it responsible for the constitutional impasse. "In 70 years the Senate has never been at the origin of an impasse. Now and then it did send bills back to the Commons so they could be improved, period." Mr. McIlraith said he did not know how his Liberal Senate colleagues would react if the proposed resolution is not amended, but he predicted that "there will be so much trouble among the public and in Great Britain" that the project will be aborted if the government does not change its attitude.

• (1425)

[English]

I have now read the entire article into the record, and I repeat that no part of it that I left out yesterday was relevant to the questions I put to the minister then. Today I will repeat my question to him: Were the ministers and the parliamentary secretary stating the position of the government?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question has already been answered. If they were made at all, these appear to be personal comments expressed by members of the other place. Because the honourable senator has not been in the chamber very long—

Senator Flynn: Which makes no difference for anyone who has been here as long as you have.

Senator Perrault: —I think it would be useful for him to know that in 1964 the Special Committee on Procedure and Organization recommended the following guidelines, which were subsequently concurred in by the House of Commons, to be used by members in asking or answering oral questions:

> (b) not inquire whether statements made in a newspaper are correct;
> (e) not be of a nature requiring a lengthy and detailed answer;

Even the framing of the question should not be too lengthy. I did not ask Senator Murray to read that lengthy and detailed newspaper article to the chamber. I suggested that he may wish to provide me privately with the complete text of the alleged statements made by the honourable members of the other place who, if the reports are accurate, were speaking for themselves.

Senator Murray: I apologize for having taken up the time of the Senate, but the fact of the matter is that an imputation was made by the minister in his reply that I was quoting out of context. I thought it necessary to put the entire text on the record. I thank him for reminding me of the rule that goes back to 1964.

I should now like to remind him of a rule that goes back a couple of hundred years, and it is the rule of collective responsibility in the cabinet. I ask him whether it is now open to ministers of the Crown in the other place to express personal opinions on a matter of this importance—personal opinions which do not bind the government.

Senator Flynn: There is no answer.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PURPOSE OF MINISTER'S VISIT TO UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government. Apparently the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. MacGuigan, is expecting to be in London at the beginning of next week. I would like to know the purpose of his visit and whether he has been instructed, ordered, or invited by Lord Carrington, the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in Great Britain, to report on the progress of the resolution for patriation which is now before the special joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall take that question as notice.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: On a supplementary. When the minister answers the question I just put to him, given the objections coming from almost every political circle, especially from the British government in London, would the minister arrange to meet with government officials, particularly Lord Carrington who is in charge of this file, and assure him that the Canadian government will drop its Charter of Rights from the amending formula and will be content with asking the British Parliament to patriate the Constitution with an amending formula?

[English]

Senator Perrault: If the minister arrives safely in London, it is certainly obvious that he will attempt to see Lord Carrington.

Senator Asselin: Why?

Senator Perrault: A number of observers have speculated that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Lord Carrington may discuss the British North America Act. It would be surprising if that subject did not come up. However, the minister does not envisage that if the meeting takes place with Lord Carrington, it will have a constitutional focus. He has already seen Lord Carrington on that question and will probably wish to dwell more on north-south issues which, as the senator is aware, are most important.

• (1430)

Senator Asselin: Could you tell me why the minister is not accompanied this time by his colleague, the Honourable John Roberts, the Minister of the Environment? The last time he was accompanied by him, and together they met the Queen, the British Prime Minister and a few other ministers. Why is he going alone this time to discuss the constitutional matter?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the honourable ministers are extremely busy these days, and it is not necessary at all times on overseas visits—

An Hon. Senator: To save travelling expenses, too, would be just as good a reason.

Senator Perrault: —for two ministers to go together to the United Kingdom or any other country. I fail to see why any ominous implications flow from the decision of Mr. MacGuigan to go to London without the Honourable John Roberts.

ENERGY

NEW BRUNSWICK—HOME HEATING—CONVERSION GRANTS

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. My question arises from an article in the Telegraph-Journal of Saint John, New Brunswick, dated October 31, and the headline: "New Brunswick Won't Get You a Grant."

Honourable senators, I am fully aware of the intention of the grants system for transfers of fuel usage in the country, that is, to make sure that less and less imported oil is used in heating homes and businesses, but I fail to understand why New Brunswick was placed in the same category as the other Atlantic provinces. For the information of the Senate and the minister, I would like to point out that at the present time more than 50 per cent of electricity produced in New Brunswick is produced by either hydro or coal-fired plants, and, when Lepreau comes on line, almost 80 per cent of the power used in New Brunswick will be generated from sources other than oil. In addition, honourable senators, given the fact that New Brunswick is still roughly 50 per cent rural, it is hard for me to imagine the gas pipeline, when it comes down to the Atlantic provinces, serving the rural areas of New Brunswick.

Therefore, I would ask the minister to inquire if the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources would consider allowing those fuel grants to be made to residents of New Brunswick for conversion to wood-burning or electric furnaces.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will make an inquiry of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, and try to get an answer as soon as I can.

THE BUDGET—POLICY RESPECTING CANADIAN OWNERSHIP OF OIL COMPANIES

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I would have asked this question yesterday but affairs of great and vital importance to the future of the nation took the minister out of the chamber before the Question Period was concluded. I pause here to express the hope that those affairs were carried out to the great advantage of the Canadian people. I am pleased to see the minister back in his seat for this Question Period.

The chairman of the Royal Bank of Canada was quoted today—I wrote this question yesterday because I intended asking it then, so it was yesterday that he was quoted but he spoke the day before—as saying that the budget, that is, Mr. MacEachen's budget, has "the very real prospect of creating uncertainty, confusion and disruption in the energy industry," and he has counselled that rather than penalizing foreign-owned oil companies, the wiser course would have been to provide incentives for Canadian investors to purchase shares in them, thereby increasing Canadian control.

My question is: In the light of Mr. Frazee's comment, and many other similar comments made since last Tuesday, is the government reconsidering its policy of promoting Canadian ownership with the stick rather than with the carrot?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, of course that is a matter of interpretation and, as usual, my honourable friends opposite try to put the worst possible interpretation on the proposals of the budget, which is a perfectly normal thing. Opposition parties have done that for the last hundred years, too. However, I will—

Senator Donahoe: I didn't know Mr. Frazee was in the opposition party.

Senator Olson: No, I was talking about the general attitude of the opposition for the last hundred years—even our attitude when we were in opposition.

An Hon. Senator: Were you there, too?

Senator Olson: I was there for a while, yes.

An Hon. Senator: Do you recall the speeches you made in the other place at that time and the questions you were asking there?

Senator Olson: Yes, I am an expert in designing speeches and questions that seek out the weaknesses in the government's policy because I was probably in the opposition longer than my honourable friend. I was there for 10 years, so I have some knowledge of what I used to spend a great deal of time doing.

I will take the question as notice and refer it to the Minister of Finance for his comments, because that is, of course, where this was made, but I can say at the outset that the principles involved in Canadianizing the oil and gas industry, and to put Canadian companies in an advantageous position in doing that in the future, are not negotiable. That is the stated policy of this government, and what may be adjusted are some of the methods of doing it, but what is in the budget stands in that respect.

I would like to mention also, I appreciate that members opposite missed me yesterday afternoon. Senator Donahoe was not the only one. I read that Senator Murray missed me. I should like to draw to their attention that I was here for about 30 minutes of the Question Period in spite of the change of order. The answer to the second part of that first question is, yes, there were some very important matters of state that were probably being very well managed.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question? I was very interested in the answer, and in light of it I would like to draw the minister's attention to the headline story that appeared in yesterday's—that is, the day before yesterday because of the time when this question was written—Globe and Mail's "Report on Business" which stated that since the budget, stock market trading has actually caused Canadian ownership to decrease. My question with respect to that headline is: Will the minister now concede that it makes no sense to have thrown away the goal of self-sufficiency in this decade for a policy which is having the opposite effect to that intended, and will he commit his government to act to rectify this situation?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is how we get into difficulties here. The honourable senator is now saying that the government has thrown away the goal of self-sufficiency in this decade. Of course, that is absolutely, unreservedly, unequivocally untrue. We have not. In fact, the goal has a higher priority now than it had under the previous government, or even prior to the election campaign of 1980. It is well known that that policy was, is and will continue to be our policy, and if that is so, then all the rest of the question may as well be thrown in the ash-can.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It concerns Petro-Canada. Would the minister explain to us how Petro-Canada's finances are arranged in terms of their buying into the various consortia in exploration, and in terms of the various projects that they are getting involved in, for example, the acquisition of companies and the building of oil rigs, and so on. I realize that there is no share capital available, but how exactly is the money put together or found?

Senator Olson: That is a fairly complex question. My honourable friend will realize that it is a program that will evolve not only over a number of months but a number of years. I could bring my honourable friend a report on some of the principles involved in that if he was unable to grasp them by reading the budget and the energy papers. Certainly, for his edification, it would be necessary to have updates on that from time to time. If he asks me for them, I will see that he gets them.

• (1440)

Senator Doody: I have a supplementary question. The budget reference to PetroCan is really not very helpful in trying to determine what the original financial structure of the operation was. It was acquiring rights in various oil exploration groups long before this particular budget was presented. I think it would be a rather futile exercise for me to try to find it, even with the aid of the yellow highlightings that the honourable minister was kind enough to supply. They were very helpful. It must have taken his staff all of three minutes to go through that exercise.

I must say, however, that we had a quid pro quo on that particular day. I offered to get him a copy of John Turner's comments. I have them now, and I shall ask a page to take this document to the minister. It was not available in Ottawa, so I had to send to Toronto for it. I can't understand why it was not welcome in Ottawa. It will make some late bedtime reading for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

In the minister's quest for information on PetroCan structuring, I wonder if he will try to find for me the rationale in using some of these moneys—which are not private moneys, obviously—to buy $300,000 worth of paintings. I understand that PetroCan has recently acquired $150,000 worth of Canadian art, and is intending to buy another $150,000 worth in the near future. Would the minister determine whether that is a proper use of PetroCan funds in its ongoing desire to Canadianize, if I may use that terrible word, the oil industry?

Of course, these may be oil paintings. That may be the explanation.

Senator Olson: To the extent that that is a serious question, and I assume it is, I will make a reference to the minister responsible for PetroCan and obtain the answer.

Senator Doody: Excuse me, but you may have to get two answers, one from the minister in charge of cultural affairs and another from the Minister of Finance. I rather imagine they have different views on this acquisition.

NATIONAL HARBOURS

PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I have a question that I should like to address to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Can he tell us when we can expect the government to introduce the promised legislation concerning Canada's ports? I believe this is something that he is as anxious as I am to see introduced. Is there any indication as to when we can expect this legislation?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, no date has yet been set for the introduction of the west coast ports legislation, but certainly legislation is in the course of preparation. I can understand the Honourable Senator Bell's great interest in this subject because of the importance of ports in her area of responsibility.

Senator Bell: If I may ask a supplementary, would the leader use his persuasive ability to see if we could have the ports legislation introduced here in the Senate where we could give it a thorough scrutiny, as we usually do in our committees, and members of the other place could then confidently pass the legislation with dispatch?

Senator Perrault: As usual, the honourable senator has advanced a constructive idea and certainly representations will be made in that direction, but if the proposed ports legislation contains certain financial clauses its introduction in this chamber may not be possible. However, I fully support the implementation of Senator Bell's request, if at all possible.

Senator Bell: This is not exactly a supplementary question, but perhaps I could point out that the particular legislation I have in mind will probably save the taxpayers' money and not spend it.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTIONS RESPECTING PROCEEDINGS—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, now that we are blessed with the presence of Senator Hays, the joint chairman of what I suppose I can call the Constitution Committee, I wonder if I could ask him to inform the Senate of the main decisions taken at this morning's meeting, and whether they are positive or negative.

[Senator Doody.]

Hon. Harry Hays: Honourable senators, I am pleased to answer the honourable gentleman's question. The committee met this morning at 9.30 and proceeded to choose two joint chairmen, one from the House of Commons and one from the Senate. Nobody seemed to vote against the selection of either of the nominees, so I suppose they must have been satisfactory.

This was very important business because this is probably the most important committee ever convened in the last 113 years, and I think we are right on the brink of success. I certainly hope we are.

The next item of business was the appointment of the steering committee, in which we got a great deal of help from members of the opposition in the persons of Senator Flynn's deskmate, the senator who sits immediately behind him, and the senator who sits on Senator Roblin's left. Senator Flynn has probably not conversed with these committee members since the meeting this morning. They were at the meeting and were of great help.

The make-up of the steering committee is the two joint chairmen, three Liberals and three Progressive Conservatives—I thought that was a pretty fair way to do it, and I am sure the honourable senator will agree—and one member of the NDP.

Senator Olson: There are too many Conservatives.

Senator Hays: Then we moved on to whether we should advertise. This was really an organization meeting which has not been completed yet. We considered how we should inform the Canadian public as to how the committee is going to proceed, in the committee, and agreement on that was achieved by about 12.30. Anyone who wants to attend meetings of this committee will, by and large, be welcome.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I rise on a point of order. Since the members opposite, particularly yesterday and earlier, displayed such an interest in compliance with the rules, I would draw their attention to chapter 9, page 129, of Beauchesne, on the subject of questions:

> A question oral or written must not . . .
> (hh) seek information about proceedings in a Committee which has not yet made its report to the House.

Senator Flynn: That is all right, but that is not in our rules. You can go back a hundred years but you will find that that is not in our rules. Questions here may be put to any chairman of a committee on the activities of that committee. That is what I was doing.

Are you really objecting to my question? Do you want another ruling by His Honour the Speaker? Do you want him to rule as you wish?

Senator Frith: I am answering your question as to whether I want a ruling, and your other questions. My answer is that yesterday and previously we had honourable senators on the other side and on this side raising points of order. We sat and listened to them, and I want to put on the record that the honourable senator's question is out of order according to Beauchesne. Now, it may be in accordance, as frequently is the case, with the rules according to Flynn, but it is not with the rules according to Beauchesne.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have been sitting in the Senate for nearly nine years now and our rules, and indeed our customs, have always allowed senators to put questions to all committee chairmen. We have done that in many instances, and never did government representatives attempt to stop us. Committee chairmen have always accepted questions from senators concerning committee work, so today why should we change the rules and customs that have prevailed for all these years?

• (1450)

[English]

Senator Frith: It depends on whose ox is being gored. We raise a point of order and the objection is that it is being raised. So it depends on who is raising it. Anyway, that is what it says.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I would like to address the point of order, honourable senators, if I may. I refer the house to page 7 of Rules of the Senate. I do not refer to Beauchesne but to section 20 of our own rules, which reads as follows:

> (1) When the Speaker calls the question period, a senator may, without notice, address an oral question to . . .
> (c) the chairman of a committee, if it is a question relating to the activities of that committee.

So the third person to whom questions may be addressed is the chairman of a committee, if they relate to the activities of that committee.

Senator Asselin: That is right.

Senator Roblin: That seems to fit precisely the proceeding initiated by my honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition. He wished to address a question to the chairman of a committee relating to the activities of that committee. I submit, according to our own rules—which, in my opinion, take precedence over Beauchesne—that the Leader of the Opposition is in order.

I will leave the point of order, seeing that it is groundless, and ask the permission of the house to make an addition to the report given us by the joint chairman.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as the Honourable Senator Roblin says, a question to the chairman of a committee about its activities is in order, but the proceedings of, and what is taking place in, the committee are not the same as its activities. For example, it is perfectly proper to ask a question about when the committee will meet.

An Hon. Senator: You are splitting hairs.

Senator Frith: It is proper to ask if the committee intends to meet later or when it is going to meet, but it is not proper to ask about the proceedings in the course of its meetings before it has made its report. For example, there is no entitlement to ask questions about evidence given before a committee until the committee has made its report.

Senator Flynn: I did not ask that, anyway.

Senator Roblin: That is an interesting interpretation of the word "activities". For all I know, it may be a correct interpretation, but I don't think it is. I think the word "activities" means exactly what it says, namely, what went on. That is what "activity" means to me. It means what went on. We have not asked the honourable joint chairman for anything more than a short report on what went on.

Senator Frith: You were there.

Senator Roblin: But I have to say, with respect, that he omitted the most important thing that went on this morning, which I feel perhaps should be brought to the notice of this house.

Senator Perrault: What was that?

Senator Roblin: That was the question of whether or not we were going to open the windows and the doors and let the people of Canada in by means of television and electronic devices, because the proceedings of this committee could be broadcast by television and radio to all the people of Canada.

It would be out of order, I think, if I attempted to deal with any of the arguments, but I merely wish to report the fact that the matter was raised by the committee, and I am unhappy to say that the motion was defeated.

Senator Frith: Order. We are talking about a question to the chairman. Surely, honourable senators, we should try to come to some understanding about this, because this committee will be meeting every day. In my opinion, it is not good to have a scrap over this and have a ruling on it. I think we should try to come to some understanding about how we will interpret these rules, and to see if we can have a consensus on it. No one wants to choke off questions or to choke off debate, but when a question is asked to the joint chairman about the proceedings of the committee so that it becomes necessary for him to give an interim report, I submit that that is out of order. Admittedly, there is a nice distinction as to how the words in the rule should be interpreted. I understand Senator Roblin's view and he understands mine. We do not agree with each other, but we see our two points as arguable positions.

There is another point. Will the members of the Senate who are members of that committee continue what has taken place here this afternoon? Will they continue to ask the joint chairman about what has taken place at a committee meeting at which they were present?

Senator Flynn: Where decisions were taken.

Senator Frith: And will they then make comments on the answers that are given, thus, in effect, making an intervention which is tantamount to a debate on the answers given?

We should get together to see if we can find some balance on this matter, so that, while we do not totally ignore the activity of the committee, we nevertheless do not proceed to have reports every day on what is taking place there, especially when we already have representation on the committee.

Senator Roblin: Speaking to the point of order, I was careful to ask permission of the house to add to the report given by the chairman, and I would like that point to be noted. So far as I am concerned, that permission was granted or I would not have continued with my remarks. It seems relevant to me that the most important thing the committee did should be reported.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the joint committee will be holding meetings every day for a considerable time. For that reason, and because I think the matter is of sufficient importance, it is my opinion that the point of order that has been raised requires some clarification so that both sides will know where they stand, not just in respect of today but for the future as well.

I do not want to be caught in the position of prematurely confirming the position of either side at the moment. I shall therefore reserve my judgment on the matter.

TRANSPORT

WESTERN CANADA—GRAIN HAULING SUBSIDIES

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. I am sure he must be feeling neglected this afternoon, not having had any questions directed to him.

Senator Marshall: Neglected and rejected.

Senator Flynn: He was rejected yesterday. Today he is neglected.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I just could not get any attention.

Senator Bielish: Is the minister aware that in Valleyview, Alberta, as well as in other locations in western Canada, grain companies have offered to bear all of the costs involved in constructing an offline elevator, if they can be assured that hauling subsidies will be available?

Is the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board in a position to indicate whether western farmers can anticipate implementation of a policy to subsidize the hauling of grain by truck, where the producers have to haul more than 20 miles?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

Senator Bielish: I have a supplementary question. If you intend to do that, can you offer the complementary assurance that sufficient additional car allocations will be granted in order to move the increased volume of incoming grain?

Senator Argue: I make the same reply.

ENERGY

THE BUDGET—EFFECT ON OIL AND NATURAL GAS EXPLORATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. My question has to do with the oil business.

I presume he saw the interesting headline in the paper this morning about Canadian Hunter shifting to the United States in the wake of the budget. The story goes on to say that the company is making that move because it appears to them, at any rate, that the value of their holding has been reduced by one-third by the instrumentality of Mr. MacEachen's budget.

I will not enter into any discussion with the minister on that or query that particular point, because it is subjective with respect to Canadian Hunter. I do wish to ask him, however, whether or not these shifts in the oil industry in Canada will be included in the work of the Petroleum Monitoring Agency. That agency has been set up to examine the shifts of capital investment and profits, and other things like that, and activities of the petroleum industry generally in Canada, and it seems to me it would be important that they be instructed to take account of the shift and movement of petroleum activity from Canada to the United States in order that we might have some objective standards for measuring the effectiveness of the government's oil sufficiency policy.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will take as notice that part of the question dealing with whether they have looked specifically at the movement of exploration activity, or, in fact, whether they have asked the oil and gas development companies to give them indications of the movement of their rigs in and out of the United States. Of course, we have other ways of obtaining information concerning the movement that goes both ways, but I will take as notice that part of the question concerning whether they are asking about that specifically.

• (1500)

As to the newspaper headline, that is the opinion, I guess, of the President of Canadian Hunter. He should be well advised to inform himself about some of the other aspects of the budget, because if he does that, he might come to the conclusion that several other Canadian companies came to. That is the objective of Canadianizing the industry, and it may be in his interest more than he is willing to acknowledge.

Senator Roblin: I am not challenging the minister's opinion, because he is entitled to it. I am asking him to monitor what actually takes place. I am not only interested in the movement of drilling rigs. I want to know about the movement of capital, because what is important to me in this story is the fact that the company is to move its entire capital investment to the United States in 1981, and that is a sum of between $50 million and $100 million. The movement of capital is the significant point here, and I urge my honourable friend to have the Petroleum Monitoring Agency advise us on this, because it might become a very important matter.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is a little difficult to quantify and qualify intentions. Perhaps they could be asked about this. As I said, I will take that part of the question as notice. Whether they might have spent $70 million or $100 million, and now intend to spend less, makes a difference in the market availability of, in this case, natural gas and other things. I am sure my honourable friend will have some sympathy, because to be precise about intentions is not always easy.

Senator Roblin: I agree with my honourable friend that that does present a problem, but the government is continually assessing intentions in the economic field in order to conduct its activities, so I suspect it can do so in this case.

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENT OF ALBERTA

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should like to refer to a question I asked my honourable friend yesterday concerning areas of negotiation that might be open between the federal government and the Government of Alberta. My honourable friend, in his coy style, refused really to give me an answer of any kind on that. Yet, I find that the day before the question was asked, the minister responsible, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, stated that there was an area of negotiation, and, in fact, said that Alberta was to get a new offer with respect to the unconventional oil sands production—at least the heavy oil production—or things of that sort. I expect my honourable friend can now confirm that there is an area in which negotiations are taking place. Has the minister any information as to whether the Province of Alberta has agreed to negotiate with the federal administration with respect to these areas?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I assumed that there was nothing wrong with my honourable friend's memory, and there certainly is nothing wrong with mine. I told him and other senators at least four or five times that one of the priorities of this government is incentive to bring on synthetic oil, whether from mining operations, the Cold Lake type of enhanced recovery, Lloydminster, Peace River, or half a dozen other places where that quality of oil is. There is just no question that we are willing and ready to negotiate. As a matter of fact, we have already made what we think are significant offers in that respect. We offered as much as $38 plus inflation, which is more than twice as much as the present conventional price in the stream now.

To get back to the specific question of whether that is the subject of further negotiations, we certainly hope it will be one of the subjects. I can tell my friend that there has been some communication since the budget between officials from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Province of Alberta. We hope that serious negotiations will take place soon on a number of specific points. They made no secret at all that one of the subjects will be the one that my honourable friend has identified. We regard bringing on more supplies as holding the greatest potential for increasing Canada's oil supplies, and we are very anxious to renegotiate that.

Senator Roblin: I guess I am really regretting that my honourable friend did not tell me that yesterday.

Senator Olson: I told you that four or five times.

Senator Roblin: I am sympathetic with him and sincerely hope that negotiations with the Government of Alberta do result in an agreement on what might be done with those matters. I urge him to exercise a little flexibility, because that is what we are always told is the hallmark of the administration.

AGRICULTURE

ATLANTIC REGION—PROPOSED VETERINARY COLLEGE

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. I ask this question of him, knowing of his vast experience in agricultural matters, having observed him for many years and having heard his dissertations on questions put in the other place.

I should like to ask him if he can advise the Senate of the status of the proposed veterinary college in Atlantic Canada. Is this proceeding at the moment, or will it come to fruition? I would not mind the minister taking the question as notice and bringing to the Senate a full and comprehensive report so that we can all get up-to-date on where it stands at the moment.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): It is quite obvious that this is not within my jurisdiction; I am not here to answer on behalf of any particular minister. The question has been considered by members of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on previous occasions. A great deal of interest has been shown in having a veterinary college in Atlantic Canada. I will take the question as notice and obtain further information.

Senator Muir: The reason I posed the question is that I have heard so many conflicting stories about it. I am wondering whether there ever will be a veterinary college there. I would appreciate the minister contacting his colleague in the other place, the Minister of Agriculture, to find out what is happening on this matter.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

THE BUDGET—IMPACT ON LOW INCOME FAMILIES

Hon. Jack Marshall: My question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It relates to a question I asked last week with respect to the burden placed on pensioners and low income people because of the high cost of energy.

Some alarming statements have been made by the Canadian Council on Social Development. One is that the budget will add roughly $500 a year to the living costs of an average family. Another alarming statement, one that I thought we would never hear in Canada, is:

> —that social unrest is apt to rise over the next few years unless there is a basic change in federal social policy—

And there is another:

> Canadian society will pay a heavy price in lost productivity, personal bankruptcy and higher rates of domestic violence—

I wonder whether the minister read the report by the Canadian Council on Social Development, and if he has, whether it has been discussed with his colleagues with the aim of reviewing the high cost of fuel to poor people in the future.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I shall take that question as notice and refer it to my colleagues. It was asked in the other place several times. I could give the honourable senator the same answers, and he would expect me to do that. We have noted with some satisfaction that the cost to the consumer is somewhat less now than it was under the previous budget.

If my honourable friend has not seen those answers, I can send them to him. They appear in Commons Hansard. That is freely available to everyone here. I could identify the pages where those answers appear and draw them to his attention.

● (1510)

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I follow Hansard very carefully, but I neither appreciated nor accepted the answers given in the other place. Since the minister said, just a few moments ago, that he was an expert on questioning, I thought he might be an expert on giving the proper answers, too.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend would not be advising me now to give an answer different from that given in the other place, especially after he has heard his leader tell us about—

Senator Muir: Probably a more comprehensive answer.

Senator Olson: —about cabinet solidarity, and that if we support the policy we must all give the same answer. I am sure he would not expect me to give any different answer.

Senator Marshall: In the event that the minister is a little more sympathetic than his colleagues in the other place, perhaps he would, given the seriousness of the situation, take the question as notice and bring it up again.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, all of the ministers in this government have demonstrated that they are substantially more sympathetic to this problem than were the ministers of the previous government.

Senator Flynn: What is the word for that? It is not parliamentary.

ENERGY

OIL IMPORTED FROM MEXICO—COST OF CONVERSION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to respond to a question raised by Senator Charbonneau on October 29 last in which he was seeking information concerning oil imported from Mexico.

First of all, I should like to point out that all sales contracts that Mexico is now executing, including those with Canada and Japan, for example, relate to specified quantities of oil and do not specify quality. Therefore, the purchasers pay according to the quality received.

[Senator Marshall.]

With regard to the additional costs of refining heavy crude, the honourable senator should know that the refining industry is responsible for maintaining its equipment in a suitable and adequate condition. I would add that companies around the world understand that the world gravity of oil is getting lower. In other words, the percentage of heavier crudes is increasing worldwide and is not a problem facing Canada alone.

Keeping in mind the Canadian consumer, our government has obtained a commitment from four refineries in eastern Canada which will be prepared and able to handle the Mexican crude. In addition, Petro-Canada is looking into the possibility of upgrading another plant in Montreal.

I trust this answers the honourable senator's questions. He may also want to refer to pages 61 to 65 of The National Energy Program, which outline improvements for the efficiency of crude oil use.

CROWN CORPORATIONS—APPLICATION OF PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should also like to reply to questions raised on Friday, October 31, by Senator Steuart and Senator Roblin, concerning the petroleum and gas revenue tax. I should like to explain that federal crown corporations already pay taxes to provincial governments, both income taxes and other forms of levies and royalties. It should also be noted that the federal government exempts provincial crown corporations, including SaskOil, from paying federal income taxes.

The petroleum and gas revenue tax is a tax on a product and not on an entity. Therefore, the tax is to be levied on the output, including that of both federal and provincial crown corporations, without consideration for the ultimate beneficial ownership of the entities involved.

I trust this response will answer the questions raised by both honourable senators.

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE

VISIT OF PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO BRUSSELS, BELGIUM

Hon. Stanley Haidasz rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, June 12, 1980:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the proceedings and results of the IV Interparliamentary Conference on European Co-operation and Security held in Brussels, Belgium, from 12th to 18th May, 1980.

He said: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to inform you on the IV Interparliamentary Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, held in Brussels, Belgium, from May 12 to 18, 1980. I had the privilege of serving as rapporteur of the Third Committee, dealing with humanitarian issues, as well as being a member of the Canadian delegation, along with Senator Balfour and three members of the House of Commons.

We prepared ourselves for this conference by holding intensive briefings, which helped us a great deal in preparing a text of draft resolutions of our own, covering all three committees, plus the follow-up questions.

As we arrived in Brussels last May, we sensed an atmosphere of apprehension and expected a stormy and even inconclusive meeting. Without exaggeration, international relations at that time were going through perhaps the most dangerous period since World War II. A few months earlier, Soviet troops had invaded Afghanistan. Détente was chilled and a new cold war was beginning to develop. With American hostages still prisoners in Iran, the Soviet military build-up accelerating, the Western alliance strained, prospects for détente, and even peace, were indeed dim.

Many delegates wondered whether this meeting would produce concrete results and provide a helpful input to the forthcoming November inter-governmental CSCE review meeting in Madrid, or whether our conference would lead to more confrontation and a breakdown in the CSCE process.

The Canadian delegation entered the Brussels conference well prepared, with the dual objectives of keeping the CSCE process alive and maintaining our strong position on such questions as the principles of security, economic co-operation, and especially human rights.

The Canadian delegation played an active role in the debates, drafting groups and informal sessions. Our draft resolutions were submitted to the conference and, owing in part to the fact that Canada was represented well on all of the committees and drafting groups, our interests were fully taken into account.

We expressed the hope that the Brussels conference would be a positive contribution to the forthcoming Madrid Review Conference. We strongly felt that it was necessary to reaffirm the commitment to peace, security and justice, that détente should be regarded as indivisible, and that the principles contained in the Helsinki Final Act should be implemented in their entirety. We emphasized in our interventions that Principle Seven, dealing with human rights, was most important, and that it was necessary to reaffirm this and other obligations contained in the Final Act so that the CSCE process could go forward.

In a speech to the plenary session, one of our delegates emphasized that the principle underlying all the others was respect for the sovereignty of states and for agreements and commitments made. Mr. Frank Hamilton, one of the three members of the House of Commons on the Canadian delegation, focussed on the question of economic co-operation, and particularly on the role of food in European and world relations. He stressed that the production and distribution of food was a major factor in attempts to promote stability, co-operation and security, and he went on to warn us that the food situation in the world would approach crisis dimensions within the next 20 years.

The effectiveness of the work of the Canadian delegation in the committees and drafting groups may be judged from the progress that was made in our deliberations and final resolutions. For example, the First Committee drafting group helped to secure new clauses on human rights and hostage-taking; our activities in the Second Committee drafting group led to the incorporation of new language on business contacts and information; while the Third Committee drafting group helped to gain acceptance for strengthened wording on family re-unification and new clauses concerning religious groups and the protection of authors' rights, introduced by Mr. R. Gourd. All of these were submitted by the Canadian delegation, and our success in the Second Committee drafting group was due mainly to the efforts of Senator Balfour.

In the working group on the Follow-up Committee, the Canadian draft resolution provided the basic text for discussion and drafting. After heated discussions and brinkmanship tactics by the U.S.S.R. delegation, the Brussels Conference produced agreement on a set of concluding resolutions arrived at by consensus.

I believe the preamble to the concluding resolutions adequately reflected parliamentarians' assessment of the current European and world situation. It noted the recent deterioration in international relations and urged those states guilty of armed intervention against other sovereign states—such as the invasion of Afghanistan by the U.S.S.R.—and violations of human rights, to end them without delay, and adopt global and indivisible détente as the objective for the states participating in the CSCE process. At the same time it declared itself for the continuation of the CSCE process in all appropriate ways, and stressed the significance of holding the Madrid Conference on the appointed date.

The concluding resolutions of the First Committee, dealing with security, détente and disarmament, reaffirmed the absolute validity of the ten basic principles of the Helsinki Final Act, called on the Madrid Review Conference to work out a mandate for a conference on military aspects of security and disarmament, and stated that such a conference should be an integral part of the CSCE process. It contained a list of confidence-building measures which could possibly be agreed upon by the CSCE states. These included, among others, measures to reduce considerably the threshold of notification of, and the ceiling for, military maneuvres; to reduce the threshold of notification of major troop movements, and of all major military manoeuvres; to refrain from carrying out multinational manoeuvres in certain zones, according to agreed criteria; to initiate regulations on the international transfer of conventional weapons; to seek the definition of a valid method of assessing the degree of balance of military forces and installations in Europe with a view to the progressive reduction of their level; and to expand the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act to include wider and more binding measures enforceable in defined geographical areas.

This set of concluding resolutions was also notable for two considerable advances on the final text of the 1978 Vienna Conference, namely, several clauses stressing the importance of respect for human rights and the rights of national minorities, and a new paragraph calling on parliaments and governments to co-operate, in accordance with international law, in combating the taking of hostages and all other acts of terrorism.

The concluding resolutions of the Second Committee, which dealt with co-operation in the field of economics, science, technology and environmental problems, were very similar to the text agreed on in Vienna, although with some updating and additions. The main new features included a recommendation to governments to ensure economic co-operation and development of trade "on a mutually advantageous basis", strengthened clauses on the provision of business information and new items dealing with improvements in business contacts, co-operation between the European Economic Community and the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance, and future meetings on energy and transport. It also noted the importance of extensive exchanges of information on energy matters as a basis for closer international co-operation in this field.

The concluding resolutions of the Third Committee, on co-operation in humanitarian and other fields, contained sections on contacts between people, information and culture, which represent a reinforcement of the Vienna text. The provisions on family visits, family reunification and bi-national marriages were not only reaffirmed, but improved. The same is true for the sections on fees charged for passports, the gradual elimination of administrative and financial obstacles to travel, access to information for the general public, facilitation of the work of journalists and improvement of the possibilities for cultural exchanges. There were also new clauses dealing with such matters as contacts among religious and other groups, and also the protection of authors' rights, which did not appear in the final text of the Vienna Conference, but which were submitted at this meeting by the Canadian delegation and adopted unanimously.

The committee on follow-up to the conference recommended that the concluding resolutions be conveyed to parliaments and governments, so that they may be taken into account in the preparatory work on the CSCE meeting in Madrid, and it also advocated various ways of continuing the CSCE process at the inter-parliamentary level.

So, after six days of intensive work and stormy sessions, we breathed a sigh of relief. We overcame many difficulties posed by the hard line stance and brinkmanship of the U.S.S.R. delegation. Maybe it was through the knowledge that some common ground could be found, despite the serious state of international relations, or maybe through the realization that east-west relations being so poor, an extra effort was needed to prevent a total break-up and its awful consequences, that a consensus was reached in the final hour of the conference, just before the closing of the plenary session.

All the concluding resolutions, however, were adopted unanimously, and I am happy to say that progress was made in many provisions of the Helsinki Final Act. The final text was a definite improvement over the one passed at the III Interparliamentary Conference held in Vienna two years earlier. Therefore, the Brussels concluding resolutions should provide a very useful input to the preparations and deliberations of the governmental Madrid review meeting which is to begin on November 11.

Since this UPU meeting on the CSCE, some senators and MPs have spoken at meetings of representatives of ethno-cultural organizations and the ethnic press, which is greatly interested in the monitoring process and the forthcoming Madrid review meeting.

In its efforts to meet concerns expressed by parliamentarians and the interested public, the government decided to have a subcommittee of the House of Commons Committee on External Affairs and National Defence hold special hearings. Senators were invited to attend these hearings, and three or four senators did take an active interest in this work and contributed to the writing of the report.

The committee received 115 submissions and heard 71 witnesses from various organizations, corporations and governmental bodies who came with interesting and constructive comments during 47 hearings. An overwhelming majority of witnesses urged that the Canadian delegation take a strong stand in defending all of the aspects of human rights and seek to promote a balanced approach to détente. In particular, we were asked to press for a thorough review of the implementation of all the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act, and to elaborate a satisfactory final document, reconfirming the commitments made by the signatory countries, without exception.

One very interesting and, indeed, desirable recommendation called for the establishment of an international monitoring committee as part of an on-going follow-up process.

The Amnesty International brief called on the Canadian government to make a serious effort to ensure that the Madrid concluding document contain a definite reference to the legitimacy of citizens' monitoring groups.

• (1530)

The representatives of the Lithuanian and Latvian organizations expressed great concern over the erosion of the national identity of their former homelands due to the great influx of Russians into these countries, and the efforts of the U.S.S.R. authorities to "Russify" their culture and language.

Other ethno-cultural organizations asked us to plead forcefully on behalf of the persecuted human rights activists, prisoners of conscience, and separated spouses and families.

Representations were made by businessmen to strengthen our trade commissioner service in eastern Europe and to increase assistance to Canadian companies which are trying to improve our trade with eastern European countries, for example, by greater Canadian participation in foreign trade fairs.

The role of Radio Canada International was also reviewed, and opinions were expressed that this government agency should be given more resources to expand its broadcasting to the U.S.S.R. and eastern Europe.

The subcommittee also turned its attention to Canada's responsibilities in fulfilling its commitments to the Helsinki

Final Act by urging Parliament and government to enhance women's rights to equality, such as equal pay for work of equal value, equal job opportunities, equal treatment when marrying outside their native group, equal benefits under the law, and to accelerate the processing of reunification of spouses.

I recommend to honourable senators the report of the subcommittee, which was tabled in the other place yesterday afternoon. This report, consisting of 51 paragraphs, includes 30 recommendations that our Canadian delegations should take into account at their meeting at Madrid. I believe this report is a comprehensive one and that it faithfully reflects the views of our witnesses. It should serve as a useful guide to our delegation.

Honourable senators, I hope you will also have the opportunity of reading the minutes of the proceedings of that committee, for they really shed a great deal of light on the views of various ethno-cultural organizations and business corporations, especially the concerns of various sectors of the Canadian people as to the continuing development of that process and, in particular, the violations which have been committed by certain signatory countries.

We should also exert our influence as parliamentarians to ensure that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the official delegation to the Madrid review meeting, which begins on November 11, maintain a very vigilant position, as so many attempts are being made by the Soviet bloc delegations to curtail the review of the implementation of the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act. Unfortunately, to this day, the preparatory meetings which began on September 9 in Madrid are at an impasse, having failed to reach an agreement on an agenda and a method of procedure for the review meeting.

Honourable senators, the Helsinki Final Act is basically a solemn, international compact freely negotiated between the U.S.S.R. and the other states of Europe as well as Canada and the U.S.A. The agreements reached at Helsinki have become a beacon of hope for human rights compaigners and those who are working to improve co-operation in the economic, environmental and cultural fields in Europe, to which we are so closely tied. This international compact, which was born in Helsinki, must not be allowed to die in Madrid. I, therefore, urge honourable senators to join in this noble effort to ensure peace and justice.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Haidasz a question of elaboration?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: I understand that he may well be, or is expected to be, a delegate to Madrid; is that correct?

Senator Haidasz: Yes.

Senator Frith: I heard the news reports which Senator Haidasz referred to. Does he feel able—both in terms of having the necessary information and opinion to do so, and of the appropriateness of his doing so—to elaborate on two matters? This is in the context of the news reports and the wrangling which is going on in Madrid which, in turn, follows some analysts' opinions that the Soviet Union will use the Madrid Conference to make it the last conference and thereby undermine the Helsinki Final Act. Does Senator Haidasz feel that the subject of the report that he has just given, and the decisions made at Brussels, lay the foundation for us to answer this threat?

My question is: Does he think there is any reality to the threat that the Soviet Union will try to undermine the Helsinki Final Act by the Madrid meeting, and does he think the meeting in Brussels laid any foundation to prevent that happening?

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, in reply to the questions posed by Senator Frith, I must say that I am not in a position to say what the intentions of the U.S.S.R. will be in the future, as far as the continuing process of the CSCE review is concerned. Of course, several analysts think that the whole CSCE process may die in Madrid, but some of them, however, are saying that the U.S.S.R. is really biding its time, waiting for the results of the elections in the U.S.A. before deciding what its next step will be, this depending on who will be chosen as the next President of the United States.

As far as the second part of the question is concerned, both the concluding document of the IPU Conference on the CSCE which took place in Brussels, as well as the report of the subcommittee which was tabled yesterday in the House of Commons, strongly urge all parliaments and governments to continue their efforts to have regular follow-up conferences and I hope this will be the case.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other honourable senator rises to speak, or wishes to adjourn the debate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Jack Marshall, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, November 5, 1980, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to examine and report upon the subject matter of the Statute Law (Military and Civilian War Pensions, Compensation and Allowances) Amendment Act, 1980, Chapter 19, Statutes of Canada, 1980, and any regulation that may be made thereunder.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): May we have an explanation?

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, you will recall that on July 10, 14 and 15 we debated Bill C-40, to reduce the burden on widows of surviving war pensioners and the qualifications for a pension below the 48 per cent level. We agreed unanimously in order to allow time for the administrative process, that the bill should receive Royal Assent without delay, which it did on July 17. We did that on the condition that in the fall the subject matter of the legislation could be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. In that way, we could delve into the clauses of the bill that were contentious and which we still feel are unfair.

• (1540)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Marshall for that explanation, and I do recall what he has said. I suggest we adopt the motion, and I defer, for further explanation, to Senator Lafond.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I have no further explanation. It seems to me that what Senator Marshall has proposed is the normal procedure of the Senate on a subject of great importance. The subject of the study is evident from the title of the legislation. I think the Senate should adopt this motion immediately.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would remind you that, in accordance with a motion that was adopted earlier, the Senate will reassemble next week on Wednesday, November 12, 1980, at 2 p.m. Tuesday is Remembrance Day, and the House of Commons will sit neither on that day nor on Monday.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, November 12, 1980, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 12, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Revised Report of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C. 1970.

Copies of Agreement between Canada and France on Social Security, signed at Ottawa, February 9, 1979, together with Order in Council P.C. 1980-2859, dated October 23, 1980, approving same.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CABINET

ABSENCE OF MINISTERS FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we had questions for the ministers but I can see they are not here today. In the circumstances, I doubt that it was advisable to have the Senate meet this week only today and tomorrow, just for the convenience of committees. Apparently, the ministers, and probably the government, do not consider these days as important. So they stay away. The Deputy Leader of the Government can perhaps give us some explanation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Yes, honourable senators, the Senate was convened today not only for the convenience of committees. I think Senator Argue is in town. He is here today. I do not know what keeps him away from the Senate at the moment.

Senator Perrault has other engagements in his home province.

I believe Senator Olson is also in Ottawa, and I am sorry he is not here now.

I am quite willing to take questions and transmit them to the appropriate department.

Senator Flynn: This is disgraceful. One cannot say they are overly concerned about their responsibilities towards the Senate.

THE CONSTITUTION

STATUS OF REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for someone who is here, namely, the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. My question, which I think I raised some days ago, is this: When may we expect the report from his committee on the work that they were doing this summer, and what is the reason for the delay in its submission to this chamber?

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, the report was finally approved in substance and it is in the hands of our Parliamentary Counsel and staff for completion. We found quite a number of errors in translation. I expect to be able to present that report any time, but obviously it will not be this week. I will speak to the Parliamentary Counsel again today, but it is out of my hands and out of the hands of the subcommittee. The remaining work has to be done in order to present the report in proper language and style.

Senator Flynn: Will it be presented before December 9?

Senator Goldenberg: If the Leader of the Opposition insists that I present it after that date, I will be glad to consider accommodating him.

Senator Flynn: I am not the one to insist on that, but I hope that nobody else will.

Senator Goldenberg: I assure honourable senators that I will present the report as soon as it is ready, whether it be next week or the week after at the latest. That is my intention. I do not intend to hold it back.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary.

Is it the intention of Senator Goldenberg, who is chairman of that Senate committee, to appear as a witness before the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to table this report and explain to members of that committee the document prepared by him and his colleagues on the various subcommittees that sat last summer?

Is it his intention, before a decision is taken about patriation and the matter relating to the Senate, especially section 44, to appear before the committee as a witness in order to submit the views of the Senate as to the transformation of this chamber?

Senator Goldenberg: No, I do not intend to do so, because the report will not be a Senate report, but rather a committee report.

Senator Asselin: A Senate committee report?

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Goldenberg: A Senate committee report, yes, but not necessarily approved by the Senate.

[English]

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the same chairman another question. Having in mind the fact that members of the subcommittee were requested to, and did, act very vigorously in order to produce a report during the summer, and then particularly to have it ready for submission immediately after the First Ministers' Conference in early September was completed, why is it that nearly two months have gone by since that conference and we still have not received the committee's report?

Senator Goldenberg: For reasons which Senator Smith, as a member of the committee, should know. He attended meetings of the committee and knows that various changes were suggested, and when changes are made they have to be carried out in both languages. I assure Senator Smith that our Parliamentary Counsel, and the translators, who created some difficulties for other reasons, have been working at it steadily. I can assure honourable senators that there is no deliberate delay. If it is in the minds of some senators that I have been asked to delay the submission of that report, I want to correct that impression. As I have already said, I intend to submit the report as soon as it is handed to me in correct form by the people who are now working on it. I believe it is in the final stages.

• (1410)

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I might just comment that although it may be that I should and probably do know, I am not aware of any particular reason why it should be so long delayed.

Senator Goldenberg: If Senator Smith wants to check on my answer I give him permission to talk to Mr. du Plessis, our Parliamentary Counsel, and check with him. Perhaps he will believe Mr. du Plessis when he shows the honourable senator why the report has not yet been presented.

Senator Smith: I suppose the honourable senator and I can exchange pleasantries of this kind for quite a while. At least, I feel some coming on myself. If he would like to indulge himself further I can probably keep up with him. However, I don't know that I have to get his consent to ask the Law Clerk anything I happen to want to ask him. What he may answer me is, of course, another question.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, at the last committee meeting the members present unanimously agreed that the chairman should proceed as quickly as possible and present to the Senate the final report of the committee. You even said at that time, Mr. Chairman, that you would act as quickly as possible in order to incorporate the changes which had been made at the last meeting and that you would table the report before the Senate as soon as possible.

Senator Asselin: Just answer!

Senator Goldenberg: That was not a question; it was a statement of fact, was it not?

[English]

THE CABINET

ABSENCE OF MINISTERS FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise to solicit the good offices of the Deputy Leader of the Government with respect to the missing cabinet ministers. Question Period is one of the most invigorating and, I think, productive periods we have in this house.

Senator Walker: Inspirational.

Senator Roblin: It sometimes inspires questions. I am not so sure that it does much else in the inspirational line. We are looking forward to the chance of asking some questions of the two ministers, not the Leader of the Government, on this occasion. I wonder if it is possible for us to proceed to other business, send out a whip to find out where these two laggards are, and when they get back here we could return to Question Period and pose the matters we wish to secure information on.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in rising to deal with that question, I do not want to seem to adopt what seems to me to be a rather unparliamentary description of ministers of the Crown. I am sure the expression was used humorously.

Senator Roblin: I never use unparliamentary expressions. Well, hardly ever, and certainly not on this occasion. When I describe them as laggards, that, they obviously are.

Senator Frith: That may seem obvious to the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. The question of their presence here, or their absence here—

Senator Flynn: That is more precise.

Senator Frith: —as leading necessarily to conclusions or inferences of the type drawn by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition is, of course, for him. I am in a position, as has happened on previous occasions, including the period when honourable gentlemen opposite sat on this side, when for some reason a minister or ministers are not here, to take any questions as notice and refer them to the ministers. I also have some briefing that might enable me to answer some questions. I suggest, with respect, that we proceed with Question Period. I will take questions, as is often done, as notice, attempt to answer them, or refer them and see that honourable senators get answers as soon as possible.

● (1415)

If it turns out later on today that one or both ministers appear, I certainly would not oppose reverting to Question Period, but I cannot undertake to send someone out to get them while we proceed with other business. I again underline that I am briefed, to some extent, and am happy—indeed eager—to handle any questions I can and forward those I cannot to the government.

Senator Flynn: If you are eager, that worries me.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

THE BUDGET—WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

Hon. Lowell Murray: In that case, I wonder if the deputy leader could consult his brief to tell the Senate which minister will be responsible for the Western Development Fund?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): My brief will not give that answer, but I will undertake to get one.

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the deputy leader. It has to do with the petition that Senator Godfrey presented earlier today with respect to the Royal Canadian Legion. Could the deputy leader tell us when this bill will be presented to the Senate, and how it will be dealt with?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I understand that this petition was not presented on behalf of the government. Senator Godfrey presented this petition for a private bill, and with the permission of the Senate I will ask him to enlighten us.

Senator Godfrey: The bill will be presented tomorrow.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATES—INVESTIGATION OF CP RAIL

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am going to try the deputy leader out on his offer and find out how good his brief is. Could he tell us what the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board meant when, speaking in Winnipeg late last week to the Manitoba Pool Elevators, he said that a federal government plan to investigate CP Rail would be a necessary first step in the proposed task force study of the controversial Crowsnest rate situation?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will have to take that question as notice. So far, in spite of a lot of possible answers I have, no right question has come along.

Senator Murray: Give us the answers.

Senator Roblin: I will try again. Will he tell us whether it is the policy of the government that there should be a study conducted of CP Rail to investigate their continuing responsibility to transport grain at low statutory rates before any action is taken with respect to the Crowsnest rates situation?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I assume that if it were the policy of the government, it would have been either initiated by or concurred in by the minister concerned. I really believe that I should leave the question to him. I will see that this question and the previous one are brought to his attention.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I appreciate the answer given, but the whole point of the question is that that is what the minister said. I am really asking if the minister is speaking through the back of his head or if he is speaking on behalf of the government. I rather suspect it is the latter, because if he is true to form and lives up to his usual capacity to recognize the proprieties of a minister of the Crown, undoubtedly he is reflecting cabinet solidarity and is not freelancing. But I should like to get some confirmation of the situation.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, even if this third question were less rhetorical, I am sure that the honourable senator would not expect me to be able to answer any question relating particularly to the front or back of the minister's head, so I will pass the question along.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has a great capacity to answer questions, so I feel nothing is really passing him.

Senator Flynn: But not to answer questions.

Senator Roblin: Well, it is the same thing.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—RECAPITALIZATION

The Hon. the Speaker: Delayed answers to questions?

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I am sorry for being a little slow on my feet. I had not realized that all available questions had been exhausted or whether my colleagues had become discouraged in trying to ask them. I would suggest it was the latter.

I wanted to ask a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development, but I shall direct it now to the deputy leader, with his consent. I understand that the President of Canadian National Railways made a speech in Montreal last week in which he expressed some sentiments which seemed to be a little surprising to those of us who lived through the legislation recapitalizing the CNR.

● (1420)

I should like to draw attention to what it is the gentleman appears to have said and ask a question about it. Among other things, he appears to have said, referring to the CNR and its finances, that "if things are left essentially the way they are now, the CNR will be faced with the disagreeable necessity of returning to the bad old days of too much debt," and some similar comment to the general effect that the CNR "will soon need more capital than we can prudently raise."

Keeping in mind the extensive recapitalization of the CNR in 1952 and the even more extensive and very recent recapitalization of 1978 and the assurances then given as to the future of the CNR, I wonder if the honourable gentleman would be able to discover what it is that has now created the situation which the president feels may be something like the "bad old days of too much debt?" I ask that especially in view of the recapializations of 1952 and 1978.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will see that that question is directed to the attention of the minister concerned.

Senator Roblin: That's a pretty good score so far.

Senator Frith: I don't know what the scoring system is.

THE CABINET

ABSENCE OF MINISTERS FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the deputy leader. We have noticed the absence of the three ministers, and now I notice the absence of the Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. Does the deputy leader know of his whereabouts, and does he know if he has decided not to appear in the Senate for the Question Period?

Senator Asselin: He is not on duty today.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had not noticed that he was not in attendance. I spoke to him before the commencement of today's sitting, and I expected that he would be here. I, too, am surprised that he is not. I understand the committee is sitting this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Yes, at 3.30 p.m.

Senator Frith: Yes. So I don't know the answer to the question.

TRANSPORT

AIR CANADA—TARIFFS BETWEEN MAJOR CANADIAN CITIES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the deputy leader. He may have to take it as notice.

Last week I brought up the question of exorbitant increases over the past 10 years by Air Canada, and I understand from today's newspapers that a further increase is being requested. The Leader of the Government in the Senate, in response to my earlier question, indicated that he would get some information. It now becomes more urgent, in view of the increase announced yesterday by Air Canada, that some explanation be received from the Canadian Transport Commission as to whether or not it will be allowed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, without accepting the adjective "exorbitant"—or rejecting it, for that matter—if the information that Senator Marshall has brought to our attention is correct, then that is indeed good reason to try to get the answer to his earlier question as soon as possible.

Senator Flynn: Bravo! We now have one of the ministers in the chamber.

ENERGY

OIL SHORTAGES—PRECAUTIONARY MEASURES

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question that I had intended to address to the Minister of State for Economic Development. I would not demean the Deputy Leader of the Government by using him as a mere funnel, so I was not going to put my question. But I see that we now have the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board in the house, and since this is a matter on which he might have some information from his attendance at cabinet, I shall direct my question to him.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in the aftermath of Premier Lougheed's statements the other day, said that Canadians should not worry because—and this is what he said—"this country has enough friends worldwide who would supply Canada with its needs."

My question is: Can the minister, or either of them, tell us from what countries Canada has received any commitment that they are prepared to supply these additional needs?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I can tell the honourable senator that I have no information that would be helpful to him in endeavouring to reply to that question.

Senator Donahoe: A supplementary question.

I appreciate that the minister has no information, and he may have no information on this supplementary either, but perhaps he would agree to convey these questions to the minister in charge of economic development and get me an answer at a later time.

When he offered this assurance of the presence of so many generous friends around the world, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources must have had in mind a particular price which Canada could be expected to pay for that generosity. Would the minister indicate to us if that price is higher than either the existing price for Canadian drilled oil or the price requested by Alberta for the year 1981?

● (1425)

Senator Argue: I think it is pretty obvious, if I do not know about the source that might be involved and the countries that might be involved, there is no way I could know what the price might be. So I must give the same reply: If it is desired that I seek information from my colleague, the Minister of State for Economic Development, I shall be happy to pass on the question to him, or to the Minister of Energy.

Senator Donahoe: I have a final supplementary. Assuming that our friends abroad continue to be able to satisfy our energy needs, would the minister tell the Senate—and again I would hope he would refer this to the other minister—if the government has made calculations of the increase in the deficit which could be expected due to higher outflows from the Oil Import Compensation Fund?

Senator Argue: I suppose that calculation is one that would have been made, and I suppose it has been made. I am not really so pessimistic as to think that this cutback may be put in place, and may last a long time. However, that is a possibility. I shall pass that further supplementary on to the minister.

GRAIN

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—CONTROL OF FEED GRAINS

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Since the joint statement several weeks ago by the Advisory Committee of the Canadian Wheat Board and the Advisory Committee of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board to the effect that the membership of those boards unanimously favoured the placing of feed grains back under the complete control of the Canadian Wheat Board, has the minister received any representations from certain members of one or the other of those advisory committees suggesting that no unanimous agreement exists on this question?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Not to my knowledge or to my recollection. As far as I know—and I was at the meeting when the statement was made—there was certainly unanimity among all the members then present. I am not sure if all the members were there that day, but since that statement was made certain organizations and certain producers have said that they do not go along with it. But I think it should be kept in mind—and I know this is not exactly what the honourable senator has asked me—that this general agreement was based on two main considerations. There were several considerations, but there were two main ones. One was that there should be a security of supply of feed grains, and a method by which it could be taken off the market at reasonable prices. That is an important part of this agreement.

As far as the Canadian Livestock Feed Board advisers were concerned—this is the second part—they said that they supported the objective of feed grains going under the Canadian Wheat Board, but they wished to go back to their member organizations and check it out and get their further representations.

Senator Bielish: May I ask a supplementary question? It is my understanding that several members of the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee have publicly disavowed their support for a policy of placing feed grains back under the control of the Wheat Board. In the absence of unanimous agreement, would the minister tell us what he is intending to do to rectify current anomalies in the system without taking the drastic step of placing feed grains under the control of the Wheat Board.

Senator Argue: Well, I personally am not aware of any member of the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee who has disputed this agreement. I am not saying that that is not the case, but certainly all those who were at the meeting I mentioned supported it. Among those in attendance at that meeting were some whom I have come to know quite well, and who, if there was to be opposition, might well have shown it.

Obviously, there are some anomalies in this system, and one of them has been that the Canadian Wheat Board is forced to sell western feed grains in the eastern market at corn competitive prices. I am happy to report that at the present time the Canadian Wheat Board is not selling feed barley in the eastern market at corn competitive prices, and it has been agreed generally among the two boards and the officials here that during the present crop year the Canadian Wheat Board does not have to, and will not be obliged to, sell outside of the prairie area at corn competitive prices. The supplies of feed grains are pretty adequate in most parts of Canada.

● (1430)

Corn can come from the United States into both western and eastern Canada, so that anomaly has been removed. I believe that the advisers to the Canadian Wheat Board and the Canadian Livestock Feed Board were doing everyone a service when they came forward with this objective. A foundation of the objective is that there should be a system put in place whereby feed grains and surplus supply will be taken off the market at reasonable prices, preventing fire sale prices in the west and a relative advantage being given to prairie feed producers over feeders of livestock in other parts of the country. So that much of the anomaly has been removed.

Within the Grains Group there has been established what has been called the ad hoc committee on feed grains. That is not a policy committee. Its purpose is to look at the whole question of feed grains and their movement through the system, and to make suggestions as to what might be done under the current system to remove some of the anomalies that have been suggested from time to time, and to improve the situation. That report has not been finalized, but regular meetings have been, and are continuing to be, held and I would hope that apart from changing the policy itself, which is another issue, the committee might be able to come up with some practical suggestions to improve the present system.

Senator Bielish: Have the names of the members of the ad hoc committee been made public?

Senator Argue: Yes, they have, and I would be happy to bring the names to the honourable senator's attention. They have been made public.

CROWSNEST RATES—INVESTIGATION OF CP RAIL

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin may wish to repeat the question he asked earlier about the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Be careful. It might not be answered now.

Senator Frith: That's all right. I didn't have the answer, so they are no worse off.

Honourable senators, Senator Hays, the Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, is now in the chamber, and there may be questions to be directed to him. I might ask His Honour the Speaker whether he is prepared to give a ruling on what questions are appropriate to be asked of a committee chairman before that committee has reported.

[Senator Argue.]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, things are looking up all over. Two of our distinguished colleagues have decided to attend, and we are only two down. I would be glad to repeat my question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board because I know, from observing him, that he always has an answer, and I am sure he has an answer for this one.

I was referring to the speech that my honourable friend made in Winnipeg the other day about the Crowsnest rates, and the suggestion contained in the news report that it was a matter of government policy now that there should be an investigation of CP Rail to determine its responsibilities with respect to the movement of grain before any further action was taken in setting government policy on the Crow.

I would ask my honourable friend if that statement is correct. Is it a matter of government policy to have this further study of CP Rail before the Crow is dealt with?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I would have to divide that question into two parts. I will give the honourable senator the government's policy as I understand it. There will be an inquiry into CP Rail. That inquiry will go forward. That is my understanding. I find that it sometimes takes a lot of time for the decision to be implemented by the commencement of the inquiry.

I did not say in Winnipeg—and certainly I did not intend to say—that the inquiry necessarily had to take place and be completed before anything was done on the Crow rate. I was grilled on this. I was asked the question a dozen times. What I said was that the two, as far as I could understand, could be going on at the same time, but that I did not think action on the Crow rate necessarily depended upon the conclusion of the other. The two have not been linked that closely together in any conversations in which I have taken part.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his explanation. My question was prompted by this report:

● (1440)

> During a question period, Argue said such an investigation would be preliminary to further study to determine needed changes.

That obviously refers to changes in the Crow. I presume the minister is telling us now that that is not the case. Naturally, I accept his statement on the matter.

Senator Argue: I do not know which one would come first. I would expect they would be likely to be going on at the same time.

Senator Roblin: Well, it seems to me, if I may offer a comment, that if the government is going to have an investigation of CP Rail in connection with their responsibility towards freight rates, then manifestly they should have it before they deal with the Crow, otherwise they may find that they have made the wrong decision. I offer that piece of advice to the minister.

I would like to ask another question. If there is going to be an investigation of CP Rail, would my honourable friend undertake—and I gather from what he said that he does not have the information now—to tell us what form this investigation will take, when it will take place, and what the terms of reference will be.

Senator Argue: Well, I will be very happy to give that information, whenever the decision is made and whenever it is made public. As far as I know the precise date as to when the inquiry might commence, or even the composition of the commission, have not yet been determined. However, I do believe the principle of having an inquiry has been determined, and there will be an inquiry. That is the way I understand it.

Senator Roblin: I thank my friend, but I ask him to clarify for the Senate, the next time we meet, this relationship between the CP Rail inquiry and the Crow inquiry. He leaves me with the impression that they might come at the same time and, then, that they might not. What is the policy of the government going to be? Perhaps he could tell us the sequence of events.

Senator Argue: Well, I will make this commitment to the honourable senator. As soon as that sequence is known, and has become a matter of government policy, I will be happy to bring it to my honourable friend's attention, but as far as concerns his request today that I obtain the information and bring it here, I am not sure that I will be able to bring it here in the short time available.

Senator Roblin: I want my honourable friend to understand the dilemma in which he places some of us. He has, in one way or another, related this inquiry to the settlement of the Crow. It is important to find out exactly what he means in connection with this matter, because if he means the government is going to study CP Rail independent of the Crow rate decision, that is one thing. If he says they are going to discuss it at the same time as the Crow, that is another thing. If he says they are going to study it before they decide on the Crow, that is yet another thing. I think we need clarification of the government's policy as to which of these three alternatives—and there may be others—the governent intends to pursue.

I repeat: in connection with that I would like to know, when my honourable friend knows, how the investigation is going to be handled; what the terms of reference are going to be; when it is going to be; and who the investigators are going to be.

Senator Argue: As soon as a decision has been made as to how it is going to be undertaken, as to what person or persons are going to make the inquiry and so on, I will certainly bring that to the honourable senator's attention. I do not think there is any need to repeat what I have already said. I have given all the facts I know.

Senator Roblin: We just want a few more, that's all.

Senator Argue: That is all right. As soon as they are available I will bring them here as fast as I can get them, but, as you know, the various decisions I have talked about this afternoon are decisions that have been made. The precise timing is not known to me, and as far as I know that decision has not been made. I think the two things are associated, but I am in no position to say that you have to have one fully concluded before you do something with regard to the other. I am not sure that that is the way it is going to be.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps I owe it to my honourable friend to explain that when I was discussing this matter with the deputy leader, I asked him whether what the honourable senator said in Winnipeg represented government policy, or something else. I am afraid I was indelicate enough to say that I considered that he was talking out of the back of his head, though I did not really believe it, knowing my honourable friend the way I do. However, I do tell him that this matter of the study—not so much the study, but of the association with the Crow—and the timing of the Crow decisions, which are now becoming very critical, have raised a great many eyebrows with respect to what government policy is. So while my honourable friend tells me that he does not know what it is at the moment, I do urge upon him the necessity of having a decision very soon.

Senator Argue: I am not at all concerned about eyebrows being raised. I think that to get eyebrows raised in the right place might be very beneficial for all concerned. I have not talked about anything for a long time that has wider support than an inquiry into CP Rail. Even the friends of CP think it is a good thing to have it all out in the open. I think it is a very constructive thing to do.

Senator Roblin: We wait for the answers with much interest. I am not arguing with my honourable friend about the desirability; that is another debate. I do say, however, that we are entitled to know what the policy is, particularly in view of his last statement.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTIONS RESPECTING PROCEDURE—SPEAKER'S RULING ON POINT OF ORDER RESERVED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I asked the Clerk of the Senate to research the question raised by the Leader of the Opposition, and he has done so. For my own part, I examined the rules and tried to understand exactly what they mean. The Clerk and I met today and compared notes, with the intention of providing a written ruling tomorrow.

Unless honourable senators insist that I give my ruling today, I think I will reserve it until tomorrow.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—TELEVISING OF PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not know if this question will be objected to by the deputy leader, but I would ask the joint chairman of the special joint committee whether or not the decision not to televise the proceedings of the committee is final.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That question clearly deals with the activities of the committee and, for what it is worth, my opinion is that it is a perfectly proper question.

Hon. Harry Hays: To answer the question by the Leader of the Opposition, the ball is now in the House of Commons' court, and we are awaiting their decision. There has been no change insofar as the committee is concerned. We voted not to televise the proceedings, and that is the way it stands at the moment.

Senator Flynn: The honourable joint chairman says that the ball is in the House of Commons' court. Would he explain that to me? I am not too sure what exactly he has in mind.

Senator Hays: I should say "both houses." I suppose that they would have to indicate that the proceedings of the committee should be televised, and probably that would imply, that the Senate would have to make the same sort of ruling.

Senator Flynn: You are not referring to the fact that the House of Commons has more influence on the committee than the Senate? Of course, as we know, it has more members.

Senator Hays: I would hope that that will never be the case.

While I am on my feet, honourable senators, I should like to announce that over the weekend Senator Bielish was greatly honoured in the Province of Alberta. They are going to hang her photograph in the Agricultural Hall of Fame. We are very proud of her.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

THE BUDGET—WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board could help me with a question that I put earlier to the Deputy Leader of the Government, when I asked him who will be the minister responsible for the Western Development Fund.

I might ask a related question of the minister of state as to whether the Western Development Fund will be used for new projects in the area of economic development in western Canada, or whether that fund will be used to finance existing commitments, such as development at Prince Rupert, the purchase of new hopper cars, and so on.

● (1450)

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I am not sure who will disburse the funds. I am not even clear whether the $4 billion or the $2 billion, depending on the time period, would have to be lodged with one department, then to be apportioned among others. It may possibly be apportioned among departments where it is to be spent without its being handed first to some entity of the government. This strikes me as being a very sensible approach, but I am not an authority on how these things are done.

I am not in a position to answer the other part of my honourable friend's question as to whether this will be additional money over and above anything that has already been allocated to that area. However, I will give him my opinion, which may be a little dangerous, but I will do it anyway.

Senator Flynn: You're used to it.

Senator Argue: As I said, I am trying to give a frank answer to a question that I think is important.

Senator Asselin: We have only frank answers here.

Senator Argue: I would think that if the fund is to be of the kind required to help western Canada, under all the circumstances it would not be very helpful if the objective were that this fund should replace all the other assistance that has been provided in the past. Then it would just be a question of bookkeeping—moving the figures around.

My own impression and belief is that it is to be a real thing, and it is to add, in a general way, to the benefit of western Canada. I am not going to try and define what this means for any specific item such as extra hopper cars because there may be some variation as to whether part of an item was used before. Generally, as to principle, I feel that the endeavour will result in some additional benefits to western Canada.

OFFICIAL REPORT (HANSARD)

COST OF PRINTING MONTHLY APPENDIX

Hon. Allister Grosart: My question to the Deputy Leader of the Government relates to the publication known as the Debates of the Senate, Volume 128, Number 58, for last Thursday, in which I find some 24 pages with some printing on them—some more than others—starting with "Appendix". This is all after the report of the adjournment. Would the Deputy Leader of the Government inform the Senate of the total cost of those 24 pages and the cost per page in view of the fact that some of them have more blank space than printing on them?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will endeavour to obtain the information the honourable senator seeks.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—SENATE PROCEDURE FOLLOWING PRESENTATION OF REPORT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this answer may give rise to some further questions. I want to make it clear that I am not bringing this answer forward with a view to inhibiting in any way such further questions. This is an answer which I offer as the result of questions asked by Senators Grosart, Everett and Smith on November 5, 1980, with reference to the procedure for considering the proposed resolution when that matter comes back to us as a result of a report from the special joint committee.

I wish to remind honourable senators that there exists a three-stage procedure. The establishment of the special joint committee is the first stage. The second stage is the consideration of the proposed resolution by the special joint committee, which is the stage we are at now; and the third stage is the review and, if considered appropriate, approval of the work of the joint committee by both houses.

There is a possible fourth stage where the government might introduce a final resolution for a Joint Address. However, that depends very much on the report of the special joint committee and the subsequent consideration of its report by both the House of Commons and the Senate.

If there is a motion to return the report to the committee recommending certain amendments, it would have to be approved by both houses, of course, whether it originated in the Senate or in the other place.

The terms of reference of the special joint committee specify that it submit a report, not that it report "from time to time." It would, however, be possible for the special joint committee in its report to request an extension of its mandate. This, of course, would have to be approved by both houses.

To answer a question put by Senator Everett, the formulation of the resolution for a Joint Address will depend a great deal on the recommendations contained in the report of the special joint committee.

To Senator Smith's question as to whether it is necessary to have a resolution for a Joint Address carried by the Senate to that effect, I would reply that, of course, it is necessary, but that final resolution need not necessarily be moved by a separate motion. This, again, depends a great deal on the nature of the report of the special joint committee.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is this reply based on the rules of the House of Commons, the rules of the Senate, or on no rules at all, but merely on practice and custom?

Senator Frith: My understanding, honourable senators, is that this answer is based on the rules and practices of this chamber.

Hon. Allister Grosart: As I asked the original question, perhaps I should now ask a supplementary. Would the deputy leader not agree that he has skipped one very important stage in his outline of the three stages? Surely the stages are: the establishment of the committee; the consideration by the committee; the report of the committee, which is entirely separate from what he calls the third stage; and then the consideration of the report in the Senate. One obvious reason for this is that the committee might not report the reference at all. Therefore, I feel that the stages, as he gives them to us, are inadequate and form part of the confusion that is obviously in his mind.

The deputy leader has said that the decision as to whether there will be a resolution passed for a Joint Address to Her Majesty depends on the report of the committee. Of course, it does not. It does not matter what the committee reports because it can only recommend to the Senate what the Senate should do. It cannot be regarded as, or even deemed to be, a decision of the Parliament of Canada to send a Joint Address to Her Majesty. All the committee can do is say to the Senate, "This is what you should do." Surely the deputy leader will agree that at some point subsequent to discussion—no matter what results from the discussion of the report and whether it is sent back—the Parliament of Canada must decide to do something. Surely it will not be sufficient for the Parliament of Canada to say, "All right, go ahead; we are not going to pass any resolution; we merely say to Her Majesty, 'By the way, one of our committees brought in a report and the Parliament of Canada has agreed with it.' "

Surely the deputy leader would agree that there must be a fifth or even a sixth stage when the Parliament of Canada says, "We will do what the committee recommended," or "We will not do what the committee recommended." Would he not agree that there must be that stage which is completely separate and subsequent to whatever disposition is made of the report of the joint committee?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, of course, Senator Grosart is quite right that there is a stage which I think is implied in the answer. If this was not perfectly clear, I am glad that he has given me an opportunity to clarify my answer.

• (1500)

Of course, there is the stage of report. I agree with Senator Grosart that perhaps the words used here are ambiguous or could give rise to misunderstanding. The words used were "approval of the work" and I think it would have been better to use the words "consideration of the report." He is quite right in underlining that that would be the better way to describe it, although it was included in the language used.

On the second point as to whether it depends on the report of the committee whether there is a resolution, perhaps I ought to have given Senator Grosart a copy of this statement because it is sometimes hard to follow the context of an expression when it is just being given one time orally. What the statement said depended very much on the report of the special joint committee as the possible fourth stage—that is, a separate final resolution being introduced. If the impression was created that the Senate could not make such a move and could not present such a resolution except with the permission of the committee, I entirely agree with him there. Of course, that is not correct.

With reference to the third part of his question—that is, whether there must be an entirely separate stage—I cannot agree that that is so. I would be interested in exploring that possibility, and perhaps we are just at odds in the matter of terminology. If he means that a Joint Address must have the assent of the Senate, and in some form, consistent with the rules of the Senate, it must be clear that the Senate has resolved that such an Address go forward, then I agree with him on that also.

Senator Flynn: Does the deputy leader agree, whatever his statement might mean in practice, that it does not bind the Senate or the Speaker? I have another question. Does he not agree that the Senate could set its own rules with regard to this resolution and the way to deal with it?

Senator Frith: On the first question, my answer would be yes.

On the second question, I do not think there is any suggestion here, and should not be any suggestion anywhere, that the Senate cannot amend its own rules.

Senator Flynn: So the answer is yes to both questions.

Senator Frith: The only reason the second answer was a little longer was because I wanted to be sure there was not an implication or inference beyond that.

Senator Grosart: You can never be sure.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the deputy leader arising out of his comments and the statement he read. I agree with him, of course, that hearing a statement of that complexity read once may not allow the listener to grasp really what is in it, and I may be in that position as one of the listeners. However, I thought I heard him say, during his reading of the statement, words to the effect that it might be possible that the final resolution containing the loyal address might not have to be separate, but could be part of something else, although it might well be separate. I am rather puzzled as to what it possibly could be part of, and, if it were not separate, perhaps the honourable gentleman would help me with that one.

Senator Frith: The word "separate" was used with reference to the word "stage", and what I said was that in my opinion there must be something that can be clearly an adoption by the Senate of the Joint Address and a resolution that it go forward consistent with the rules of the Senate. I was only saying that I did not want to be tied down to the question of a stage. I think that Senator Grosart and I understand each other on this, and it is a matter of terminology.

Senator Grosart: With due respect, it is not just a matter of terminology. It is a matter of fundamental principle. I was happy when the deputy leader said that we understood each other, but now it is obvious that we do not. The point I am making is surely there must be a separate stage, absolutely regardless of what this joint committee does. If it is the intention to send an Address to Her Majesty, the government can introduce a resolution that there be an Address regardless of what has gone on before. The government might wish to send it even if the committee recommended against it. There is nothing to stop the government from doing that. So I am asking if there is to be a separate stage when, if it is the wish of the government, the Parliament of Canada will be asked to send an Address worded in the usual way to Her Majesty.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not want to get into an exchange of opinions on the meaning of the word "stage", but I do want to underline my understanding that what goes forward with reference to a Joint Address will have to be by a decision by the Senate consistent with its rules and practices, and with precedents that apply to Joint Addresses.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Grosart: If we stick to that, we will have no problems.

Senator Frith: That is subject, of course, to the fact, as the Leader of the Opposition said, that the Senate might amend its rules. But it will be consistent with the rules and practices then existing.

Senator Smith: On that point perhaps I might be permitted to make a further observation, which is partially in the way of a question, and partially, I readily admit, not in the way of a question and, therefore, is not strictly in order. Would the deputy leader be able to recall, or, if not, by having some research done for him, that in the past the form which has been concurred in by the Senate has simply been a resolution resolving that whatever it is be sent to the Sovereign, whether it be Her Majesty the Queen or, as in earlier days, His Majesty the King, and having attached to it the proposed text which the Sovereign was asked to lay before the Parliament at Westminster. It seems to me there are literally dozens of precedents, some of which I have looked at more recently, and I see nothing there which should cause any difficulty. The only difference between those precedents and this situation is that here there has been an intermediate step placed between the two stages which previously followed one another. Once that intermediate stage—that is, consideration by the committee and the report of the committee—is finished, then surely everything else reverts to the same procedure as was always the case.

I would ask the deputy leader if he would perhaps give that problem some thought, and respond later. I find a great deal of difficulty in understanding why, once the report of the joint committee has been received, there should be any difference in procedure from what has hitherto been the case. It has always been straightforward when the matter came properly before either house—that is, putting the resolution, debating it, and amending it or doing whatever the house wanted to do with it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I accept the invitation to study further the previous practices, but I do not want to leave the question without repeating the fact that the intention is to proceed in accordance with the rules and practices of this chamber.

Senator Flynn: Even the new rules.

PRIVATE BILLS

MONTILAC LTD. AND SOCAM LTD.—SECOND READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the second reading of Bill S-13, to revive Montilac Ltd. and Socam Ltd.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, this is a bill to revive two private companies, both of which were originally incorporated under the Canada Corporations Act.

As the petitioner owns both companies, it was decided that it would be preferable to introduce only one bill for the two companies. To give you a better understanding of the situation, I shall be happy to summarize the history of these two companies and the facts leading to the cancellation of their charter.

Montilac Ltd. and Socam Ltd., each having its principal place of business in the City of Laval, in Quebec, were incorporated on March 4, 1963 and September 18, 1963 respectively, for the purposes and objects set out in their letters patent.

Montilac Ltd. is a small commercial loan company and—

[English]

—Socam Ltd. is a holding company that receives and collects on behalf of doctors who are anaesthetists.

[Translation]

In 1976, the accountants of these two companies submitted their respective income tax returns to the Department of National Revenue, but the department refused these returns on the grounds that both companies had been dissolved in 1967 for failure to file with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, for three consecutive years, the annual information return required under the Canada Corporations Act.

Following some inquiries it was proven that the notices requesting filing of annual returns had not been brought to the attention of the directors and officers of the companies, but had instead been sent to the lawyer who had acted on behalf of the promoters of both companies when they were incorporated. As this lawyer had retired from practice, the companies had never been informed of these notices.

Of course, the notices were also published in the Canada Gazette in June 1966 but were not seen by the officers of the companies, and consequently the directors never learned that the companies had in fact been dissolved and they continued to carry on the business of the companies.

In May 1976, the public curator of the Province of Quebec, as provisional administrator, assumed responsibility for the assets of both companies, pursuant to section 12 of the Public Curatorship Act. To re-establish the legality of the companies, the petitioner, Roger Gagnon, now requests that both companies be revived and be deemed not to have been dissolved.

This being a private bill, it is up to the appropriate Senate committee to examine the allegations of facts as set out in the preamble of the bill and, if everything seems in order, to take the necessary action to approve this bill.

[English]

Honourable senators, there is some urgency in this matter. If these companies are not revived before December 15, 1980, they will face a second statutory dissolution. Under section 261(3) of the new Business Corporations Act every company previously incorporated under the old Canada Corporations Act must be continued under the new act within five years after the coming into force of that act. The five-year period commences on December 15, 1980.

I would therefore propose, if and when second reading is given, to ask that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for examination of the allegations.

I would also propose to ask that rule 95 be suspended in relation to this bill. Rule 95 is the one that states that a private bill originating in the Senate cannot be considered by a committee until one week after the date of referral to the committee. I understand that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has a meeting scheduled for tomorrow morning to examine Bill S-12, respecting the Canadian Merchant Service Guild, and if so authorized by the Senate could at the same time examine Bill S-13.

[Translation]

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, would Senator Leblanc allow a question?

Senator Leblanc: Certainly.

Senator Deschatelets: Senator Leblanc has given us rather comprehensive reasons concerning the federal government department. If I am not mistaken, these two companies started their operations in 1963 and in 1967, and a notice was given which never came to the knowledge of the two companies.

Could he tell me more about what he said about the public curator who at one time tried to recover the holdings of these companies and tell us also how and why the public curator got involved with these two companies?

Senator Leblanc: In fact, it is a law of the Province of Quebec, the Public Curatorship Act, according to which after some time the Public Curator of the Province of Quebec is allowed, as interim administrator, to seize the goods and assets of companies officially dissolved. The public curator, pursuant to section 12 of that act, takes over the holdings and assets of the said companies.

Senator Deschatelets: Were the two companies in operation at that time?

Senator Leblanc: Both companies were and still are conducting operations, at least up to that point where they learned they were dissolved.

I therefore move that the bill now be read the second time.

[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Leblanc moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

SUSPENSION OF RULE 95

Senator Leblanc: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1), I move that applicaion of rule 95 be suspended in respect of Bill S-13, an Act to revive Montilac Limited and Socam Limited.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I might mention for the record that this is urgent, in view of the fact that if this bill is not passed before December 15, there will be no way to revive these two companies after that date.

Motion agreed to.

TREMUS INDUSTRIES LIMITED—SECOND READING

Honourable Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the second reading of Bill S-14, to revive Tremus Industries Limited.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is similar to that of Bill S-13 which I just explained. It is to revive a company whose charter was cancelled by administrative action.

Tremus Industries Limited, with headquarters in Athelston, Province of Quebec, was incorporated in 1970 by letters patent issued under the Canada Corporations Act. This is an important industry engaged in the smelting and refining of precious metals in the Eastern Townships area.

In June, 1980, the petitioner decided to sell some of his shares in the company to another individual. In the course of completing the documentation arising out of that sale, it was discovered by the petitioner's lawyer that the company had been dissolved in 1979 for failure to file with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, for two consecutive years, the annual information returns required under the Canada Corporations Act.

The notices that were sent out requiring the filing of returns had been sent to a deceased director of the company, and as a consequence of this the notices never came to the attention of the other directors of the company.

A notice was also published in the Canada Gazette in March 1977. This notice, however, did not come to the attention of the officers of the company and they continued to carry on the business of the company, despite its dissolution and loss of corporate status.

To regularize its legal situation, the petitioner, Edward P. McGovern, now requests that the company be revived and be deemed not to have been dissolved.

Honourable senators, this company also faces a second dissolution if it is not revived and continued under the Canada Business Corporations Act before December 15, 1980. I provided an explanation earlier in this regard concerning Bill S-13.

When this bill has been read a second time, I shall move that it be referred to the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for further study and that rule 95 be suspended with relation to this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Leblanc moved that the bill be referred to the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF RULE 95

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move that rule 95 be suspended with respect to Bill S-14, an Act to revive Tremus Industries Limited.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, do the reasons given earlier by the Leader of the Opposition also apply in the present case?

Senator Leblanc: This is exactly the same situation. If these companies are not revived before December 15 of this year, they will be dissolved a second time.

Senator Frith: Because of the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act?

Senator Leblanc: It is the new legislation.

Motion agreed to.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—HISTORICAL FACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA REFERENCE CASE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator G. I. Smith rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, July 9, 1980:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores which distinguish that claim from the British Columbia claim as dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights (the British Columbia Reference case), (1967) Supreme Court Reports, 792, and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, and submit that the said decision does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall attempt this afternoon to relieve you of the threat which has been hanging over you now for some time of having to listen to me as I try to make this dissertation which is the second half of two installments, one of which you will be glad to recall has already been delivered.

Senator Frith: The other shoe is about to drop.

Senator Smith: This is, as I have said, the second of two inquiries of which I have given notice relating to offshore mineral rights, and in particular to my belief that the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the case which is prominently referred to as the British Columbia Reference case is not applicable to the question of who owns the minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.

Some honourable senators may recall that I spoke to the first of these two inquiries on Thursday, July 10, 1980. What I said then is reported in Hansard of that date beginning at page 613. What I propose to say today is a continuation of those remarks. Anyone who wishes to follow my whole argument on the matter—and I do not suppose there will be any great rush in that respect—might find it useful to read what I said on July 10.

The exact question put to the Supreme Court of Canada is set out on page 614 of Hansard for July 10, so I shall not repeat it now. It will be recalled, however, that the Supreme Court of Canada decided the British Columbia Reference case specifically on the historical facts as the court found those facts to be as they related to British Columbia, but in cases where historical facts are different, then different conclusions might well be reached by the same court.

I submit that there are certainly very, very different historical facts applicable to the Atlantic provinces, and particularly to Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. The importance of the historical outline as the foundation on which the British Colombia decision rests is indicated by the following quotation from that decision, which may be found on page 615 of the said Hansard, and which, in part, reads as follows:

> We have already said that, in our opinion, in 1871 the Province of British Columbia did not have ownership of property in the territorial sea and that the Province has not, since entering into Confederation, acquired such ownership of property.

I emphasize the following sentence used by the court:

> We are not disputing the proposition that while British Columbia was a Crown Colony the British Crown might have conferred upon the Governor or Legislature of the Colony rights to which the British Crown was entitled under international law but the histocial record of the Colony does not disclose any such action.

Honourable senators, the burden of my submission today is that it is perfectly clear that the British Crown not only was entitled under international law to confer upon the governor or legislature of the colony of Nova Scotia rights to which that Crown was entitled, but, in fact, did so, and thus Nova Scotia meets that test laid down by the court itself for consideration.

• (1530)

As I previously submitted, and as I repeat now, the historical outline in respect of the Atlantic provinces, and in particular the provinces of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, shows that the British Crown did confer upon the legislature of the colony rights to which that Crown was entitled. Those historical facts relate not merely to the territorial sea but also to the ownership of Sable Island and jurisdiction far beyond the limits of the territorial sea.

Let us take a look at some of those historical facts. Nova Scotia's history, as is well known, goes far back into the days when it was a possession of France. One of the earliest documents available is the commission issued by Henry, by the grace of God, King of France and Navarre, reading:

> To our dear and well beloved the Lord of Monts, one of the ordinary gentlemen of our chamber, greeting—

And honourable senators will know, of course, that what I am reading is a translation and not the original script.

> As our greatest care and labour is, and always hath been, since our coming to this Crown, to maintain and conserve it in the ancient dignity, greatness and splendour thereof, to extend and amplify, as much as lawfully may be done, the bounds and limits of the same; we being, of a long time, informed of the situation and condition of the lands and territories of La Cadia . . . We then, for these causes, fully trusting on your great wisdom and in the knowledge and experience that you have of the quality . . . of the said country . . . expressly appointed and established you, and by these presents, signed by our hands, do commit, ordain, make, constitute and establish you, our Lieutenant General, for to represent our person in the countries, territories, coasts and confines of La Cadia . . . and there to command in peace, rest and tranquility, as well by sea as by land . . . with the advice of wise and capable men, to prescribe under our good pleasure, laws, statutes and ordinances, conformable, as much as may be possible, unto ours, especially in things and matters that are not provided by them . . . over and besides that which is above-mentioned, (and that which is all over prescribed, commanded and ordained unto you by the conditions and powers which our most dear cousin . . . the Admiral of France, have given unto you for that which concerns the affairs and charge of the admiralty, in the exploit, expedition and executing of the things above said), to do generally whatsoever may make for the conquest, peopling, inhabiting and preservation of the said land of La Cadia; and of the coasts, territories adjoining, and of their appurtenances, and dependencies under our name and authority, whatsoever ourselves would and might do if we were there present in person—

There could be no clearer words, I submit, honourable senators, to be used by His Majesty the King of France to give his Lord Lieutenant or Governor of La Cadia every bit of power that he had himself over any part of his realms and the sea that adjoined those realms, and any place to which his authority extended. Again:

> —whatsoever ourselves would be and might do if we were there present in person—

And this is dated the 8th day of November, in the year of our Lord, 1603.

The above-mentioned translation of this commission is found as an appendix to chapter 2 of a book called A History of Nova Scotia or Acadie by one Beamish Murdoch, Esq., Q.C., printed in Halifax, Nova Scotia, by James Barnes, printer and publisher, in 1865. The commission may also be found in the Public Archives of Canada.

Again, I draw particular attention to the reference to the Lord Admiral of France and to the words:

> —of the coasts, territories adjoining, and of their appurtenances and dependencies under our name and authority, whatsoever ourselves would and might do if we were there present in person.

So we start off from the very first, or at least from 1603, with the authority granted to this Governor sent out by the King of France to govern Acadia, which was a much larger territory in those days but which does cover all of what is now Nova Scotia, to give the Governor of Acadia every power that the King himself could maintain, and in those days, I need hardly say, the King of France, as was the case with many other monarchs, was a ruler upon whom there were no restraints except his own will and his power to have his commands carried out.

It is clear that France claimed and acquired various rights relating to the coast and adjoining waters of its colonial possessions—rights at least as great as it claimed in its home water. Nova Scotia, or Acadia as it came to be called, was very much in the minds of those who ruled the great European exploring and colonizing nations of the time. It was the subject of many military and diplomatic activities. It does not seem to be necessary to make in detail an examination of all of those ancient activities, but I shall draw attention to some.

Just 16 years after the commission of Henry of Navarre was granted to the person he called The Lord of Monts, it is clear that the King of England was claiming jurisdiction over extensive areas of the coast of Nova Scotia. In 1621 he granted a Royal Charter to Sir William Alexander, who desired to establish there new Scotland, or Nova Scotia, in the New World. The Royal Charter contained a description of Nova Scotia which included the following words:

> —all . . . islands, or seas lying near, or within six leagues to any part of the same, on the western, northern or eastern parts of the coast . . . and on the southeast (where Cap Britton lies), and on the southern part of the same (where Cap de Sable is), all seas and islands towards the south, within forty leagues of the sea coasts of the same, including the great island commonly called Isle de Sable, or Sablon, lying toward the Carbas, south southeast, about 30 leagues from the said Cap Britton, in the sea and being in the latitude of 44 degrees or thereabouts—

I turn now to the Treaty of Utrecht, which was made between Great Britain and France in 1713. Article XII of that Treaty ceded to Britain:

> —all Nova Scotia or Acadia, with its ancient boundaries . . . and all other things in those parts, which depend on the said lands and islands . . . and all rights whatsoever—

It then went on to say:

> —the Crown of France be excluded from all kinds of fishing in the said seas, bays, and other kinds of fishing in the seas, bays and other places, on the coast of Nova Scotia, that is to say, on those which lie towards the east, within 30 leagues, beginning from the island commonly called Sable—

And it is 85 miles offshore.

> —inclusively, and then stretching along toward the southwest.

The treaty certainly contemplated that the Crown of France and its subjects had rights "which depend on the said lands and islands." The treaty does not enumerate or define those rights; but whatever they were, they were transferred from the Crown of France and French subjects to the British Crown. These words are wide enough to include any rights to waters adjacent to the coasts and the lands under such waters.

And remember, honourable senators, the commission of Henry of Navarre, after giving the very fullest of powers to his Governor in 1603, said that that Governor would have in Acadia whatever powers the King himself had in France. So by the Treaty of Utrecht, all of these powers in respect of Acadia are, in fact, conveyed to Britain—to the King of England, I think, was the exact phraseology.

The treaty recognized the right of England to exclude the French from fishing not only in the coastal waters immediately adjoining the land, but also in some areas a distance of 30 leagues—which is approximately 90 miles—east of the coast of Sable Island and then to the southwest. As I have said, Sable Island is about 85 miles east of Nova Scotia.

Then we come to the Treaty of Paris which was signed almost exactly 50 years after the Treaty of Utrecht and was effective from the tenth day of February, 1763. The parties to that treaty were Britain, France and Spain and very shortly after it was signed by those three, it was acceded to, which means it was accepted by, Portugal. It was accepted as a treaty by which Portugal was bound. Those were the four great sea powers which at that time were actively concerning themselves with the new world and exploiting its resources. It was thus not merely a bilateral treaty between two countries, but was international in a very much wider sense, and in all probability it was as international as you could get having regard to whose ships were trading in or utilizing the seas off our coasts.

The Treaty of Paris dealt with matters in many parts of the world, the old world as well as the new. They were matters of widely differing kinds. Article II of the Treaty of Paris enumerated a considerable number of treaties between various European countries. Most of these treaties had little or nothing to do with Nova Scotia or Acadia, but the Treaty of Utrecht was among those enumerated and was mentioned as being "all renewed and confirmed in the best form". This would certainly include the matters relating to Nova Scotia which were included in the Treaty of Utrecht.

Article IV of the Treaty of Paris specifically deals with Nova Scotia, Canada and the Island of Cape Breton. The King of France guaranteed Nova Scotia in all its parts and with all its dependencies to the King of Great Britain. He also guaranteed to the King of Great Britain the Island of Cape Breton.

> —and in general every thing that depends on the said countries, lands, islands and coasts, with the sovereignty, property, possession, and all rights acquired by treaty, or otherwise [which the King of France] and till now over the said countries, lands, islands, places, coasts . . . so that . . . the . . . King cedes and makes over the whole . . . and that in the most ample manner and form, without restriction, and without any liberty to depart from the said cession and guaranty under any pretence, or to disturb Great Britain in the possessions above mentioned—

Article V deals with fishing and among other things

> —consents to leave to the subjects [of the King of France] liberty of fishing in the gulph of St. Lawrence, on condition that the subjects of France do not exercise the said fishery but at the distance of three leagues from all the coasts belonging to Great Britain—

Honourable senators, these treaties conveyed to Britain, among other things, the Island of Newfoundland and the Province of Nova Scotia including Cape Breton together with whatever rights in connection therewith as had been held by France. It is worth noting again that the Treaty of Utrecht provided that the subjects of France should be excluded from fishing off the eastern coast of Nova Scotia for a distance of 30 leagues "beginning from the island commonly called Sable"—85 miles offshore—and then stretching along towards the southwest. The Treaty of Paris allows the French to fish in the Gulf of St. Lawrence but not within "the distance of three leagues from all the coasts belonging to Great Britain"—that is nine miles approximately—and not within "the distance of fifteen leagues from the coasts of the Island of Cape Breton". Thus Britain was asserting and exercising jurisdiction over certain areas to a distance of 30 leagues, which is 90 miles, from Nova Scotia, 15 leagues, which is 45 miles, from all coasts belonging to Cape Breton, and three leagues, nine miles, from all coasts belonging to Great Britain. This jurisdiction was accepted by the other three countries who were parties to the treaty.

Even long before the Treaty of Utrecht, the King of England was claiming jurisdiction over extensive areas of Nova Scotia, and in that connection I have already referred to the Royal Charter of 1621 to Sir William Alexander. This, incidentally, may be found in the Public Archives of Nova Scotia as Bulletin No. 22 under the heading "The Boundaries of Nova Scotia and its Counties".

Then we come to the Commission of Governor Wilmot, one of the governors sent out by the King of England to be Governor of Nova Scotia, and, as I say, that was a somewhat larger territory then than it is now. This commission was given to Governor Wilmot under date of November 21, 1763, just about nine months after the Treaty of Paris, which was signed on February 10, 1763, and a total of 142 years after the Royal Charter of 1621, which was the first—at least the first I have been able to find—document in which England laid claim to Nova Scotia. Wilmot's commission gave a description of Nova Scotia which in part reads:

> —and all Islands within Six Leagues of the Coast to the Southward by the Atlantick Ocean from the said Cape to Cape Sable including the Island of that name and all other Islands within Forty Leagues of the coast with all the Rights, Members and Apportenances whatever thereunto belonging—

As to offshore rights, honourable senators, it is clear that the English Crown was claiming consistently from at least 1621 substantial jurisdiction over large areas at least far enough from the mainland to include Sable Island and far beyond. The claim clearly was much further seaward than the territorial sea of three miles. In this respect, therefore, I submit there can be no doubt that the historical facts differ so greatly from those relating to British Columbia as to distinguish undoubtedly the British Columbia situation and the Nova Scotia situation and the general Atlantic provinces situation.

It will be recalled that the joint opinion in the British Columbia Reference case specifically stated that it did not dispute the right of the Crown to delegate to colonies the right to legislate in respect of such matters. It said that in the case of British Columbia there was no evidence of such delegation. There is, however, substantial evidence of such delegation in respect of the Atlantic provinces, both specifically and by necessary implication. An examination of the situation with regard to Nova Scotia reveals that very clearly. Thus again the relevant historical facts differ very greatly from those relating to British Columbia.

● (1550)

In this connection, honourable senators, the commissions issued to British governors of Nova Scotia were made in wide enough terms to give jurisdiction to exercise any rights which the British Crown had in, over or arising from the colony. They also instructed the governors to make laws with the advice and consent of the council and assembly.

For a long time before Confederation, the Governor of Nova Scotia was assisted in legislating in respect of that province by a representative assembly. Indeed, the first representative assembly in Nova Scotia was elected in 1758 and was, I believe, the first representative assembly in what is now this country.

The commission to Lord Cornwallis dated May 6, 1749, appointed him:

> Governor in Chief in and over our province of Nova Scotia or Acadie in America, with all the rights, members and appurtenances whatsoever thereto belonging.

It gave him power to summon "General Assemblys of the Freeholders and Planters," and authorized him to make laws "with the advice and consent of our said Council and Assembly"—which clearly is a delegation of the right to the governor, with the advice and consent of the elected assembly, to make laws regarding Nova Scotia.

It appears, however, that Cornwallis—to use a word we heard this afternoon—was somewhat of a laggard in summoning the General Assembly. In Britain, the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations apparently sought a legal opinion on whether the governor and his council, without an assembly, had the right or the power to make laws. They received an opinion dated April 29, 1755, that the Governor in Council "alone are not authorized by his Majesty to make Laws till there can be an Assembly." Another quote from that opinion is:

> His Majesty has ordered the Government of the Infant Colony to be pursuant to his Commission and Instructions—

That, as I have already indicated more than once, included the summoning of an assembly of the free citizens of the province.

There was some correspondence from Governor Lawrence, a successor to Cornwallis, about the difficulties of summoning an assembly, but the Lords Commissioners in England did not think very much of that explanation, and by letter dated March 25, 1756, said the situation could not be "acquiesced in" any longer, and, in effect, told Lawrence to get on with whatever was required to summon an assembly and get it to work with himself and the council "to enact such Laws as must be absolutely essential in the Administration of Civil Government."

Lawrence continued to drag his feet, and the Lords Commissioners did not like that very much. They wrote him a rather sharp letter dated February 7, 1758, in which they referred to a letter from Lawrence about calling the Assembly, and said:

> —having so often and so fully repeated to you our sense and opinion of the Propriety and Necessity of this measure taking place, it only now remains for Us to direct its being carried into immediate execution, that His Majesty's Subjects . . . may no longer be deprived of that privilege which was promised to them by His Majesty, when the Settlement of this Colony was first undertaken, and was one of the Conditions upon which they accepted the Proposals then made.

The Assembly was duly called and consisted of 22 elected members. It first met on October 2, 1758. In December of that year Governor Lawrence reported to the Lords Commissioners in England that the Assembly had met "and passed a number of laws, a list of which are enclosed."

For the correspondence relating to the preceding paragraphs, I would refer honourable senators to the publication called Constitutional Documents of Canada, pages 6 to 18, which can be obtained from the Parliamentary Library.

[Senator Smith.]

Honourable senators, I say that the foregoing is more than ample evidence of specific delegation by the Crown to Nova Scotia of the right to make laws for the administration of civil government, and of the necessity to include a general assembly in the law-making process. The kinds of laws that were so made, and not disallowed by the Crown, demonstrate that the delegation was intended to include the right to make laws relating to offshore matters. The "Governor, Council and Assembly" of Nova Scotia did not hesitate to make laws dealing with offshore matters. As early as 1770 they enacted "An Act for the Benefit of the Fishery on the Coasts of this Province," which is found in chapter X of the Perpetual Statutes of Nova Scotia, 1767 to 1771.

Over the 109 years, from the first meeting of the Assembly in 1758 until Confederation in 1867, they passed many laws applying offshore. A convenient source to find at least some of those laws is the last consolidation of Nova Scotia statutes made before Confederation. This is referred to as the Third Series of consolidated statutes made in 1864.

To take two examples, chapters 16 and 94 thereof deal with the problem of smuggling as well as fishing. They are frequently referred to in constitutional discussions as the "hovering acts," because they forbade hovering off the shores of Nova Scotia. They had their origin as far back as 1836. Similar statutes were enacted in Prince Edward Island in 1843, in New Brunswick in 1853, and in Newfoundland in 1893.

Chapter 16, which I have just mentioned, is entitled "Of the Prevention of Smuggling," and among other things authorized officers of the revenue of the colony to go "on board any vessel being within one league"—that is a much shorter distance than some of the distances I have been mentioning—"and stay on board while she remains in port or within such distance". In certain circumstances they could "search and examine her cargo".

Chapter 94 is very much the same thing, except that it has to do with the coast and deep sea fisheries. But there is a section in that statute forbidding hovering and allowing search and examination of cargo and bringing the vessel into port.

Those and similar pre-Confederation statutes show beyond dispute that the Legislature of Nova Scotia, with the consent of the Governor and the Council, was accustomed to legislate in respect of offshore waters.

There is a New Brunswick case referred to as R. vs. Burt, (1932) 5 Maritime Provinces Reports, at page 112. That case appears to illustrate and confirm delegation of the power to legislate, although it must be admitted that in the British Columbia Reference case the Supreme Court of Canada said that the Burt case did not involve a delegation of the power to legislate over the territorial sea because the place of seizure was actually within the boundaries of New Brunswick. But that, of course, was not the ground on which the Supreme Court of New Brunswick rested its decision.

The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick was dealing with a matter under the Intoxicating Liquor Control Act of that province, and the seizure of a schooner carrying liquor about one and three-quarter miles off the shore of the County of Saint John. The question was whether or not the courts of New Brunswick had jurisdiction over an offence committed in such a locality, and the Court of Appeal of New Brunswick held that the court did have such jurisdiction. In the judgment considerable reference was made to the:

> —Royal Instructions issued to Governor Carleton upon the separation of what is now the Province of New Brunswick from the Province of Nova Scotia [in which] the southern boundary of the new Province was defined as a "line in the centre of the Bay of Fundy . . . clearly indicating [it said] the claim of Great Britain at that time to the whole of the Bay of Fundy as a portion of her territory.

The decision goes on to examine this at some length, but I will not burden honourable senators by reading any further extracts from it.

• (1600)

I just would say that notwithstanding the view expressed in the British Columbia Reference case, which was not essential to the decision therein, it is respectfully submitted that it did not overturn the Burt case, and that case clearly holds that the Province of New Brunswick has legislative jurisdiction over the territorial sea, which is part of the case, which I think all the things which I have been mentioning support, and which was not the case in British Columbia. The court held there clearly that British Columbia had no jurisdiction over the territorial sea.

The question of the ownership of the solum, or the earth lying under the coastal waters, was in part dealt with by the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in the case of Dominion Coal Company Limited vs. Municipality of the County of Cape Breton. This is a fairly recent case, and is reported in (1963) 48 Maritime Provinces Reports, at page 174. Though it may be argued that this case is authority only with reference to the solum of waters which are interior waters—that is, not part of the territorial sea—there are a number of comments in the various judgments of the Court of Appeal in that case which appear to deal with the question in wider terms. These, like some of the comments of the Supreme Court, may, at best, be simply dicta, but are of value in considering the problem.

For instance, at page 199, Mr. Justice Currie says that, in his opinion, under pre-Geneva Conference law it was generally recognized that a coastal state can exercise sovereignty over its territorial waters, up to three miles; and then he goes on to say that as part of the soil and territorial property of the Crown, the minerals under the sea beyond low water mark were vested in the Crown. He then refers to the "hovering" act, which I have mentioned, and how it supports the contention of Nova Scotia's ownership off her coasts.

I must say, however, that the comments of one of the other judges, Mr. Justice MacDonald, raise certain questions without expressing any clear subject. Mr. Justice Patterson, quoting from a recognized text, says:

> As regards the bed of waters and the subsoil beneath the territorial and the interior waters, it is now generally admitted that they belong, to an unlimited extent, to the state which is sovereign of the territory on the surface. It therefore possesses the right to carry out the exploitation of both the surface and its subsoil by tunnelling or mining for coal and other minerals.

I should say here that that particular case was about the right of the municipality to assess coal mines extending out under the sea, and I should say also that for more than a century, long before Confederation, Nova Scotia has been taking coal from under the sea, and beyond—very substantially beyond—anything which could be called the territorial waters.

Senator Deschatelets: Excuse me, Senator Smith, but in the last case you mentioned was the matter referred to a higher court?

Senator Smith: No, it ended with the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, although it could have been appealed had either party wanted to do so, I suppose, and had the Supreme Court given leave. However, there was no appeal. You will be glad to know, honourable senators, that I am approaching, or am within sight of, the end of this dissertation.

I would like now to make reference to a well-known author, who has written a number of articles on various aspects of mineral rights, and more particularly with regard to oil. His name is John Ballem, and I refer to a particular article of his which was delivered as a lecture to the Law Society of Upper Canada in 1978, and which is printed in the volume of their special lectures of that year at page 251 and succeeding pages.

With reference to the solum of the territorial sea, Ballem acknowledges, at pages 267 and following, that the historical claim of the maritime provinces is supported by legislative and judicial authority pre-dating Confederation. He goes on to say, however, that in his view—with which, incidentally, I do not agree—much of the case law upon which the maritime provinces base their arguments was disposed of in the British Columbia Reference case. I say he has gone as far astray as some other people have. He has not really examined the question to see what the Nova Scotia situation really is, although he does recognize that it may be different. He says that in the case of Nova Scotia his comments should perhaps be qualified to some extent, because of the uncertainty and arguments surrounding the status of Sable Island, which clearly was a part of the colony of Nova Scotia at the time of Confederation. Whether Sable Island ceased to be part of Nova Scotia at the time of Confederation I will deal with a little later—I hope briefly—in this memorandum. Ballem then goes on to say:

> It would appear that to substantiate their jurisdiction over these resources the Provinces will have to prove their ownership to the lands under the territorial sea. Secondly to prove their ownership to these lands in the light of the Supreme Court's approval of the Keyn case—

That is one of the cases the Supreme Court of Canada relied upon.

> —the Provinces will have to prove that some form of grant or delegation of these lands had been made prior to the colony. Without a claim to a proprietary interest in those lands, or in the absence of a claim to jurisdiction derived from the Provinces' former sovereign status, the British Columbia opinion indicates that jurisdiction over these resources will fall to the Federal government—

But I have just shown clearly, I think, beyond any real possibility of contradiction, that Nova Scotia had received delegation to legislate, and to legislate over waters far exceeding the limits of the territorial waters. Not only was there a delegation, but the Governors were ordered to establish a legislature, and to make laws by and with the advice and consent of that legislature, and that legislature, so acting with the Governor and the Council, did make many laws clearly extending beyond the limits of the territorial sea.

Now let me turn to Sable Island. The ownership of Sable Island is one of the fundamental constitutional questions involved in the whole matter of offshore mineral rights, especially as it affects Nova Scotia. There can be no doubt that previous to Confederation, Sable Island was considered to be a part of the colony of Nova Scotia. That is clear from some of the documents I mentioned, and from which I read extracts. This is specifically set out in the Royal Charter of 1621, the Treaty of Paris and in Governor Wilmot's commission which is dated November 21, 1763.

The government of the colony of Nova Scotia exercised its jurisdiction over Sable Island prior to Confederation without any interruption of any kind; that is, for well over 100 years. I have forgotten the exact date now, but I think it ran from 1713 to Confederation. It would be well over 100 years.

Section 108 of the B.N.A. Act and the third schedule to that act, however, do make a reference to Sable Island, and we have to take this into consideration in dealing with the ownership of that island.

An examination of the third schedule shows that it is concerned with transferring property of a kind which is of a public nature serving some general public purpose. It is concerned with canals, public harbours, steamboats, dredges and public vessels, rivers and lake improvements, railways, military roads, custom houses, post offices, other public buildings, ordnance property, armouries, drill sheds, lands set apart for public purposes and "lighthouses and piers, and Sable Island."

• (1610)

Honourable senators, it is not easy to believe that the draftsman of this schedule of the B.N.A. Act, or the representatives of those Nova Scotians who must have approved it, intended to transfer a whole island from provincial to federal ownership simply by including the name of it with the words "lighthouses and piers" in a schedule to the act. It is surely more likely, as is maintained by Nova Scotia, that the inclusion of the words "Sable Island" in this particular, with the words "lighthouses and piers", was simply a convenient way of describing the various humane establishments maintained by Nova Scotia on the island. Those establishments were all of the life-saving and ship-guidance sort, and clearly of a kind which were being enumerated in the rest of the schedule. If the draftsman had wanted to include those humane establishments, item by item, he would have had a very long list. It seems to me, at any rate, and I think to most Nova Scotians, quite clear from the whole text of the schedule and the kinds of things enumerated there, that what the draftsman had in mind, and what the representatives of Nova Scotia thought they were doing, was giving to the federal government, upon Confederation, the humane establishments and the responsibility for maintaining them, and a substantial number were enumerated.

Senator Thompson: Would it have been easier if they had said "lighthouses and piers of Sable Island", rather than "and Sable Island"?

Senator Smith: Yes, I agree, that would make it clear and probably beyond any dispute whatsoever that what they were dealing with were the humane establishments including apparatus to guide and direct ships and to save lives, such as lifeboats and means of taking care of shipwrecked people.

Senator Frith: Then we would not have been able to enjoy this inquiry.

Senator Smith: That may be a doubtful asset to balance off the loss of the island.

Senator Donahoe: They were transferring more lighthouses than the ones on Sable Island. It was all lighthouses, and Sable Island was only included.

Senator Thompson: Your definition of property under section 108 included lands.

Senator Smith: It included certain lands of public buildings such as post offices and armouries.

Senator Thompson: I thought you said "lands" per se.

Senator Smith: Yes, public lands used for certain public purposes on the mainland.

It is easy to visualize the draftsman using the words "Sable Island" in the third schedule simply to refer to the rather substantial humane establishments maintained on Sable Island. Surely, if it had been intended to convey a whole island from Nova Scotia to the federal government, it would have been reasonable to have given it at least a separate heading to itself and not to include it simply ejusdem generis with piers and lighthouses.

No doubt the federal argument rests not only upon the inclusion of the two words "Sable Island" in the third schedule, but also upon the fact that after Confederation and until recent years the Province of Nova Scotia did not exercise any particular jurisdiction over the island. That fact must be taken into consideration when dealing with the matter. The federal government did, at least in respect of aids to navigation for administering relief to shipwrecked persons and for preserving and removing shipwrecked property, exercise jurisdiction over these institutions.

Provisions of this kind are contained in Part XI of the Canada Shipping Act, being chapter S-9 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970. The relevant provisions of this part are very similar to, and, in some cases, exactly the same as, the provisions of chapters 21 and 23 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, 1864, which I mentioned, and from which I believe I read some words.

Section 589 of the Canada Shipping Act, interestingly enough, provides that in all proceedings in any court Sable Island shall be held to be within the County of Halifax which, of course, is part of Nova Scotia, and uses almost exactly the same wording as is used in section 5 of chapter 23 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, 1864.

It is to be noted also that for the purposes of federal elections, Sable Island has for many years, by regulations made under the Federal Elections Act, been treated as being part of the electoral district of Halifax County.

Honourable senators, I have not by any means referred to all documents and authorities relevant to this matter. There are many more which are relevant and helpful, both to the argument I am making or to understanding more clearly the problem, but both you and I would be wearied indeed if I tried to deal with all of them.

I respectfully submit, however, that I have mentioned enough of them to show three things. The first is that Nova Scotia has a soundly-based claim to Sable Island. The second is that the British Crown, more than a century before Confederation, had commanded that a legislature be created to make laws which the Governor and Council did, in fact, do—they made laws applicable not only to land but to offshore matters far beyond the limits of the territorial sea. The third is that not only are the relevant historical facts related to Nova Scotia very different from those related to British Columbia, but, in the very words of the Supreme Court, the British Crown did confer "upon the Governor or the Legislature of the colony rights to which the British Crown was entitled under international law."

Honourable senators, I must express my sympathy to you for having listened to this dissertation for so long and also my gratitude to you for having done so. You have been very patient, and while I do not suppose I have changed any minds from views previously held, I hope at least I have been able to place before you some of the considerations which I think are of extreme importance to my province in this respect, and to convince you of one thing at least, and that is that the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the British Columbia Reference case does not bind or decide the case with regard to Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. That case remains open for argument as well as for negotiation.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, November 18, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if the motion could not have been put last Thursday.

Senator Frith: As I understand it, it would have been quite in order to have put it last Thursday, yes.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTIONS RESPECTING PROCEDURE—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before proceeding to the Question Period, I should like to give the house my ruling on the proposal made by the Leader of the Opposition last Thursday.

During the Question Period of Thursday, November 6, the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition addressed a question to the Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, which he thought admissible under subparagraph 20(1)(c) of the Rules of the Senate, which reads as follows:

[Translation]

20. (1) When the Speaker calls the question period, a senator may, without notice, address an oral question to

(a) —

(b) —

(c) —the chairman of a committee, if it is a question relating to the activities of that committee.

The question asked by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition was as follows:

[English]

HON. JACQUES FLYNN (LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION): Honourable senators, now that we are blessed with the presence of Senator Hays, the Joint Chairman of what I suppose I can call the Constitution Committee, I wonder if I could ask him to inform the Senate of the main decisions taken at this morning's meeting, and whether they are positive or negative.

• (1410)

Whereupon the Honourable Senator Frith raised a point of order based on citation 357, paragraph (1) subparagraph (hh) of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, found at page 130, which reads as follows:

> A question, oral or written must not seek information about proceedings in a committee which has not yet made its reports to the House.

A debate followed and the views expressed by honourable senators indicated disagreement on the interpretation and meaning to be given to the word "activities." I found the comments most helpful and I am grateful to the honourable senators who participated in that debate.

Rule 20 permits questions relating to the "activities" of a committee. Beauchesne, on the other hand, prohibits questions relating to the "proceedings" of a committee. In my view there is no inconsistency between these two concepts. In fact, each complements the other.

The "activities" of a committee would obviously be the specific things that are done by the committee, such as the holding of meetings, the election of a chairman, the calling of witnesses, the hiring of staff, advertising, and any other matter relating to the manner in which the committee conducts its proceedings. These are all "activities" of a committee.

[Translation]

The Honourable Leader of the Government countered the question by the Honourable Senator Flynn in the following terms:

[English]

> Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I rise on a point of order. Since the members opposite, particularly yesterday and earlier, displayed such an interest in compliance with the rules, I would draw their attention to chapter 9, page 129, of Beauchesne, on the subject of questions:
>
> > A question oral or written must not—
> >
> > (hh) seek information about proceedings in a Committee which has not yet made its report to the House.

[Translation]

The first thing that comes to mind upon analyzing the disputed statement is that the Rules of the Senate refer to the "activities of that committee" while Beauchesne refers to "proceedings" for which the French equivalent could be "délibérations".

[English]

The term "proceedings" with respect to a committee, on the other hand, is a term that, in a parliamentary context, is more closely associated with the actual deliberations of a committee. In fact, the French word is "délibérations." The English word "deliberation" is defined in the dictionary as including "careful consideration with a view to decision" and "the consideration and discussion of the reasons for and against a measure by a number of councillors."

According to May's Parliamentary Practice (19th edition, at page 87), the term "proceedings in Parliament," as a technical parliamentary term, has a meaning that goes back as early as the seventeenth century.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

May states that it means "some formal action, usually a decision, taken by the house in its collective capacity." "This is naturally extended," according to May, "to the forms of business in which the House takes action, and the whole process, the principal part of which is debate, by which it reaches a decision."

[Translation]

Now, we agree on the terms "proceedings" or "délibérations", but what is meant by "activité" or "activities" of the committee?

Though the word "activity" has a very broad meaning, and can encompass every form of action, joined to the word "committee" its meaning is considerably limited. A committee acts as such when it passes resolutions, reaches decisions on rules, statements, reports and so on. In other words, the acitivity of a member of the committee including its chairman, or a witness appearing before it, or a person connected with it in any way or working for it, is not considered to be the activity of the committee unless the committee makes its own the position adopted by one of those persons.

There, then, is a first restriction to the term "activité" or "activities".

Questions may not be asked of the chairman of the committee unless they pertain to the activities of the committee itself.

The last restriction, with regard to the questions that may be put to the committee chairman, relates to rule 73 of the Senate, which stipulates:

> Members of the public may attend any meeting of a committee of the Senate, unless the committee otherwise orders.

So if the committee decides to sit in camera, what then would be the meaning of rule 73, if honourable senators could, in the Senate, invite the committee chairman to reveal all that was decided at a given committee sitting?

Let us now come back to the question put by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition. His question dealt with the activities of the Joint Committee on the Constitution. On the other hand, the committee chairman at no time mentioned that the meeting was held in camera. I therefore conclude that to my mind the question seems to be in order.

Senator Flynn: The answer, then, is of no consequence.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—TELEVISING OF PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, again we are missing two of our three cabinet ministers. Only Senator Argue, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, is here. Maybe some of us have questions for him, but I suggest that the greatest number of questions will be directed either to the Leader of the Government or the Minister of State for Economic Development, who holds a rather broad portfolio.

In any event, as I indicated previously, possibly the Senate should have dispensed with the sitting this week, given what little there is before the Senate itself. The only questions that are really relevant today are those questions we might put to Senator Argue, because even if we put the questions to Senator Frith, he will just take them as notice, and in that case we will not get an answer until next week when the ministers will, we hope, be here.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That would depend on the questions.

Senator Flynn: So I do not see the use in putting any questions, except those to Senator Argue, or those addressed to Senator Hays in accordance with the ruling the Speaker just made a moment ago. The question I wanted to put to Senator Hays is: Is it his intention to have the Senate approve the decision of the committee to ask for leave to have its deliberations televised?

● (1415)

Senator Frith: Under the Speaker's ruling I do not think that is in order.

Senator Flynn: I am asking whether the committee decided to ask leave from both houses to have its deliberations televised, and I am asking Senator Hays if he intends to ask that permission of the Senate today.

Senator Frith: I guess the first question to be asked is whether the committee did so decide. I don't know whether they did or not. I don't think they did so decide.

Senator Flynn: If I am wrong, then I think Senator Hays can correct me.

Hon. Harry Hays: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that insofar as the televising of the committee's proceedings is concerned, this question will be dealt with by the House of Commons and by the Senate. As far as the committee is concerned, we have no intention at the moment of changing our decision. It is up to the House of Commons and the Senate as to how they want to proceed insofar as televising the committee's proceedings is concerned. The committee has not asked for permission to be televised.

Senator Flynn: As I understand it, the committee has not made a decision; it has not asked for anything.

Senator Hays: No.

Senator Flynn: Then do I understand that there is a possibility that the Commons may instruct the committee to do that?

Senator Frith: Perhaps I can help. I understand that a motion is going to be presented in the other place, using the word "authorized", not "instructed".

Senator Flynn: Yes, but what is the exact situation? Are we going to be invited to join in that exercise?

Senator Frith: My instructions are—

Senator Asselin: You have been instructed?

Senator Frith: No, I have not. I am always glad to concede that I am being instructed if in fact that is the case. I suppose that the use of the phrases, "according to my instructions," or "I am instructed," is an occupational hazard, since it is an expression that is used in court. I apologize for using it here in that way.

In this case, in any event, neither in that more esoteric sense of the word, nor in its general sense, am I instructed. I am, rather, informed that the plan is for a motion to be introduced in the other place, probably within half an hour from now, and the motion will propose that the committee be authorized to televise its deliberations. I am further informed that the motion finishes with the words, "that a message be sent to the Senate," asking the Senate to concur in the motion so to authorize the committee.

That is my information. I understand the motion is to be presented at the end of Question Period in the other place.

Senator van Roggen: Did you use the words "authorized to televise"? Or is the motion to the effect that they are to be directed to televise?

Senator Frith: I was told that the word to be used is "authorize." My understanding is that they will be authorized to do it; that is, they will have authority to do it, if they wish. I cannot tell you anything more than that I was told today that the word would be "authorized." It may turn out that it will not be that word, in which case I hope honourable senators will not feel that I have tried to mislead them. I am simply telling you what I understand the plan was in the other place.

● (1420)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to refer to the use of the word "authorized" in the resolution which my honourable friend opposite anticipates. In my opinion the word "authorized" should be replaced by "instructed," because in the first instance, when this committee was set up, we were under no misapprehension as to what it was being asked to do. It was not authorized to do something; it was being instructed to do something. It seems to me the same reference ought to be used in connection with this motion that is being forecast.

I think that some weight may be added to that argument when one knows that the committee has itself already declined, after a very vigorous debate, to approve the introduction of television, radio or other electronic media to its proceedings. This would merely authorize the committee to do something, which they may nor may not decide to do. If they adhere to their present frame of mind, they will not do it. In fact, one wonders whether they have the right to reconsider a matter that has already been decided.

I leave that open for the experts to decide. But it seems to me advisable, if this house believes that television and radio ought to appear in that committee, that we instruct them to do so. Otherwise we will have no guarantee that they will do it, and it will involve the question as to whether or not they are going to rescind their previous decision.

So I would ask my honourable friend to communicate with his friends in the other place and give them some instructions for a change. Instructions are always coming this way. Perhaps he could let the instructions flow in the reverse direction and propose to them—and that is a better word, perhaps—that the word they use in dealing with the matter should be "instructed" and not "authorized."

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in the first place, I guess my friend was otherwise engaged when I said that in this case there were no instructions in either direction. I understand the position he has taken. My membership on that committee was so fleeting that I am unable to say with the same authority as my honourable friend what took place at the committee on this subject.

I suggest that we wait to see what the message says, and we can then decide what our feelings are on the subject of the operative verb. Since it is a committee that was originally proposed by a motion in the other place, with a resolution being sent here for concurrence, I think we should wait until we receive the wording of the other place, and then of course we can concur in it or not concur in it.

I do not propose to send a suggestion or instruction or—

Senator Roblin: Proposal will do.

Senator Frith: —or proposal over to the other place, but—

Senator Flynn: You don't want to reverse the trend?

Senator Frith: —but I am sure that all of the questions raised and the comments made by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition will be taken into account when the message is received, if it is received. Also, it is quite possible that I am mistaken or that the change suggested subsequently was accepted. I am not sure whether the word is going to be "authorized"; the word may very well be "instructed." Let's wait and see.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, there is another aspect to this. We must never forget that this is a joint committee, and that the members of the other place are, in the final analysis, creatures of the parent body, the House of Commons, as are our ten members in relationship to this parent body. I am wondering what the deputy leader, for whom I have a very high regard, has in mind in terms of the mechanism and the modalities for this chamber to advise, instruct, or suggest to our members on that committee as to the course of action they should take in respect of this very important matter.

As a member of the Senate of Canada, I would be somewhat offended if our ten most excellent members should be acting upon the instructions, advice, suggestions or orders of the other chamber. I think we must never lose sight of the importance of the expression "joint committee," and I had thought today, quite frankly, that the Honourable Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate would have been proposing a motion, a measure, upon which we would give our considered, fair and objective judgment.

• (1425)

I am somewhat unhappy about the suggestion that we should, with languor and total relaxation, wait to see what they do in the other place. Our chamber is not always standing highest in the esteem of the public of this Canada of ours, as Mr. St. Laurent used to say, but if we ourselves contribute to this lack of regard for our own position, I think we are endangering our situation here. I would ask the leader to think just a bit more about this. We do not want our 10 among the 25 to be in any way subsidiary to anyone else's "diktat."

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, earlier in the day I considered and discussed with the Leader of the Opposition the possibility of our dealing with the matter and not awaiting, for example, a message from the other place. He and I felt that if we could deal with the matter independently of a message from the other place that that is what we would prefer. I did check into it and I was advised by the resident experts that in a case of this kind, involving a joint committee, it is usual to await the message from the chamber which originated it. In other words, in reverse circumstances it would be considered discourteous or against the respected practice to have messages cross, for example, or to not wait for the initiating chamber—be it this one or the other—to send a message asking for concurrence. For that reason I abandoned the proposal, which was somewhat like the one suggested by Senator Macquarrie, of bringing forward a motion on the subject. I was told that that would be contrary to the practice in the case of joint committees, and so I did not do so.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, last night on television I had the pleasure of seeing my former colleague, the former Premier of Manitoba, and now my colleague in the Senate. I think his question a moment ago was pertinent. Can the deputy leader tell us if this will come to the Senate in the form of a resolution, or in the form of a bill, which would require one day's notice? In addition, might it take three or four days before the matter is resolved here, or could we get a message from the House of Commons this afternoon? How is the matter going to be dealt with? In other words, are we going to have three readings of a resolution and have to sit tomorrow, as well as on Saturday and Monday?

Senator Flynn: What do you mean, three readings?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I understand that the practice is not really unusual. It is quite normal for us to receive a message with reference to a joint committee and to be asked to concur in that message, and that is what is contemplated in this instance. We expect to receive a message from the Commons informing us that they have adopted a motion—whatever it may be—and asking us to concur in it. The message applies to a joint committee and requires concurrence by both houses. The chamber that initiates the joint committee normally initiates the message as well. In any event, according to the authorities I have consulted, one house waits for the message from the initiating house, thus avoiding the crossing of messages somewhere in between.

Senator Flynn: That practice is not sacrosanct. I don't see why we should wait for them. If it is the view of the Deputy Leader of the Government that we should instruct or authorize, or whatever he says, the committee to televise its proceedings, I do not see why we should wait and necessarily have to join with the other place. We can express our own view. For instance, if they do not send us a message, if the motion in the other place is defeated, why should we not say that as far as we are concerned we are prepared to have the committee proceed with the televising of its proceedings? I suggest it is very simple. To calm the worries of my good friend Senator Robichaud, I would say that we are prepared to give leave to any motion that may be moved this afternoon. I should also inform him that in my view—and I think that the Clerk would confirm—there are not three readings of a resolution.

• (1430)

Senator Frith: As I understand it, we will need leave, in any event, to proceed to consideration of the message when it arrives.

Senator Flynn: It is given in advance.

Senator Frith: I would ask honourable senators, in view of the time, to follow what has been the practice and await the message, and thus avoid any contretemps between them and us on this question.

Senator Flynn: There is no contretemps.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I would urge the deputy leader to reconsider the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition, that we proceed, by leave, to deal with this matter now.

Senator Flynn: Right away.

Senator Roblin: Unless the Deputy Leader of the Government is prepared to give us his assurance that we will receive this message from the other place before we rise today.

Senator Flynn: Then we won't need it.

Senator Roblin: I would be prepared to go as far as to say that if we can get the message today we could proceed with the matter expeditiously. If we do not get it before we rise today, then we do not meet again until Tuesday night, which means a long, long weekend intervening, and no television on Monday and Tuesday, and probably Wednesday, while some of us are anxious to get the televising of proceedings in line as quickly as possible. Could the honourable senator give us an assurance that we will get the message this afternoon and have an opportunity to deal with it?

Senator Frith: At this point, of course, there is no matter before us. All I have done, in elaboration of a matter that was raised—namely, the question that was put to the joint chairman of the special joint committee—is to say that I have been informed that such a message might be received pursuant to a motion that I expect will be moved in the other place. Therefore, we do not really have anything to deal with, in that sense.

The question of the Senate's consideration of the televising of the committee's proceedings has not really been raised in the Senate. That is the reason I believe it to be a much clearer and more acceptable practice, since all we are doing is anticipating something, to wait until that initiative is taken in the other place. If it is, we can then deal with it in that context rather than as we have been dealing with the possibility of its arriving here.

Senator Roblin: I suggest that is not a very satisfactory course to follow, because the honourable senator has given us no assurance at all that we will receive the proposal from the other place this afternoon. I think it is becoming quite important that we should move on this now.

The Deputy Leader of the Government says we have no matter before us. Would he be prepared to give leave if we on this side were to produce a resolution with respect to television and the other media, so that we could deal with it this afternoon and express our view, and allow the committee, as far as the Senate is concerned, to get on with televising its proceedings?

Senator Frith: It seems to me an obvious corollary to the fact that we would prefer to deal with the message when it is received from the other place that I would not wish to give leave to consider the matter in anticipation, but would rather await the message from the other place and deal with it when it arrives.

Senator Roblin: Has the honourable senator had any consultations with his colleagues in the other place that would enable him to tell this house when it will receive the message?

Senator Frith: No, I cannot tell the house when the message will be received, but perhaps I can estimate when it might be received. The consultation I have had with colleagues in the other place confirms what I already have said.

Senator Flynn: Colleagues?

Senator Frith: Yes. Are we going to pick up the word "colleagues"? Let's have it.

Senator Flynn: I was just curious to find out who the colleagues were.

Senator Roblin: What do the colleagues say?

Senator Frith: The answer to Senator Roblin's question is that the plan is to move this motion at the end of Question Period in the other place. I understand the motion has received support from the three leaders there, and it is not anticipated that it will be debated at length. In fact it is anticipated that it will be adopted quickly, and that we will receive the message shortly after 3 o'clock.

• (1435)

That is the estimation, and, of course, it is also the reason why I cannot give an assurance as to if or when. I think it is a very good bet that we will receive it by 3:30 this afternoon. However, I cannot guarantee what somebody else is going to do.

Senator Asselin: And if we don't?

Senator Frith: If we don't, we don't. That will simply mean that they have not adopted it. If that message is not received it could be that the motion was not adopted, and there could be any number of reasons for that. If the message is not here by the time we have finished our business we can either adjourn during pleasure until it arrives, or we can adjourn for the day.

If we find out—and I shall certainly try to find out shortly after 3 o'clock—that the motion has been adopted, then I suspect we would want to avoid what Senator Roblin has spoken of, namely, our not being here when the message arrives.

Hon. Lowell Murray: In view of the fact that when this matter came up in committee, Senator Goldenberg, as I am given to understand, argued that the television lights would be too bright and too hot, I wonder whether he could be equipped with a set of sunglasses and a parasol to encourage him to change his vote when the matter comes up again.

Senator Frith: I take it that that question is not addressed to Senator Goldenberg as Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee but to me, and I shall take it as notice.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, with leave, I would move, seconded by Senator Roblin, that as far as the Senate is concerned, the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution may have its proceedings televised if it so desires.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Robichaud: I want to rise on a point of order. I understand that at the moment we are on Question Period, and I am wondering if a motion is in order.

Senator Flynn: I asked leave, and when you say "No" that is the end of it. I withdraw the motion because I cannot move it without your concurrence. You acting alone can block it.

The Hon. the Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and so the motion cannot be put.

ENERGY

EFFECT OF SPOT PURCHASES ON OIL PRICING

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government, which he can take as notice. There is an increasing concern in the world energy community about upward pressure on spot oil prices, and part of the pressure, if not a good deal of it, is based on the purchases by both private and state companies in the western industrial community. In order to avoid this desperation that takes place in the marketplace which creates a ratchet-like effect on everybody's oil prices, I wonder if the government is considering, or discussing with other industrial countries, the possibility of limiting purchases as to price except by government agreement.

[Senator Asselin.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That question will be taken as notice.

• (1440)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): When my honourable friend is looking into that question, perhaps he would address himself to a supplementary matter and tell us whether the International Energy Agency, which is our proxy in these matters, has considered these increases in prices and whether it has made any recommendations to the member states with respect to them. That is a corollary of the question my honourable friend, Senator Austin, has asked.

Senator Frith: Yes, I agree it is a corollary, and it will also be taken as notice.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—PRINTED PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Would the Deputy Leader of the Government inform this chamber whether honourable senators will receive a transcript of the deliberations of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that the first group of transcripts of the proceedings have been received. I noticed the transcript covering the first two days of proceedings on my desk the other day.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

COVERAGE OF BUDGET SPEECH

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Godfrey on October 29, 1980, concerning the CBC coverage of the budget speech.

The decision to cover the budget speech in the way it did was made by CBC management, which Parliament has not interfered with in the past. I am informed that CBC chose to present the broadcast in the manner it did in order to make the budget more easily understood by the viewing public and also to maintain interest in the program.

Honourable senators will remember that the point of the question was that when the CBC coverage of the budget was presented—and, as I recall, it was the same on CTV—the Minister of Finance was frequently interrupted, taken off the screen, and a journalist would explain either what was coming up or what had taken place. Senator Godfrey would have liked to have heard the Minister of Finance make his own judgments about what was taking place, and then later to have listened to the commentary.

While the decision made by the news department of the CBC may have been unacceptable to most parliamentarians, I must reiterate that Parliament has no ability to interfere in the day-to-day decisions of that corporation.

However, since I and other honourable senators share the views of Senator Godfrey, I shall be pleased to communicate our feelings about that presentation to the President of the CBC.

Senator Marshall: I think it worthwhile pointing out that even before the Minister of Finance started his budget, all the highlights were given at 8 o'clock by the CBC.

Senator Murray: What, in the opinion of the CBC, were the highlights.

Senator Marshall: I would not hesitate for one moment to support both the deputy leader and Senator Godfrey.

Senator Frith: As Senator Murray has just said, it covered what, in the opinion of the CBC, were the highlights.

THE CONSTITUTION DEBATE

REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADIAN CIVIL LIBERTIES ASSOCIATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Smith on October 30, 1980, concerning representations by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association.

The government has not responded to representations made by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association as it was felt that it would be more appropriate that these representations be made to the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PURPOSE OF MINISTER'S VISIT TO UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Asselin on November 6, 1980, regarding the visit of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to London on November 10.

The minister's reason for this visit was basically to pass through London en route from Vienna to the current Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe in Madrid, and meet with Sir Sonny Ramphal of the Commonwealth Secretariat on North-South questions following the Vienna meeting. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, however, also met with three British ministers and the Constitution was discussed.

It is my understanding that the main discussion concerned the question of parliamentary timetables. These talks took place within a context of implied understanding on the part of both governments that the federal government alone speaks for Canada concerning the Canadian Constitution.

TRANSPORT

WESTERN CANADA—GRAIN HAULING SUBSIDIES

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Bielish last Thursday, namely, whether the government is likely to provide transportation costs for the trucking of grain at an off-line elevator should it be built at Valleyview, Alberta.

On this very important question that Senator Bielish has asked, the Hall Commission, reviewing the situation in that area some years ago, recommended that a rail line be built. Since that time, as a result of a study that was made by the Alberta government, it has been felt that that may not be the most efficient way of handling the movement of grain. However, I am informed that a study is being made at this time by the Department of Transport of that very question, and as soon as a decision is made I will be happy to bring that information to Senator Bielish and to the Senate.

GRAIN

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—CONTROL OF FEED GRAINS

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Bielish asked if I could provide the names of the members of the ad hoc Feed Grain Supply Committee. The committee members are:

Barry Andrew, a grain and livestock producer in the Regina area. Mr. Andrew is president of Canadian Western Agribition, director of Saskatchewan Stock Growers Association, and a director of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association.

Fern Beaudet, director of grain services at the Co-op federee du Quebec. Mr. Beaudet has had extensive experience in marketing grains with a number of grain and cereal companies.

Gordon Blanchard, a grain and livestock producer from the Bow Island area of Alberta. He is a regional director of Unifarm as well as a member of the Unifarm Executive and chairman of its Transportation Committee.

John Eaton, manager of technical services in the agriculture division of Co-op Atlantic, in Moncton, N.B. Mr. Eaton was raised on a farm in Nova Scotia. In his 19 years with the Co-op, he has been involved with marketing and other aspects of the feed grain industry.

Glen Flaten, a grain and broiler chicken producer from the Regina area. He is first vice-president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, chairman of the Saskatchewan Hog Marketing Commission and a director of Canfarm Cooperative. Mr. Flaten is also a member of the Advisory Council on Transportation to the Saskatchewan government.

Bert Hall, a grain, hog and broiler chicken producer from Manitou, Man. Mr. Hall is a past president of the Manitoba Farm Bureau, chairman of the Manitoba Provincial Chicken Marketing Board and a director of Canfarm Cooperative.

Charles Landry, director of coarse grain sales at the Canadian Wheat Board in Winnipeg. Mr. Landry is involved with the domestic and export marketing of oats and barley and matters relating to the domestic feed grain policy.

Douglas Mutch, director of economic research and secretary to the Canadian Livestock Feed Board in Montreal, Que. Mr. Mutch is involved with market analysis for feed grains. Before joining the Board, he taught at Macdonald College in Montreal.

HON. MARTHA P. BIELISH

FELICITATIONS ON INDUCTION INTO ALBERTA AGRICULTURAL HALL OF FAME

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to associate myself with the remarks of Senator Hays yesterday when he drew the attention of the Senate to the honour that has been accorded to one of our colleagues, the Honourable Senator Martha Bielish, by being inducted into the Alberta Agricultural Hall of Fame.

The Agricultural Hall of Fame was created to recognize men and women of Alberta who have made outstanding contributions to rural life and to the development of agriculture in the province. The 45 individual members of the Hall of Fame are impressive examples of leadership and accomplishment.

It is indeed appropriate that in this year, the seventy-fifth anniversary of Alberta's entry into Confederation, Martha Bielish should be honoured as one who has devoted her life to strengthening the rural community, and supporting the family and the rural way of life—the hallmarks of Alberta throughout the past 75 years.

The citation which accompanied Senator Bielish's nomination states:

> Martha Palamarek Bielish, a dedicated humanitarian, has continuously worked to improve the quality of life, especially for those in rural areas. Active on a variety of committees and councils, she has made a special contribution to women's institutes. She served four years as provincial president, and has represented the organization at several international gatherings. In 1975 she was presented with the Woman of the Year award by the Alberta Women's Institute. Two years later she received the Queen's Jubilee Medal as recognition for her work at the community, provincial and national level.

I am sure all honourable senators will join me in extending congratulations and best wishes to our colleague on being so honoured by being inducted into the Alberta Agricultural Hall of Fame.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Argue.]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, further to our discussions earlier of the anticipated message concerning televising the proceedings of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, we now face the risk so eloquently described by Senator Roblin—that of adjourning before the arrival of the message, with the possible loss of two or three days of television broadcasts of the committee's proceedings. Therefore, it seems to me that the solution is for us to adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell upon receipt of that message.

● (1450)

I will undertake, honourable senators, to find out what the situation is, and, if it turns out that we will be wasting our time by waiting, I will have the bells rung and we can then adjourn until Tuesday.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is there a motion to adjourn?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Presumably there is, seconded by Senator Lamontagne, but that is not the point. The point is that the deputy leader, when he says we should adjourn during pleasure, is suggesting that the Senate should submit to a rather inferior position. Why should we wait for the Commons to send us a message, when we can just as well decide the matter ourselves right now? As I proposed previously, the Senate could authorize the committee to have its proceedings televised, if that is what it wants.

Having been refused leave to move that motion, I might suggest that I could retaliate by refusing to give leave respecting another motion later on. Nevertheless, in view of the situation, I will give the deputy leader the opportunity of moving the motion immediately so that we can adopt it and allow the Senate to adjourn without being made to look stupid, waiting for a message concerning a decision that the Senate could make by itself without having to wait for any message from the other place.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I can only repeat that we disagree on interpretation. I tried to explain why I do not feel there is anything wrong with our waiting for that message, but some of us seem to feel that there is something humiliating in doing so.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Frith: Let me explain why I do not think so.

Senator Flynn: Your explanation may take as long as is necessary to receive the message.

Senator Frith: Thank you. Leave is granted for a long explanation with that condition attached. Perhaps I will not persuade the honourable senator with my argument, but I do wish to deal with this matter of whether or not we are humiliating ourselves by waiting, because that point was also raised by Senator Macquarrie.

In the isolated context of the particular stage we have reached with this particular item that might seem to some honourable senators to be the case, but I can assure the house that I have consulted the practice and precedents of the past and determined that not only is it quite in order but it is accepted as a courtesy to await a message initiated in the other place. It is a matter of courtesy not to anticipate such a message by debating it prior to its arrival. If the situation were reversed and we were in the position of sending a message to the other place, asking them to concur in something, we would certainly not expect them to debate it in anticipation of its arrival. The honourable senator may not find my argument persuasive, but I tell him that in my view we are not being humiliated.

I am now given to understand that the motion has been passed in the Commons and that we can therefore expect to receive a message shortly. If you wish, honourable senators, we can adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of that message. That is the procedure I recommend, having taken note of the fact that there are those who would prefer another procedure. I feel we ought to follow this procedure, in the hope that the next time there is a reverse situation and we are sending a message to the other place, as has happened often in the past, they will treat us in kind.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, since the house leader is being quite avuncular, in a pleasant way if I may say so, may I ask two questions? At the beginning of our sitting did he not have the precise form of the resolution which was being presented to the other house? And does he not agree that it is quite within the prerogatives of this chamber, and indeed in the whole gamut of Parliament, that resolutions—not just subsidiary motions on procedure, but joint resolutions—may arise simultaneously in both houses and that, in fact, the idea of waiting is not a fixed and immutable law such as that of the Medes and the Persians? In other words, there was, in fact—and I hope he will admit it—no reason at all why we could not have dealt with the same motion the other place was considering and have made our judgment upon it, because no one knows or can predict in the parliamentary process that both chambers will come up with identical answers. We have a perfect right to deal with the matter. We could have supported our committee members. We could have done that because that is our prerogative. That is why we put it to the two houses. That is the essence of bicameralism.

Senator Flynn: You never know. We may say no; we may say yes.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we may not concur in the message. That is true. For example, there is no impediment to the House of Commons adopting a motion—

Senator Flynn: Or refusing.

Senator Frith: For example, the House of Commons could adopt a motion asking a joint committee to do something, and then the Senate could adopt a motion on the same subject saying the opposite. That is possible, but it is desirable to avoid it. That is one of the reasons the accepted procedure has been to allow one of the chambers to initiate something and then send a message to the other chamber requesting concurrence. Something then is begun that can be dealt with in one form, without having both houses acting coincidentally and possibly giving the committee two separate sets of instructions or advice on the same matter.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: In my opinion that is the reason the practice I have referred to has arisen. It is to avoid confusing a joint committee, which is one body although it represents two chambers, by giving it two sets of conflicting instructions. We avoid that by having one chamber initiate the message. Whichever is the initiator does not really matter; the other simply waits to receive the message, and then concurs or does not concur in it.

Senator Macquarrie: I am sorry, honourable senators, but I wish to make one more point. Although I am not given to frequent and easy argumentation, I should like to take exception to the house leader's comment that it is desirable for one house to agree with the other. I submit that that is overstating the case. Each house makes its own judgment. It may be convenient for those who originate a particular document that both houses agree; but it is never better per se, surely, that House B agree with House A, or that House A agree with House B. It is a matter purely for each House to determine.

I thought the honourable deputy leader had made a rather fine statement of a very poor case, and the only exception I would take to it is the use of the word "desirable". I do not think it is any more desirable that we should agree than that we should disagree. It is most important that we make up our own minds.

Senator Frith: I agree. I am sorry if I gave the impression that I thought it was always desirable for us to agree. What I thought I was saying, and what I intended to say, was that it is desirable to avoid conflicting instructions being given to joint committees, because I do not believe it is possible, or, indeed, in order, for only one chamber to instruct or authorize a joint committee. In other words, I do not think it can, but that is what I meant by "desirable".

If I may restate it in other words, the reason the procedure is to have one or the other chamber initiate the instructions, and then have the other concur or not concur in them, is that the only instructions that a joint committee need heed are those that emanate from both houses. I do not believe that we could instruct that joint committee to do anything. The joint committee could simply say, "Oh, we are sorry; we are a joint committee and we cannot take instructions from the Senate alone. We have to take instructions from both chambers."

● (1500)

Senator Flynn: So far as the Senate is concerned, there should be no problem with adopting immediately the resolution concerning this matter. I am giving the Deputy Leader of the Government an opportunity to kill time.

Senator Frith: Yes, and I appreciate that. I want to record my appreciation for the opportunities given by both Senator Flynn and Senator Macquarrie. A problem that could arise in such a case lies with the wording. We must remember that Senator Macquarrie prefaced his first question quite properly by saying "Did you not know the exact wording?" Clearly had I known the exact wording—as perhaps I should have known—we could have avoided the risk of having different wording. I still believe that the reason for the practice of allowing one chamber or the other to initiate a matter, and to send a message requesting concurrence, is to avoid the possibility of having conflicting instructions on the same question.

Senator Flynn: It's dépassé.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to direct an inquiry to the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Senator Frith: Please do.

Senator Donahoe: I would make the following suggestion: If there is a likelihood that by not waiting until the message is received, we should use different phraseology or different wording, what is wrong with our initiating our own wording and striking the first blow for democracy, and sending our message to the other place, asking them to concur in it?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Donahoe: Surely that would solve the question, because it would then be up to them to decide whether they agreed with us, and we would not be in the position of having to sit around here for the rest of the afternoon, waiting for them to decide what they want to ask us to do.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is exactly what I believe the present practice hopes to avoid—namely, the possibility of crossed messages. It seems that that does not bother many honourable senators. But to me it is more efficient to follow the procedure of not sending a message when we know there is a message forthcoming from the other place. I understand that the motion is being, or has been, dealt with in the other place, and therefore I would ask honourable senators to accept my undertaking that I will have the message before the chamber as soon as possible; and that we can adjourn during pleasure, to resume at the call of the bell, and to deal with what now looks like a message that we shall definitely receive.

Senator Donahoe: Can we have an assurance that the message will be sent by hand and not through the mail?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, my colleagues in the House of Commons know that I do not like engaging in procedural discussions; but it might be that if there is a disposition to adjourn during pleasure, I could be placed in a benedictory role. I was at a church meeting all day yesterday, and it falls lightly upon me. In my opinion, this half-hour discussion demonstrates the importance of some thought being given to the channels of communication between the two houses. It is an area that has been neglected since Confederation, and in the United States it is not too clear.

I was a little upset when I heard over the radio, saw on the TV and read in the press, that the house leaders in the other place had decided that there would be a motion and that there would be no debate; and yet they were talking about a joint committee. I am of the opinion that Senator Frith should have been in on those discussions from the very beginning, and that the resolution should not only have been in his hand but in part constructed by him, because this house, to use a familiar expression, is either the father or the mother—and in these days one has to be careful—because this house is a parent of the committee and the Deputy Leader of the Government should have been involved.

Senator Donahoe: Amen.

Senator Macquarrie: We are not proud old men and women. We are here to do our job, and we want our government leader and deputy leader to be involved. We could have saved a great deal of trouble had there been closer and fuller discussion, and I would like that message to get back to the other place.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I assure Senator Macquarrie that I have heard what he had to say. His comments are well founded, and he made a very good presentation of a good case.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Deputy Leader of the Government would cite the authority for some of the pronouncements he has been making on procedure as between the two houses, and the authority of this house?

He has told us that it is a practice, a tradition, that if one house knows that the other house is considering sending a message, then the house to which the message is to be sent takes no action. I suggest to him that that is nonsense, that there is no such tradition. The authority for that is, of course, that in the practice of inter-house relations we have no knowledge whatsoever of what is going on in the other house until it is communicated to us. That is the principle, as I understand it, of relations between the two houses. It certainly applies to a bill and to points of order. There have been many cases where any discussion of a bill before one house or the other has been found to be out of order.

Secondly, we have been informed, if I understood the deputy leader correctly, that the Senate could not send an instruction to a joint committee. I do not know what the authority for that is. The Senate is master of its own rules, and obviously it can send such an instruction within certain limitations. There are limitations laid down. There was a limitation laid down in a recent decision of the Speaker of this chamber. There are limitations. But, on the other hand, I suggest to the Deputy Leader of the Government that it is absolutely incorrect, and there is no foundation whatsoever, for him to say that this house cannot, within certain limitations, instruct a joint committee. Where is his authority? The Deputy Leader of the Government has a habit—

Hon. George J. McIlraith: May I ask a question of the honourable senator, so that I will better understand the point being made?

Senator Grosart: Perhaps the honourable senator would ask his question after I have finished. I would say to the Deputy Leader of the Government that he has a habit of saying "This is the rule, this is the procedure," but very seldom does he cite the authority. In these two cases it would be useful—because these matters may arise again—if he would cite the authorities, so that we know exactly where we stand.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, the question I wanted to ask Senator Grosart, when he was making his presentation, was whether I correctly understood him to suggest that this house can send an instruction to the members of the House of Commons serving on a joint committee, or, conversely, that the members of the House of Commons can send an instruction to the members of the Senate serving on that committee?

Senator Flynn: No, that is not what he said.

Senator McIlraith: I would like that point clarified, because—

Senator Flynn: That is not what he said.

Senator McIlraith: —some of the honourable senator's remarks I did not clearly understand.

Senator Grosart: I am saying that the Senate, being master of its own rules, can, within its procedural rules, send instructions to anyone. There may be a slight exception in the case of the monarchy, but there is nothing to stop the Senate, if it so decides, as master of its own rules, to send an instruction. The instruction may not be received. It may be refused by the committee. But I am saying that there is nothing that I know of that would prevent the Senate from sending, by resolution, an instruction. "So ordered by the Senate"—that would be the phrase. If there is anything that would prevent the Senate, by unanimous consent, or by order—which would be by a majority—from making its position clear and giving an instruction, then I am not aware of it. I am not saying that the instruction would have to be accepted. I am saying that there is nothing to prevent the Senate from giving that instruction if that is the decision of the Senate.

● (1510)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I would ask Senator Grosart for his authority for the statement that I very seldom cite authority. If he looks at the record, he will see that practically every time I raise a point of order I do it with reference to the rules or to Beauchesne. In fact, I detected a bit of crankiness in that I was referring to Beauchesne too often. So I do not think it is correct to say that I have a habit of not quoting authority when I raise a point. In fact, as I said, I have more complaints to the effect that I cite the authority too often, and am too much of a prisoner of Beauchesne.

The second comment I will make is that, of course, there is nothing preventing the Senate from sending an instruction to anyone. In fact, it could probably try to send instructions to the monarch. There is nothing in the rules that says it cannot. When I say it cannot—and perhaps we will have to look at the record, but I thought I made it clear that it cannot effectively do it in the sense that the committee—

Senator Grosart: That's enough.

Senator Frith: You are a little testy about that.

Senator Flynn: Take your time.

Senator Frith: The point is that if Senator Grosart or any other honourable senator has the impression that I said we cannot do it—in other words, that the rules prohibit us from sending instructions to a joint committee—then I must say that I did not intend to create such an impression. I intended to say that it cannot effectively do it. I am sure the record will show that my earlier comments were that a joint committee cannot accept, need not accept, will not accept and is not required to accept instructions from only one chamber.

I also agree with Senator Grosart, expressing it the way he expressed it, that it is not correct to say that there is no right in this chamber to deal with a question when it knows the other place is dealing with it, or that it has to wait until the other place has dealt with it. The point I was making was narrower than that. It was simply that in all the cases I consulted—and I had photocopies made of the record of all previous occasions in order to see what procedures we followed with respect to joint resolutions, or undertakings by which the two houses were to establish a committee—the procedure was for one house to initiate, and for the other to wait for the message. That does not mean there is anything to prevent our dealing with a question that is being dealt with in the other place. I agree with that. If I gave another impression, then I regret it, because I am talking simply about the routine rather than the power—the routine, the method or the practice that I found in the cases I looked at. I have that book in my office and can bring it to the chamber, if necessary, and go through all of them. Normally when one house adopts a resolution and sends a message to the other house asking it to concur in the resolution, the other house waits for that message, thus avoiding crossed messages.

Senator Grosart: I thank the honourable deputy leader for narrowing the scope of his earlier remarks, because that clarifies the position.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I must candidly say that I am embarrassed to have to tell you that I am advised that the motion has been agreed to in the other place, but I do not have the message yet, so again I ask honourable senators to accord me the—what's the word—

Senator Murray: Indulgence.

Senator Frith: That is precisely the right word, Senator Murray. I ask the indulgence of the house to move that we adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell.

Senator Murray: I wonder whether the rules permit us to send a message to the other place saying we are waiting for their message. We could then see which message arrives first.

Senator Frith: I do not know whether the rules do so provide, but at this moment I wish they did.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.25 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—APPROVAL OF TELEVISION AND RADIO BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that I have received a message from the House of Commons in the following words:

Thursday, November 13, 1980

Ordered,—That, further to the resolution of this House of January 25, 1977, as subsequently implemented, this House approves the television and radio broadcasting of the proceedings of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution on the basis of the same principles and practice, mutatis mutandis, governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons, including the concept of "electronic Hansard", provided that any sub-committee of the said Committee, shall not be broadcast by television, but shall be broadcast by radio, except the sub-committee on Agenda, which shall not be broadcast;

That it be an instruction to the Committee that it undertake the aforementioned action as soon as physically possible without disturbing the proceedings of the Committee now undertaken or planned;

That it be an instruction to the Committee that all decisions concerning the implementation of this Order shall be taken only by the Committee's sub-committee on Agenda; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate asking Their Honours to unite with this House in the aforementioned actions.

Attest

C. B. Koester
The Clerk of the House of Commons

Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Senate unite with the House of Commons in the approval of the television and radio broadcasting of the proceedings of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada on the basis of the same principles and practice, mutatis mutandis, governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons, including the concept of "electronic Hansard", provided that any subcommittee of the said Committee, shall not be broadcast by television, but shall be broadcast by radio, except the Subcommittee on Agenda, which shall not be broadcast;

That it be an instruction to the Committee that it undertake the aforementioned action as soon as physically possible without disturbing the proceedings of the Committee now undertaken or planned;

That it be an instruction to the Committee that all decisions concerning the implementation of this Order shall be taken only by the Committee's Subcommittee on Agenda; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 18, 1980, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 18, 1980

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGES IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that messages had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Miss Campbell (South West Nova), Messrs. Robinson (Burnaby), Hawkes, Lapierre, Beatty and Epp had been substituted for those of Messrs. Lapierre, Manly, Beatty, Tobin, Epp and Hawkes; and that the names of Messrs. Tobin and Lapierre had been substituted for those of Messrs. Lapierre and Tobin; and that the name of Mr. Knowles had been substituted for that of Mr. Robinson (Burnaby) on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

PRIVATE BILL

PRESIDENT OF THE LETHBRIDGE STAKE OF THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS—FIRST READING

Hon. Ernest C. Manning presented Bill S-16, respecting the President of the Lethbridge Stake of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

Bill read first time.

Senator Manning moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, November 25, 1980.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—ATTENDANCE IN CHAMBER OF SENATE MEMBERS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before I ask one or two questions of the government, can the leader tell me whether there is any way of recording the attendance of senators who are posted to the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. On certain days the committee meets at exactly the same time as the Senate, and when that happens senators have a problem in recording their attendance here, although they are engaged in Senate business. Is there any way by which we can facilitate that situation?

● (2010)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the special joint committee has permission to meet while the Senate is sitting, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has advanced a very constructive idea, which is worthy of study and action, if possible.

May I say at the outset of the Question Period that our esteemed and distinguished colleague, Senator Olson, is forced because of his onerous responsibilities to leave at approximately 9 o'clock. If those questions to be directed to Senator Olson can be asked before that time, it will be of great help to him.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, this may be a light evening for Senator Olson so far as questions are concerned, but we will keep that request in mind.

STATUS OF REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to refer to a question asked by my leader a few days ago and addressed to the Honourable Senator Goldenberg as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, requesting information when the report of that committee with respect to constitutional reform in reference to the Senate might be presented. Is there any information on that matter.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand it is the intention of the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee to table that report on Wednesday, a week from tomorrow. There have been some delays occasioned by translation challenges.

Senator Roblin: Did the leader say the date for tabling is not next Wednesday, but a week Wednesday?

Senator Perrault: A week from tomorrow, yes.

Senator Roblin: I do not wish to dwell on the subject, but it has been some time since the matter was handed over to the legal staff and others to prepare, and that delay raises the question of whether they have too much on their plates to get these jobs done in time. I will not pursue that matter further at the moment because we will be getting the report next week, but it may be something we will have to look into at some time.

REFERENCES TO APPEAL COURTS BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government respecting the constitutional situation. I am sure he is aware that a number of the provinces have given notice of their intention to direct references to their courts in respect of the constitutionality of the government's proposal which is now before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. I am aware that in the case of the Province of Manitoba, for example, the hearings will commence on December 4.

Can my honourable friend confirm that the federal government will be represented at those hearings and will make a presentation of its view of the matter?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, on the same subject, I would ask my honourable friend to make inquiries on some other points as well.

I wish to know what the policy of the government is in respect of action by these courts. In other words, should it happen that the appeal court of a province finds that the government's proposal is unconstitutional or is otherwise open to question, I want to know whether it is the intention of the government to refer such a decision to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that is, at this stage at least, a hypothetical question. For this reason, I am not prepared to answer the question.

Senator Roblin: I can understand my honourable friend's reluctance to answer it, but I suggest that it is by no means hypothetical, because at some stage in the game, all things being equal, the Supreme Court of Canada will be asked to rule upon the findings of these various appeal courts and to make a decision with respect to the constitutionality of the government's move.

My question is: If the matter is found to be unconstitutional, will the government have regard or respect for, or accede to, the decision of the court in that respect?

Senator Perrault: The federal government has, of course, a long tradition of respecting court rulings, as do other governments in this country. Beyond that, honourable senators, I am not willing to make a further statement. The eventuality will be dealt with, should it arise.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his comment, but I hope he will take the matter under consideration and give us a more definitive answer than he has so far, because it is quite conceivable that there may be a finding against the federal government in the matter. In that event, this house, along with others, may be asked to make up its mind on whether it intends to proceed in defiance—if that is the correct word—of the court's judgment on the very important constitutional matter. Because the matter will go to the courts and is bound to proceed to the Supreme Court, and is bound to result in a decision one way or the other, I think the government's policy in the case of an adverse decision should be made known to the Senate.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator's views will be given careful consideration. I thank him for his opinion on this matter.

● (2015)

Senator Roblin: I want my honourable friend to know that I will be awaiting his answer with anticipation. I hope he will give it to us within a reasonable time. Answers to such questions, if not timely, are not of much use.

THE ENVIRONMENT

POLLUTION—ACID RAIN

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In light of Monday's newspaper reports to the effect that acid rain pollution in eastern Canada is substantially worse than had originally been estimated or calculated, and that 65 to 80 per cent of acid rain which falls in sensitive areas, to quote a newspaper account, comes "sweeping in from the U.S.," will the Leader of the Government provide the Senate with a progress report on, and details of, new initiatives being taken by the Government of Canada to impress upon the American authorities the true nature of the problem, and also provide the Senate with innovative programs, if there be such, which we can expect will combat acid rain for future generations?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, perhaps I should try to reply to this question, because this has been drawn to the attention of the Economic Development Committee for a number of reasons, including the need for additional funding to deal with the problem.

The minister responsible, the Honourable John Roberts, has already indicated that funding, as far as Canada is concerned, will be increased. Indeed, the representations my friend alluded to respecting our hope, and indeed our expectations, that the United States will take some positive action to clear this up, is an ongoing process, of course, through the Department of External Affairs and the director responsible for the environment in Canada.

Senator Nurgitz: I wonder whether the honourable senator could indicate if there is any anticipated date for a report?

Senator Olson: I am not sure I could give that, but I would be happy to take the question as notice and refer it to the minister, not only to get a date but to provide some further information.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

DEPUTY MINISTER—ALLEGATIONS BY NATIONAL INDIAN BROTHERHOOD

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. A rather disturbing account in yesterday's newspaper indicated that the Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been labeled by the National Indian Brotherhood as "public enemy number one." In view of the fact that he is perceived as an adversary of the National Indian Brotherhood, and the likelihood of his having to solve critical problems—especially at this time of constitutional talks—is there any plan on the part of the government to alleviate these concerns, if not to replace Mr. Tellier by a more sympathetic person. If not, why not?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not read the account in the newspapers. If the honourable senator has a complete statement issued by the National Indian Brotherhood, I would appreciate having a copy.

I shall take the question as notice and obtain any information which may be available.

OFFICIAL REPORT (HANSARD)

TRIBUTE TO STAFF

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I rise on a pleasant note. Would the Leader of the Government not agree with me that we are very fortunate in this house to have the exceedingly able reporting staff, such as we have under Mr. Tom Hubbard, doing such an excellent job on the reporting of our speeches, in both English and French.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I know that the sentiments of the distinguished Senator Walker enjoy the complete and enthusiastic support of every member of this chamber.

ENERGY

STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF NOVA, AN ALBERTA CORPORATION

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The President of Nova, an Alberta Corporation, in predicting last week that his company will enjoy a profitable year in 1981, said that the larger portion of Nova's income growth would be met through an aggressive acquisition program rather than through exploration. Would the minister share with us his view on the tendency towards greater corporate concentration in the energy industry and indicate the government's expectations of the net benefit to Canadians of this phenomenon in terms of achieving the self-sufficiency goal?

● (2020)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I believe the senior officer of Nova had a little more to say than that in the speech he made. He also indicated that his companies, or some of them at least, would also be allocating a substantial budget toward increased development of the land or leases that they now hold in both Alberta and Saskatchewan. It seems to me, from what he has said about additional acquisitions, that if this is a transfer from foreign ownership to Canadian ownership—and Nova is a Canadian company—then it is not in contradiction to stated federal government policy.

Senator Bielish: I have a supplementary question. In the same vein, I should like to know if it is the government's intention to apply to the acquisition of foreign-owned energy companies by Canadian companies the tough new anti-combines laws which the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has said he intends to introduce early in the new year.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not sure that "tough" and "new" represent an accurate description, although if the honourable senator was quoting the minister, then I will accept that. However, the federal government, through the agency of FIRA, has for some time been very careful, to say the least, in allowing acquisitions of oil and gas resources in this country by foreign corporations.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. It is based upon the strong statement made by my fellow Islander, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in Madrid just a few days ago, in reference to the repression and suppression of human rights and civil liberties in the Soviet Union. Could I ask the minister if it is the policy of the government to speak out strongly against such repression and suppression in all countries, and that we in Canada are not, in fact, concentrating our criticism upon the Soviet Union, but that we are aware of such repression in the People's Republic of China and many other parts of the world? Do we have an open-handed, an open-mouthed, attitude against suppression of civil liberties, or are we, in fact, following the suggestion of Washington in this respect.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Madrid criticized the Soviet Union for the invasion of Afghanistan; but it expressed also concern for the violation of the principle of human rights generally and non-implementation of provisions for the freer flow of people and ideas. It gave notice of an eventual proposal by Canada for a meeting of experts or a high level meeting on humanitarian issues affecting a number of countries, not merely the U.S.S.R.

The government has expressed its continuing concern about human rights and fundamental freedoms and of the provision of the Final Act for the freer movement of people and ideas between participating states.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I thank the minister for that interim reply, and I would invite him at some later date to indicate to me and to the Senate what protestations have been directed to other countries in the world, where it seems sadly clear that great violations of human rights have taken place.

Senator Perrault: That question will be taken as notice. I do not have that detailed information before me this evening.

SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE—MADRID CONFERENCE

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary on the same subject? Is the government leader in a position to give us an update on the position of the Madrid Conference? There was a suggestion last week that it might be heading into a rather difficult type of disagreement. Can you tell us if it is progressing, or what the situation is?

● (2025)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have a statement this evening on events in Madrid. However, I think honourable senators are aware of an interim agreement reached on opening statements by heads of states of the 35 participating states. Initially, there was a lack of fundamental agreement on agenda and working procedures for the Madrid meeting.

The main reason for the deadlocks which occurred was a basic disagreement between East and West on the nature and duration of the part of the meeting to be devoted to the review of implementation by participating states in the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act.

Honourable senators, I have a further statement dated November 18. The agenda and rules of procedure adopted on November 14 satisfy the fundamental Western requirement that there be sufficient time reserved at Madrid for a thorough review of the implementation by signatory countries of the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act. Normal negotiating compromises have been made; however, allegations that the West gave in to Soviet pressure are unfounded. The agenda adopted will permit, inter alia, a review of the observance of the principle of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and of the provisions of the Final Act for the free movement of people and ideas between participating states.

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense. Dispense.

Senator Perrault: I am surprised that honourable senators would wish me to dispense with stating Canada's concern for the fundamental freedom and free movement of peoples.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN NATIONAL EXPRESS—CLOSING OF TERMINALS IN ATLANTIC REGION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: May I direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate? The Canadian National Express has announced that it intends to close half of its 70 express terminals by the end of 1981—

Senator Marshall: Shame! Just like in Newfoundland in 1968.

Senator Phillips: —with 10 of the 15 terminals now serving Atlantic Canada to be the first to be closed. Would the Leader of the Government indicate to the Senate why the Atlantic provinces, with the highest rate of unemployment, have been selected as the first to suffer the adverse effects of the closure of the CN Express terminals?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the short answer is, yes, the closing of the terminals is part of the CN's effort to reduce the deficit from express operations. This deficit is expected to be $53 million in 1980. Canadian National has been trying unsuccessfully for some time to compete with the more specialized express companies. As my colleague, the Minister of Transport, has said in the other place, every effort will be made to minimize the potential unemployment difficulties. For example, there will be pre-retiring relocation and retraining of employees.

Senator Phillips: Could the minister indicate to us the areas to which the laid-off employees will be transferred? It is going to be very difficult for an employee in the Atlantic provinces to be transferred to Quebec or Manitoba.

Senator Perrault: That part of the question must be taken as notice. I do not have that information.

With regard to the rest of the previous question, however, the terminal consolidation program is one of many designed to make the express division a profitable operation by reducing operating costs. CN will operate a nationwide core network of 30 to 35 terminals by the end of 1981.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

GOVERNMENT POLICY—PETRO-CANADA INTERNATIONAL

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, if I may, I would like to put a further question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

In conjunction with the Minister of Finance's announcement on the weekend of an increased Canadian contribution to the World Development Bank, Mr. MacEachen announced the formation of a new company, Petro-Canada International, into which the government will pump $250 million for starters. Would the Leader of the Government tell us if the new company will be participating abroad on an equity or on a loan basis in the development of energy sources?

• (2030)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice. However, I do have some information about the possibility of trilateral aid programs involving Canada, the OPEC and developing countries. The honourable senator may be interested to know that the issue of the recycling of some of the oil revenues to developing countries has preoccupied the government for some time. There have been numerous contacts at the official level with various Arab financial institutions with a view to identifying possible areas for co-operation, and planning is proceeding for further such meetings in 1981.

I know honourable senators will be pleased to know that the general question—

An Hon. Senator: Dispense.

Senator Perrault: —of Canada-Arab co-operation is a subject which will be raised by the Prime Minister with Saudi authorities.

Senator Phillips: Having listened to that reply of several pages, I am not sure whether the Leader of the Government has taken the question as notice. Since the government leader went off on a tangent about the funding of the exploration work, perhaps he would also be good enough to determine what method Petro-Canada International will use to raise the necessary funds.

I would also ask the government leader to confirm whether it is the policy of this government to buy foreign-controlled energy companies operating in Canada in the interest of promoting an independent and nationalistic spirit at the same time as we are entering into arrangements in other countries, the type of which we believe to be detrimental to Canada and should be discouraged.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The honourable senator obviously has—

Senator Donahoe: A full understanding.

Senator Olson: —the policy stated by Petro-Canada International completely mixed up. There is no intention to acquire resource companies of other countries at all. It is partially in the form of a resource development to assist some of the Third World countries that do not themselves have the technical expertise necessary to develop their own natural gas and oil resources. Canada has a great deal of expertise in this field, and that expertise will be made available to these countries by Petro-Canada and hopefully will prove useful to them.

Senator Phillips: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I am wondering whether the minister, in mentioning the expertise we have available, has in mind the exodus of exploration companies from Alberta.

Senator Olson: No, honourable senators, I do not. We have enough experience to look after that requirement adequately and to help some of our more unfortunate sister countries that do not have that expertise.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN NATIONAL EXPRESS—CLOSING OF TERMINALS IN ATLANTIC REGION

Hon. Robert Muir: I have a supplementary question to that posed by Senator Phillips to the Leader of the Government respecting the CN Express closures. The leader mentioned the question of pre-retirement with regard to those CN workers who would be laid off because of the closing of facilities. In relation to this pre-retirement program, I would ask the leader to bring to the chamber information as to what benefits will be forthcoming to these workers, some of whom have worked for many, many years for Canadian National, during the course of which they have given very good service.

I would ask the government leader to spell out for us precisely what this pre-retirement arrangement is and what will be received in the form of pension benefits by these workers.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is an important question, especially for the employees involved. I shall bring as much information as I can to the chamber as soon as possible.

Senator Muir: I thank the government leader. Mention was also made of finding these workers jobs with CN in other parts of the country. Many of these workers in the Atlantic region have worked for CN for 20, 25, 30 years.

In the event of relocations, I would ask the government leader to inquire as to what arrangements may be made in respect of the expenses that will be incurred in relocating these workers and their families to other parts of the country. I have particular reference to the homes that these people have in the Atlantic region which they now cannot sell. Will some arrangement be made by Dr. Bandeen and his assistants and their assistants, and their assistants, who are stacked up in Montreal and Moncton and other centres in Canada, to come up with a brilliant idea that will be of benefit to these workers who have devoted their lives to the Canadian National Railway?

• (2035)

Senator Perrault: The important question asked by the honourable senator will be taken as notice.

ENERGY

IMPORTATION OF OIL FROM MIDDLE EAST

Hon. Peter Bosa: My question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Was Canada receiving oil supplies from Iraq before the hostilities began between the Islamic Republic of Iran and Iraq?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will check to make sure that my answer is completely correct, but it seems to me that some small quantities were imported from Iraq. By that I mean a small percentage of the amount coming into Canada. There may have been some cargoes. I believe it was a very small amount.

Senator Bosa: A statement was made over the weekend by Sheikh Yamani, the Petroleum and Mineral Resources Minister of Saudi Arabia, to the effect that that state was prepared to sell 100,000 barrels of oil to a state-owned oil company such as PetroCan. Has that deal been consummated? Was it negotiated and has it been under negotiation for some time? If so, what was the purpose? Was it to replace oil that we were not receiving from Iraq or was it to offset any possible reduction in the supply of oil from the Province of Alberta since it was stated by the Premier of Alberta that he would reduce the supply of oil to the rest of Canada?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is true that Sheikh Yamani did indicate to the Prime Minister Saudi Arabia's willingness to supply oil on a state-to-state basis with negotiations being conducted by our representative national oil company.

Saudi Arabia has been, and continues to be, a major and secure supplier of Canadian requirements of imported oil. Canada will continue to rely primarily on other multi-national oil companies for its imported oil, but we are prepared to consider bilateral oil-purchase arrangements or agreements with selected oil producers including Saudi Arabia. Petro-Canada will be pursuing discussions with the Saudi Arabian national oil company in the future.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Has the minister quantified the cost, in terms of foreign exchange, of implementing the purchase of 100,000 barrels a day from Saudi Arabia to Canada?

Senator Olson: I do not have the figures with me, but I believe it is a fairly simple calculation; it will be 100,000 barrels a day times the price.

Hon. C. William Doody: Could the Minister of State for Economic Development indicate if the price is to be based on the price we pay to Albertans for their oil or are the Saudis getting a better deal?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator will know, of course, that the price will probably be somewhere in the same range as is now being paid for oil. There was a suggestion in one press report that it may be somewhat lower than new negotiated agreements. I can tell him also that it will be substantially less than is being offered for new supplies of synthetic oil that could be brought in from Canadian production.

Senator Doody: I am not quite sure that I follow the answer. Will the Saudis be receiving more money per barrel than we are currently paying Albertans or will the price be the same?

[Senator Bosa.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in some cases it will be more and in some cases it will be less, depending on the classification of the oil.

My honourable friend will have realized that the federal government has indicated it is prepared to pay $38 plus escalation for very significant amounts of new oil that could come into the stream from the tar sands and the heavy oil deposits in Alberta. However, on the other side, it would probably be less than the price being paid to the conventional oil industry now.

Senator Doody: One final supplementary: Would the honourable minister state that the Government of Alberta can receive the same deal now and in the same terms as the Government of Saudi Arabia will receive?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, no producing province, including Alberta, has an excess quantity of 100,000 barrels per day to add to the Canadian requirements. They do, however, have some enormous deposits of tar sands and other oil classified as heavy oil which, after going through the processing system, becomes synthetic oil and is then, essentially, the same quality. The federal government has indicated that it is willing to pay up to $38 a barrel plus escalation for those additional volumes that go into the Canadian consumer stream.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In light of the very high profile that Canadians have in the international community in the areas of negotiation and peacekeeping—and I have in mind particularly the winning of the Nobel Peace Prize by the late Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson—does the itinerary of our Prime Minister in the Middle East include the prospect of any meetings with the leaders of the two warring states in that area?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Bosa refers to the Arab-Israeli situation. As far as discussion of the Arab-Israeli dispute is concerned during the course of this present visit to the Middle East, both sides agreed on the necessity to reach an early and just solution. Both sides agree that the lack of a settlement complicates other regional problems and thus constitutes a continuing threat to world peace and stability. Both sides agree that the international community has a responsibility to help bring about a just solution. However, in terms of meetings with Egyptian and Israeli officials, I have no information on that subject, but further information will be sought.

TRANSPORT

AIR CANADA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN FARES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. It has to do with a question

I asked him about ten days ago about the almost weekly increases in fares by Air Canada. I think since I asked him that question they have increased their fares twice, and indeed, since last March they have increased their fares six times. It seems they are running ahead of the consumer price index. They increase their fares even faster than inflation is going up.

Has the minister inquired into these exorbitant and continuing increases which are placing a heavy burden on the public, and has he inquired from the Canadian Transport Commission as to what action they are prepared to take, and has he received an answer?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): No information has been received as yet on that question, although I understand that today there was another public statement by Air Canada with respect to a requested air fare increase.

CANADIAN NATIONAL EXPRESS—CLOSING OF TERMINALS IN ATLANTIC REGION

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I have been intrigued by the questions asked by Senator Phillips and Senator Muir with respect to the closing down of CN Express offices in a number of communities, particularly in the Atlantic provinces, with the consequent loss of a number of jobs. As the Leader of the Government has said there may be a possibility of minimizing the effects by keeping some of these people employed by transferring them to other locations, and to take care of others by means of early retirement. I want to give a little preamble to my question.

Some years ago I tried to determine the position of the CNR with respect to the subsidiary company which looks after the express end of the business. I was told first before the Motor Carrier Board in New Brunswick, and subsequently by Dr. Bandeen and his officials before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, that this subsidiary company—I have forgotten the name of it now—just gives its bills to the CNR at the end of the year and the CNR reimburses its expenses on a non-profit basis. But if the case is now as it was then, the subsidiary company has a large amount of assets. I do not have the annual report of the CNR before me now, but it is alarming to think that the possibility exists that these assets of a subsidiary company have been dissipated.

So my question is: Would it not be possible—instead of having the Leader of the Government take notices of these questions and bring in an answer from Dr. Bandeen and his officials—to ask Dr. Bandeen and his officials to come voluntarily before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications and explain all this, because it is a deep mystery to me.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in the course of discharging my responsibilities I endeavour to provide as much information as possible, including some made available to me by various ministers and by the office of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. I see nothing wrong, however, in the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications asking Dr. Bandeen to appear before them. That is a decision, however, for the committee to take.

I might point out, too, that the chairman of that committee is our distinguished colleague, serving in the opposition, Senator Smith. The suggestion, I am sure, will be given careful consideration by Senator Smith and his colleagues on that committee.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—CURTAILMENT IN SERVICES

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, my question relates by coincidence to the questions asked by Senator Riley and Senator Muir a few moments ago. We all know that there have been some very considerable reductions in Canadian National services in various parts of Canada, and particularly in the railroad operations themselves. And now in related activities we are informed that there are likely to be further drastic reductions. In my own province, for example, the number of people employed in railroad services today must be infinitesimally small compared with the number employed 20 years ago.

I was wondering, and I think Senator Muir was hinting at this, if the Leader of the Government could obtain some figures on this subject. For example, could he find out for us if there have been comparable proportionate reductions in the number of Canadian National employees at the executive level in that 20-year period? We know there has been a drastic reduction in the number of employees in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and parts of western Canada, and I have been wondering if there have been proportionate reductions among the executive personnel. Perhaps it would be possible to get some figures on this.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is indeed an interesting question posed by Senator Rowe. However, the honourable senator may consider placing that as a written question on the Order Paper. I would be pleased to take it as notice and obtain any information that I can but long, detailed and statistical questions like that are perhaps better posed in written form.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I hope the Leader of the Government will not think I am being antagonistic, but this is a very important question. Perhaps he has misunderstood me. It is quite possible for two of us to move and second a motion or an inquiry that Dr. Bandeen and his officials be asked to appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. But in order to elaborate and explain this whole complex question of the CNR and the CN Express, I think that it would be proper, in order to provide us with further details, if the Leader of the Government in the Senate suggested to Dr. Bandeen that there are a number of people in the Senate disturbed by this move to close up CN Express offices. He might suggest to him that he and his officials might request an opportunity to come before the committee in order to satisfy us and explain more fully the CNR's position in respect to this.

• (2050)

In eastern New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, and I think in most of Nova Scotia, there is no railway express service to compete with the CNR. They are acting unilaterally, and they are going to close some of these express offices. Do Dr. Bandeen, his officials and the management of the CNR intend to ignore those parts of the maritimes, which are not served by the prime competitor, the CP Express, or do they just say let the other private trucking companies fight over this?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I appreciate the view so eloquently expressed by Honourable Senator Riley. However, in my view it would be wrong for the Leader of the Government to attempt to pre-empt the important role of Honourable Senator Smith as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Senator Riley or any other honourable senator may wish to initiate an inquiry in this chamber on the subject of CN transportation policies in the Atlantic provinces. That would be one way in which honourable senators would be able to state their views on this important subject. However, I feel sure that Senator Smith would listen sympathetically to the appeal made this evening by Senator Riley. It would be entirely in order for the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, and those who serve on that important committee, to initiate some sort of inquiry.

Senator Riley: I have a supplementary question. I appreciate what the Leader of the Government has said, but would it not be better if, in order to clarify the questions in the minds of the honourable senators from the Atlantic provinces, Dr. Bandeen said, "I am concerned about their concern and I would like to request, through Senator Smith, the chairman, that I be allowed to appear before the committee to explain what we are doing"? I intend, and I am sure other senators from the Atlantic provinces intend, to discuss this with Senator Smith, but I think it would be a magnanimous gesture if Dr. Bandeen and his officials volunteered to come before the committee to clear up what may be a misunderstanding, or what may be discrimination against the people of the Atlantic provinces in respect of CN Express service.

Senator Perrault: I understand that Dr. Bandeen is a close follower of Senate Debates, and I am sure he will read in the record of tonight's proceedings the remarks made by Senator Riley. Tonight's discussion may well inspire Dr. Bandeen to offer voluntarily to appear before a committee of the Senate. Senator Riley has developed such an interest in the subject of transportation in the maritime provinces and certain actions anticipated by the CNR, that perhaps he may wish to write a personal letter to Dr. Bandeen. Dr. Bandeen in the past has certainly been very forthcoming in his attitude towards Parliament. I know that we would all be interested to hear the kind of reply received by Senator Riley.

Senator Riley: I do not have very much clout with Dr. Bandeen.

[Senator Riley.]

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, to further this a little bit, I certainly appreciate the comments of Senator Riley, Senator Rowe and the others who have expressed themselves. I fully endorse having Dr. Bandeen before the committee, and I will certainly make that representation to the chairman of the committee. The Leader of the Government suggests that Senator Riley has developed an interest in transportation. He always had an interest in transportation. He always devoted his time to that sort of thing. That is quite true.

The other point I want to make is that the Leader of the Government also suggests that perhaps Senator Riley would like to write a letter to Dr. Bandeen. Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate aware that I have been writing, I have been calling, and I have been talking to CN officials in Montreal on behalf of a man who, after serving for 34 years, went on pre-retirement, and with all their computers, all the whiz kids and all the brilliant people down there in Montreal, including Dr. Bandeen, he was told he would receive a certain amount of money per month for a pension. He received that amount for one month. Every month since then he has received $124 less than what it was stated he was going to get, and, despite all our efforts, we cannot get this man's pension straightened out. It is there in black and white—"You will receive this amount." He has never received it. I think it would be wonderful if we had Dr. Bandeen before the committee, not some of his back-row boys. We want Dr. Bandeen so we can ask him. That is the man we want.

Senator Perrault: A number of questions have been asked this evening concerning the Canadian National Railways. I have committed myself to obtaining certain information with respect to the operation of the CN and details with respect to provisions made for those employees who may be taking early retirement. It has been suggested now that Dr. Bandeen appear before a committee of the Senate. I am sure that many honourable senators would support the idea and would like to see a Senate committee undertake that kind of initiative. Certainly there would be no resistance on the part of the government. I anticipate that many of those who support the government in the chamber would be in support of the idea.

Frankly, at some point it could be of value to have representatives from the CPR appear to answer certain questions about that operation in western Canada and other parts of Canada. Certainly, it is appropriate that the Standing Senate Committee on Transportation and Communications, in view of the fact that the Senate was established to protect regional interests in the country, should concern itself with the manner in which we are served by the CN, the CP, other rail lines, Air Canada, Eastern Provincial Airways, Nordair, PWA and other air carriers, and other modes of transportation. Perhaps some of our standing committees should be more wide-ranging than they have been in the past. There has not been one committee activity undertaken by any standing committee of the Senate which has failed to produce anything but outstanding work. I am sure that the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transportation and Communications, who is a very capable person—as are the other members of that committee—with Senate support, would be pleased to undertake the kind of initiative discussed this evening. I am sure that the committee would receive substantial support from honourable senators.

Senator Riley: I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Again, I am not trying to be antagonistic. Would he suggest to the Minister of Transport, with the consent and at the joint request of Senator Smith, that he ask Dr. Bandeen. We are not talking about western Canada; we are talking about the Atlantic provinces. As far as western Canada being concerned over the CPR, very well and good, but we must remember that the CPR does not provide the Atlantic provinces, except for small sections, with an express service. I do know that the other private trucking concerns are not anxious to haul express parcels, and the courier services are eating into the business of CN Express only because they give better service.

If I were to send a fish packed in ice from Saint John to Ottawa by CN Express, it would have to lie in a warehouse overnight, whereas a courier service at a much higher cost would bring it here much more quickly.

Senator Marshall: It would be very smelly.

Senator Riley: Not if it got here overnight. Once, when I was in the House of Commons, I insisted that they amend an amendment to the Criminal Code. I wanted to correct the spelling of the corporate name of my city to S-a-i-n-t, Saint John, and Art Smith from Calgary said, "A fish by any other name would smell as bad."

● (2100)

In any event, this is a matter of serious concern to the people of the Atlantic provinces and I would ask again, with consent, that Dr. Bandeen and his officials be brought before our committee. We must not forget that Senator Smith is serving on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, so it is hard to say how much time he will have between now and Christmas to become engaged in this sort of enterprise of bringing the CNR officials before a committee. I think it would be appropriate, and diplomatic, if the Leader of the Government in the Senate were to approach the Minister of Transport and ask him either to check with Dr. Bandeen and his officials or simply bring them before the committee.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I wish to agree with the statement of my leader that it would be appropriate for the Chairman of the Transport and Communications Committee to invite Dr. Bandeen to appear before the committee to give evidence on this important question. I cannot agree with Senator Riley that we should approach the Minister of Transport to see if he would help bring Dr. Bandeen here.

Senator Riley: Just on a diplomatic basis.

Senator Argue: The Senate is the master of its own procedure, and the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications is perfectly capable, through its able Chairman, of sending a letter to Dr. Bandeen inviting him to appear. I am sure that Dr. Bandeen, being a reasonable person, would come and give important evidence before that committee, answering some of the questions that have been raised. These are important questions, and I can understand the concern of senators who have raised them. I believe the Deputy Leader of the Opposition could play a constructive role tonight by just saying he would be prepared to send these requests on to a member of his caucus, namely, the distinguished Chairman of the Transport and Communications Committee.

It has been said that this is an Atlantic matter and is not a western matter. Well, the same kind of problem has been raised in western Canada from time to time. In North Battleford, Saskatchewan, the CN Express service was removed a short time ago. The people in that area have exactly the same concerns as the people in the Atlantic area.

When Dr. Bandeen comes—and I am certain he will come, if he is invited, and I believe he will be invited—the concerns about the express services in the Atlantic provinces should be raised, as should the particular concern that I have suggested. Indeed, I will play my part in seeing that it also is raised at that time, because I feel it is part of the function of the Senate to look into these important questions.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have to tell my honourable friend that I have not the slightest intention of making any such request, as he has suggested I should, of the distinguished Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. If that is his idea of how the Senate works—

Senator Argue: Just pass on the questions.

Senator Roblin: For a man who has been around here as long as he has, it astonishes me. I would no more think of doing that than I would think of telling the distinguished Chairman of the National Finance Committee how to run his committee. I have seen him in operation, and he runs an excellent committee. So does my honourable friend Senator Smith. I am quite content to rely on Senator Smith to initiate his own course of action without any gratuitous or unsolicited advice from me.

But if that committee, by any chance, should meet to discuss these interesting questions, I would suggest to Senator Smith that he request, urge or subpoena, if necessary, the Honourable Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, because I am still waiting to hear what the meaning was of his statement delivered in western Canada a few days ago about having an investigation of the Canadian Pacific Railway before he proceeds with the consideration of the Crowsnest rates. That committee might provide a good opportunity for my honourable friend to expound upon the policy of the government in this connection so that the matter can be clarified for the interest of all concerned.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sydney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I wish to raise a point of order. I know how tolerant we are in our Question Period, but, obviously, this matter has now turned into a debate.

Senator Argue: There is nothing much wrong with that.

Senator Buckwold: I just think there is a limit to how far the Question Period can wander. I would suggest that this matter be raised in due course at the proper time, and that we get on with the next question or the next order of business.

Senator Muir: I would like to respond to the point of order.

Senator Argue: There is no point of order.

Senator Buckwold: Yes, there is a point of order.

Senator Muir: I believe it has been recognized that there is a point of order and I should like to speak to it. In any event, I realize that there has been a little nitpicking on who is going to do this and who is going to do that. I see nothing wrong with airing this thing in this chamber to the fullest extent, even supposing we were here for four or five hours. The fact that we are taking that much time is just fine. The fact that there is a point of discussion between the deputy leader on this side and the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board is all right too. But none of that is doing anything for the several hundred workers who are being displaced, dislocated and thrown out on the streets. What we want to do is to pin down this man Bandeen and his people, who will not give straight answers, who make mistakes and who lie about them. We want to do something about the poor workers who cannot get the decent pensions that they were told they were going to get.

Bandeen is the man I would like to see here. I think that is a good point and we should continue with it.

Senator Buckwold: There is a very easy way of doing it by giving notice today that the matter will be drawn to the attention of the Senate tomorrow and debated in full.

The point of order I raised has nothing to do with the subject at hand. That subject is most important. I am just saying that His Honour the Speaker has been tolerant in allowing the Question Period to wander as far as it has in the light of our agenda. I am merely suggesting that if you want to have a thorough discussion of this matter—and I support that and might even be prepared to speak on it—it should be done simply by giving notice that the matter will be brought forward tomorrow and put on the Order Paper.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, on this reference to a point of order, I just want to say to Senator Roblin that I was not suggesting at all that he instruct Senator Smith, or that he should try to instruct Senator Smith. I was simply suggesting that he might pass on the message.

I agree with Senator Roblin that it would be a great mistake if he were to try to interfere with the committee or throw his weight around, because the result would be a disaster. I would not want him to start in that direction.

He has raised a question about a statement I am alleged to have made in western Canada. If I haven't got his question accurately, I am sure he will correct me. I understood him to say that I said, or was reported to have said, that the inquiry into CP Limited should take place before there could be or might be any action on the Crow rate.

That I did not say. I specifically and categorically said the very opposite. I said that, so far as I was concerned, the two inquiries or the two questions could be proceeded with, or would be proceeded with, at the same time. I did not feel that it was necessary that one had to be concluded before the other was began. But I did say—and I repeat—that I think, in looking at the whole question of the Crow rate and the things that may take place, we should have all the facts on the table.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, if I am spared until tomorrow and if Senator Smith, the chairman of the committee, is here, and if the Leader of the Government gives his full approval, I will ask him to make arrangements as soon as possible to have Dr. Bandeen and his officials appear before the committee.

• (2110)

Senator Perrault: That is satisfactory to those who support the government.

The Hon. the Speaker: Before we go to the delayed answers, I think honourable senators should consider the procedure we are following during Question Period. I do not pass any judgment, and it is not my intention to pass judgment, on this, but I feel that we should proceed in a more orderly fashion.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government the following question. In view of the concerns of the American people with regard to the Garrison diversion project, and in view of the fact that American officials have suggested to officials of Manitoba that all those concerned should make representations to officials in the Government of the United States, could the leader give us his support in making appropriate representation to the American government to show our concern with regard to the fresh water in Manitoba, and to support those Americans who have indicated their concern? If we all get together, both the federal government and the provincial governments, we could probably stop the diversion project, which is what we want to do.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I want to thank Senator Guay for his continuing representations on the subject of the Garrison Dam project, and also thank Senator Roblin for the questions asked from time to time by him. I have something to say about the Garrison diversion project this evening.

The Government of Canada welcomes today's announcement by the U.S. Department of the Interior that funds associated with those aspects of the Garrison project which would affect Canada—that is, the Lonetree Dam and New Rockford Canal—will be set aside as reserved funds to be committed only after the conclusion of consultations with Canada.

This is a positive and encouraging response to the representations which have been made by the Canadian and Manitoba governments and spokesmen at all levels, and one which should provide a good basis for consultations with the United States.

We look forward to receiving a response to our diplomatic note of October 1, which we understand will be forthcoming shortly, and to beginning this process of consultations. We shall, of course, keep a close watch on the situation and continue to impress upon the new United States Congress and incoming Administration that Canadian concerns about Garrison are deeply serious and legitimate.

I am pleased to bring this information to the Senate this evening.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, keeping in mind His Honour's admonition, with which I agree, I should like to thank my honourable friend for his statement, because I think it does open up a hopeful aspect of this matter so that it might come to a satisfactory conclusion. I wish him well in his endeavours.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NUCLEAR FUSION RESEARCH

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in reply to a question put by Senator Yuzyk on October 31, 1980, concerning fusion research, I am in the position to state, as honourable senators may be aware, that the Honourable John Roberts indicated sometime ago that in order to arrive at a decision on this matter there were a number of questions he wished to have examined. Since that time, the matter has been discussed with the National Research Council, and the Council is in the course of preparing a report on various aspects of a fusion national energy program.

As a result, the government is now satisfied that fusion should have a place in Canada's national energy research program. The size and nature of that program has, as yet, to be determined, but will be considered by the government in due course.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

CONFISCATION OF THE LADY ANNE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question on the subject of the motor vessel Lady Anne was raised on October 27, 1980, by Senator Smith. The answer is rather long. Perhaps it could be placed in today's Hansard, because it contains great detail concerning penalties and the ownership of this vessel, and so forth.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I think I may safely speak for my colleagues and suggest that it be placed on the record.

Senator Perrault: If there are any further questions arising from the answer, I would be pleased to answer them.

(The answer follows:)

The subject vessel first came to the attention of Revenue Canada through three penalty infractions, two for entering non-customs ports on August 9, 1977 and October 26, 1978 and one for failure to report on October 13, 1977. The total amount of the penalties was $2,000 and was paid on November 27, 1978.

This vessel was later seized by the Coast Guard on behalf of the Department of Fisheries for a violation of their law.

The owner of the vessel at that time was East Coast Fisheries Corp., Mashpee, Mass., U.S.A.

It would appear that fisheries dropped their charges as the sheriff of Shelburne County "arrested" the vessel for various liens and accrued salaries for the crew. The subsequent court case in the federal court indicated the plaintiff as Southern New England Production Credit Association of either Taunton, Mass., U.S.A. or Falmouth, Mass., U.S.A.

The court, in its decision ordered the vessel to be sold at auction. Those who submitted tenders were: Henry Mahle, Trinity Bay, Newfoundland; Southern New England Production Credit Association, Taunton, Mass., U.S.A.; John B. Ryan, 155 Plantation Drive, Duxbury, Mass., U.S.A.; David E. Barnes, 235 Hanover Street, Hanover, Mass., U.S.A.; Murray E. Ossinger, R.R. 3, Shelburne, N.S.; John I. Craig. R.R. 1, Riverport, N.S.; Crest Trawlers Ltd., Lunenburg, N.S.

Mr. Ossinger was the successful bidder with an amount of $225,500.

In July 1979, Mr. Ossinger passed an entry on the vessel (which was of U.S. registry) in order to engage in the fishing trade. The amount of duty paid was $45,100, which was 25 per cent of the appraised value of the vessel ($180,400). The vessel was subsequently given Canadian registry Number 392648 at the Port of Halifax, N.S.

In July 1979, Mr. Ossinger petitioned the court to have the court reimburse him for the duty paid on the vessel as it was his contention the vessel was sold to him free and clear of encumbrances. The court dismissed the petition on July 26, 1979.

These questions in the Senate apparently arose from Mr. Ossinger's inability to transfer his fishing licence from his previous vessel Catch Me the Second to the Lady Anne as his new vessel was in excess of 65' (being 97') and a freeze had been imposed on the issuance of new licences for the past two years.

AGRICULTURE

ATLANTIC REGION—PROPOSED VETERINARY COLLEGE

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, on November 6, 1980, Senator Muir asked a question regarding the proposed veterinary college in the Atlantic region, and the present status of that proposed college.

Several months ago, the Council of Maritime Premiers agreed that the proposed veterinary college be located at the University of Prince Edward Island, subject to disclosure of financial arrangements. A committee was established to work out cost-sharing arrangements. One of the conditions was that wherever it was located, it would not take away from current programs at Nova Scotia Agricultural College. At a recent meeting of the Maritime Council of Premiers, Premier Buchanan of Nova Scotia said that he could not support its location in Prince Edward Island.

The departmental position is that the location is the prerogative of participating provinces, so I think it follows that, if the Atlantic provinces could agree on the location and come to us with a unanimous request, at that point they would pass the ball to the federal government and then it would be up to the federal government to take the required initiative. I would be hopeful myself that that initiative would be forthcoming.

I am not being critical, but Senator Muir and other senators mentioned the unemployment situation in the Atlantic provinces. Certainly, I believe that the construction of this college would employ some people and would be of some modest help in these difficult circumstances. So I would think it behooves everybody, in particular the leaders of the Atlantic provinces, to attempt to come to some agreement on the location of this proposed college. If that were the case, we could get together and get on with its construction.

OFFICIAL REPORT (HANSARD)

COST OF PRINTING MONTHLY APPENDIX

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Grosart on November 12, 1980, concerning the cost of printing a monthly appendix to Hansard. The answer is that the cost of printing per page, for even one line, is $71.75. There is no charge made for blank pages. The total cost for the appendix of Thursday, November 6, 1980, was $1,363.25, as it contained 19 printed pages.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

CONDUCT OF QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers that Senator Olson asked me to offer to the Senate on his behalf because, as was mentioned by the Leader of the Government at the beginning of our sitting this evening, he was required to leave just shortly before 9 o'clock. I suggest that I give the names of the senators who asked the questions, and then we can decide to either delay the answer, if the senator is not here, or have it put on the record.

I should also like to associate myself with Senator Roblin and Senator Buckwold and support the Speaker in his suggestion that we try to proceed in a more orderly fashion in our Question Period. I am not suggesting that we limit the number of subjects but that under our rules certain matters could be dealt with better by way of debate.

[Senator Argue.]

PUBLIC WORKS

GROS CACOUNA, QUEBEC—HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first delayed answer deals with a question put by Senator Asselin concerning harbour improvements at Gros Cacouna, Quebec, a subject raised by Senator Asselin in October 31. It is not a long answer, but I see that Senator Asselin is not here. I suggest that it be placed on the record and then Senator Asselin can deal with it further, if he wishes. Is that agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

> On October 31, Trans-Canada PipeLines filed an application with the National Energy Board with regard to the possibility of establishing an LNG receiving terminal located at Gros Cacouna. The application relates to a receiving terminal located at Gros Cacoune, but it also provides, that should a timely decision be made to construct a natural gas transmission system in the maritimes, the Strait of Canso site would be given equal consideration with Gros Cacouna by the applicant.
> The proposed regasification terminal is associated with the Arctic Pilot Project, a project to deliver Arctic natural gas to eastern Canada by LNG tanker. The Arctic Pilot Project's application also mentions that Gros Cacouna and Canso are two possible sites for the location of the regasification plant and terminal. The applicant submitted that "both locations are acceptable from an environmental, socio-economic, shipping capability and public safety point of view".
>
> Both applications, including the port site, are currently under review by the National Energy Board. It would be inappropriate at this time to comment further on the question of the port site, since no decision or recommendation has yet been made.
>
> Regarding the extension of the pipelines in Quebec, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources continues to consult with TQM on the status of the project. However, regulatory decisions on the route in Quebec are the responsibility of the Government of Quebec and the NEB.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

THE BUDGET—WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my next delayed answer is to a question asked by Senator Murray. It is of wider interest. The question dealt with the Western Development Fund, who would be responsible for it, and whether it would be used to finance existing commitments.

Honourable senators, in its recent budget our government acknowledged the growing diversification of the western economy from processing of resources to the development of new industries. To this end we have allocated $4 billion to the Western Development Fund, of which we expect to spend $2 billion over the next three years. The federal government is anxious to participate in a number of the growth supporting policies being undertaken by western Canadians. We have already indicated a particular interest in the areas of transportation and agriculture, water development and industrial diversification. Cabinet will decide the specific programs to be funded.

ENERGY

QUEBEC & MARITIMES PIPELINE—EFFECT ON COAL MINING INDUSTRY IN EASTERN CANADA

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Muir on October 29, concerning the Trans Quebec & Maritimes Pipeline and its effect on the coal mining industry in eastern Canada.

Honourable senators, the National Energy Board has not carried out any specific study relating to the TQ&M Pipeline's impact on Atlantic Canada's coal industry. The Atlantic offoil strategy envisions the joint use of coal and natural gas as oil substitutes in a rational manner. The extension of a natural gas transportation system into the maritimes is not expected to have a negative impact on the coal industry; it will only enhance coal's role in achieving an Atlantic Canada independent from offshore sources of oil. Essentially, coal and natural gas will not be competing fuels in the maritime energy market. Coal's use is primarily in the thermal power and steel-making market and some other heavy industry applications. Natural gas will be directed into the home heating market and into the commercial and light industry markets.

STATUS OF APPLICATION BY Q & M PIPE LINES TO CONSTRUCT A PIPELINE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on October 30 Senator Donahoe asked a question about the status of the application by the Q & M Pipeline.

(The answer follows:)

> The federal government has clearly stated in the national energy program that it supports a gas pipeline to the maritimes and to ensure its financial feasibility, the government has initiated the following measures:
>
> 1. The city-gate price of natural gas in maritime communities will be the same as Toronto.
>
> 2. A contingency fund of up to $500 million will be available to assist in financing the pipeline if it is necessary.
>
> 3. Grants of up to $800 will be available to consumers converting from oil heating to gas heating.
>
> 4. Grants will be available to distribution companies to assist them to develop gas markets.
>
> In addition, the National Energy Board has indicated that in its view there would be fewer delays and fewer legal problems if TQ&M submits a new application for the extension of its pipeline. I understand the TQ&M has indicated to the board that it is prepared to renew its application. The board has stated that it is willing to deal expediently with a new application for a natural gas pipeline to the maritimes, and if a positive board decision is reached by spring of 1981, the pipeline could be delivering gas to Halifax by late 1983 and to Cape Breton Island by 1984.

ENERTECH CANADA LTD.—MARKETING OF ENERGY RELATED EQUIPMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on October 31 Senator Nurgitz asked a question concerning the marketing of products currently sold anywhere in Canada by private Canadian business. His question specifically concerned the marketing of products by Enertech Canada Ltd. Since the honourable senator is not in the chamber, I will place the reply on the record.

(The answer follows:)

> Enertech Canada will concentrate on supporting commercial production of renewable energy and conservation technology. It will reinforce the work of Canadian businesses engaged in this field by joint ventures and equity investments to fill the "risk capital gap" and by offering other assistance in commercialization and marketing. This crown corporation may also enter into shared ventures with energy corporations established by provincial governments, or it may undertake commercial production on its own. Wherever necessary, the corporation will carry out research, development and demonstrations.
> I would like to reiterate that the main function of Enertech is to provide support to the private sector in developing new technologies, not to compete with it.

OIL—FORECAST REDUCTION IN EXPLORATION DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Donahoe on November 5 concerning the number of drilling rigs forecast for exploration in Canada.

Although no figures are available for 1981, I am able to report a deployment rate for 1980 of 83 per cent. Honourable senators will realize this is a high utilization rate for any industry but particularly for the drilling industry. The growth of this industry in Canada over the past few years has been impressive. As I have pointed out before, during the next year and a half there will be a number of factors at play which will determine the growth of the drilling industry in this country. However, our national energy program is designed to encourage sufficient exploration and development in Canada to ensure us a secure energy future.

NEW BRUNSWICK—HOME HEATING—CONVERSION GRANTS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 6 a question was asked by Senator Thériault concerning conversion grants for home heating.

As stated in the national energy program the federal government is anxious to make Canadians aware of alternative energy sources in light of our growing dependence on imported oil. To this end the government has developed a series of incentives and has introduced conversion grants to encourage Canadians to consider the high efficiency equipment already available and the improvements in equipment efficiency that are anticipated over the next year or two.

The dependence of the Atlantic provinces on imported oil for electrical generation, however, precludes financial assistance for conversions to electricity. Bilateral discussions will be held with each of the Atlantic provinces to determine at what point their oil use for electrical generation will be sufficiently small that financial assistance for conversion to electricity can be provided. In the meantime conversion to other energy sources such as wood will be considered for conversion grants.

THE BUDGET—POLICY RESPECTING CANADIAN OWNERSHIP OF OIL COMPANIES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Doody on November 6 concerning art acquisitions by Petro-Canada. The honourable senator asked if the minister would find out the rationale for the purchase by Petro-Canada of $300,000 worth of paintaings.

Honourable senators will realize that it is an accepted practice for companies, both large and small, to purchase art for their offices. In the case of Petro-Canada, I am informed that when the company was created it was able to borrow from a foundation's private collection. This collection has since become public and Petro-Canada has had to replace the borrowed pieces with it's own acquisitions. This year, Petro-Canada has spent approximately $150,000 on art work, not the $300,000 quoted originally. An estimated 300 pieces have been acquired after careful selection. I might add that Petro-Canada has endeavoured to support living, Canadian artists. Special attention has been given to purchasing pieces that will appreciate in value.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

THE BUDGET—IMPACT ON LOW INCOME FAMILIES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 6 Senator Marshall referred to the analysis of the Canadian Council on Social Development and its projections of the effect the budget would have on low income families. He asked whether the minister had read the report and whether it had been discussed with the aim of reviewing the high cost of fuel to poor people.

The honourable senator may be aware that over the next several years, expenditures on social development and social support by the government will increase to $33 billion. Each year will mark a substantial increase, in large part attributable to our policy of indexing benefits to all recipients in Canada.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Roblin: They are going to end it.

Senator Frith: It should be noted that in the report certain tables concerning incomes of the working poor neglected to include benefits from family allowance or child tax credit, both of which are indexed. Had these been taken into account the report's findings would have been more optimistic.

I would also point out that with the pricing schedules for oil and gas included in this government's budget, the burden on the Canadian consumer up to 1984 is $40 billion less than the budget of the former government.

Senator Balfour: Are you sure of that figure?

Senator Frith: I will make sure that I did not misquote it. I shall repeat that part of the reply:

> —with the pricing schedules for oil and gas included in this government's budget, the burden on the Canadian consumer up to 1984 is $40 billion less than the budget of the former government.

THE BUDGET—OIL EXPLORATION—PARTICIPATION OF PETRO-CANADA ON CROWN LANDS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Roblin on October 30 concerning the participation of Petro-Canada in oil exploration on Crown lands and what is called the 25 per cent back-into. The reply occupies about one and a half pages. So that honourable senators will understand the reply, the question was:

> Petro-Canada . . . will have the right to back-into wells that are drilled on Crown lands in Canada to the extent of 25 per cent.

The honourable senator's question was whether the new rule would apply to all activity on Crown lands.

(The answer is as follows:)

> To clarify for honourable senators the proposed 25 per cent Crown interest will be applicable to every right on Canada lands. It is planned that this interest will be exercised by Petro-Canada or some other designated crown corporation. The carried interest will be convertible to a working interest at any time prior to authorization of a production system for a particular field at which time the Crown agency would assume a 25 per cent share of all costs of the production system.
> As to future exploration, it is not correct to describe it as a "carried interest" given that every explorer will qualify for a 25 per cent incentive payment from 1981 onwards. Because Petro-Canada will be paying its way as a full equity partner from the point at which the big investment on development and production facilities begins, the new regime will leave the private investor's return the same as if neither the 25 per cent options for Petro-Canada or the 25 per cent incentive payment applied. The 25 per cent interest for Petro-Canada represents a means by which Canadians as a whole will have a greater level of ownership in Canadian oil and gas resources.

As to lands where exploration expenditures have already been incurred, the federal government has in a very real sense paid for much of those by means of special fiscal treatments. It now wants a stake for itself in those rights.

I trust this information answers all of the honourable senator's questions.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that completes the list of delayed answers given me by Senator Olson.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

CONDUCT OF QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I would like to thank the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate for the answer he gave to my question, on behalf of the Minister of State for Economic Development. At the same time, I raise the point that he mentioned something which could possibly be termed, by some people, a snide comment with regard to our conduct concerning Question Period in this chamber.

I say, with all due deference to him, honourable senators, and to Senator Roblin and His Honour the Speaker, for whom I have the greatest regard, that I thought we were here to represent the different regions of our country as well as the country in general. When I raise a question on behalf of people who are being thrown on the streets and put out of employment I do not think I am out of order, and, therefore, I do not apologize to anyone.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in the first place I certainly had no intention of making a snide remark, nor any suggestion collateral to the one I was in fact making. I do not think there can be any dispute at all that a question of the type just described by Senator Muir is perfectly in order during Question Period.

I thought we were all agreeing that when a subject is raised in Question Period and tends to develop into a debate, while it is not out of order necessarily, it may be more appropriately dealt with in another part of the day's business. My suggestion was not that such discussion should be limited, but simply that the subject in question may be one upon which honourable senators who are so interested in it may think that we should have an inquiry on it. Far from limiting discussion of the matter, such an inquiry would broaden its scope.

Senator Muir said that he would not apologize. If I have created the impression that I was saying something snide, or that I was criticizing him for asking a question in Question Period, then I apologize to him. I had no such intention.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, as the one who raised the point of order, I certainly want to say to Senator Muir that the point of order was not with regard to the matter raised in the question, which was a very timely one, and one that needed to be considered. I was in fact referring to rule 32, which says very clearly:

> A debate shall not be in order on an oral question, but brief explanatory remarks may be made by the senator making the interrogation and by the senator answering the same. Observations upon any such answer shall not be allowed.

That is the rule, and quite properly, I think, we are pretty elastic in the way we interpret it. I think that today a question really turned into a major debate—and a very good debate it was, too. My only point in raising the point of order was that in my view it would have been proper to deal with it more fully under a different item on the agenda. I felt that it was not really a debatable item in the Question Period; that is all.

Senator Muir: Perhaps I can make one slight comment. I appreciate the remarks of Senator Buckwold, and I think he is very wise in making them. If he will check the record tomorrow, however, he will note that I did say that there was some nitpicking going on apart from the question actually being asked, and he will also see that Senator Riley, Senator Phillips, Senator Rowe and myself were all dealing with different questions pertaining to the Canadian National Railways. I think we will solve the difficulty very satisfactorily, as the Leader of the Goverment in the Senate has agreed, and as I think everyone agrees, by having the principals appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Transportation and Communications.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators will, of course, understand that there are many times when I feel like intervening, but refrain from doing so. I do think, however, that we can achieve our objectives just as well by following the rules. In this case, for example, the Standing Senate Committee on Transportation and Communications does not have the right to study anything which is not referred to it by the Senate. This is provided for by rule 67. It may be said that the Standing Senate Committee on Transportation and Communications should deal with this matter, but there was no motion to that effect before the Senate.

I am not blaming Senator Muir, because I think the subject raised by him and the others is a very important one. I am trying, however, to see whether we can, according to the rules, proceed with the matter in orderly fashion without wasting any time. It is now a quarter to ten, and we have not reached Orders of the Day. My intention, as I say, is not to blame anyone, but we do have rules, and honourable senators may find them very helpful from the point of view of saving time, and perhaps providing the opportunity for a more satisfactory discussion.

PRIVATE BILL

MONTILAC LTD. AND SOCAM LTD.—THIRD READING

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe moved the third reading of Bill S-13, to revive Montilac Ltd. and Socam Ltd.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Donahoe, seconded by the Honourable Senator Balfour, that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

MOTION IN AMENDMENT AGREED TO

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Deschatelets:

> That this bill be not now read a third time but that it be amended as follows:
>
> (a) by striking out lines 22 to 24 on page 1 and substituting the following:
> "1966, pursuant to subsection 125(11) of the Canada Corporations Act (now subsection 133(10) of that Act), stating"; and
> (b) by striking out line 33 on page 1 and substituting the following:
> "tion 125(12) of the Canada Corporations"

Honourable senators, these are only technical amendments.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, just so that the record is clear as to the reason for these amendments, let me say that it was after the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs had examined Bill S-13 last Thursday, November 13, that two errors in the reference to the Canada Corporations Act, in paragraphs (c) and (d) of the preamble were discovered. This is why the amendments were not included in the committee's report on the bill, and why it is necessary that they be made now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion in amendment agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Shall the main motion, as amended, carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

TREMUS INDUSTRIES LIMITED—THIRD READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the third reading of Bill S-14, to revive Tremus Industries Limited.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN MERCHANT SERVICE GUILD—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-12, respecting the Canadian Merchant Service Guild, which was presented on Thursday, November 13, 1980.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, the report of the committee on Bill S-12 contains an amendment to clause 9 on page 4 which would add an additional subclause (2), as follows:

> (2) The national executive board may, at any time between the holding of conventions, make by-laws referred to in subsection (1), and such by-laws shall come into force on the day on which they are approved by a majority of ballots cast in a referendum held in accordance with the by-laws.

And then the remaining subclauses would be renumbered accordingly.

The Canadian Merchant Service Guild is an organization which governs itself by making bylaws at its conventions, so-called. These conventions would ordinarily be called annual meetings, but in the case of this organization, the meetings take place only tri-annually.

It becomes apparent that if an occasion arises where there is the need or the desire to amend the bylaws, it can only be done at very considerable distances in time. Accordingly, the organization is asking that it be permitted to have this alternative method of amending its bylaws other than at its regular tri-annual conventions, the alternative being by the expedient of having the amendments passed by the executive and then endorsed by referendum of the general membership. The regulation and control in setting up of such referenda is provided for in the bylaw-making power given in another section of the statute.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 19, 1980

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN NATIONAL EXPRESS—CLOSING OF TERMINALS IN ATLANTIC REGION

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might be permitted to rise on what I think is a point of order. If, after I state it, His Honour the Speaker feels it is not a proper point of order, I shall abandon it for the moment.

Within the last half hour there has been brought to my attention the discussion about the possible closures of Canadian National Express terminals in the Atlantic region and the request that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, of which I am chairman, invite officers of the CNR to appear before the committee.

I just want to say that I have noted, albeit very recently, the discussion. I am not sure as to the exact method of procedure, and I have not yet had the opportunity to consult the authorities upon whom we rely in these matters. I should be pleased to discuss with the appropriate officers of the Senate and the steering committee what would be the best procedure to bring about what seems to be the wishes of a number of honourable senators, as evidenced by the discussion last evening.

One way which suggests itself to me—and I do not know whether it would be the correct way or not—would be to have a motion adopted by the Senate referring this particular question to the Transport and Communications Committee, because I believe the committee has authority to deal only with those matters which are referred to it by motion. In any event, I want to assure honourable senators that their wishes have been noted, and that we will see what we can do towards the carrying out of those wishes.

While I realize I do not have to explain my absence from the Senate chamber last night, I might just say that I was in room 200 of the West Block as an alternate member replacing another member of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

• (1405)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we certainly support the initiative to have the Transport and Communications Committee, of which Senator Smith is chairman, study the question raised in the Senate last night about the closing of CN Express terminals in the Atlantic region. I suppose the question could be debated in the chamber under an Inquiry, but as I understood it the consensus of honourable senators last night was that the sooner this is brought before the committee the better. Senator Smith's suggestion that this might be accomplished by way of a motion in the Senate sounds worthy of support, and we on this side will be glad to consult with Senator Smith on the wording of the motion so that it can receive prompt attention when it is presented in the chamber.

I might add that we certainly understand honourable senators' current commitments to television which require them to be elsewhere on certain occasions.

The Hon. the Speaker: So I understand that a motion to this effect may be made at the appropriate time.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Messrs. QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CABINET

ABSENCE OF MINISTERS FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before commencing the Question Period

I wish, on behalf of two of the ministers of the Crown, to explain their absence today.

Senator Perrault, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who has obligations with reference to the Pacific Rim Conference, had hoped to make special travel arrangements that would enable him to be here this afternoon for Question Period at least. Unfortunately, those arrangements fell through and, owing to the exigencies of time schedules, Senator Perrault at the last minute had to leave on a flight to British Columbia in order to attend that conference, and is thus unable to attend this afternoon's sitting.

As you may recall, Senator Olson did inform us yesterday that his presence was required in Alberta today. I apologize to the Senate for his absence, but he does expect to be here tomorrow. Both ministers will be making strenuous efforts to return for Question Period tomorrow. I am sure Senator Olson will be here, but I am not sure whether Senator Perrault will be able to return in time.

I understand that Senator Argue will be here this afternoon. I am sorry he is not yet in the chamber, but I will do my best to answer any questions I can on behalf of the government in the absence of the ministers, or to forward them to the appropriate ministers.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am one of those who will miss the attendance of our honourable friends on the other side during Question Period. I do hope they will be back tomorrow. I can well understand why two of them, at least, have thought fit to take themselves to western Canada. I am not sure that they can do very much to explain the present government to western Canada, but I hope they can do something to explain western Canada to the present government, because one of the problems we have in this country is a lack of sound advice being funnelled into federal government channels as to the state of affairs in the west.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I know that Senator Perrault and Senator Olson will be reassured by Senator Roblin's encouragement for them to spend time in the west explaining government positions there.

ENERGY

DEVELOPMENT OF DOMESTIC HEAVY OIL RESERVES— NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENT OF ALBERTA

Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to address one question to the Deputy Leader of the Government that normally I would have addressed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. I expect that the deputy leader will have to reserve his answer.

I am interested in knowing what progress is being made by the federal government in opening negotiations with the Province of Alberta on the question of oil and gas, and overcoming the present impasse. I am particularly interested to know if there has been any movement in the negotiations with the respect to the synthetic oil supply that may be obtained from the tar sands and the deep oil sources in Alberta.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I share Senator Roblin's interest in the question of alternative sources of oil and gas, underlined as that question was by the declaration of Imperial Oil that we heard about on the news today. I hope, because of the importance of the question, that we will have some answer on it tomorrow, when Senator Olson returns. I shall try to see that Senator Olson receives a copy of that question before the sitting tomorrow afternoon.

• (1415)

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his answer, because he is quite right in saying it is a matter of considerable importance. The Cold Lake potential is 140,000 barrels of oil a day. While it may be comforting to some to know that apparently our priority is dedicated to getting 100,000 barrels a day from our OPEC friends in Saudi Arabia, I would really be anxious to know why that priority is not given to the development of indigenous Canadian sources, because if that is the case the money stays in the country and the cash-flow developed from that goes to the creation of jobs, not only in one province but in many provinces, including Ontario, where de-industrialization is threatened. So it seems to me that as well as having a statement regarding negotiations, it would be interesting to have government policy as to the priorities it accords to the Cold Lake development.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will remember that in answer to a question raised yesterday, Senator Olson pointed out that Saudi Arabian oil is not of the same character or classification as oil from alternative sources, such as tar sands and heavy oil deposits, which requires enhanced recovery.

That does not change the importance of the question asked by Senator Roblin, but I do wish to underline what is already on the record, namely, that oil sands and heavy oil cannot be considered alternatives to lighter Saudi Arabian oil in terms of availability for immediate delivery. That, however, still leaves the question of policy with reference to the initiatives the government wants to take in order to recover alternative sources.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his comments, because they simply underline the importance of the point I am making. We have been told that it is the government's goal to reach energy self-sufficiency by 1990.

While it is apparently true that these unconventional sources of oil have to be upgraded, this upgrading is obviously part of the process. When the oil is upgraded, then essentially it is barrel for barrel of the same quality as imported oil. So more of us are very concerned about the problems which have arisen and have been on the agenda for approximately two years with respect to proceeding with Cold Lake and unconventional sources of that kind. I merely want to tell my honourable friend that his comments are correct and they underline the importance of getting some action on this now.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I suppose we can assume that if Imperial Oil is going to shut something down at Cold Lake, then something must have been happening in the meantime for them to shut down.

Senator Roblin: That is very true. It is on the shelf; it is not shut down. There is a difference. It can be reactivated if the government wants to do something about it. The whole point of my inquiry is to find out what they intend to do, but I guess that point has been dealt with sufficiently for the moment.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should now like to refer to a statement made by the Leader of the Government last evening regarding the Garrison Dam situation in North Dakota, as it affects the waters flowing north into Manitoba. He made what seemed to me to be a very reassuring statement. His statement appears on page 1236 of Senate Hansard:

> The Government of Canada welcomes today's announcement by the U.S. Department of the Interior that funds associated with those aspects of the Garrison project which would affect Canada—that is, the Lonetree Dam and New Rockford Canal—will be set aside as reserved funds to be committeed only after the conclusion of consultations with Canada.

On the face of it, that is a good statement. I was glad to hear it and welcomed it, but I am sorry to report that there is a disturbing interpretation of this matter in the press this morning. It makes it clear, if the press report is correct, that there has been no hold-back insofar as the United States government is concerned. What they have undertaken to do is to recommend to the Congress that the Congress take action on this matter.

● (1420)

I wonder if my honourable friend could clarify the situation for me and find out whether the department has actually put a freeze on those aspects which affect Canada, or whether it is merely passing the buck to Congress to do something, because we are in two entirely different situations if the latter interpretation should turn out to be correct.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, our information is that the matter, while being left for the Congress, is being set aside as reserve funds, to be committed only after the conclusion of consultations with Canada. I understand exactly the point being raised by my honourable friend, and I shall try to get that confirmed.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend. While he is interesting himself in Garrison, I would be glad if he would provide us with a copy of the note of October 1 that was delivered to the United States Government in respect of this matter, and the answer to that note when it is available.

TRANSPORT

WESTERN CANADA—GRAIN HAULING SUBSIDIES—AVAILABILITY OF HOPPER CARS

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, and it follows from his delayed answer given on Thursday last to a question I asked the previous week.

In his delayed answer, the minister stated that the Department of Transport is conducting a review of the off-track elevator concept. If, as a result of that review, the government decides that there should, in fact, be some form of federal assistance in the form of commercial highway transport subsidies, as recommended in the Hall report, will the minister assure us that there will be adequate hopper car allocation for any area that will utilize the off-track elevator concept?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, there are quite a few conditions in the question, and, in a sense, I am not really able to speak for the Minister of Transport, because he has authority in that field and I do not. But I think it is reasonable to suggest—and I do suggest—that if and when there is a provision for off-line elevators, it absolutely follows, and has to follow, that there would be a fair allocation of hopper cars within that area so as to accommodate the extra grain that is going into those off-line elevators.

If the specific matters to which Senator Bielish has referred should arise and if at that time she is not satisfied with the precise action that has been taken by way of hopper cars, and so forth, I would be very happy to take her suggestions and follow through with them at that time.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

THE BUDGET—IMPACT ON LOW INCOME FAMILIES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government relating to the delayed answer he gave last evening as to the impact of the budget on the social assistance programs. I would like a more definitive reply on the amounts given in that answer. In the reply, which appears at page 1240 of yesterday's Hansard, we have the statement that "expenditures on social development and social support by the government will increase to $33 billion". That is like asking how long is a piece of string.

Could we have a breakdown in terms of the number of years that that takes into account, and the definitive departmental headings involved?

In that same reply, we have the statement:

> —with the pricing schedules for oil and gas included in this government's budget, the burden on the Canadian consumer up to 1984 is $40 billion less than the budget of the former government.

Again, that expresses some ambiguity. I wonder if we could get a further clarification on that and a more definitive reply in terms of where that $40 billion originates.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): As I understand it, the honourable senator is seeking more detail as to the actual span of years covered by the $33 billion in expenditures and a further breakdown of the $40 billion figure. I do not quite know what he means by "ambiguity" in respect of that figure of $40 billion. Does he just mean there is uncertainty or lack of detail?

Senator Marshall: I will take your word.

Senator Frith: I shall endeavour to get that information.

THE CONSTITUTION

RENEWABLE RESOURCES—INDIRECT TAXATION BY PROVINCES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government in respect of the controversy which has arisen over the fact that the Government of Canada would give the provinces the right to impose indirect taxation on their renewable resources. I realize this is a question which he will have to take as notice.

There was a statement by the Minister of National Revenue in Newfoundland that this would be so, and there seems to be, as a result of questioning in the other place, some ambiguity arising out of the answers given by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice.

● (1425)

Could the deputy leader provide us with the government's position on the question of indirect taxation on renewable resources by the provinces, and particularly with regard to hydro-electric power?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I noticed too that there does seem to be some controversy on that subject and that the premier of Senator Marshall's home province seems to have some doubt as to whether the powers to be given would include indirect taxation on hydro-electric power. Certainly, I shall endeavour to obtain all the information possible in order to clarify the position of the federal government—which I believe to be that it would include such power to tax.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—RECAPITALIZATION

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Deputy Leader of the Government when it might be reasonable to expect a reply to a question I asked on November 12, 1980, which appears at page 1198 of Hansard of that date. My question related to some statements reported to have been made by the President of the CNR as to the difficulty in raising capital for the CNR. I directed my question to the deputy leader because the appropriate minister was not present on that occasion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Yes, I see the question, and I see that I did undertake to see that it would be directed to the attention of the minister concerned. I assume that that was done, but I shall follow it up.

[Senator Marshall.]

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

THE BUDGET—WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have one brief question for the Deputy Leader of the Government arising out of a delayed answer given yesterday to a question originally posed by Senator Murray. The reply appears at page 1238 of yesterday's Hansard.

The simple question was whether the $2 billion being allocated over the next three years to the Western Development Fund would be used for existing programs. If I recall Senator Murray's question correctly, he gave by way of examples the development at Prince Rupert, the purchase of additional hopper cars, and things of that nature.

As I read the answer given by the deputy leader, it appears clear to me that he has not addressed himself to the question. Senator Murray wanted to know whether the $2 billion would include existing programs, such as the ones I have just named, and the answer given by the deputy leader is that his government has "a particular interest in the areas of transportation and agriculture, water development and industrial diversification."

Well, I am pleased that it does, but I am interested in the answer that Senator Murray wanted, and that is whether it includes existing programs.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think the intent of the answer was to say that the allocation to specific programs, either as to subject matter or as to present or future, is to be decided by the cabinet. In other words, that decision has not yet been specifically made, and will be made by the cabinet. I agree with Senator Nurgitz that the last sentence of the reply could be clarified both as to subject and as to future, and whether it is going to be from time to time or one decision on the whole program. I shall try to find that out.

INDUSTRY

IMPORTATION OF AUTOMOBILES

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government respecting the importation of foreign automobiles into Canada. This is a question I would normally address to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

I understand that when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was recently asked in the other place whether Canada was considering placing import restrictions on the importation of foreign cars, he said—I am paraphrasing, but I think fairly accurately—that while the department did not currently have such a move in mind, Canada would, of necessity, have to take into account any decisions that the United States might make in respect of such action in that country. I now understand that the United States government has made a decision, and that decision is that it will not, for the time being at least, place any restriction on the importation of foreign cars.

● (1430)

So the question that I would have directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development is this: In view of the United States decision—if, in fact, I am correct in believing that it has been taken—can it now be assumed or understood that Canada, for the time being at least, is not considering import controls or restrictions on the importation of foreign cars? I might add that I believe it is a fact that for October 1979 the total importation of foreign cars into Canada was 55 per cent higher than for October the previous year, and that for the ten months ending in October 1979 the total imports were up by just over 40 per cent as compared with the same ten-month period of the previous year.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, might I ask, by way of clarification, if the honourable senator, when he speaks of foreign cars, means non-United States foreign cars?

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable senator for bringing that to my attention. I did mean to make it clear that United States cars were excluded from the import of my question.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, I read in yesterday's New York Times that the Federal Trade Commission made the decision that has been referred to after lengthy hearings. I shall endeavour to ascertain whether the government will automatically follow the results of that inquiry in the United States, or will simply take it into account in making its own decision.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John M. Godfrey moved the second reading of Bill S-15, respecting the Royal Canadian Legion.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill provides for four amendments to the act incorporating the Royal Canadian Legion. The first amendment deals with membership of the Legion, and an amendment in somewhat similar terms came before the Senate in Bill S-10 about two-and-a-half years ago in March 1978. That amendment provided that the Royal Canadian Legion, as well as offering membership to members of the armed forces, could have as members other persons who support the purposes and objects of the Legion. Senator Connolly, the sponsor of that bill, gave rather an extensive speech at that time describing the Royal Canadian Legion, its membership and so on, and I refer honourable senators to that speech which is reported in Hansard for March 16, 1978, at page 463. I shall not repeat what he said at that time.

The bill went to committee, where there were objections expressed to opening up the membership so widely, because this had not been approved at a Dominion Convention of the Legion. There were, therefore, amendments proposed and carried in committee restricting the extension of full membership to the RCMP and sons and daughters of members of the armed forces. The bill, as amended, was passed by the Senate, and sent to the House of Commons where it received third reading on that basis.

At the Legion Convention held in Edmonton in June 1978 this question was discussed, and it was decided that they wanted the wider powers—that is to say, they did not want to restrict the extended membership to the RCMP and sons and daughters of members of the armed forces, but to extend it to other persons who support the purposes and objects of the Legion. This was specifically approved at that convention.

Then again at a convention held in Penticton this summer three other amendments were approved, which I shall refer to briefly. I might also add that when this bill was discussed in 1978 it was pointed out that the average age of the members of the Legion at that time was 61, and since a couple of years have passed since then it would seem that it is now 63. As time goes on, it is obvious that the people who have been the backbone of the Legion will gradually die off. The Legion has extensive programs for aged veterans, low cost housing, youth and sports programs, but eventually there will not be anybody left who is active enough to carry these on unless they have other people coming along to take the places of the present members. That is why they are concerned, and why they want to extend the membership. They will, no doubt, lay down detailed requirements in their by-laws as to who they will have as members.

The second amendment which is sought involves a technical change to allow the passage of by-laws to deal with the amalgamation of branches. Many more branches are amalgamating, and I suppose it is because of the dying-off of the members. But there was no actual provision for this in the original act.

The third amendment sought involves a technical change designed to allow the by-laws to deal with procedures for the election of officers at Dominion Conventions. The present act provides that the officers shall be elected by a majority of those voting at conventions. In fact, candidates for election as vice-presidents are usually put on one ballot, and this causes some difficulty because some people may be elected a vice-president who do not actually get a majority of the overall votes cast.

The fourth change sought has to do with protecting the words "Canadian Legion", "Legion" and certain insignia used by the Legion, including the poppies that are widely sold around Remembrance Day, and that is provided for in the bill. In that respect, I might say it was pointed out to me this morning that there is an error in the schedule to the bill which describes the poppy as being red with the centre portion being black, while, in fact, the centre portion is green. But that is an error that can be corrected in committee.

I do not think there is anything further I need to say at this time except that I feel that this bill should be referred to committee. The last time a bill of this kind came before this house it was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, because that is the committee which deals with veterans affairs. I presume that that is the committee to which this bill should be referred, if and when it receives second reading.

Senator Deschatelets: Did I understand the sponsor to say that all these changes were approved by the Legion?

Senator Godfrey: It is my understanding that they have been approved at a Dominion Convention of the Legion. The first one was approved two years ago at Edmonton, and the other three were approved, I am informed, this summer at the Dominion Convention at Penticton.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment motion I wish to make two comments. Most of the items on the order paper have been stood, but we should recognize for the record that these days our proceedings are to some extent dominated either directly or indirectly by the activity of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada. However, I understand that the Commons is now debating Bill C-6, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1980, and may vote on it today. If it is passed, we can expect the bill tomorrow, together with some other business from the other place.

If Bill C-6 is voted on today, we should receive the message from the other place at 2 o'clock tomorrow; if it is debated and voted on tomorrow, we should receive it some time tomorrow. In either eventuality we could have first reading tomorrow. Because of the exigencies of the time limit on Bill C-6, and in order to avoid having to extend the time period again, I suggest that we meet Monday evening to give us more room to deal with the bill next week.

Depending on what happens with reference to the Bank Act in the other place today and tomorrow, I wish to warn honourable senators that I may well move, when we adjourn tomorrow, that we sit Monday night.

Just to project what might then take place, depending on the Senate's giving leave or giving support, as the case may be, to the various stages, we could consider the bill next week and certainly give it second reading, and then third reading, because in both the debate stage and the committee stage we are helped by the fact that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has already studied the subject matter of the bill and it is expected that Senator Hayden will, as chairman of that committee, sponsor the bill. He will certainly be able to help the Senate considerably with reference to debate, both on the subject matter of the bill and on its particular provisions.

I thought before we adjourned, honourable senators, I should warn you that we might well wish to sit Monday evening for the purposes I have outlined.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in response to the deputy leader, may I say that I certainly understand the problem he has put before us because the deadline for this bill is the end of this month, which means that next week is the total time allotted to us to deal with it. Despite that, I am not convinced that it would be necessary to meet on Monday night. I feel it might suffice to meet early on Tuesday. My reason for saying that is that we have had a pre-study of this bill that has taken place for a considerable length of time in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee under the chairmanship of the Honourable Senator Hayden.

This bill, in its present or previous forms, has really been studied to death in that committee. It has been there for two or three years at least. It has been most carefully examined. I would not in the slightest be surprised if the chairman of the committee had reached the point in the committee's considerations where he would be able to submit his report to this house. That will be a valuable document, and, if it is available first thing when we get to the study of this bill, I am sure we will be able to deal with the matter expeditiously, even if we do not meet Monday night.

Senator Frith: I agree with what Senator Roblin has said. It is generally acknowledged amoung honourable senators that Senator Hayden will be the quarterback—if I can use a timely phrase—of this bill in this chamber.

Senator Roblin: "Mastermind" would be a more suitable term.

Senator Frith: Yes, "mastermind" would perhaps be more accurate, if not superficially timely. I intend to ask Senator Hayden for his estimate on what will be required to achieve the objectives. If it turns out that he feels, because of the pre-study and because of everything Senator Roblin has mentioned, that a meeting on Tuesday afternoon, for example, would give us adequate time, then I will so report tomorrow and I will not call the Senate for Monday night. However, if he feels that he would like to have that extra time, then, to be perfectly candid, I intend to try to accommodate him because of what Senator Roblin has said as to his experience with the bill.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, possibly I should add a few words at this point, seeing that I have been designated as the "quarterback" for this bill. Incidentally, that is a novel description, because in real life I never achieved that position. Because I was built close to the ground, there were other areas in the game of rugby, as we used to play it, in which my special physical qualifications had more application. In any event, I do not expect those physical qualifications will have any application to the consideration of this bill.

While the tendency seems to be to favour not sitting on Monday night, I should just recite the problem we have. We have done a pre-study of the bill in relation to most of the amendments which were made by the Commons committee in the summer recess and immediately upon the resumption of the fall sitting. The report has been prepared, and yesterday half of it was given to the translators; the rest of it should be in the hands of the translators by now. Usually we reckon on a delay of anywhere up to four or five days for the translation process. However, I am trying to expedite that aspect of the matter.

Quite apart from that, there are several amendments in the bill in the form in which it will come to us. The question therefore arises whether in those circumstances we should simply give the bill first and second readings, debate it and then go on to third reading, or whether, even though it might be somewhat perfunctory, we should send the bill to committee. It might develop—I think I can make it stronger than that—I think it will develop, having regard to the attitude of the majority of the members of the committee and the subject matter as it will be developed in the supplementary subject matter report, that the committee will demand that the minister attend again, before the committee.

Consequently, this is the way I see the schedule: We can sit on Monday evening, if we have the bill, because we cannot proceed to second reading without the members having the bill before them. The explanation on second reading could be given on Monday evening and we could sit on Tuesday morning for whatever debate might arise as a result of the explanation given on second reading. Then during the day, on a reference of the bill to committee, the committee could sit; and I cannot see that sitting taking more time than the afternoon of Tuesday.

I am a great believer in not measuring the time so carefully that you just receive a bill at the last minute of the last hour. That is a risky course of action to follow. There is too much at stake there to do that, when you realize that, if we reach November 29, which is a week from Saturday, without having approved the bill, in whatever form we will approve it, and without having sent it back to the Commons, then, when the depositors or others who deal with the banks go to their banks on the following Monday morning, they will find all the doors locked. You can imagine the kind of uproar that will develop across Canada if that happens. They will immediately conclude the worst. There is no use telling them that the banks make money and that they have lots of money on hand. They will say, "The doors are closed. We can't get at it."

● (1450)

So we have to avoid that by all possible means. Therefore, I suggest that we allow ourselves more time at the beginning of next week to be sure that we can deal with everything to the wishes of the Senate and be ready in time, rather than have the other shocking situation occur.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, that is one of the most convincing speeches I have listened to in some time. I will be here Monday night.

Senator Frith: I suppose it is true that we should show more concern for the creditors rather than the debtors, who might be happy to see the banks closed on Monday.

Therefore, I will probably give that notice tomorrow, and I respectfully ask honourable senators to plan their calendars for next week accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Before I put the question on the motion to adjourn, I should like to inform the Senate that I cannot be here tomorrow owing to a bereavement in my family. The Honourable Senator Lapointe has accepted my invitation to occupy the Chair at the opening of the sitting, and the Honourable Senator Deschatelets will replace her when she has to leave to attend a committee meeting.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Messrs. Lapierre, de Jong and La Salle have been substituted for those of Messrs. Tobin, Robinson (Burnaby) and Epp on the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION BILL, 1980

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-6, to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

• (1405)

Senator Frith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday, November 24, 1980.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before proceeding with Presentation of Petitions, some senators who may have to leave should know that later I will move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next at 8 p.m. This adjournment results from having Bill C-6, the Bank Act legislation, placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday evening.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the National Film Board of Canada, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 20(2) of the National Film Act, Chapter N-7, R.S.C., 1970.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) presented, for Senator Perrault, Bill S-17, to implement conventions between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Bill read first time.

Senator Frith, for Senator Perrault, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday next, November 24, 1980.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981, and ask that it be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of today and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 1269.)

Senator Everett moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CLOSING OF CN EXPRESS TERMINALS—TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, I ask leave to report on a matter which was under discussion at the last two sittings of the Senate about a possible investigation by that committee of the proposed closing of certain Canadian National Express terminals or offices.

Honourable senators will recall that this matter was discussed at length on Tuesday evening last, and there was considerable expression of opinion that it would be appropriate to have such an investigation. Yesterday, as chairman of the committee, I said that I would consult the steering committee and the proper officials of the Senate with a view to seeing whether I might be permitted today to bring forward a motion.

I have consulted the steering committee, which has concurred in the idea that this matter should be so investigated, and I have consulted the appropriate officials and officers of the Senate. As a result thereof, I now move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e):

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine and report upon the question of the proposed closing of certain Canadian National Express terminals or stations and matters related thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, November 24, 1980, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the motion is put, honourable senators, I wish to explain that, as I indicated yesterday afternoon, we hope to have the Bank Act revisions before us on Monday. We already have the message with respect to the act, and we expect that the bill will be printed and available for consideration by honourable senators for our sitting Monday evening. It will probably be our principal order of business that evening, and we hope to be able to refer the bill to committee and so complete that stage of second reading debate on Monday evening. Our optimism is based on the fact that the committee has studied the act for some period of time and in great detail.

Senator Walker: We have studied it for years.

Senator Frith: For years, as Senator Walker points out. Nevertheless, we expect there will be some debate. But because of that substantial and long term pre-study we hope there will only be a few matters requiring further study by the committee. If, then, we are able to complete that second reading stage on Monday evening, it will mean that the committee can sit on Tuesday morning. I mention that because the chairman of the committee suggested that the Senate sit at 11 o'clock on Tuesday morning to finish up the debate on second reading we hope to commence on Monday night. Without suggesting that we must complete the debate on second reading on Monday night—and I have conferred with Senators Roblin and Macdonald on this—I emphasize that we hope to do so. In that case we could send the bill to committee on Tuesday morning and perhaps have it reported back to the house for consideration Tuesday afternoon. These targets are not hard and fast, but we do hope to make a good start on the Bank Act early in the week and thus avoid the feeling that the November 30 deadline is breathing down our necks.

Senator Asselin: So the Senate is going to be a rubber stamp as usual.

Senator Frith: Senator Asselin says that we are going to be a rubber stamp as usual, but, with respect, that comment is not appropriate in this instance. The subject matter of Bill C-6 was given a great deal of pre-study in committee, where the eventual form and wording of the bill was greatly influenced by members from both sides of the Senate.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I might add a word, I did have the advantage of consultations with my colleague, the Whip on this side, and with the Leader of the Government, and I do appreciate the point that Senator Asselin raises, because it presents us with our typical dilemma. The situation may be ameliorated somewhat because of the very extensive pre-study referred to, and I suppose it is reasonable to expect that we might be able to conclude second reading stage on Monday, depending, of course, on the number of senators wishing to intervene in the debate.

I can appreciate the position of those members of the Senate who are not members of the committee, because for them it may well be a relatively new matter and one cannot foreclose their options, and I know the Leader of the Government agrees with me on that. But I would say the prospects look reasonably good that we can dispose of it Monday night, and, if we do, the agenda as outlined could be followed.

Senator Frith: Also on the point raised by Senator Asselin, I want to underline that I also feel frustrated on occasions when we are stuck with deadlines. I was merely underlining that in this particular case, at least, we have had the opportunity to give a great deal of pre-study to this piece of legislation.

• (1420)

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, we have been studying this bill for over four years. The matter has come before us at least three times and we have made all sorts of amendments. No bill has ever received greater study and consideration than this bill, and I would be delighted to co-operate in getting it through on Monday night.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, may I draw the attention of the Deputy Leader of the Government to the desirability of informing senators as early as possible of any change in the routine of the Senate's meetings. As it stands, the routine is that we adjourn on Thursday afternoons until Tuesday evenings, and as we approach Christmas it will become increasingly difficult for senators to change their schedules. For instance, to my discontent I just found out a few moments ago that it will be difficult to change my reservations to Monday.

For myself, I try always to plan ahead, and I know many of my colleagues do likewise. I try to make reservations weeks in advance. It is necessary to do that, if you live at any great distance from Ottawa. If the Senate is not informed sufficiently in advance of a change in routine, say from Tuesday evening to Monday evening, the problem arises of trying to find accommodation on the airlines. As I say, that will become extremely difficult the closer we approach Christmas. I am sure the deputy leader appreciates this problem and will do everything he can in future to advise us well in advance of any changes from the normal schedule.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am grateful to Senator Rowe for his observation. I appreciate that there can be considerable difficulty in making changes in travelling schedules, particularly with respect to trips between Ottawa and either the east coast or west coast or other distant points. However, I am sure Senator Rowe also appreciates that I always try to do exactly what he has requested. Indeed, in this particular case, when I learned yesterday that we would be receiving the Bank Act, I immediately announced that it would be my intention to move the adjournment to Monday. Making that announcement yesterday was the earliest I could do so, and I will continue to have regard for these problems of time scheduling for trips both east and west from Ottawa.

Just to be absolutely sure that there is no doubt about the matter, I gave no notice with reference to Tuesday because, as honourable senators will realize, according to our rules, if we sit on Monday evening at 8 o'clock, the next sitting of the Senate will be on Tuesday at 2 o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT OF CANADIAN POLISH CONGRESS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to draw your attention to the presence in the gallery of the newly elected President of the Head Executive Board of the Canadian Polish Congress, Mr. Jan Kaszuba, and his Vice-President, Mr. Marek S. Malicki, and Professor Jan Fedorowicz, all of whom will be appearing this afternoon before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

COLD LAKE, ALBERTA—HEAVY OIL PROJECT—FEDERAL LOAN TO IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development in relation to the announced loan by the federal government of $40 million to Imperial Oil with respect to the Cold Lake heavy oil project. Will the minister explain to the Senate how the proposed loan to Imperial Oil ties in with the announced government objective of Canadianization of the Canadian petroleum industry?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I am not sure that there is a direct tie there. However, there is a direct tie to be made with the government's stated policy of encouraging as-rapid-as-possible development of the enormous deposits of heavy oil, of which the Cold Lake project is one.

The reason for the loan, as expressed by the Minister of Energy, is that, in the absence of an agreement, the loan would give the company the confidence that there was a time within the reasonably near future when it could proceed with that program. Moreover, the government would not like that group of highly technical people involved in the project to be disbanded, because there is already a shortage of that class of skills. Now that they have been assembled by the company, we want to do what we can to make sure that they are in place and that that project can go ahead, because we have consistently given high priority to meeting at least part of Canada's deficit in crude oil from those resources.

● (1425)

OIL—ADVANTAGE OF DOMESTIC PRODUCTION

Hon. R. James Balfour: Would the honourable minister explain why it is more in the interest of Canada for our country to be negotiating for offshore purchases of up to 100,000 barrels a day of additional Saudi Arabian oil at the world price than purchasing the same quantity of oil from western Canadian sources at less than the world price?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): There is no question, honourable senators, that that is more advantageous, or that one source of supply is more advantageous than the other. We obviously believe that Canadian crude oil from Canadian production is the most advantageous route to follow, and we are pursuing that with vigour. However, we also realize that we are not at the stage where we can do that, and probably will not be at that stage until the end of this decade.

We are required to import some crude oil and we have an obligation to consider all offers made, in terms of the volume required, and the price and security of that supply coming to Canada during the years that we need it.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

THE BUDGET—IMPACT ON LOW INCOME FAMILIES

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question to direct to the Deputy Leader of the Government. It relates to a response he made no November 18, 1980, reported at page 1240 of Senate Hansard, during which he made the following statement:

I would also point out that with the pricing schedules for oil and gas included in this government's budget, the burden on the Canadian consumer up to 1984 is $40 billion less than the budget of the former government.

I realize the question will have to be taken as notice, but I would ask the honourable senator whether he would be prepared to table the details of the calculation by which he arrived at the $40 billion figure.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question just put by Senator Balfour is similar to a question put by Senator Marshall yesterday. I undertook then to try to get the necessary details.

INDUSTRY

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT ON AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development relating to the Canada-U.S. auto pact. Can the minister inform the Senate whether Chrysler Canada Ltd. and American Motors (Canada) Limited are expected to meet the production to sales ratio which is provided for in the Canada-U.S. auto pact this year? If they are not expected to meet that requirement, has the government in mind any action in relation thereto?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there has been some speculation in the press that that may not happen. I have also noted that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who has more direct responsibility for this than I do, has made some comments about the situation recently. While I can remember some of those remarks, I think it would be better to take the question as notice so that I can give my honourable friend complete and accurate information.

Senator Smith: I certainly appreciate that assurance, and I shall look forward to having that complete and accurate information in the reasonable future.

Is there any satisfactory guarantee of the medium- and long-term integrity of the provisions of the auto pact if it should be—and I am not asserting that it is at the moment—that two such companies as those just named can disregard it and suffer no adverse consequence so far as the Government of Canada is concerned?

• (1430)

Senator Olson: That perhaps is not the kind of question that I should take as notice as it does not call for any detailed or technical information. What it does is to call for an expression of opinion as to whether or not there will be some problems in the event that we fall short of some of the targets under the auto pact.

I remind my honourable friend that there is a prohibition in the Question Period against asking a minister to express an opinion on policy. A minister can be asked what the policy is, but not what his opinion might be.

In any event, I will not get into that for the moment. I shall refer the question to the minister directly involved for a more detailed answer.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable minister. I was prepared to meet him on his assertion, but I am glad it is not necessary.

GRAIN

SALES TO U.S.S.R.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

In view of the reported impending shortage of wheat and other grains throughout the entire world, would the minister inform us as to the present status of the Canadian embargo on sales of wheat to the U.S.S.R.?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I really do not have very much to add to the statement I made on this question on July 16 last. The statement at that time was that the policy of the Canadian government with regard to the shipment of grain to the Soviet Union is to ship into that market at normal and traditional levels, and not to agree to any fixed ceiling for the present year.

The former government went along with the partial embargo on the sale of grain to the Soviet Union. We as a nation, because of that policy, placed ourselves in an inferior position in relation to the record sales of other exporting countries. Our grain producers thought that we should not stay in that inferior position, with the result that there has been a change in policy.

However, it is not the intention of the Canadian government that that policy should result in the sale of quantities of grain into that market in excess of normal and traditional levels. In other words, we are not endeavouring to multiply our sales in that market. It is important that we should no longer be in an inferior position, so we are following the policy that I enunciated in July. I feel it is a policy that, in all of the circumstances, is a reasonable one.

We appreciate the need to send the Soviet Union a message that aggression in Afghanistan is not warranted and not supported by the Canadian government. However, we feel that our grain producers should have access to that market in the normal way, as we believe the wheat producers in most other, if not all other, exporting countries do.

GRAINS TRANSPORT CO-ORDINATOR—APPOINTMENT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Can the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board inform the chamber as to whether the Government of Canada has made a decision on the appointment of a Grains Transport Co-ordinator?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): There has been no replacement as yet for Dr.

Horner. However, the authority is continuing. The Deputy Grains Transport Co-ordinator, Mr. Radky, is doing all of the things that Dr. Horner did. The word I get from the producers' organizations is that, while he has a much lower profile, his accomplishments are most satisfactory, and he is satisfying the various elements of the trade and the producers in the work that he is doing.

• (1435)

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—SETTING OF INITIAL PRICE

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. I have received some representation from western farmers in the face of the continuing rise of costs, and would ask whether any favourable consideration will be given to an increase in the initial price as soon as possible.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, that question is frequently raised, and was raised recently in the other place. I have received telexes, and so on, from ministers of agriculture in western Canada.

I have taken the position that it would be a mistake to make an immediate increase in the initial payment right now, for probably two reasons: First, that the Wheat Board's receipt of income from a given posting of a price for a given date often takes from three to six months, in the normal course of doing business. Therefore, it would not be right to try to chase up the world price, at least to the extent of asking the Canadian Wheat Board to borrow the money to make the payment, because the farmers would be bearing that cost themselves. I believe that the producers would be the first to object, and would object rather strenuously, if the payment were made by the end of the calendar year, because it would mean that most of them would be taxed on that payment, and they would like to have greater control over their incomes.

In reply to the honourable senator, the Canadian Wheat Board's system is based on orderly marketing principles, and I believe that one of the improvements that can be made is to implement a more orderly system of payments to producers.

Our experience this calendar year has been one of a softening market early in the year, followed by a strengthening one. This spring, when the tentative initial payments for wheat, oats and barley were announced, the prevailing conditions suggested that certain levels were best, but by July the Canadian Wheat Board was able to recommend changes, so that the 1980-81 initial payments for wheat and barley were set higher.

The further strengthening of the world market has led some producers and others to seek a yet higher level. The Canadian Wheat Board is now, of course, making sales at the current market prices, but its sales program is not complete.

As I have suggested, I believe that a more orderly system of payments to producers should be added to our orderly marketing system. By that I mean that a specific pattern of giving consideration, first, to the initial payment for the coming crop year, and then to a possible adjustment, should be established. Orderly marketing, to me, means just that—a realistic initial price and a meaningful final payment in January, followed by the increased initial price in February or March when that can be provided. It would come at a time when farmers' costs are very high before seeding. They need to buy fuel; often they need to buy registered seed; they have repair bills to meet, and so on. Therefore that would be a very appropriate time.

On setting the initial payment, I believe that late June or early July is the most appropriate time, and that would be a change in policy. The Canadian Wheat Board is then in a far better position to assess the market situation and to make a recommendation to the Government of Canada that will, in most years, reflect at least the next six months of marketing.

I would add that from time to time changes in the initial payments are also warranted by the market situation and to encourage producer deliveries. The initial payments for oats are being considered at this time—this is important to the western producers—and I expect to make an announcement at an early date about an increase in the initial price for oats.

Under the system that I have outlined for the timing of the consideration and setting of initial payments, and adjustments thereto, I am confident that grain producers will receive an orderly flow of income.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would encourage the minister in his policy. If he can produce a system that more flexibly reflects the movement of markets and the costs to farmers, that would be a good thing. I am glad to see that he is taking that under advisement.

SALES TO U.S.S.R.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the minister to clarify for me his statement about the shipment, or sale, of wheat to the U.S.S.R. I want to be careful about this, because I do not want to misunderstand, or put words in the minister's mouth, but what I thought I heard him say today was that there was going to be no fixed limit on sales to Russia, and that Canadian farmers should retain their usual access to the Russian markets. I interpret that to mean that to all intents and purposes the embargo is off. If that is incorrect, I wish the honourable the minister would put me right.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I am not going to interpret the honourable senator's interpretation of what I said. I just have to revert to the principles of what I said, namely, that we are prepared to sell into that market at normal, traditional levels, and for this year we have not agreed to any fixed ceiling.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend. It is a little clearer. I interpret that to mean that if we have an embargo it is a pretty dicey one indeed. I am interested in the point, because I know, or I think I know, what has been concerning the minister in connection with the embargo, and that is, his interpretation of the actions of the United States wheat-selling people in the Chinese market. I know that the head of the Wheat Board in Australia has made a statement that he believes he was assured by the Americans, when they went into this thing in the first place, that they would not use their surpluses thrown up by the Russian embargo to trespass on the customary markets of other people. That is the point that I would like to get the government's policy on. Do they feel that the American government has, in fact, breached its undertaking in respect of sales to China?

Senator Argue: I think it was an understanding that the former administration had, and that I believe this administration has also, with the United States authorities, to the effect that our co-operation with them with regard to the partial embargo against the Soviet Union had associated with it a clear understanding that the Americans would not be unduly aggressive in other markets, so as to replace Canada, shall we say, or other exporting nations, in some third market, when we were going along with the partial embargo against the Russian market. I think that stands to reason. I think that that is a reasonable way for reasonable people to operate. I believe that I can say that the Canadian authorities, and the Canadian Wheat Board, feel that that understanding was not fully adhered to, and the recent sale that has just been made—or the recent agreement that has recently been drawn up—with China is based on two particular provisions.

First, the Americans say it is their understanding from this agreement that if the Chinese need more than 9 million tons in a given year they will get the additional quantity from the United States. Then, if they require less than 6 million tons, which is the floor in the China-U.S. agreement, they will distribute that reduction among all of the exporters. My opinion, therefore, is that that is really a very aggressive attitude which is not in keeping with the spirit of the understanding that was arrived at—this was under the former administration—at the time of the partial embargo.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I cannot speak for the former administration that my honourable friend is so fond of referring to; I can only speak about this one. But I ask my honourable friend whether, in view of his statement, he has given any consideration to making representations to the United States government on this point. Indeed, has he made representations?

Senator Argue: Not in the formal sense, for example, of sending the minister a note, but my officials have been in touch with the officials in the United States, and the representations that I have made in a public way, and perhaps that I am making here today, are being brought to their attention on a continuous basis.

EMBARGO ON SALES TO U.S.S.R.—COMPENSATION TO FARMERS

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a question with regard to grain and grain payments, and it is directed to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

It seems to be the policy of the government that farmers will be compensated for the fact that Canada honoured the U.S. boycott of grain sales to the U.S.S.R. The matter of timing of those payments seems, however, to be in some doubt. The Minister of Agriculture said that a cabinet decision can be expected by the end of November, whereas the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board has suggested that a final decision on compensation may not be taken until December or early January. I beg to know which minister is articulating government policy in this matter.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I think that that question should have been addressed to the Minister of State for Economic Development, because he would, I am sure, be in a much better position than I am—and much less biased—to answer the question about timing, but I will go on to give you my more up-to-date version, at any rate.

I am in favour of what the Honourable Eugene Whelan said. That is what I want to see happen. I have not been in the cabinet very long, and I am a little bit sceptical, even after having been in it a few months, as to the speed at which these things get done. I have less faith in that speed than the Minister of Agriculture, but I hope he is right, and I will be happy to bow to his superior understanding of the process and how it works.

The main thing I am concerned about is that this question will be dealt with, and that on the basis of all of the best possible information that is available, and that can be made available, a realistic adjustment or payment will be made.

Senator Bielish: There seems also to be some doubt as to how much the government will be offering in compensation payments. The minister responsible for the Wheat Board said that studies by the government have not yet been completed, and then he went on to suggest that the amount might be about $67 million. That amount of $67 million is identical to the sum forecast by the agricultural economics division of the University of Saskatchewan. Would the minister indicate how it is that he can project compensation in the amount of $67 million, yet on the other hand concede that, in the absence of completed government studies, a real projection cannot be offered?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, a lot of work has been done on this, and there are some preliminary estimates of what the final result of this study may be. I am just trying to be fair. Those are the facts. No figure has finally been arrived at—at least, to the best of my knowledge—and I participated in discussion about this as recently as yesterday. It does seem clear, however, that from all the information that has been brought to my attention, it would be somewhat in the range of the final product of the study undertaken by the University of Saskatchewan. Certainly it appears that it would not be lower, and may possibly be higher. Perhaps I just talk too much, but anyway, what I have said is accurate.

I think that that kind of information is useful to have, but I can tell you that the people doing the study are very careful, and are using what they believe is the most sophisticated model that can be obtained for the purposes of that study. When the study comes forward I would hope that it will gather the support necessary to see it through, and that then the compensation will be paid along the lines of the recommendation.

CROWSNEST RATES—SUBSIDIZATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask my honourable friend, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, a question with respect to the Crow rate, which he knows I am rather interested in?

I would like to ask him what proportion of the Western Development Fund will be used to subsidize the Crow rates.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I have no idea. I am not able to answer that question.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend be so kind as to inquire of his colleague the Minister of Transport, because he is the one to whom credit is given for having made that statement. Perhaps his colleague, the Minister of State for Economic Development, could answer. I am interested in knowing what proportion of the Western Development Fund will be used to support freight rates, either the catch-up on the $180 million or whatever it is that the railways are thought to be losing now, or whether it is intended only for increases in freight costs from here on in.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Well, honourable senators, it is very difficult to give an answer as to how much, especially when the amount has not yet been determined.

● (1450)

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his inadequate answer, but I would ask him again if he would consult his colleague, the Minister of Transport, because he is, apparently, the one who is making statements on the topic.

Senator Olson: I will give an undertaking to do that but I—and I do not like to use the word "suspect"—I do think at this time that there has been a bit of speculation added to what the Minister of Transport might or might not have said.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend can no doubt clarify that matter for us, because we are anxious to get rid of the speculation and obtain the facts. My honourable friend is not famous in this chamber for producing facts, so I encourage him to do so on this occasion.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am sorry my honourable friend missed that. I said the fact is that the amount has not yet been determined. That is a fact. It is fair game to speculate on what that amount may be when it is determined, I suppose, but the fact is that it has not been determined.

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Roblin: I accept that statement, but I encourage my friend to give us the information when he receives it. I think it would be a lot better for all of us if we stuck closer to the facts and refrained from stimulating speculation in the manner adopted by the minister.

Senator Argue: I am going to volunteer another answer. I have just read the statement made today in Regina by the Minister of Transport to the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. We would both be very happy to convey the suggestion of my honourable friend to the Minister of Transport, but I think our earlier answers will show that the process is still going on, and no firm conclusions have yet been arrived at.

CROWSNEST RATES—INVESTIGATION OF C.P. RAIL

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps I could ask my honourable friend, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, a question which, I hope, will be the final one for today as far as I am concerned. Would he tell us whether or not, in the discussions that are taking place with respect to the Crow, any decision has been made about an investigation of CP Rail in connection with that matter?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I suppose it is in the same category as the answer to the other question. No specific policy or details have been arrived at—unless I have missed a meeting—as to a future inquiry. I read in the paper that Senator Olson and I are very strongly in favour of the CP inquiry and that is true. It has almost unanimous support in western Canada, and I believe it would be a very useful thing to do, but I do not have detailed information on how it should be done.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is encouraging speculation again. I wish he would get down to the facts.

ORDERLY MARKETING—FARM-STORED GRAIN

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

This is your day, Senator Argue. I understand you are going to make a significant speech later in the day on energy, so perhaps you had better conserve some.

I should like to make one or two comments, with the indulgence of Her Honour the Speaker, and then ask a question. My first observation is that I hope that the $400 million development fund, which was promised in the budget to help western Canada, is not dissipated by subsidizing railroads in respect of the Crowsnest rate. That would be a real disappointment to many of us in western Canada because we think that that fund should be used to develop the industrial capacity and fill other needs of the west.

Another observation I want to make is in response to the minister's reply to Senator Roblin's question regarding the CPR. The minister indicated that this is the unanimous wish of western Canada where you have one man—

Senator Argue: Almost.

Senator Buckwold: Almost? Well, I must be the one that does not make it unanimous because I think it is time we stopped witch-hunting in western Canada and using the CPR as the whipping boy. It is always a great way of diverting public attention. I happen to be one of those who feel that the railway is doing the best it can under the circumstances.

Senator Argue, as a proponent of orderly marketing, has been reported—I believe by a publication of the Wheat Pool—to have suggested that he favours a much larger application of farm-stored grain as a means of orderly marketing. I have no objection to that particular concept. My question to him is: Is this plan being worked out, or is it just merely an expression of opinion, and if it is being worked out, what kind of advances will be given to the farmers of western Canada for grain that is stored on their farms? Will he follow the American procedure of, in fact, buying the grain and paying the farmer and paying him a charge for storing it, or will it be just a case of another small cash advance and letting the farmer carry the burden?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): With the indulgence of the Chair, I should like to comment on Senator Buckwold's statement about the CP inquiry. I now have to agree that the desire to have the inquiry is not unanimous in this chamber, although this is the first voice that I have heard in opposition to it. Senator Roblin certainly was not complimenting me or anybody else for thinking about it, but I did not hear him say that he would oppose it. I hope it goes forward.

Senator Roblin: First of all, we have to find out whether you are going to do anything.

Senator Argue: I think the inquiry should take place. I think it could be very useful. The Crowsnest agreement is associated with the granting of large tracts of land to the CPR, although it did not happen in the same year. I think it was part of the deal that was entered into in a certain area. If you are going to say that the Crowsnest rate in statutory form is not firm and, therefore, should be changed, I do not see why the grain producers of western Canada should have to accept an additional transportation burden. If, at the same time, the country says that those grants, revenues and large sums of money that have come to the CPR since that time, are permanent, then perhaps the Crow rate should be permanent.

I do not want to have any part of a witch-hunt. I think it is important to the people of Canada that the facts are known. To obtain the facts one does not need to pillory the CPR or to engage in a witch-hunt, but I believe it can be done by persons of a very high calibre and could result in clearing the air and seeing what the facts really are.

In regard to the question of an inventory program, and whether that has been refined to the point where it might be considered something like a cash advance or loan or something else, I can say that a good deal of consideration is being given to this whole question. It comes about in part because of the recent meeting between the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee and the Advisory Committee of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board in which they suggested that they would approve the Wheat Board's having full jurisdiction over the marketing of coarse grains as long as there is an inventory policy in place which would make it possible, at a time of surplus barley production, shall we say, in the prairies, for that grain to be taken off the market at market prices and not allowed to distress the local market to the point that feeders on the prairies have a greater advantage than feeders in eastern Canada. That is one of the places where the policy is being supported.

It is being supported as a good idea because of the recent conference in Saskatoon sponsored by the Canadian Wheat Board and its advisory committee on the whole question of production and the necessity of greater production on the prairies to meet the opportunity of larger world markets. It was said at that conference—and I agree—that if you want to have grain producers confident enough to go out and do their best to increase production to a large degree, they need to be assured that if they should have a bumper crop, and if that bumper crop should take place when world demand is softening, there is some mechanism in place to take the temporary burdensome surplus—temporary even though it may be—off the market and give them some buying power.

The idea is also supported in international discussions about a wheat agreement. It is said if there is going to be a wheat agreement that is meaningful, there must be some policy of inventory support in the interests of grain producers and consumers. That is where the support is coming from.

• (1500)

As far as a defined policy is concerned, there certainly is not one. I could talk about the American policy, but that does not really involve buying wheat on the farms; it involves making loans under certain conditions with certain stipulations.

I think there is room for the Canadian Wheat Board to give consideration—and this is not a cabinet directive—to the possibility of extending its area storage jurisdiction from the normal terminal positions and the country elevator positions, perhaps in a modest way, to on-farm storage. I am not saying it should be agreed to or opposed; I am saying this is something that should be looked at.

It would seem to me that one could ask whether the Canadian Wheat Board might take into its own storage program some modest quantities of grain and store them on the farm, pay the farmers for the grain, pay them the regular storage, but have it completely understood that whenever the Wheat Board needs that grain, and its instructions went out to the farmer to market it, that grain would be taken to market. I think that may be a very useful part of the normal marketing system. Certainly I feel it is a question that should be looked at, and, as far as the advisory committees are concerned, their target is to have whatever they are endeavouring to do in place by August 1. That is the earliest date by which this matter could be finally agreed to.

THE ECONOMY

FACTORS RESULTING IN FAVOURABLE BALANCE OF TRADE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. What factors have contributed to such a favourable balance of trade for Canada in the first nine months of the year? Is it the devaluation of the dollar? Are we becoming more competitive in the export of our manufactured goods? Are we exporting more raw materials?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, my answer would involve some technical detail concerning the various factors. I can answer the question now since I anticipated it. However, since the question was phrased as it was, I will take it as notice and give some more specific detail as to the change in that nine-month period.

PUBLIC WORKS

TERMINATION OF COMMUNITY SERVICES PROGRAM

Hon. Jack Marshall: I think this may be the final question, and I direct it to the deputy leader. I am sure he will have to take it as notice.

My question has to do with the termination of the federally funded Community Services Program, recently announced by the Minister of Public Works. This program is very important to small and isolated communities seeking funding for basic community needs such as water and sewerage programs and neighbourhood improvements.

I was astounded to learn that at a meeting last year between the federal and provincial governments there was a commitment that prior to December 31, 1980, the federal government, with the provinces, would replace that agreement by an improved one to provide for longer-term certainty of the Community Services Program.

Would the deputy leader seek clarification of what will replace the present Community Services Program, particularly when many of the municipalities have committed themselves to long-term loans in order to install things such as water and sewerage systems?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on the assumption that something is replacing it, I will try to find out what that is. I am sure the government knew about the undertakings others may have made while relying on this program. I will try to find out what negotiations took place and what substitute arrangements, if any, were made.

ENERGY

THE BUDGET—POLICY RESPECTING CANADIAN OWNERSHIP OF OIL COMPANIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to a question raised on November 6 by Senator Donahoe. The question concerned the government's policy of promoting Canadian ownership in the oil and gas industry.

I should like to remind the honourable senator that the government is fully committed to the policies enunciated in the budget and the National Energy Program. To use the senator's own words, I believe there are far more carrots than sticks to be found in this program. The government is putting Canadian companies in an advantageous position vis-à-vis foreign companies in terms of the acquisition and development of gas and oil resources.

Canadians must play a greater role in the energy sector. With the incentives offered in our National Energy Program they will be able to achieve this goal.

IMPORTATION OF OIL FROM MIDDLE EAST

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on November 18 by Senator Bosa concerning oil imports from Iraq. I am able at this time to confirm the answer I gave to the senator when he originally raised this question. The situation is that small quantities of oil were being imported from Iraq at the time the hostilities there broke out. Purchasers, however, have been able to arrange for alternative quantities, and there has not been any interruption in Canadian supplies.

THE ENVIRONMENT

POLLUTION—ACID RAIN

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on November 18 by Senator Nurgitz concerning the problem of acid rain.

As my colleague the Minister of the Environment said in the other place, this government is continuing its efforts in relation to the United States. Some progress has been made in this area. Canada has signed a memorandum of intent with the United States, and discussions are under way for the establishment of a treaty of accord with the United States.

Meanwhile, at home, Canada is increasing its research vis-à-vis this subject while encouraging our provincial governments to enforce more stringent limitation orders. Inco has already complied, and Falconbridge and Ontario Hydro plants are being assessed with a view to improving our own acid rain problem.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

THE BUDGET—PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised by Senator Marshall on October 30, 1980, relating to the qualification period for widows' pensions and to the revision of the basic rate of pension. It is a fairly detailed answer, and it may be of wider interest than just to Senator Marshall. I would be quite happy to read the answer in case he wishes to ask a supplementary, or I would be glad to put the answer on the record.

Senator Marshall: It should be put on the record.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

When Bill C-40 was introduced it was with the purpose of providing additional assistance to veterans and widows to the fullest extent possible. This additional assistance took the form of providing further benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act. The major benefit under the Pension Act was the introduction of proportionate pensions for widows. This new benefit will eventually provide pensions for the qualified widows of all disability pensioners who received a monthly pension in their lifetimes regardless of whether their death resulted from military service, or the degree of the disability. This is a major improvement in pension benefits available to surviving widows. Unfortunately the institution of such a benefit is costly. The late Minister of Veterans Affairs was only able to recommend provision of this benefit on the basis that it would be introduced gradually over a period of six and a half years. In that period of time it is anticipated that about 26,000 widows who are not now receiving any benefit under the pension act will become eligible and will receive a widow's pension.

The widows of pensioners who were more seriously disabled, and whose disabilities were assessed at from 38 per cent to 47 per cent are now eligible for the new benefits. The survivors of the next most seriously disabled group, those at the 33-per-cent to 37-per-cent level, will be eligible for widow's benefits on April 1, 1981. The government is most sympathetic to the widows of all pensioners, and if the fiscal situation improves, it will be prepared to re-examine the timetable for the introduction of the benefits.

In the meantime, if the widow of any disability pensioner is experiencing difficulty in managing on her income, the Department of Veterans Affairs has other programs which could be of help to her.

With reference to a revision in the basic rate of pension for veterans, pension rates are adjusted from time to time and the most recent adjustment in 1978 brought the rates into line with the formula which was established in 1973. In addition, the rates are adjusted in January of each year in keeping with the consumer price index. The most recent adjustment of 8.9 per cent took place on January 1, 1980.

Because of this method of increasing pensions the basic rate is now $739.71 a month. This is the amount paid to an unmarried pensioner whose disability pension is assessed at 100 per cent. The comparable amount received by the composite public servant—the average of the five selected categories of unskilled public servant—is $753.30 a month after income tax is deducted at the rate in effect for the province with the lowest income tax rate.

Pensions will be increased in accordance with consumer price index changes on January 1, 1981. The increase will be 9.7 per cent which means that the basic rate of pension will be $811.46 a month. The comparable amount received by the composite public servant, after deduction of income tax at the rate in effect for the province with the lowest tax rate is $818.91 a month.

There are no plans to change the present system in the near future.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on November 18 concerning the Canadian position on human rights violations.

I can confirm for the Honourable Senator Macquarrie that it is indeed the policy of the Government of Canada to speak out against the repression and suppression of human rights in all countries. For example, officials of the Department of External Affairs have expressed Canada's concerns to Salvadorian officials both here in Ottawa and in El Salvador on numerous occasions about the deteriorating situation involving human rights in that country. Canadian concerns have also been expressed directly to Guatemalan authorities both here and in Guatemala on the growing level of violence in that country. Canadian concerns for the respect of human rights in Argentina have been made clear to the Argentine authorities on a number of occasions in both Ottawa and Buenos Aires.

Canada has placed considerable emphasis on efforts to create effective United Nations mechanisms for protecting human rights on a worldwide basis.

Also, Canada has repeatedly condemned apartheid in South Africa, most recently in the address by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the UNGA on September 22, as an affront to human dignity. Canada has manifested its opposition to apartheid in a concrete manner by taking steps to phase out governmental support for trade and commercial relations with South Africa. Canada urges the South African government to implement meaningful reforms to promote equal rights for all South Africans. A continuation of apartheid jeopardizes the peace and security of South Africans of all races.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin on November 19, 1980, concerning the Garrison Dam project.

Honourable senators will remember that Senator Roblin discovered a discrepancy between a press report on this question and the answer that I had given earlier. As it turns out, the press report appears to have ignored the second part of the information because the answer is that the United States Congress has already appropriated the funds for the Garrison project. It is now up to the Executive of that country to release those funds for spending. The decision not to release funds associated with those aspects which would affect Canada was made by the United States Department of the Interior. The U.S. Secretary of the Interior has given us his personal undertaking in that regard.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Bosa on November 18 regarding a possible meeting between the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the leaders of the two warring states in that area.

The answer is that the Prime Minister will not be meeting the leaders of Iran or of Iraq during this trip. He arrives in Luxor, Egypt today, and he will be meeting with President Sadat tomorrow morning.

THE CONSTITUTION

REFERENCES TO APPEAL COURTS BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the last delayed answer I have is to a question asked by Senator Roblin on November 18 concerning references to appeal courts by provincial governments in respect to the constitutionality of the government's constitutional proposals.

The question was in two parts. The first was as to whether the federal government would be represented at those hearings, and the second was as to what the position of the federal government would be in the event of certain conclusions being arrived at by the said courts.

The answer to the first part is that the federal government will indeed be represented at any such hearings, and will make a presentation of its views on the matter before the court.

As to the second part, the question is hypothetical, since it asks for the government's position on a situation that may or may not arise, or which may arise in various forms, and the government will respond to the results of any court decisions on the basis of the actual decision and other circumstances then existing.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 23, the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled "Child at Risk", tabled in the Senate on October 16, 1980.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, this item has stood in my name on the order paper for some time so I shall take just a few minutes of your time this afternoon to say a few words about this report.

The report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled "Child at Risk" is a very impressive document. It is an impressive document in that it is a very readable result of an in-depth study of a subject which has not been given very much consideration in the past. Yet the subject is a matter of importance not only to individuals but to society as a whole.

I admit that when the proposal was first advanced for the committee to make the study, it did not appear to me to be necessary although it might possibly be desirable in a vague sort of a way. I knew, of course, it was a matter dear to the heart of Dr. McGrand, and I expect the fact that such a distinguished and respected senator wanted the study made influenced many of us in its favour.

However, honourable senators, on reading the report I realized a real need existed for this inquiry, and from the foreword it is evident it exists from two points of view. One is the effect on the individuals directly concerned who have been influenced in prenatal life or in early childhood by something which led them to a life of violence or crime in later life. Or if the effect was not that serious there were lesser undesirable characteristics which prevented such persons from becoming happy and productive members of society.

The need from the second point of view is the cost in dollars to society of criminal acts as well as the suffering of many individuals and families as a result of crime and violence. The dollar costs set out in the foreword are frightening. For example, between 1974 and 1978 there was an increase of over 17 per cent in the rate of Criminal Code offences, and of more than 10 per cent in the rate of crimes of violence. Some 138,972 violent crimes took place in Canada in 1978. I think it is a matter of grave concern when, as it is stated in the foreword, recent enlightened efforts to reform offenders and re-integrate them into society, rather than punish them, have not produced encouraging results as 80 per cent of persons admitted to federal institutions have been previously convicted.

And then, the cost in dollars is very high. Apparently, the expense of operating a federal institution averages $25,000 a year per inmate. In the year 1977-78 the total cost of operating federal penitentiaries amounted to $295,526,000, and in the same year it cost the provinces about $600,000 a day to operate their correctional institutions. In that year alone the total cost was over half a billion dollars, and it would now be higher. So, honourable senators, these figures prove, if proof is needed, that crime prevention is good business from a dollar and cents point of view, apart from its beneficial effects on the individuals who otherwise might commit crime.

With these facts in mind, it is apparent the committee was inquiring into a matter of grave concern to society and any recommendations it could make would be of practical benefit.

Now, in order to understand just what the committee wanted to do we need to look at its terms of reference. These are not long and I will read them:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to inquire into and report upon such experiences in prenatal life and early childhood as may cause personality disorders or criminal behaviour in later life and to consider and recommend such remedial and preventative measures relating thereto as may be reasonably expected to lead to a reduction in the incidence of crime and violence in society.

So it is apparent the inquiry was to be a very ambitious project which could have far reaching results.

It was decided the inquiry would be conducted by a small subcommittee known as the Subcommittee on Childhood Experiences as Causes of Criminal Behaviour. From the foreword it is apparent the committee wanted a study in depth. Let me read a paragraph:

> What are the influences in the life of a young child which will so affect the course of his development that he will grow up to be aggressive, antisocial or a violent criminal? How is he influenced by the environment in which he lives? Is there some inherited vulnerability to criminal behaviour? Are the reasons basically social, or are they psychological, emotional or physical? Whatever the reasons may be, what can be done to alter the anticipated development of such a child? These were some of the questions which the Committee asked during the enquiry.

Honourable senators, specifically the subcommittee explored these early childhood experiences which might be the causes of criminal behaviour in the future, and it concluded what steps might be taken to change such harmful circumstances in early life. The committee has given us a vast amount of interesting information and its report will, I expect, become a standard reference work on this subject.

The report shows the inquiry was divided into two parts, though, of course, the two parts are interrelated. One part was the inquiry into experiences in prenatal and early childhood which might later cause personality disorders or criminal behaviour; the second part was to make recommendations as to what might be done to, at least, reduce the incidence of crime and violence in our society. The study has shown the great importance of the prenatal period and the influence on the development of the child by outside factors such as malnutrition or poor nutrition and the use of drugs, alcohol or tobacco on the part of the mother prior to the birth of the child. Apparently, even emotional stress or anxiety can affect the unborn child.

It is rather surprising to learn from the report that the unborn child is influenced so early and to such an extent by matters which affect the mother. It shows, I think, that the unborn child is a living human being which can be influenced just as a child already born can be influenced by the factors studied by the committee. I expect, honourable senators, that the report, as it deals with prenatal influences, will strengthen the belief of those who oppose abortion, because I think it is obvious what is being killed by abortion is not just a piece of tissue but a living human being who is developing and preparing to be born.

• (1520)

After reviewing all the evidence, the committee became absolutely convinced there is no such thing as a natural born criminal. It is environmental factors of one kind or another which cause people to turn to crime or make crime appear attractive. Some are influenced by poverty, and some by poor health, lack of education, a lack of decent housing and the like. And it is surprising to learn the extent which these influences have on early life—the first three years of life, in fact. It is surprising how these factors or influences, which occur in the first three years of life, can shape the physical, moral and mental development of the future adult. The report deals with these factors in some detail and I will not speak of them now.

If I might make a slight criticism of that section dealing with the influence of poverty, I wonder if there is not an undesirable influence extended by what might be called "near poverty." The young child might well be influenced by the strains and stresses in a home where there is a constant nervous pressure to make ends meet from a financial point of view.

I think also more information and more explanation should be given on paragraph 143 on page 51. This states in part that low-rental complexes or subsidized housing lead to a concentration of multi-problem families. While I expect that is so in some cases—and indeed I have heard of such cases—I do not expect it is widespread and I do not believe it to be a problem difficult of solution. Certainly, I would not want the impression to be given that low-rental subsidized housing is not a good thing. I believe it is an excellent plan and a practical answer to a very pressing need. It provides good, decent housing to people with low incomes. And even if it has, or can have, some undesirable side effects, the good it does and the fine results it obtains far outweigh any undesirable side effects.

Honourable senators, from reading the report it is apparent that the committee, through and by the subcommittee, did make an in-depth study of how personality disorders or criminal behaviour may well be influenced by prenatal and early childhood experiences. Indeed, it proved that point beyond any doubt. It proved that some of these influences were emotional privation, child abuse, violence in the home and on the streets, violence seen on television and the like. If from its early years a child lives in a home where there is a very casual attitude towards crime, then such an attitude will develop in the child and will be retained throughout the adult years.

While the report does not mention it directly, I have read that many crimes of violence are the result of persons needing money to buy hard drugs. If a person is addicted to the use of such drugs, apparently he will commit crimes of violence in order to obtain them. If a young child is in a home where the use of drugs is tolerated, or indeed accepted, then the need for such drugs might well lead to crime, and I expect there will be a very undesirable influence on the child which will be reflected in his actions in later life.

In its report the committee finds that there is not a single, simple solution to the problem it has studied—nor, I suppose, did it expect to find one. It is not a simple problem; consequently, there is not a simple solution. I rather suspect that the committee hopes that its recommendations, of which there are 27, will serve as guidelines for future action rather than as an aid in the implementation of immediate policy.

I may say, however, that I was surprised by the third recommendation, found at page 17 of the report. To me, the wording of that recommendation appears in part to be completely out of line with the general policy outlined in the report. I refer to the recommendation which advocates the payment of an allowance to a pregnant woman. I think that is a good idea, and had the recommendation stopped there it would have been well received by me, at least. However, the recommendation goes farther than that. Paragraph (a) states that the allowance should be paid "as soon as possible after the confirmation of a pregnancy and the decision not to terminate it." I object to the words "and the decision not to terminate it." To me those words suggest that the committee is accepting the advocacy of the theory of abortion on request, abortion as a matter of routine. If the committee has accepted that theory, even by implication, then, by that very acceptance, it is promoting the theory, and promoting or advocating an action which is repulsive to many people.

Honourable senators, if such an allowance is to be paid, undoubtedly an application form will have to be filled out on which the question will be asked whether a decision has been made not to terminate the pregnancy. I am sure a great many women would regard such a question as a gross insult.

Turning to another aspect, I feel that the fourth recommendation, which is found on page 18, needs further explanation. It reads:

> We recommend that the medical profession place more emphasis on early diagnosis of potential "high risk" parents and that these parents be encouraged to seek special counselling where indicated.

I should like to know just what is meant by this special counselling that such parents should seek.

In my view, the most important general recommendation is contained in paragraph 169 on page 62. In part, it reads:

> We are fully convinced that early childhood experiences can condition a child towards violent behaviour. We believe multi-disciplinary research is needed. Since such research is of the greatest urgency we recommend that, in order to conserve public funds and to improve the quality of life in Canada by preventing violence, an organization to be known as The Canadian Institute for the Study of Violence in Society be established.

The paragraph then goes on to show the value of such an organization and what its duties and responsibilities would be.

Honourable senators, I can say without any doubt that the report entitled "Child at Risk" is a valuable contribution to the solution of a problem which is growing more acute as time goes on. It is obvious that the members of the committee did a great deal of work in hearing witnesses and studying briefs and other matters before this report could be prepared. The members of the committee have earned the thanks of the Senate for their work, although, as I mentioned, there are two recommendations to which I take vigorous objection.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Thompson, debate adjourned.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board) rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, November 18, 1980:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to Prime Minister Trudeau's constructive energy policy, in particular
> 1. the advantage to Canadians of having prices for oil and gas in Canada lower than O.P.E.C. prices;
>
> 2. the advantage of Canadianizing the industry;
>
> 3. the advantage of the provisions to encourage large numbers of Canadians to invest in the industry;
>
> 4. the advantage to Canada of the provisions concerning conservation; and
> 5. the advantage of other aspects of the policy.

He said: Honourable senators, I placed this inquiry on the order paper because I feel that the government's energy policy should be debated in this chamber, and because I feel that it is a good policy which can contribute a great deal to all parts of Canada. It is true that after the policy was announced there was a feeling of surprise in western Canada. One element of surprise came about because the government did not impose an export tax on natural gas. I take it that was a welcome surprise for many people.

There has been a lot of opposition to this policy—and very strong opposition. The opposition has come, in some measure, from large oil companies. It has certainly come from Premier Lougheed of Alberta, and Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan. While Premier Blakeney does not seem to make his position absolutely clear, he does seem to lean toward the Lougheed position. As far as Saskatchewan is conerned, with respect to the debate on the energy policy and the debate on the Constitution their position is most unclear. It is a wait-and-see policy.

The premier says that, as far as the Constitution is concerned, he will wait and see whether or not there are amendments acceptable to him on the basis of the final resolution that is passed by the House of Commons and the Senate. That is a different stand from that taken by his counterpart in the House of Commons.

I believe Premier Lougheed has embarked on a rather dangerous course. Many people in western Canada talk of alienation and of separation. Indeed, there are a number of organizations already out there which claim to be dedicated to separation. I think the word "separation" comes from the mouths of Conservatives in western Canada, and certainly not from people of other political persuasions. In Saskatchewan, two Conservatives tried to establish a party with the policy of separating Saskatchewan from Canada, and joining the United States. Well, they gathered practically no support. They were not taken too seriously. Others may talk about separation and they may hold big meetings, but I think it is all of a temporary nature.

Premier Blakeney is not clear how he stands on the Constitution. He seems to lean to the side of world oil prices. He has said in advertisements put out by his party that the federal government is robbing the resources of Saskatchewan, that Trudeau is raiding those resources, but the budget was not all that bad for Saskatchewan, even from his point of view. The tax on the export of Saskatchewan oil was cut in half, and the Saskatchewan government, by that action, will have additional revenues in the area of $200 million. The federal government said that it was prepared to be a partner with Saskatchewan in establishing a refinery to upgrade heavy oil at a total cost of $1 billion. To me, that shows that the Prime Minister and the present government have in mind the welfare of the people of Saskatchewan in the total energy policy.

In my own mind, I am not particularly concerned with this so-called separatist movement out west, or any other so-called separatist movements. I do not think that they are a real threat to the country. I think they are passing things. I was disturbed, as a good Canadian, when separatism was being advocated in the province of Quebec, but I was really pleased when Canadians in that province came forward with a No vote. I am also absolutely certain that the turning point in that campaign came when the Prime Minister of this country, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, was able to take part, with his associates in the House of Commons and the full support of the Liberal Party and certain other parties in that province. By that means, he was able to bring about a No vote.

Senator Frith: And senators from both sides, too.

Senator Argue: And senators from both sides, too. I do not want to overlook anybody, because many Canadians went in and did a tremendous job at great personal sacrifice.

As a westerner, as a member of the Liberal Party and as a member of the caucus, having seen the Prime Minister of this country in action in all respects, including in the cabinet, I believe he is just as much interested in having western Canada a functioning part of a united Canada as he was interested, and is interested, in having Quebec a functioning part of a united Canada. I believe that the energy policy is in the interest of all Canadians.

Surely, one cannot bring forward an energy policy that is going to give a portion of the revenue to the federal government—and I do not hear anybody saying there should not be some revenue going to the federal government—that does not have a measure of argument attached to it. There will be differences of opinion, but, as I see it, what has been undertaken in this energy policy is a reasonable apportionment of the revenue which will flow from this industry.

These are not new figures I am using, but they are accurate. Up until the present, the oil industry has taken approximately 45 per cent of the revenue, provincial governments 45 per cent, and the federal government 10 per cent. Under the projected energy policy, the provincial share will be reduced from 45 per cent to 43 per cent, the federal government's share will be increased from 10 per cent to 24 per cent, and the industry's share will be reduced from 45 per cent to 33 per cent. I do not think we should immediately say that the oil industry is going to be damaged and crippled, and will not be able to function because of this. I am convinced, from all the projections that have been made, there will be ample room for a healthy oil industry in Canada, and that in the foreseeable future, in the next few years, it will still be controlled, in the main, to the extent of more than 50 per cent, by foreign investors.

As a Canadian, I think that this essential industry should be Canadianized, that there should be a larger part in control and ownership played by Canadians. I do not support the present mix which shows that last year revenue from the foreign-controlled industry amounted to $6.151 billion, and revenue from the Canadian-controlled oil and gas industry amounted to $1.608 billion, for a foreign-controlled share of the oil and gas industry of 72 per cent. The government, under this policy, is determined to correct this imbalance.

The hue and cry going up in the oil industry is that it has to be able to generate huge amounts of capital and that it needs to look to foreign capital coming in to develop, yet the oil and gas industry, far from drawing in foreign capital, since 1974 has been a capital exporter. The industry has supported net capital outflows from 1975 to 1979 of $2.1 billion. Some of this outflow has represented a return of capital to foreign owners, while some has represented new foreign investment by Canadian companies. If dividends and interest payments are added to this total, the total outflow over the period from 1975 to 1979 becomes approximately $3.7 billion. Dividends rose from $200 million in 1973 to $600 million in 1979. In addition, the foreign parents have received fees for technological, operating and managerial services.

• (1540)

So, the industry has done well. It has exported capital from Canada. I am one who believes that Canadians are capable of producing more and more of the investment capital necessary in the oil industry to bring the target 50 per cent under Canadian ownership. I think it is reasonable, and I think it can be done.

When this policy was announced, certain provincial premiers complained. The Province of Alberta claims that it is a raid on Alberta's resources by central Canada; that it is a raid on those resources mainly by the population of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

I sat in the House of Commons at a time when there was great discussion of the oil industry, when a certain famous Canadian, Carl Nickle, was a member of the house. His speeches then were in favour of the oil industry, oil development, as his speeches are now. I have read his comments from time to time over the years.

I heard neither Carl Nickle nor Premier Lougheed complaining in the period when consumers of oil and gas from the Ottawa Valley line west were paying extra money for Alberta oil. There were no complaints then. The Alberta oil industry and the Province of Alberta, and the people in that region of Canada, gained $2 billion during that period as a result of additional charges on the consumers in that part of Canada from the Ottawa Valley west. I do not think it is unjust to reverse the whole process. The revenues from resources in Alberta and Saskatchewan should not be totally, or even 90 per cent, blocked from the federal government. I think the people of Canada have a right to a larger share in the revenues from those sources.

I am certainly in favour of the Canadianization of the resource sector. I am not an oil expert, but as I read the policy, I think Canadianization has a great opportunity. Petro-Canada will be taking a 25 per cent interest in the Canada Lands. I am amazed to see from a map of the Canada Lands that the acreage in the ownership of the people of Canada through their federal government is almost twice as great as the acreage of the 10 provinces combined. That is a tremendous area of the country, and Petro-Canada will take a 25 per cent interest in developments in that large part of the country.

There are provisions to encourage Canadians to invest in their own industry. There are incentive grants placed in the budget and the National Energy Program to encourage Canadians to invest in their own industry.

The multinationals claim that they put in the risk capital and that this was necessary for the country. Yet, I am informed by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources that the depletion allowances, the tax concessions, often were 100 per cent or greater than the total cost of exploration. In other words, the public of this country has been paying the exploration costs, with the discovered oil resources becoming the property, in the main, of the multinational corporations. Well, surely that is not the wisest policy for any country to follow.

The incentive contained in the National Energy Program provides for the return of 80 per cent of the investment by Canadians by way of incentive grants. To be able to have a $1 investment for 20 cents is not too bad. It is better than the proportion under the Western Grains Stabilization Act; it is better than crop insurance. It is two-to-one under the Crop Insurance Program, and three-to-one under the Western Grains Stabilization Program. This particular arrangement provides for a four-to-one ratio.

Then there is an additional sweetener in the form of a further deduction that can be taken on the corporation's income tax return, namely, a further concession of 13 cents on the dollar. So, for every dollar that a Canadian invests in the Canada Lands through a Canadian company, the cost will be 7 cents. I can see a lot of Canadians wanting to invest in the Canada Lands on that basis. As well, the provinces are going to make it easy for Canadians to invest in provincial lands through Canadian companies.

I think this policy has a great deal of support. The Prime Minister made a speech in the City of Regina before 2,000 people, and supporting that meeting and in attendance in substantial numbers—and, incidentally, they paid $25 a plate, so it was not something that was free—were such organizations as the Multicultural Council of Saskatchewan, the Saskatchewan Urban Municipalities Association; the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities, the Saskatchewan School Trustees Assoociation, the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture, the Palliser Wheat Growers Association, the Western Canada Cow-Calf Association, and the Regina Chamber of Commerce.

That is not to say that they agree with the policy, but it does mean that they were prepared to attend that meeting and hear the Prime Minister of Canada, and I think that that was a wise thing for them to do. I would be just as happy if the Premier of Alberta were to experience the same kind of thing on a visit to Saskatchewan. I do not think there is anything wrong with that. I think it should be done, and I am pleased that these organizations were prepared to attend that meeting and listen to the Prime Minister, give him a hearing, and weigh what he had to say.

Sure the media twisted what was said. Individuals who were there that night—and they were very influential people—say, "The Prime Minister did not say that; that that wasn't the way he said it." You can clear a lot of air when you have the leader of the country go out and talk to representatives and leaders of responsible groups, such as were present that night. But, you know, the media watches the Prime Minister; they really do.

Senator Choquette: They made him.

Senator Argue: They do not say very much good about him. I do not think they really give him a fair shake. But people in public life get used to that. He went out there. He wanted to have his speech televised. Well, he didn't simply decide to take the money out of the public treasury to buy television time in Saskatchewan. To put this speech over the private television network in Saskatchewan, it was necessary—and I do not complain—that the Liberal Party produce the funds necessary to buy that television time, and that was done. But it is strange to me that when Premier Lougheed of Alberta was making a speech on the same subject, he went on provincial television in the Province of Alberta, paid for by the taxpayers of Alberta.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Argue: He did not collect from the Conservative Party, and he did not ask the oil barons to put up the money; he collected it from the taxpayers of Alberta.

Well, I am not even too critical of that. But when the opposition parties in Alberta asked for television time, there was nothing doing. So, there is public money in Alberta to give one side of the case and no public money to give the other side of the case, and I do not think that is defensible.

Then when one member in his own party, Mr. Sindlinger, said he did not agree with Mr. Lougheed, they kicked him out of the party. They expelled him. I was a member of a party years ago when once in a while I got the same urge, but I was not expelled. Of course, had I stayed around a little longer, I don't know what might have happened. In my opinion, every time a person is expelled from a party, the party loses. It is a mistake to expel someone merely because at some point in time he disagrees with either the party or the leader. Is this a free country, or isn't it?

• (1550)

I have watched this Liberal Party in operation, and I find the Liberals very tolerant—so tolerant that sometimes it is hard to get up enough energy and really attack something, because they want to take into account all points of view, and sometimes, as a politician, that is not conducive to getting where you want to go.

I have noticed that if the Prime Minister has, within the Liberal Party, a dissenter, that dissenter has his say. He makes his contribution. He is not ridiculed; he is not threatened with expulsion. That word is not used, there is not even a rumour, and often I have found that a year or two later the person who was in opposition becomes one of the Prime Minister's strongest supporters. So in the long run we gain by a little tolerance. But Mr. Lougheed removed that man from his party.

I believe there are two sides to this case. There is one side, which is certainly the side of the multinational oil companies. There is another, which is Mr. Lougheed's side. That is certainly true. Mr. Blakeney stays as close to Mr. Lougheed as he really dares, under the circumstances. He keeps complaining, and there are paid ads, and so on, that Saskatchewan is not getting the world price for oil.

I have done some work on a table of oil costs. I have already used the information publicly on one occasion and I should like to refer to it today. The contents of the table might be easier to comprehend if it were printed as part of my remarks.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

HERE'S WHAT BLAKENEY-LOUGHEED WORLD ENERGY PRICES (as set by OPEC) WOULD COST YOU:

If you are a:	Your average annual energy consumption would be:	Your annual cost at 1984 Lougheed-Blakeney world prices (as set by OPEC) would be:	Your annual cost in 1984 under the Government of Canada Energy Policy would be:	Your annual savings under the Government of Canada Energy Policy would be:
Homeowner	Natural Gas 160 M.C.F. per year	$1,255.00 ($7.84 per M.C.F.)	$ 615.00 ($3.84 per M.C.F.)	$ 640.00 ($4.00 per M.C.F.)
Pensioner	Home Heating Oil 960 gals. per year	$2,073.00 ($2.16 per gal.)	$1,382.00 ($1.44 per gal.)	$ 691.00 (72¢ per gal.)
Motorist	Gasoline 1000 gals. per year	$2,960.00 ($2.96 per gal.)	$2,070.00 ($2.07 per gal.)	$ 890.00 (89¢ per gal.)

Businessman	Natural Gas 320 M.C.F. per year	$2,510.00 ($7.84 per M.C.F.)	$1,230.00 ($3.84 per M.C.F.)	$1,280.00 ($4.00 per M.C.F.)
Trucker	Truck Diesel 24,000 gals. per year per unit	$67,680.00 ($2.82 per gal.)	$45,120.00 ($1.88 per gal.)	$22,560.00 (94¢ per gal.)

HERE'S WHAT YOU SAVE UNDER THE FEDERAL LIBERAL "MADE IN CANADA" ENERGY POLICY:

Source — Estimates from Department of Energy, Mines and Resources

Senator Argue: I should now like to refer to certain parts of the table. I would mention first the Province of Saskatchewan and the cost involved for a homeowner, using an average amount of natural gas under the prices projected by the national energy policy and under the projected world prices for natural gas in 1984. The table shows that under world prices, supported by Premier Lougheed and Premier Blakeney, the cost of natural gas for the homeowner would be $1,255. Under the national energy policy, the cost would be $615, or a saving to a homeowner in the Province of Saskatchewan in 1984, using natural gas, of $640.

I am told that while the figures would be somewhat different in another province, there is not that much difference, that in the Province of Alberta you would probably be within 1 or 2 per cent of precisely the same figures.

So when Mr. Lougheed talks about world energy prices, let us bear in mind that those prices will mean a penalty for every homeowner using natural gas in Alberta and Saskatchewan—and, indeed, throughout Canada—of between $600 and $700 per year.

For a person using home heating oil—960 gallons is said to be the average consumption—the cost would be $2,073 at OPEC prices, and $1,382 national energy policy prices, a saving of $691.

For a motorist using 1,000 gallons of gas a year—that is perhaps 20,000 miles, depending on the type of car—the cost is $2,960 at world prices, and $2,070 at national energy policy prices, a saving of $890 in driving his car in 1984.

A farmer using 3,000 gallons of diesel fuel would pay, under OPEC, $7,680, and under the national energy policy—under the Trudeau energy policy, under the Liberal energy policy—$4,866, a saving of $2,820.

A farmer who uses 3,000 gallons of purple gas—that is the gas that he can burn in his trucks and on which there is no road tax applied—would pay $8,250 under the OPEC prices, and $5,580 under national energy policy prices, a saving of $2,670.

If honourable senators add up all of those savings they will see that as a homeowner, as an automobile driver, and as a user of diesel fuel and purple farm gas, the Saskatchewan farmer, under the Trudeau policy and not the Blakeney policy, will save over $7,000 in 1984. I say from the floor of the Senate that it is in the interest of the Saskatchewan farmers, homeowners and business people to support a national energy policy that says there should be reasonable prices to the consumer, and that those prices should not be at the OPEC international level. We do not have to have the cartel level. We do not have to have the cartel getting $40 a barrel for light crude that was brought into production at a profit of $2 per barrel. We do not need that. We do not need to rip off Canadians, to give it away to the multinational oil companies, or to give the incomes of Canadians into the hands of a few multinational oil companies or one province.

I have seen the projection that if nothing is changed, and the present trend continues, within five years the big multinational oil companies and one province will have under their control 60 per cent of all the investment capital in this country. It is projected that the Lougheed government will be getting, under the federal policy, up to 1990 and beyond, as much as $100 billion. Up until 1984, western provinces will get $40 billion.

I do not think they need to get additional tens of billions of dollars at the expense of consumers and average Canadians. And if that great wealth is in the hands of Alberta and Saskatchewan, are we going to go to those wealthy provinces when we need an increase in the old age pension and say, "Please will you give us an increase in the old age pension?" If we need something for medicare, are we going to go to the provinces that have all the wealth and ask them for it? No. I believe it is fair that we should have a Canadian policy where there is a reasonable distribution of this wealth.

Let us consider the owner of a business—and I will admit that it is a pretty arbitrary business. It might be reasonable if I said that a businessman in heating his premises uses twice the quantity of natural gas that he uses to heat his home, and that instead of one car he drives two cars. So it is a pretty small business. He would save $1,280 per year.

A man who owns a diesel truck, and keeps it on the road steadily and uses 24,000 gallons of diesel fuel in a year, would save $22,560 under the national energy policy—I repeat, $22,560. The reason why a diesel truck owner would need so much more than a farmer is because his truck operates virtually every day of the year; it has a big motor and it consumes perhaps 10 gallons per hour. When it is on the road with a large load it just burns up diesel fuel and, from our inquiries, 24,000 gallons is approximately the quantity of fuel that a big transport truck normally uses in the course of a year.

Senator Frith: What is his percentage of saving?

• (1600)

Senator Argue: The cost is $2.82 a gallon under OPEC prices, and $1.88 per gallon under national energy policy prices. So that is a saving of close to a dollar—a 35 per cent saving. That is a very major saving.

I am perfectly happy, therefore, based on this evidence, to take my position on the side of the Trudeau policy, the Lalonde policy, the Liberal government policy, the Government of Canada policy. It is a policy preferable to those followed by certain premiers advocating that the world price should be paid by all Canadians.

We are in a constitutional fight, and we are in a fight over energy policy. We surely know that. We really know that, too, in western Canada. We know who is on the side of the multinationals—the Premier of Alberta, the Conservative Party of Canada, the Conservative Party of Saskatchewan. They want the full OPEC prices. They talk about the dangers of separation, and as they talk about the dangers of separation they implant the idea of separation.

You can be with them, or you can take your position on the other side. I think the position we take is in the interest of the homeowner, the pensioner, the motorist, the farmer, the businessman and the trucker—and there are other Canadians interested in the policy that this government has put forward, and interested in supporting it.

There has been an idea around since an early meeting of the cabinet, when it was suggested that there should be a chance for Canadians, in a broad way, to invest in the oil industry in this country. It was my idea, my suggestion, that we should endeavour, if at all possible, to bring about an investment in the Canadian oil industry by the great co-operative movements of this country. After having made that proposition, I was honoured and pleased to be able to travel with a famous Canadian—a well known Canadian—Mr. Jim Coutts, to the Province of Saskatchewan, my province. At the headquarters of Federated Co-ops we talked to them about the need and desire of co-ops to get into the energy business. This was well received. We went from there to discuss the same questions with the board of directors of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and their leading management. It was well received there, and well supported also. Our third call was on the Credit Union Central in Saskatchewan, and I would like to point out to honourable senators that the credit unions in Saskatchewan cash 40 per cent of all the cheques that go through the banking system in that province. If all the credit unions were called a bank, it would be the biggest single bank in the province.

When we talked about such investment to each of those three large, representative, powerful financial institutions, they indicated they were anxious to do something like that. They talked of Canadianization. They talked of working with the federal government, and of their role in bringing about a united Canada. They talked, too, about working with the caisses populaires Desjardins of Quebec, and the credit union movement across this country. There have been other meetings since, and I am very pleased that George May, the national chairman of the credit unions of Canada, from his office situated in the City of Toronto, is giving this proposition of co-operative investment in the oil industry his full and enthusiastic support.

Let no senator think that this movement is not strong or widely represented. I point out that Federated Co-ops is a western Canadian organization. From the lakehead west it has 850,000 members. Last year it did business of over $1 billion. The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool represents virtually all of the farmers in Saskatchewan, and I think it ranks, in volume of business, tenth in Canada. In terms of the size of corporations, therefore, it is a very large and successful farmers' and producers' co-operative, and they are interested.

When the Prime Minister came to Saskatchewan, we asked the co-operatives if they would like to be part of the evening, to share the banquet and hear Mr. Trudeau speak. They came in large numbers. The Federated Co-ops alone invited all of the members of their board of directors from Thunder Bay to Vancouver Island, and they were there. The Wheat Pool representatives also were there, as were the credit unions, along with Mr. George May and others. They heard the Prime Minister, and they met him and others the next morning at a meeting that lasted for one hour. It was a friendly meeting. The Prime Minister understands the co-operative movement. He said that after he graduated from college he bought his first motorcycle, and went down to Nova Scotia and Cape Breton to talk to Father Coady, one of the great founders of the co-operative movement, and one of the great persons of his day. Prime Minister Trudeau understands the principles of the co-operative movement.

At this meeting there was discussion not only about the desirability of putting together a large co-operative investment in the petroleum industry of this country, but there was also talk of national unity and working together. It was the opinion of these members of the co-operative movement in western Canada, some of whom are French-speaking, some of whom are bilingual, that there is a growing opportunity to work together with their counterparts in the Province of Quebec in a venture that will be a Canadian venture, and a unifying venture.

Remember that the co-operative movement has a very large membership. Carl Nickle comes from Calgary, and he makes the national news; but what is far more important to me than Carl Nickle, and coming out of the City of Calgary, is that Calgary has the fastest growing section of the co-operative movement in Canada today. Federated Co-ops has 100,000 members in that city, and their representatives were in Regina to hear the Prime Minister. They are enthusiastic, and they want to do something for Canadianization and for Canada.

The co-operative and credit union memberships across Canada total between 9 million and 10 million—they are rapidly approaching 10 million—and they control assets of $40 billion. They want to work with the federal government and with Petro-Canada.

I think the national energy policy as put forward by the federal government is wise, realistic, imaginative, and challenging to Canadians. The co-operatives, I believe, are accepting the challenge, and they will be prepared, working with the federal government and with Petro-Canada, to take their place and do their part in the Canadianization of the oil industry. As far as the co-operatives are concerned, they are saying, "We hope this will be just the first endeavour; that there will be others to follow."

I think one of the greatest things that has happened in this country in recent years is that there are now hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions of Canadians, who have substantial sums of money that, put together, would make an enormous investment. I think the government is on the right road. Exciting times are ahead and the national energy policy, as it is worked out, will be an important unifying influence in Canada.

Senator Bosa: Will the honourable senator permit a question? He alluded to the fact that the Province of Alberta was going to receive something like $100 billion by 1990 from taxation on oil. How much would the Province of Alberta have received under the Clark agreement that was supposed to have been signed the day after the Conservative government fell last year?

Senator Argue: I do not have those figures with me, and rather than guess, I would like to do some further research. I tried to do sufficient research to make sure that what I have said is accurate, and I would rather not guess at that amount. Obviously, it would have been a very large sum of money.

Senator Thompson: I have a question for the minister. He talked about the co-operatives and credit unions, and the huge amount of capital that they might invest, but I should like to ask him about the flow of funds for exploration. Is he assured, in his own mind, that there will be exploration funds available to free enterprise companies, and that they will take advantage of them.

Senator Argue: Absolutely. According to my reading of the budget statement and the budget papers, that is what the whole policy is all about. It is to provide these incentive grants to a greater proportion of Canadian companies—Canadian companies being defined as those that are at least 75 per cent Canadian owned. In respect of development in the Canada Lands, of each dollar spent on exploration 80 cents will come from federal incentive grants.

Senator Marshall: Leave your money in Canada Savings Bonds.

On motion of Senator Balfour, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, November 24, at 8 p.m.

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)

November 20, 1980

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981, were referred, has in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, November 6, 1980, examined the said Supplementary Estimates (B) and reports as follows:

(1) The Committee was authorized by the Senate as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of November 6, 1980 to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981.

(2) In obedience to the foregoing, your Committee examined the Supplementary Estimates (B) and heard evidence from the following officials of the Treasury Board: Mr. J. L. Manion, Secretary; Mr. D. J. McEachran, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch; and Mr. E. A. Radburn, Director, Estimates Division, Program Branch.

(3) These Supplementary Estimates (B) total $1,196 million. The budgetary expenditures total $1,302 million of which $300 million are statutory items and $1,001 million represent funds for which Parliament is being asked to provide new authority. The non-budgetary expenses, that is to say, loans, investments, and advances include $25 million to be voted. The total Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981 are now increased to $60,440 million.

(4) The Committee was particularly concerned by the allocation of $39.7 million to the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation for losses relating to the disposal of real estate. The Corporation is known to be facing considerable future losses on similar operations; therefore it is the recommendation of this Committee that the Treasury Board examine the possibility of establishing a reserve account to reflect these expected future losses, and thus more accurately reflect the true financial status of the Corporation.

(5) On a matter relating to the process of posting the estimates, we are concerned by the Treasury Board's practice of listing dollar votes authorizing the deletion of debts within various supplementary estimates. The Committee recognizes that the Treasury Board has established regular, complex and lengthy procedures to control such deletions, and that no particular urgency exists to record these actions in the estimates. Therefore, we recommend that such dollar votes for the deletion of debts should be reported only once per year in the main estimates, and not be scattered about the supplementary estimates.

(6) The witnesses were questioned regarding the government's continued funding of VIA Rail operations in light of the $30.6 million grant to VIA Rail for operating costs reported in these supplementary estimates. The witnesses will provide to the Committee information on total government funding provided to date to VIA Rail, and on the distribution of this funding between capital grants and operating subsidies.

(7) Finally, the expenditure of $9.95 million dollars for the information needs of the Energy Program of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources was questioned. We are concerned that this expenditure may reflect only part of the actual costs for information for this program, as it is not uncommon for sizeable portions of departmental spending for information dissemination to be reflected as expenditures for salaries and wages, and professional services. The witnesses will provide to this Committee information regarding the total distribution of information costs of the Department.

(8) Treasury Board supplied the Committee with a list giving additional explanations for the $1 Votes included in Supplementary Estimates (B) which is attached as an Appendix to this Report.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. Everett,
Chairman.

(Appendix to Report)

LIST OF ONE DOLLAR VOTES INCLUDED IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B), 1980-81

The 27 One Dollar Votes included in these Estimates are listed in Appendix I by ministry and agency along with the page number where each vote may be located in the Estimates.

These One Dollar Votes are grouped below into categories according to their prime purpose. The votes are also identified in Appendix I according to these categories. The category for each vote has been designated by an "X". In those instances where a vote falls into more than one category, the prime category is designated by an "X" and other categories by an "*".

A. Two votes which authorize the transfer of funds from one vote to another. (An explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in Supplementary Estimates.)

B. Ten votes which authorize the payment of grants. (An explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in Supplementary Estimates.)

C. Eight votes which authorize the deletion of debts (An explanation is provided in Supplementary Estimates.)

D. Three votes which amend provisions of previous Appropriation Acts. (Additional explanations are provided in Appendix II.)

E. Four other votes which:

—deem an individual eligible for a pension 1

—authorize payments and guarantees 3

(Additional explanations are provided in Appendix II.)

ADDITIONAL EXPLANATION
CATEGORY D

Energy, Mines and Resources

Vote 16b—To authorize an increase from $200 million to $225 million in the non-lapsing authority of the Petroleum Compensation Revolving Fund.

Explanation—The Petroleum Compensation Revolving Fund was established through Supplementary Estimates (A), 1978-79. The original limit of the Fund of $20 million was increased to $200 million through Supplementary Estimates (A), 1980-81. The Fund was converted from a non-budgetary to a budgetary authority through the Adjustment of Accounts Act passed in July of 1980. This Act also included the provision that further amendments to any of the Revolving Funds may be made through an Appropriation Act.

The purpose of the Fund is to pay the producers of Tar Sands oil in Canada (Syncrude and Suncor) the difference between the Canadian and the world price of oil. Revenues for the Fund are derived from a levy on each barrel of oil that is consumed in Canada. This levy has been recently raised from $1.00 to $1.75 per barrel (July 12, 1980). However, because of recent increases in the world price of oil and near-capacity production of both the Syncrude and Suncor plants, an increase of $25 million in the authorized limit is necessary to temporarily finance the additional compensation payments.

Regional Economic Expansion

Vote L16b—To amend the existing authority of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration Working Capital Advance Account to finance expenses in respect of the South Saskatchewan River Project.

Explanation—The Working Capital Advance Account was established in 1974-75 through Estimates to:

a) authorize advances made for the purposes of financing the recoverable portions of the costs of projects constructed by the Department on behalf of a province or a municipality; and;

b) credit amounts repaid by a province or a municipality in respect of advances made for recoverable projects under paragraph (a).

This authority does not permit the financing and recovery of operating and maintenance expenses. Authority is therefore requested to permit the charging of operating and maintenance expenses incurred in respect of the South Saskatchewan River Project and the crediting to the Account of any monies recovered from the Province of Saskatchewan on behalf of the Project. The amount outstanding at any time remains unchanged at $1.5 million.

With the passage of Bill C-22, this Account will be terminated at the end of 1980-81.

Science and Technology—National Research Council

Vote 15b—To increase the commitment limit by $700,000 for assistance toward research in Industry.

Explanation—Due to delays in placing research contracts, the Council over-commits in order to utilize funds provided for research purposes under the Industrial Research Assistance Program (IRAP).

This proposal would increase the commitment limit from $24.6 million to $25.3 million to correspond to the increase in funding from $20.9 million to $21.5 million, which is being financed by a transfer from National Research Council Vote 5.

ADDITIONAL EXPLANATIONS
CATEGORY E

Deem an individual eligible for a pension

Secretary of State

Vote 1b—To deem Mrs. Fauteux to be eligible for a monthly pension under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Lieutenant Governors Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act (for indexing purposes).

Explanation—It is proposed to provide a monthly pension to Mrs. Fauteux commencing September, 1981 in the same amount as if her husband had participated in the above superannuation plans, which are now available. Mr. Fauteux was unable to participate in any of the superannuation plans since they were not established at the time he served as a Member of Parliament and Lieutenant Governor of Quebec.

Authorizes payments and guarantees

Finance

Vote L18b—To authorize the issue of non-interest bearing non-negotiable demand notes amounting to $165,609,000, being the first installment to the International Development Association's Sixth Replenishment.

Explanation—Advances made to the International Development Association are used by the World Bank to provide loans to the least developed countries for development purposes at a nominal rate of interest. The Association has committed all of its monies for assistance (by June 30, 1980). Negotiations for the replenishment have been completed and authority is now required for the issue of demand notes totalling $165,609,000 in the 1980-81 fiscal year. This is the first installment of a commitment totalling $601,810,000, which will be paid over the next few years.

It should be noted that previous advances to the International Development Association replenishments have been authorized through Estimates.

Industry, Trade and Commerce

Vote L46b—To authorize the Minister to make payments and issue guarantees in connection with the natural rubber buffer stock to be established under the terms of the International Natural Rubber Agreement.

Explanation—Authority is required to participate in the International Natural Rubber Agreement through the setting up of a natural rubber buffer stock. This stock will be financed equally by natural rubber consuming and producing countries. Canada's share of this buffer stock over the next five years, for both payments and guarantees is not to exceed in the aggregate $12,500,000.

Vote L47b—To authorize the making of payments and the issuance of guarantees and promissory notes for the purchase of shares of the Common Fund for Commodities.

Explanation—The Common Fund for Commodities will be an international institution for the financing of stocking provisions within individual International Commodity Agreements and commodity related development measures. It is proposed that Canada should participate in the First Account (financing of stocking provisions) through the purchase of a specified number of shares. The total Canadian contribution in the current and subsequent fiscal years not to exceed in the aggregate $10,380,000.
